Archevites are doubtless the men of Erech (Gen. 10:10), of the ancient city Uruk (modern Warka) in southern Babylonia. Since the other names are those of cities, the Babylonians apparently are those of the city of Babylon. Susanchites were men of the city of Shushan or Susa (Neh. 1:1; Dan. 8:2; Esth. 1:2; 5; 3:15), the capital of ancient Elam. Dehavites must be revocalized with two MSS and LXXB and translated that is linking the Susanchites with the Elamites, which was doubtless originally an explanatory gloss to the less familiar Susanchites. The Elamites were a non-Semitic folk who dwelt in the great plain of the lower Tigris, along the northern shore of the Persian Gulf, and in the mountains enclosing the plain to the north and east. They frequently joined the Babylonians against the Assyrians (George G. Cameron, History of Early Iran [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1936], pp. 4-5).

Asnapper is certainly a corruption of Ashurbanipal, the last Assyrian king (669-633 B.C.), since only he captured Shushan (Susa) from which the captives (vs. 9) were brought (H. Gelzer, “Die Colonie des Osnapper,” Zeitschrift für aegyptische Sprache, XIII [1875], 81-82; Cameron, History of Early Iran, pp. 198-207). Deported and settled indicates that the Hebrew exile was not unique but a regular political technique used by the Assyrians with rebels. In exile people would be too busy adjusting to a new environment to be a threat to Assyria. Read the plural, cities of Samaria, with the LXX and Vulg. (cf. II Kings 17:24-26).

11. After the long list, a brief reference to the letter is needed to resume the subject. The salutation here greatly resembles that in the Aramaic papyri when a superior is addressed (Cowley, op. cit., No. 30, 1. 1; cf. No. 17, 1. 1).

12. Be it known to the king is appropriate for the report of royal informants and may have been a standard formula for introducing such reports (cf. vs. 13; 5:8). Such speculative questions, much less to presume to correct the actual course of history? All that we can fairly say is that Ezra and Nehemiah did then prevail over the authors of Ruth and Jonah, but that Jesus and Paul were later, “in God’s own good time,” raised up out of that very heritage. This also is the Lord’s doing; it is marvelous in our eyes” (Ps. 118:23). And in this reminder from the actual course of history there is age-long encouragement for all who to this day have to live and work in a world where sectarianism and racialism are still powerful, sowing their dragon’s teeth as of old.
come unto Jerusalem, building the rebellious and the bad city, and have set up the walls thereof, and joined the foundations. have gone to Jerusalem. They are rebuilding that rebellious and wicked city; they are finishing the walls and repairing the foun-

a report would normally reach the king indirectly through a scribe who would read it to him. Some Assyrian reports addressed to the king contain personal notes to the scribal intermediaries. One begins: "To king Sargon himself, my lord, may this come . . . Speak as follows to the king, my lord . . ." (Rewar Waterman, Royal Correspondence of the Assyrian Empire [Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1930], Part II, p. 217, No. 1027). Another appends the note: "Whoever you are O scribe who reads this, do not conceal it from the king your lord. Speak kindness before the king. May Bel (and) Nabû command kindness for you before the king" (ibid., Part II, p. 371, No. 1250). The very formula may be reflected in the appended note: "Now I have written to the king my lord. May the king my lord know" (ibid., Part I, pp. 120-21, No. 177; Part II, p. 29, No. 753).

Came up from you, lit., "came up from with you," need not imply a return from Ezra's group, for the expression may be merely geographical, meaning "from the East," where the king was. Since Nehemiah arrived at Jerusalem and built the walls before Ezra came (cf. Intro., pp. 561-62), the reference could not be to Ezra and his group. Rudolph (op. cit., pp. 44-45) dates this incident shortly before 445 B.C., possibly in 448 B.C., while the satrap Megabyzos was in revolt against Artaxerxes. Rebellious and wicked describe Jerusalem from the standpoint of overlords who had to send expeditions to crush rebels in the western provinces (II Kings 18:7-11, 15-20; 21:1-2; 25:1-6, 25-26).

The correspondence here is not concerned with the temple, as in I Esd. 2:18, 20, but with the city walls. The temple was finished by the time of Artaxerxes (but cf. 6:14). The Chronicler in placing the letter here merely illustrates the hostility of the adversaries. Torrey ("Medes and Persians," p. 2) contends that the Chronicler understood that the adversaries were playing a trick; by a lying accusation regarding the city wall the enemies succeeded in stopping all construction, including the temple, which was their real goal. But there is no temple mentioned in Ezra and its presence in I Esd. is easily explained as due to a misunderstanding of "palace" in Ezra 4:14 as "temple" since the same Hebrew word is used for both (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 43, n. 1).

Since the walls are still incomplete in vs. 13, "have finished the walls" (ASV) or have set up the walls is surely wrong. One can read are finishing, but it is preferable to follow Rudolph's emendation (ibid., p. 38), which suggests that the verb "they have begun" (ליים) has been lost by haplography after the very similar "the walls" (ᴀʙɪ噻), and that the verb following should be read "to finish," thus, "they have begun to finish the walls."

The long debated foundations, which represents a hitherto enigmatic Aramaic word (ʿuṣḥaṭyāʿi), is now explained plausibly as a distinctly Mesopotamian architectural term (Sumerian USH; Akkadian usšu) referring to a subfoundation double the thickness of the planned walls into which the walls were laid (Sidney Smith, "Foundations: Ezra iv, 12; v, 16; vi, 3," in I. Epstein, E. Levine, and C. Roth, eds., Essays in Honor of the Very Reverend Dr. J. H. Hertz [London: E. Goldston, 1944], pp. 385-96). The usšu is mentioned in an Akkadian building inscription by Artaxerxes (Ernst Herzfeld, Altpersische Inschriften [Berlin: Dietrich Reimer, 1938], p. 45, No. 22, 1. 5; R. G. Kent, "Old Persian Texts," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, IV [1945], 228). Perhaps such a structure is what Darius describes in his record of the building of his palace at Susa when he says, "Downward the earth was dug, until I reached rock in the earth. When the excavation had been made, rubble was packed down, some 40 cubits in depth, another (part) 20 cubits in depth. On that rubble the palace was constructed." (R. G. Kent, Old Persian [New Haven: American Oriental Society, 1950], pp. 142-44, Darius Susa F., II. 22-27, sec. 3e; cf. George G. Cameron, Persepolis Treasury Tablets [Chicago: University 13 Be it known now unto the king, that, if this city be builded, and the walls set up again, then will they not pay toll, tribute, and custom, and so thou shalt endamage the revenue of the kings.

14 Now because we have maintenance from the king’s palace, and it was not meet for us to see the king’s dishonor, therefore have we sent and certified the king:

15 That search may be made in the book of the records of thy fathers: so shalt thou find in the book of the records, and know that this city is a rebellious city, and hurt-dations. 13 Now be it known to the king that, if this city is rebuilt and the walls finished, they will not pay tribute, custom, or toll, and the royal revenue will be impaired. 14 Now because we eat the salt of the palace and it is not fitting for us to witness the king’s dishonor, therefore we send and inform the king, 15 in order that search may be made in the book of the records of your fathers. You will find in the book of the of Chicago Press, 1945], p. 17, n. 112.) Since architectural problems differed in stony Jerusalem from those in muddy Mesopotamian plains, the easterners who wrote the letter apparently applied the term they knew to some similar process employed by the Jews. With such a meaning for foundations the verb is best translated “being dug out” with the American Jewish Translation, supported by the Peshitta. Obviously the work was not very far along and the officials believed that prompt action would prevent the fortification of Jerusalem.

13. Tribute is an Akkadian loan word (mandatu) meaning a more or less voluntary gift made to an overlord (cf. Neh. 5:4 KJV). Usually closely linked with it is the billu, the assessed tribute imposed by the overlord. That is apparently related to the second term in the series (Aramaic הבילו) which is attested as “his tax” (נין) in an Aramaic ostracon from Egypt (Mark Lidzbarski, Ephemeris für semitische Epigraphik [Giessen: A. Töpelmann, 1908], II, 238-39). The third term, usually translated custom or toll because of its similarity to the Hebrew verb “go” (לעון), is still another Akkadian word (iliku) meaning corvée, taskwork, or feudal service owed the overlord, or its cash equivalent. It occurs (as לון) in the Aramaic notes in the margins of cuneiform tablets concerned with the ilku (Delaporte, Épigraphes araméens, p. 67, No. 73; p. 70, No. 78; pp. 70-71, No. 79).

Revenue is but an incorrect guess based on context. The difficult word is probably a Persian adverb meaning “in the end” (as in the ASV) or “finally” (Persian apatam-am; Schaedler, Iransche Beiträge I, p. 74). The warning thou shalt endamage would hardly be addressed to a king by his subjects. Better sense is given by a simple emendation (reading for פִּלָּבָה מַתְּנוֹת, “My king will be damaged” (Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 601, n. 1; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 39).

15. The book of the records is actually, as in I Esdras, the LXXL, and Vulg., “books of memoranda,” records kept by the Persian bureaucrats and their predecessors (cf.
ful unto kings and provinces, and that they have moved sedition within the same of old time: for which cause was this city destroyed.

16 We certify the king that, if this city be builded again, and the walls thereof set up, by this means thou shalt have no portion on this side the river.

17 ¶ Then sent the king an answer unto Rehum the chancellor, and to Shimshai the scribe, and to the rest of their companions that dwell in Samaria, and unto the rest beyond the river, Peace, and at such a time.

18 The letter which ye sent unto us hath been plainly read before me.

19 And I commanded, and search hath been made, and it is found that this city of old time hath made insurrection against kings, and that rebellion and sedition have been made therein.

20 There have been mighty kings also over Jerusalem, which have ruled over all countries beyond the river; and toll, tribute, and custom, was paid unto them.

N. Schneider, “Die Urkundenbehälter von Ur III und ihre archivalische Systematik,” Orientalia, N.S. IX [1940], 7; Cameron, Persepolis Treasury Tablets, pp. 9 ff., 20-23).

Your fathers is not “your ancestors” but “your predecessors,” the Babylonian kings.
The Persians regarded themselves as the legitimate successors of the Neo-Babylonians, for the writers here have in mind the earlier revolts leading to the destruction of Jerusalem. Nothing certain is known of Palestinian revolts under the early Persian kings.
But the incidents of Zech. 6:9-15 and the sudden disappearance of Zerubbabel suggest that the Jews may have proved rebellious during the reign of Darius (A. T. Olmstead, (2) Letter of Artaxerxes to Rehum and Shimshai (4:17-22 = I Esdras

2:25-29)

17. Instead of Artaxerxes I (cf. vs. 8), Josephus has Cambyses, whom he describes as “naturally bad.” Answer represents a Persian word (paitigama) which in modern Persian (paigam) means “message” (Scheftelowitz, op. cit., I, 51). The abrupt To Rehum is characteristic of address to an inferior also in the Aramaic papyri (Cowley, op. cit.,
No. 26, I, 1). Peace or “well-being” suggests the χαρά of Greek letters (cf. Acts 15:23; 23:26; Jas 1:1) but it is also found alone in the papyri (ibid., Nos. 39, 42, etc.), where it may be an abbreviation of the lengthy salutation, “The welfare of ... may the god seek abundantly at all times” (ibid., No. 30, II. 1-2; No. 17, II. 1-2; No. 21, I, 2, etc.).

18. Plainly read is rather “translated,” since it is a technical term referring to extemporaneous translation by a scribe, in the presence of the king, of material written in a foreign language into Persian, which the king could understand. Its Hebrew equivalent is in vs. 7. In Neh. 8:8 the term is used for translation from Hebrew to Aramaic (cf. Schaeder, Iranische Beiträge I, pp. 1-14). Since all versions, including the LXX, are confused by the term, its use here argues against fabrication of the letter in the late period and for the originality of the document containing it.

19-20. Search has been made implies search in the Babylonian files. Like the Assyrians, they must have kept full reports on political events in all areas of their

604
21 Give ye now commandment to cause these men to cease, and that this city be not builded, until another commandment shall be given from me.

22 Take heed now that ye fail not to do this: why should damage grow to the hurt of the kings?

23 Now when the copy of king Artaxerxes' letter was read before Rehum, and Shimshai the scribe, and their companions, they went up in haste to Jerusalem unto the Jews, and made them to cease by force and power.

24 Then ceased the work of the house of God which is at Jerusalem. So it ceased unto the second year of the reign of Darius king of Persia.

empire (cf. vs. 15; Waterman, Royal Correspondence, Part IV, pp. 23-24). Ruled over all . . . beyond the river is an unhistorical exaggeration since Jerusalem never approximated rule over all Palestine and Syria. The verse looks like an expression of Jewish nationalistic pride and as such may be a Jewish expansion of a more moderate statement. But Batten (Ezra and Nehemiah, pp. 178-79) suggests that the threat of a strong Judean king, such as is found in the cuneiform record of Hezekiah's strong resistance to Sennacherib (Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, II, 119-21, sec. 240) may have been sufficient to move a suspicious Persian ruler to such action.

21-22. Since only the king had the prerogative to do so (cf. 6:12), make a decree shows the men to be his representatives. Until a decree is made by me, lacking in I Esdras, may be a later addition, anticipating the granting of permission in Neh. 2:4-6. "The throne" would properly interpret the kings of the M.T.

(3) WORK STOPPED AT JERUSALEM (4:23-24=I Esdras 2:30)

23-24. Rehum's title (vss. 8, 9, 17) has been lost here as one MS, the LXXI, and the Peshitta show. By force and power is, lit., "by arm and force." "Arm" is often a symbol of strength (Ezek. 51:17; Prov. 31:17; Dan. 11:15, 31). Power or "force" (יָפִי) is used for "army" in the Aramaic papyri. In I Esdras the text is interpreted, "with horsemen and a multitude in battle array," and Josephus does likewise. Rudolph (op. cit., p. 44) plausibly suggests that whatever had been built in Jerusalem was then destroyed, leaving the desolation which caused Nehemiah's grief (Neh. 1:3). Vs. 24 is probably due to the Chronicler, who disturbed the original order of the Aramaic document (cf. Intro., p. 559) and then had to revert to the situation in vs. 5 in order to resume his narrative in ch. 5. The expression king of Persia, which he uses elsewhere (vss. 5, 7; 1:1-2, 8; 3:7; 7:1) supports this view. The word then which introduces the verse and relates it to the chronological sequence that precedes (Darius, vss. 2-3; Xerxes, vs. 6; and Artaxerxes, vss. 7-22), suggests that the Chronicler may have confused Darius I (522-486 B.C.) with Darius II (423-404 B.C.), which would be too late for the completion of the temple. Schaeder regards then as a reference to events in the days of Cyrus which he believes were originally in the Aramaic document but were omitted because the Chronicler had already dealt with them (1:1-4:4). Schaeder (Iranische Beiträge I, p. 23) suggests that then was copied unthinkingly, thus making a false chronology. This hypothesis cannot be proved. Rudolph (op. cit., pp. 39-40) believes that the Chronicler who wrote the verse in Hebrew wrote "Thus" (יָנָא), in Hebrew, which was corrupted to then when it was translated into Aramaic (זָנַא < שָׁנָא > נָא > נַא > נָא)
5 Now the prophets, Hag’gai and Zechar’iah the son of Iddo, prophesied to the Jews who were in Judah and Jerusalem, in the name of the God of Israel who was over them. 2 Then Zeru’babel the son of She-al’ti-el and Jeshua the son of Jo’zadak arose and began to rebuild the house of God which is in Jerusalem: and with them were the prophets of God, helping them.

e) Reign of Darius (5.1–6.22)

The story of the temple, interrupted at 4:5, is resumed in 5:1–6:18, part of the Aramaic document already encountered in 4:6–23. As the sequence of kings shows, 5:1–6:18 must have preceded 4:6–23 originally.

After brief reference to resumption of work on the temple under the stimulus of Haggai and Zechariah (5:1–2) the writer describes an official investigation of the Jewish activity in Jerusalem (5:3–5) and incorporates verbatim the official report to the king (5:6–17), which explains the situation the officials found (5:8) and gives a statement of the Jewish defense (5:11–16). The officials called for a check of Jewish claims and requested further instructions (5:17).

(1) The Temple Building Is Begun (5:1–2=I Esdras 6:1–2)

5:1–2. In Darius’ second year (520 B.C.), after Haggai’s first prophecy (Aug. 29, 520 B.C.; cf. Hag. 1:1), the work on the temple was resumed (Sept. 21, 520 B.C.; cf. Hag. 1:15). The date in Hag. 1:1 was doubtless the source of both that in Ezra 4:24b and I Esdras 6:1. The name Haggai is found frequently in the postexilic periods in the cuneiform records of Babylonia as well as in the Aramaic papyri. The paternity of Haggai is never given, but he is always called “the prophet” (Hag. 1:1, 12; 2:1, 10; cf. Ezra 6:14). The RSV wrongly follows I Esdras here in omitting the title. Zechariah (“God Has Remembered”), on the basis of Zech. 1:1, should be the “descendant” of Iddo the prophet rather than his son or “grandson.” In cuneiform records of the period the third name in a paternal record usually refers to a distinguished ancestor whose name is proudly perpetuated. According to the Chronicler (II Chr. 13:22) “Iddo the prophet” was a person of distinction in the time of King Abijah (913–911/910 B.C.). Such abbreviation of genealogy is found elsewhere in the cases of Ezra (7:1; cf. I Chr. 6:14–15), Laban (Gen. 29:5; cf. Gen. 24:24), and Jehu (I Kings 19:16; II Kings 9:20; cf. II Kings 9:2, 14).

The God of Israel is found elsewhere several times, particularly in the Aramaic material (6:14; 7:15; I Chr. 5:26), but the Chronicler usually has “The Lord, the God of Israel” (cf. I Chr. 15:12, 14; 16:4, 56; etc.), which I Esdras and the LXXA have here. Even unto them: The last word in vs. 1 dangles awkwardly, disconnected and meaningless. Its alternate translation, who was over them, makes good sense, although the ambiguous pronoun could mean either the Jews or the prophets.

For Zerubbabel and Jeshua see Exeg. on 2:2; 3:2. Began to build need not mean ignorance of the work of Sheshbazzar since he is mentioned in vs. 16. The Aramaic word here translated began, like later Greek ἐγένετο (ἐγένετο), is often redundantly prefixed to a verb in narration without temporal significance (Gustaf Dalman, The

5:1–6:22. Prophetic Persistence Through Obstructions.—Resuming his story of the rebuilding of the temple that had been interrupted in 4:6, the Chronicler avails himself of further Aramaic source material bearing on the political legitimacy of the undertaking, as having the written sanction of a Persian king and his officials. In so doing he gives incidental recognition (5:1–2) to the actual movers in the whole enterprise, the prophets Haggai and Zechariah. The respective roles of the prophet and the layman in every constructive achievement, then
3 At the same time came to them Tat'na, governor on this side the river, and Shethar-boznai, and their companions, and said thus unto them, Who hath commanded you to build this house, and to make up this wall?

Words of Jesus, tr. D. M. Kay [Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1909], pp. 26-28; Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 51, note d, p. 189). But since apparently little evidence remained of the former work, which seems limited to substructure (vs. 16), Zerubbabel actually began again with a new substructure (3:10-11). Rebuild is more accurate. While helping could mean manual labor, it is probable that the prophetic "help" means moral support and encouragement (cf. 6:14). The same verb is used in the Aramaic version of the Behistun inscription in the sense of "support" in Darius' claim "(the God) Ahuramazda helped me" in battle (Cowley, op. cit., pp. 251-59, II. 2, 5, 13, 19, 28). Josephus, too, interpreted it as moral support, claiming that the prophets "urged them to take courage and not to be apprehensive of any untoward action by the Persians" (Antiquities XI. 4. 5).

(2) Official Investigation of the Building of the Temple (5:3-5 = I Esd. 6:3-6)

The narrative of the investigation by officials of the Persian court was begun and the line of questioning was indicated, but when the writer realized that the story would be duplicated in the letter to follow (vss. 3-4; cf. vss. 9-10), he stopped abruptly and appended the letter itself (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 51).

3. The date intended by at the same time cannot be determined closely, but the narrative suggests that it was soon after building was begun, when enough had been done to attract attention to the project. External walls had been raised (vs. 8) and work was progressing rapidly. Since the beginning of Darius' reign was marked by revolts throughout the empire, alert officials reported the seeds of sedition wherever they began to sprout. The tone of the letter suggests a routine visit by unbiased officials (vs. 17), but the Chronicler (4:5) and Josephus regard it as part of a deliberate campaign of harassment of the Jews, perpetrated by the Samaritans through persuasion or bribery of local officials. Josephus (Antiquities XI. 4. 4) departs from biblical tradition to reflect the natural concern of the official who inquired "who it was that had given them permission to build the temple in such a way that it was more like a fortress than a sanctuary."

Since Zerubbabel is not mentioned specifically in vss. 5, 9, and the elders are mentioned, some have dated the visit after the sudden disappearance of Zerubbabel. While it is true that he may have been included in the list of elders, silence regarding him in this situation is surprising, and may possibly be evidence for the date of this episode. A. T. Olmstead linked Zerubbabel's disappearance with a Jewish revolt timed to coincide with that of Nebuchadrezzar III and with Darius' Egyptian campaign ("Darius and His Behistun Inscription," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures, LV [1938], 410-12; cf. the same author's History of the Persian Empire, pp. 138-40). But it has been shown that the revolts were past, and for Zerubbabel's disappearance one must "presuppose a comparatively peaceful situation in the Persian Empire," perhaps "immediately after the Jews resumed work on the temple, i.e., somewhere in the latter part of Darius' second year of reign" (519 B.C.; Arno Poebel, "The Duration of the Reign and now, are shrewdly suggested in 5:2: the laymen rose up—and there was no enduring accomplishment until they did; but with them were the prophets of God helping them. There is likewise specific mention (vss. 14, 16) of the apparently abortive early attempt at rebuilding under Cyrus, made by Sheshbazzar (1:8, 11), whom later tradition, as the Exeg. points out, either slurred over, or confused with Zerubbabel, or sought to erase altogether. Into most of the major accomplishments of history go such premature attempts and failures. Their final 4 Then said we unto them after this manner, What are the names of the men that make this building? finish this structure? 4 They also asked them this, “What are the names of the men of Smerdis, the Magian, and the Reigns of Nebuchadnezzar III and Nebuchadnezzar IV,” American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures, LVI [1939], 145. Rudolph (loc. cit.), because he believes that the inner walls were erected and the temple almost completed, dates the incident to 517 B.C., closer to 515 B.C. when the temple was finished (6:15) than to its beginning in 520 B.C. But this hypothesis rests heavily upon a faulty interpretation of a word (نبيذ) in vs. 3 below) which he translates as “paneled.”

Tattenai, formerly identified with Ushtamnu (Hystanes), the satrap over Babylonia and Trans-Euphratia (Bruno Meissner, “abilité,” Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XVII [1897], 191-92), was apparently his subordinate. He is almost certainly mentioned in a business document of the time of Darius I as “the governor [NAM = pakhat] of Trans-Euphratia” (A. T. Olmstead, “Tattenai, Governor of ‘Across the River,’” Journal of Near Eastern Studies, III [1944], 46). The title governor is thus quite elastic, sometimes indicating the great satrap, sometimes, as here, his subordinate, ruling but part of the satrapy, and at times even a more limited subordinate (Hag. 1:1) whose authority was confined to Judea, a part of Trans-Euphratia (cf. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II, 115, n. 3). Albrecht Alt would interpret the latter as simply “commissioner,” insisting that the official had but temporary authority to complete a limited and specific task to which he was appointed (“Die Rolle Samarias bei der Entstehung des Judentums,” Festschrift Otto Procksch [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1934], pp. 23-24).

Sheshar-bozenai need not be emended to Shatibarzana (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 46; cf. Cowley, op. cit.; pp. 11-12, No. 5, l. 16) since it would form a good Persian name (Shathrabujyana; “Delivering the Kingdom”), which may also be found in the papyri (Raymond A. Bowman, “An Aramaic Journal Page,” The American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures, LVIII [1941], 305, 312; col. C, l. 4). The second element of the name is found alone as an epithet in the Aramaic incantations (J. A. Montgomery, Aramaic Incantation Texts from Nippur [Philadelphia: University Museum, 1918], No. 40, ll. 17-18, cf. pp. 252-54). Like Shimshai (4:8), this official was probably a royal scribe. Their companions are identified as “the investigators” (vs. 6).

This wall is proved an incorrect translation by the several occurrences of the Aramaic word it represents (우스하르난) in the papyri (Cowley, op. cit.; No. 26, ll. 5, 9, 21; No. 27, l. 18; No. 30, l. 11). There the term refers to materials required to repair a boat, to objects stolen from a temple, and to some material from a temple which could be burned. It has been recognized that the word “must be taken in a wide sense” (ibid., p. 102). It has been well translated as “material” or “equipment” by Harry Torczyner who, however, finally wrongly identifies the word here in Ezra with the building itself (“Anmerkungen zu den Papyrusurkunden von Elephantine,” Orientalische Literaturzeitung, XV [1912], 399). The Greek οπονια, used by the LXX here and in vs. 9, seems appropriate for it can mean “supplies” (for war) or “apparatus” (for a banquet or for the stage). In Ezra it could refer either to prepared stones, beams, or other materials awaiting the builders, or to equipment or furnishings for the completed temple.

4. “We told them” of the ASV, appropriate in the letter that follows (vss. 7-17), is out of place in a narrative in the third person. They also asked is better but inexact, since the verb of the M.T. is said. Render with the LXX, Ethiopic, Peshitta versions and one achievement is made possible by a creative combination of the initiative of men with the ripeness of the times and the conditions, under what 5:5 calls the eye of their God—a symbol of “providential watchfulness” (Exeg.). Such co-operation between different callings, and between different generations, is energized by the religious faith that can continue to say alike of unfinished tasks from the past and of new beginnings for the future, We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth (5:11).

In chs. 5–6 the Chronicler is plainly concerned
5 But the eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, that they could not cause them to cease, till the matter came to Darius: and then they returned answer by letter concerning this matter.

6 The copy of the letter that Tatnai, governor on this side the river, and Shethar-boznai, and his companions the Apharsachites, which were on this side the river, sent unto Darius the king:

7 They sent a letter unto him, wherein was written thus; Unto Darius the king, all peace.

MS, "they said to them as follows." It is lacking in I Esdras and may be an addition from vs. 9 (so Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 26; Hermann Gutehe and L. W. Batten, The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1901; "The Sacred Books of the Old Testament"], p. 34; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 46-47). What are the names? Lit., "Who are they, the names?" an idiom found also in Judg. 13:17. The names, which may have included Zerubbabel and Jeshua, are nowhere preserved. After answering the first question (vs. 3), the names may have been forgotten as unimportant. More likely they were sent in a separate list. In I Esdras 6:12 it is said that the Jews were required to furnish such a list "in writing."

5. The eye of their God symbolized providential watchfulness (Pss. 33:18-19; 34:15-16). The matter, elsewhere translated "the decree" (6:14) is here a report, in the sense customary in Akkadian (cf. 4:8; Dan. 6:2). The report is the letter that follows (vss. 7-17). The answer (cf. 4:18, 23) is found in 6:6-12. By letter is implied by the narrative but has no counterpart in Aramaic.

(3) Report of Tattenai to Darius (5:6-17=I Esdras 6:7-22)

6. Copy (cf. 4:11, 23) and letter (cf. 4:8, 11) are loan words from the Persian and Akkadian respectively. Aphaarsachites are not the governors (RSV); the latter renders "the rulers" (οἱ γυμνῶνεσ) of I Esdras 6:7. Nor is the term a transcription of Greek ἔφαρχος, governor (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 174; contra W. F. Albright, "The Date and Personality of the Chronicler," Journal of Biblical Literature, XL [1921], 114). The LXX and Vulg. treat it incorrectly as a proper name. Herzfeld (Zoroaster and His World, I, 171) identified the Aphaarsachites with the "Apharsites" of 4:9. Eilers most plausibly identifies them with the Persian frasaka, "investigator," which is also implied by the "watcher" (nawatfr) of the Ethiopic version (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 50).

7. A letter (cf. 4:17) is preferable to a report since it represents the Persian word used in 4:17. The all of all peace is unique in Aramaic epistolary salutation, but the word is attested by I Esdras 6:8 where, however, as "all things" it is transferred to the next sentence. The word translated all is really an adverb (J. A. Montgomery, "Adverbial kūla in Biblical Aramaic and Hebrew," Journal of the American Oriental Society, XLIII [1923], 391-95). The expression resembles superficially the "Heartiest greetings" (πλειστα χαιρειν) or "Many greetings" (πολλα χαιρειν) sometimes found in Greek letters of Hellenistic Egypt. But it is probably a token abbreviation of a longer Aramaic greeting who are building this building?" 5 But the eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, and they did not stop them till a report should reach Darius and then answer be returned by letter concerning it.

6 The copy of the letter which Tat'tenai the governor of the province Beyond the River and She'far-bo'znai and his associates the governors who were in the province Beyond the River sent to Darius the king; 7 they sent him a report, in which was written as follows: "To Darius the king, all to make full use of all Aramaic sources at his disposal, showing the political approval given by various Persian kings to the rebuilding of the temple. In ch. 6 he cites a memorandum of Cyrus to his officials, and another of instruction by Darius I (under whom the temple was completed in 515 B.C.), promising both official sanction and financial support in the great task, in accordance with Persian policy in these matters. Either because he found the name of Artaxerxes interpolated in his texts, or because he himself was confused as to the Persian king

609
8 Be it known unto the king, that we went into the province of Judea, to the house of the great God, which is builded with great stones, and timber is laid in the walls, and this work goeth fast on, and prospereth in their hands.

9 Then asked we those elders, and said unto them thus, Who commanded you to build this house, and to make up these walls?

(cf. 4:17; 7:12) such as “The welfare (יַעַשְׁת) of —— may the Gods altogether (נָלַל) seek abundantly at all times” (Cowley, op. cit., p. 140, No. 41, 1. 1). Since “and now,” which usually marks the end of the salutation (cf. 4:12, 13, 17), is missing here, Bewer (Der Text des Buches Ezra, p. 58) regards the all as an early corruption of that expression.

8. For be it known see Exeg. on 4:12. The province of Judea, a subdivision of the satrapy of “Babylon and Trans-Euphratia,” may represent such an administrative division as that over which Assyria formerly had appointed a “district ruler” (ambel-pakhatti; cf. Abel, op. cit., II, 115).

I Esdras 6:8 has additional material, at least part of which apparently has been lost from the M.T. Since some of the data is presupposed later (e.g., “those elders” in vs. 9). Therefore, after the province of Judea, read, “We found in the city of Jerusalem the elders of the Jews building . . . .” which must be genuine (cf. Guthe and Batten, op. cit., p. 55; Bewer, loc. cit.; Rudolph, loc. cit.). The object of “building” is the house. Thus what is translated to is actually an Aramaic indicator of the object. The great God has long been regarded as strange for a Persian official and therefore evidence of Jewish composition. But as I Esdras 6:9 shows, great here modifies not God but the house of . . . God. Thus we read, “We went to the province of Judea [and we found, in the city of Jerusalem, the elders of the Jews building] the great house of God.”

As the Greek versions show, great stones is certainly wrong. The LXX has “choice” for great, while I Esdras 6:9 has the double translation “polished and costly” (cf. I Kings 7:9-11) with no indication of size. The usual explanation, deriving great from “round,” is forced and impossible (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 140). The word (יַעַשְׁת) is now found in Aramaic also on a series of mortars and pestles of gray-green chert from Persepolis (E. F. Schmidt, The Treasury of Persepolis [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1939], pp. 61-62 and Fig. 41) which bear in part the inscription “[So and so] made this mortar of gl” (יתַעַשְׁת). It is encountered also in a Mandaic incantation text, where Cyrus H. Gordon translates it as “unsplit stone” (蝥וקדנ (“Aramaic and Mandaic Magical Bowls,” Archiv Orientalni, IX [1987], pp. 96-97 and Pl. XII, Bowl M, l. 20). Although its etymology remains uncertain, the context suggests some kind of stone or “stone” in general. The Semitic stones here and in 6:4 may then be an explanatory gloss to the foreign word.

Timber is laid in the walls (cf. 6:4) is too ambiguous for identifying the type of construction. Timber with brick is found even in early times in Egypt, Babylonia, and Greece, but stone and timber, a weak combination, is more rare. Cretan houses of under whom the task was finished, he ascribes the latter document to Artaxerxes. Complicated as are these textual and chronological problems, they suggest the difficulties against which the returning exiles labored, and the importance to them of official support against the opposition of their neighbors and the paucity of their own resources, thus confirming the picture of poverty and apathy given in the books of Haggai and Zechariah. More important than official support in overcoming these obstacles was the indomitable Hebrew faith reflected in 6:12, 22. The God whom they served would overthrow their enemies, provide new allies, and give them strength of hand and joy of heart for the work of the house of God, the God of Israel.
10 We asked their names also, to certify thee, that we might write the names of the men that _were_ the chief of them.
11 And thus they returned us answer, saying, We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth, and build the house that was builded these many years ago, which a great king of Israel builded and set up.
12 But after that our fathers had provoked the God of heaven unto wrath, he gave them into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, the Chaldean, who destroyed this house, and carried the people away into Babylon.
13 But in the first year of Cyrus the king of Babylon, _the same_ king Cyrus made a decree to build this house of God.

masonry had great wooden beams tying in the stone both horizontally and vertically (J. D. S. Pendlebury, _The Archaeology of Crete_ [London: Methuen & Co., 1939], pp. 98, 132, 188; and Pls. XXI, 1; XXIX; XXX, 1). But this is not the usual conception of the Jewish temple and is improbable. Stone and wood were used together in the walls of the temple court (cf. I Kings 6:36; 7:12) but scarcely in the walls of the temple itself. Rudolph, thinking of his interpretation in vs. 3, regards the wood as paneling for the inner walls (cf. I Kings 6:15), but this, too, is improbable. The reference is probably to the fixing of cedar beams into and across the walls to support the roof (cf. I Kings 6:9). Goeth fast on or goes on diligently interprets a Persian word (Old Persian _usprna_) which Schaeder identifies (in a personal communication to Rudolph, _loc. cit._) as "completely." Read here, "And that work is being done thoroughly" (cf. 6:8, 12-13; 7:17, 21, 26).

11-17. This long Jewish answer to the first question of the officials (vss. 3, 9), a long-range historical review, was a favorite device of Jewish writers (cf. Neh. 9:6-37). A more direct answer could have been given, but this type of answer is certainly more effective. Because of its apologetic tone and because its course of history is that stressed by the Chronicler, many conclude that the Chronicler has worked it over or may have even written it himself. But since the explanation is a Jewish defense, such as might be expected under the circumstances, there seems no good reason to challenge its validity as an actual scribal record of the Jewish answer.

11. Answer, here used of oral response, is the same Persian word elsewhere used of a "letter" (4:17; 5:7). The _great king_, of course, was Solomon (I Kings 5:1-7:51).

12. Angered or provoked ... unto wrath implies very violent anger, for the verb, meaning "to tremble violently," is also used of the movement of earthquake. When the people ignored or rejected an agreement made between their fathers and God (cf. Jer. 7:17-20; 11:1-12), it was believed that God need no longer defend Israel but could become their vengeful enemy (II Chr. 36:14-16). _Gave them_ expresses the belief that God could and did use foreign people as instruments for the punishment of Israel (cf. 1:2; Judg. 2:13-15; 4:1-2; 6:1; etc.). Nebuchadrezzar II (604-562 B.C.) besieged and destroyed Jerusalem in 586 B.C. and carried off many Jews to Babylon (Jer. 39:1-18; II Kings 24:1-25:30). Chaldean indicates the tribal groups from which Nebuchadrezzar descended; not of the line of old Babylonian kings but of a nomadic tribe that settled at the headwaters of the Persian Gulf about the tenth century B.C. and became the Neo-Babylonian rulers after the decline and fall of Assyria.

13. With this verse the narrative reaches the point at which 1:1 begins. If the Chronicler were author, we should expect a reference to the return from Babylon, one 14 And the vessels also of gold and silver of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezzar took out of the temple that was in Jerusalem, and brought them into the temple of Babylon, those did Cyrus the king take out of the temple of Babylon, and they were delivered unto one, whose name was Sheshbazzar, whom he had made governor:

15 And said unto him, take these vessels, go, carry them into the temple that is in Jerusalem, and let the house of God be builded in his place.

16 Then came the same Sheshbazzar, and laid the foundation of the house of God house of God should be rebuilt. 14 And the gold and silver vessels of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple that was in Jerusalem and brought into the temple of Babylon, these Cyrus the king took out of the temple of Babylon, and they were delivered to one whose name was Shesh-bazzar, whom he had made governor; 15 and he said to him, “Take these vessels, go and put them in the temple which is in Jerusalem, and let the house of God be rebuilt on its site.” 16 Then this Shesh-bazzar came and laid the founda-of his favorite themes. King of Babylon (cf. 1:1) is corrected to “king of Persia” in the Peshitta, but it is justified in E Esdras by the explanation “the first year that Cyrus reigned over the country of Babylon.” For the decree cf. 1:24; 6:3-5.

14. For vessels see 1:7-11; 6:5; II Kings 25:15-17. The temple of Babylon, “his own temple” in I Esdras 6:18, was Esagila, of which Nebuchadrezzar calls himself “patron.” Herodotus (History I, 181-83) describes some of the glories of that temple (cf. G. R. Tabouis, Nebuchadnezzar [New York: McGraw Hill Book Co., 1981], pp. 29 ff.; Vincent Scheil and M. Dieulafoy, Esagil ou le Temple de Bél-Marduk à Babylone [Paris: Imprimerie Nationale, 1913]. Whose name was Sheshbazzar (cf. 1:8) is, lit., Sheshbazzar, his name.” The expression “his name” is good Persian and must not be omitted with the Greek versions, H. L. Strack (Grammatik des biblisch Aramäischen [4th ed.; Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1905], p. 8*, note s), and Bewer (op. cit., p. 60) as an accidental anticipation of the whom he had made, which has the same consonantal structure (るもの). “His name” also occurs in the Aramaic copy of the Behistun Inscription after proper names where the Old Persian text has nāma, and also in several other papyri (Cowley, op. cit., Nos. 28, 33, 66:1, and the Ahiqar Papyrus; cf. Dan. 2:26; 4:8, 19; Antoine Meillet, Grammaire du Vieux-Perse, ed. E. Benveniste [Paris: É. Champion, 1931], p. 179; E. L. Johnson, Historical Grammar of the Ancient Persian Language [New York: American Book Co., 1917], p. 234, sec. 596). In 1:8 Sheshbazzar was simply “prince of Judah.” His title, here translated governor, is an ambiguous one (cf. Exeg. on vs. 3). Like Zerubbabel (Hag. 1:1) and Nehemiah (Neh. 5:14), he would be ranked below Tattenai (Ezra 5:3). Possibly the title here was equivalent to the later Greek ethnarch. Others posit for him more limited authority, temporary assignment to a specific task (cf. vs. 3) and some render “deputy” (cf. Kurt Galling, Syrien in der Politik der Achaemeniden [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1937; “Der Alte Orient”], p. 32; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 62, 64).

15. The usual interpretation has a contradiction between the two parts of the verse, the first half presumes a standing temple while the second permits the building of one. Batten (op. cit., pp. 137-38) omits reference to the temple, and implies storage in Jerusalem in some temporary place. The word translated temple here and in vs. 14 may also be translated “palace” (cf. 4:3; Dan. 4:29; 5:5; 6:18). Bewer (loc. cit.) therefore avoids the contradiction by translating “palace,” implying the governor’s palace. Rudolph (op. cit., p. 52) objects, but his solution through an explicatory conjunction (“it, namely the House of God, shall be built”) is implausible and unsatisfactory. It is probable that the temple here anticipates the building of such a structure. The same word, place or site, is used in an Aramaic papyrus for the site of the former Jewish temple in Egypt on which a new one was to be built (Cowley, op. cit., No. 32, 1. 8).

16. Laid the foundation involves Sheshbazzar in an act elsewhere assigned to Zerubbabel (4:12). Here men of the time of Zerubbabel refer to Sheshbazzar as someone who lived some time before. Tradition of the return and attempt at reconstruction under which is in Jerusalem: and since that time even until now hath it been in building, and yet it is not finished.

17 Now therefore, if it seem good to the king, let there be search made in the king's treasure house, which is there at Babylon, whether it be so, that a decree was made of Cyrus the king to build this house of God at Jerusalem, and let the king send his pleasure to us concerning this matter.

Then Darius the king made a decree, and search was made in the house of the rolls, where the treasures were laid up in Babylon.

Sheshbazzar persisted and could not be ignored, even though, for sentimental as well as historical reasons, Zerubbabel was associated with the building of the second temple. The persistent memory of an earlier attempt at building embarrassed later generations who could not explain the failure of so holy a mission, and it confused historians of later times who tried to record the history of the temple. Sheshbazzar's acts were first slurred over, then deliberately identified with those of Zerubbabel. Deliberate attempts were made in ancient times to erase Sheshbazzar from Jewish history, and such efforts have continued down to our own day. But it is likely that a relatively small but enthusiastic group returned in the time of Cyrus and also that an attempt at building the temple was made. Conditions were even more unfavorable then than in the time of Haggai, and the crude beginning was abortive. About eighteen years later traces of the effort were no longer discernible and a new beginning had to be made.

For foundation see Exeg. on 4:12. Not laid but "gave" is the verb used here (cf. 4:12). Guthe and Batten (op. cit., p. 63) see Persian influence here, since Old Persian dā means both "give" and "make," and in trilingual inscriptions Babylonian "give" (nadānu) has the same significance, presumably under Persian influence. Such use of "give" is also found in the Aramaic papyri (Cowley, op. cit., No. 81, l. 111; Ahiqar, l. 170).

17. With vs. 16 the Jewish account is finished. The transition to the officials' own request is marked by Now, therefore or Therefore—literally the same "and now" which elsewhere separated the salutation from the body of the letter (4:8, 10, 11). If it seem good is a characteristic deferential statement used in correspondence of the Persian period when subordinates ventured to make suggestions or petitions to their superiors. Similar usage is found in the papyri (Cowley, op. cit., No. 27, ll. 19, 21, 22; No. 90, l. 23a; No. 31, l. 22. The treasure house is, lit., "the house of the treasures." The royal archives reflects the translation of 1 Esdras 6:21. No archival rooms have yet been found at Babylon, but they must have been similar to those excavated at the treasury at Persepolis. There documents were deposited in several rooms adjacent to the Court of Reception. Nearly eight hundred clay tablets were found in a tablet room, while in the papyrus and parchment room nearby only a few bits of charred cloth and some clay labels (bullae) bearing the seals of Darius and Xerxes bore witness to the very hot fire that had destroyed the flammable contents of the room at the burning of Persepolis (Schmidt, Treasury of Persepolis, pp. 33-37, Fig. 11). Babylon would be a natural place to look for early records of Cyrus. It was there that Hormuzd Rassam found the famous and valuable Cyrus Cylinder now in the British Museum (cf. O. E. Hagen, "Keilschrifturkunden zur Geschichte des Königs Cyrus," Beiträge zur Assyriologie, II [1891-93], 205).

(4) Answer of Darius (6:1-12=1 Esdras 6:23-34)

The requested search for Cyrus' edict (5:17) is first described (vss. 1-2) and its substance is quoted (vss. 3-5) before Darius' own instructions to his officers are given.
2 And there was found at Achmetha, in the palace that is in the province of the Medes, a roll, and therein was a record thus written:

3 In the first year of Cyrus the king, the same Cyrus the king made a decree concerning the house of God at Jerusalem, Let

His orders grant the Jews permission to build the temple without molestation and provide for its support when it is finally completed (vs. 6-12). As a result of the king's assistance the temple was finished (vs. 14-15) and dedicated (vs. 16-18). The Chronicler then appended a description of the Passover and the feast of Unleavened Bread, which fell due shortly after the dedication of the building (vs. 19-22).

6:1-2. Then means when the report (5:7-17) was received at the Persian court. Instead of made a decree one expects an informal "gave an order" here, but the Persian king used only the decree in his administration. House of the rolls is, lit., "house of letters" or "house of documents." Josephus and I Esdras interpret it as archives. Since such rooms for documents were found in association with the treasury at Persepolis (cf. 5:17) it is not necessary to transpose the text to read "the storeroom where the documents were stored" (Julius Wellhausen, "Die Rückkehr der Juden aus dem babylonischen Exil," Nachrichten von der königliche Gesellschaft der Wissenschaft zu Göttingen [1895], p. 176; Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 192; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 54), and we can retain with the M.T., where the treasuries were laid up. Although search may have been made in Babylon, as had been suggested (5:17), the edict was actually found at Ecbatana (modern Hamadan), the former capital of Media which, because of its elevation and pleasant climate, became the summer resort of the Persian kings. Cyrus spent two summer months in Ecbatana, three spring months in Susa, and the rest of the year at Babylon (Xenophon Cyropaedia VIII. 6. 22; Strabo Geography XI. 13. 1). Shortly after his accession Cyrus retired to Ecbatana (539-538 B.C.), leaving the government at Babylon first to his general Gobryas and later to Crown Prince Cambyses (cf. Nabonidus Chronicle, col. III, II. 24 ff. in Sidney Smith, Babylonian Historical Texts, p. 118; Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 57). Read neither palace nor capital to designate Ecbatana but translate "fortress" (Akkadian birtu) as descriptive of a fortified city. Such usage is regular in the Aramaic papyri of the Persian period; in the Behistun Inscription the word is used to translate Old Persian "stronghold" (đidă; Cowley, op. cit., Behistun Inscription, ll. 77-78). Ecbatana was a great fortress, as classical and other writers testify (Herodotus History I. 98; Judith 1:24; cf. Zend-Avesta, the second fargard of the Vendidad Jemshid). Since the record was probably a single sheet of parchment or papyrus (Bowman, "Aramaean, Aramaic, and the Bible," p. 77), a roll is preferable to a scroll, which suggests something more formal and elaborate.

3-5. (Cf. 5:13-15.) Both 5:13-15 and 6:3-5 deal with the same situation; the former as narrative, the latter as prescription. Strong resemblances have led some to regard 6:3-5 as a corruption of 5:13-15, so that 6:3-5 might be emended on the basis of 5:13-15. Thus 6:4 has been excised because it was not in the other passage, and the text of 5:15b has been substituted for 6:5b by some (cf. Batten, op. cit., pp. 143-44). But 5:15b seems to be superfluous, and 6:5b is quite appropriate in its present context (cf. Bewer, op. cit., p. 62, n. 1). Since Aramaic tends toward stereotyped forms of expression, in the same situation some identical vocabulary and word order might be expected. Furthermore, the first year of Cyrus (cf. 1:1) and Cyrus the king . . . made a decree quote Tattenai's letter (5:13), just as an Aramaic memorandum later reflects passages in the official letter to which it responds (Cowley, op. cit., cf. No. 32 with No. 30). Bickerman contends that 6:3-5 represents a written document in contrast to the oral heraldic proclamation in 1:1-4 (cf. 1:1). Plausible is the suggestion that 6:3-5 is not a formal decree but the abstraction of relevant portions of a more extensive document which may have been the house be builded, the place where they offered sacrifices, and let the foundations thereof be strongly laid: the height thereof threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof threescore cubits;

4 With three rows of great stones, and a row of new timber: and let the expenses be given out of the king's house:

king, Cyrus the king issued a decree: Concerning the house of God at Jerusalem, let the house be rebuilt, the place where sacrifices are offered and burnt offerings are brought: its height shall be sixty cubits and its breadth sixty cubits, 4 with three courses of great stones and one course of timber; let the cost be paid from the royal treasury.

considered with permission for rebuilding the temples of other gods also (Galling, op. cit., p. 31; Cyrus Cylinder, II. 30-36; Sidney Smith, op. cit., p. 91, col. 6, l. 18). It has been supposed that the builders in the time of Darius had either the edict or an abstract of it, apparently as part of the temple archives (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 53). Record (vs. 2), lit., “memorandum,” favors the idea of abstraction of data from a more extensive document. A similar memorandum in the Aramaic papyri deals with official permission to rebuild the Jewish temple in Egypt (Cowley, op. cit., pp. 122-24, No. 32), and the same word “memorandum” is found frequently on the reverse of the papyri bearing the Behistun Inscription (ibid., No. 61, II. 1, 10; No. 63, II. 10, 12, 14; No. 68, 1. 2).

3. Several MSS and the versions show the translation “the house of God which is in Jerusalem” (cf. vs. 12; 4:24; 5:2, 16); cf. the statement in the papyrus, “the temple of Yahu the God which is in the fortress Yeb” (ibid., No. 30, 1. 6). Such a reference to the temple here appears to be a superscription, possibly to distinguish the Jerusalem grant from others which may have been in the same document. The designation the place where sacrifices are offered suggests the official Persian description of the Jewish temple in Egypt as “the house of the sacrificial altar” (ibid., No. 32, II. 3-4).

Because the verb means not laid but brought, there have been many attempts to emend the word translated foundations (ушшу as in 4:12). It has been altered to “his fire offerings” (Paul Haupt in Guthe and Batten, op. cit., p. 36) or burnt offerings (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 192). In the present context, however, not offerings but some transition to the following building instructions is expected. The architectural term foundations, as “substructure,” suits the present context and needs no emendation. As “let them carry,” the verb might refer to carrying the fill for the substructure. If “carry” could have the sense of “bear” or “support,” as in English, foundations could be the subject, connected with the dimensions of the building: “And its substructures shall support its height,” etc. Unfortunately since such use is not attested, the problem remains unsolved.

A dimension is lacking in the specifications. Data about Solomon’s temple, the pattern here, shows that due to the many references to cubits, a scribe has omitted some Hebrew text, including the height of the building, which is thirty cubits in I Kings 6:2. The sixty now attached to its height is the missing measure of length (cf. I Kings 6:2; II Chr. 3:3; see Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 54-55). The breadth measure has been assimilated to the previous sixty and should be “twenty” as the Peshitta shows (cf. I Kings 6:2; II Chr. 3:3; Ezek. 41:2). Since the cubic varied in length, the size of the building cannot be determined. The Jewish cubic was about 17.6 inches but Ezek. 41:8 mentions a “great cubic,” apparently the royal cubic, described as “a cubic and a handbreadth” (about 20.57 inches at Jerusalem), which must have been used for such a building.

4. Courses is now attested as an Akkadian word (надбак) in a tablet of the time of Nebuchadrezzar, in which a foreman of bricklayers specifies the number of bricks in each course in the construction of a palace wall (H. F. Lutz, Neo-Babylonian Administration Documents from Erech [Berkeley: University of California Press, 1927], p. 74, No. 82, II. 3, 11). As in 5:8, great stones is incorrect. Instead of new timber, read with the LXXAB and two MSS one course of timber (cf. I Kings 6:36; 7:12). The specifications are for the walls of the temple court and must not refer to the temple walls, which apparently had no binding timbers (cf. 5:8).
5 And also let the golden and silver vessels of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezzar took forth out of the temple which is at Jerusalem, and brought into Babylon, be restored, and brought again unto the temple which is at Jerusalem, every one to his place, and place them in the house of God.

6 Now therefore, Tat'nenai, governor beyond the river, Shethar-boznai, and your companions the Apharsachites, which are beyond the river, be ye far from thence:

7 Let the work of this house of God alone; let the governor of the Jews and the elders of the Jews build this house of God in his place.

5. It was expected that the temple vessels taken by the Babylonians would be restored to Jerusalem (cf. Jer. 27:21-22), and postexilic Jews believed that one of the first acts of Cyrus after his capture of Babylonia was their return (cf. 1:7-11; 5:14-15). Since the subject is the vessels, the words and also let . . . be . . . brought, lit., “and let it go,” are awkward. But it is unnecessary to make the verb plural to agree with the subject from which it is so far separated (Ehrlich, Randglossen zur hebräischen Bibel, VII, 168; contra Eduard König, Historisch-comparative Syntax der hebräischen Sprache [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1897], sec. 348t: cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 56). It may be translated according to its sense as “and let it [all] come . . .” (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 193). Every one to his place, impossible here, is perhaps an intrusion under the influence of “upon its place” in 5:15. And place them includes an object not in the M.T. which has “you shall lay down.” The best sense is obtained by emending the text to read, “And let it all be caused to be deposited . . .” (ibid.). Such emendation is favored by the fact that the verb is translated passively in the versions and the result (יִנְשָׁא) has some graphic similarity to the present text (יִנְשָׁא).

6-12. With now in vs. 6 attention shifts abruptly to Darius’ answer to the officials (cf. 5:6) who had asked for instructions (5:17). Such a sharp transition, without formal epistolary introduction, suggests that a portion of the text is missing between vs. 5 and vs. 6. Now, here as elsewhere (cf. 4:8, 10; 5:17), seems to mark a transition, a shift from reference to Cyrus’ edict to Darius’ own order based on the edict. But the connection between vs. 2 and vs. 3 is too close and smooth to conjecture that the salutation and part of the letter ever stood there. Josephus, too, felt the need for some introduction here, and he supplied a covering letter for the Cyrus edict, but there is nothing in the M.T. or in I Esdras to support his informal, rather Hellenistic note (Antiquities XI. 4. 7). It is proposed to introduce something like “Thereupon Darius wrote to Tattenai . . .” (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 48), but there is no present means for recovering the text which was lost so early that none of the versions preserve a trace of it.

6. With now Darius begins to explain “his pleasure” (5:17) about the Jewish temple. Since his throne was still somewhat uncertain at the beginning of his reign, he found it expedient to confirm Cyrus’ edict and thereby to gain the good will of the Jews who could form for him a buffer against Egypt (Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, pp. 140-41). In the Gadatas inscription, too, in his “policy towards the gods” Darius is motivated by the concern of his “forefathers towards the god . . .” (Botsford and Sihler, Hellenic Civilization, p. 162).

7. This verse is better translated, “Let the governor of the Jews and the elders of the Jews alone for the work of that house of God; and let them build that house of God upon its site” (cf. Vulg.; Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 193, note n). The governor, a gloss
8 Moreover I make a decree what ye shall do to the elders of these Jews for the building of this house of God: that of the king’s goods, even of the tribute beyond the river, forthwith expenses be given unto these men, that they be not hindered.

9 And that which they have need of, both young bullocks, and rams, and lambs, for the burnt offerings of the God of heaven, wheat, salt, wine, and oil, according to the for agreement with 5:3, is responsible for the further expansion to “Zerubbabel, the servant of the Lord” in I Esdras 6:27. As might be expected of a distant king, the Aramaic text has “that house of God” instead of this.

8. In the ambiguous text here, do to the elders could mean, as in I Esdras 6:27-28, “work along with the elders,” but such help would have been refused (cf. 4:2-3). Do for these elders is less likely than “do about those elders.” As in vs. 7 the pronouns indicate remote objects, “those elders,” “that house,” and “those men.” Vs. 8b is introduced by an explicative conjunction, “namely.”

Reaffirming Cyrus’ edict (6:4), Darius orders the expenses of building withheld from the royal revenue—lit., from the king’s goods—collected by his agents in Trans-Euphratia. Since it represents a Persian word for “thoroughly” (cf. 5:8), in full is better than forthwith. That they be not hindered, presumably referring to the workmen, reflects the LXX and Peshitta, but the M.T. has “that it may not be made to stop,” which refers to payments for the work. “Without stopping” is therefore more accurate than without delay.

The verse has been ridiculed as unauthentic because Hag. 2:3; Zech. 4:7-10 reflect no use of such funds (Jahn, Esra [A und B] und Nehemia, p. 54; Hölscher, Esra und Nehemia, II, 514), but it would be difficult to collect the grant from hostile officials far from the court even if it were made (cf. Batten, Esra und Nehemiah, p. 146; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 56-57). Furthermore, since the work was not stopped by the officers (cf. 5:8), it is probable that before any grant could be collected the plans and construction would be too far advanced to admit any major changes.

9-10. Part of the expenses of the cult, too, were to be paid by the king. On the assumption that a Persian king would not be likely to make such concessions and would be uninterested in such details of Jewish cult, these verses have been regarded as unhistorical forgeries. But the Persepolis treasury texts show just such royal concern for detail (cf. Cameron, Persepolis Treasury Tablets, pp. 12-13). Such interest is known to have extended to the cult of subject peoples. Cyrus was concerned with Babylonian gods and temples (cf. 1:23). Cambyses was personally concerned about Egyptian temples and the distribution of supplies for their sacrifices (cf. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 91; Wilhelm Spiegelberg, ed., Die sogennante demotische Chronik [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1914], pp. 32-33). He showed special concern for the Jewish temple in Egypt (Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, p. 113, No. 30, ll. 13-14). Darius I also supported a foreign god favored by his predecessors and reapproved an official for taxing a religious community and for making them cultivate unhallowed ground (cf. Botsford and Siehler, op. cit., p. 162). Darius II later sent to Egypt detailed orders for the keeping of the Jewish festival of Unleavened Bread (and Passover?) and, in granting permission to rebuild the Jewish temple in Egypt, the types of sacrifice permitted were specified (Cowley, op. cit., No. 21 and No. 32).

It may be deduced from vs. 10 that not all sacrifices but only the daily burnt offerings and their supplements which were connected with prayers for the royal house were supplied (Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 27; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 58-59). Cyrus, too, expected daily intercession with the Babylonian gods he had re-established (Cyrus appointment of the priests which are at Jerusalem, let it be given them day by day without fail:
6:10 THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

10 That they may offer sacrifices of sweet savors unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king, and of his sons.

11 Also I have made a decree, that whoever shall alter this word, let timber be pulled down from his house, and being set up, let him be hanged thereon; and let his house be made a dunghill for this.

Cylinder, ill. 34-36). Later Jews in Egypt similarly offered to pray and sacrifice on behalf of a Persian official who might help with the restoration of their temple (Cowley, op. cit., p. 114, No. 30, ll. 25-28).

Thus the substance of vss. 9-10 is historically probable, but they can also be challenged on other grounds. The accuracy of terminology and the knowledge of Jewish practices there demonstrated may be explained as due to the influence of a Jewish secretary, like the later Ezra, as advisor to the royal court (Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 57-58). But the verses are just such an expansion as the Chronicler might make in the interest of the cultus and there are definite indications of the Chronicler's literary style. The sacrifices are listed in an order favored by the Chronicler (I Chr. 29:21; II Chr. 29:21, 32; Ezra 6:17; 7:22; 8:35) and the expression day by day is such as he favors (I Chr. 12:22; 16:23; II Chr. 8:13; 24:11; 30:21). The verses are best explained as an expansion by the Chronicler (cf. Torrey, Composition, p. 10; Ezra Studies, p. 158).

Wheat was offered as fine flour, either alone (Lev. 5:11-13), mixed as dough (Lev. 2:1-3), or as cakes (Lev. 2:4 ff.). Josephus here specifies "fine flour." Salt (cf. 7:22) was offered with all oblations (Lev. 2:13; Mark 9:49), and meal offerings are particularly specified as needing salt seasoning (Lev. 2:13). Wine was presented as a libation with every public burnt offering (Exod. 29:40-41; Lev. 23:13, 18, 37; Num. 15:24; etc.). It was poured from a chalice to the base of the altar (Ecclus. 50:15; cf. Josephus Antiquities III. 9. 4). Olive oil figured prominently in the meal offering. Sweet savors, as the odor of sacrifice, here means the regular pleasing sacrifices (cf. Exod. 29:18, 25; Lev. 1:9, 13, 17; etc.).

11-12. Severe penalties were prescribed for those who violated the royal decree. Neither hanged nor "fastened" (ASV) reflects the violence of the act. The M.T. has, lit., "let a timber be pulled away from his house and, when erected, let him be struck upon it." The victim was impaled on the sharpened timber. It was thrust into the body either just below the ribs or between the legs (cf. W. D. Birch and T. G. Pinches, The Bronze Ornaments of the Palace Gates of Balawat [London: Society of Biblical Archaeology, 1902], pp. 2b, 4b, 10a; Pls. B2, D4, J3). The Assyrians used impalement to punish only the most abhorrent crimes (Olmstead, History of Assyria, pp. 87, 112, 308, 551; Bruno Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien [Heidelberg: C. Winter, 1920], I, 112), and Herodotus (History III. 159) calls it a Persian practice also. The house of the offender was pulled down (cf. Dan. 2:5; 3:29) and the ruins were made into a dunghill or public privy (II Kings 10:27; J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1927; "International Critical Commentary"], pp. 148-49).

Warnings of punishment for violation of royal decree are not unusual. Unlike the Daniel passages, vs. 12 promises additional punishment for future kings or people who would change the decree favoring the temple. The KJV wrongly makes alter (vs. 12) refer to the temple, but the implied object of the verb, as vs. 11a shows, is the edict. As usual in such threats, God is expected to defend the decree and the temple, since he would be vitally concerned and would survive the king himself.

618
12 And the God that hath caused his name to dwell there destroy all kings and people, that shall put to their hand to alter and to destroy this house of God which is at Jerusalem. I Darius have made a decree; let it be done with speed.

13 Then Tatnai, governor on this side the river, Shethar-boznai, and their companions, according to that which Darius the king had sent, so they did speedily.

14 And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet and Zechariah the son of Iddo. And they builded, and finished it, according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to the commandment of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes king of Persia.

15 And this house was finished on the third day of the month Adar, which was in the sixth year of the reign of Darius the king.

The God who has caused his name to dwell there is a distinctly Hebraic expression, common in Deuteronomic literature (cf. Deut. 12:11; 14:23; 16:2, 6, 11; 26:2, etc.). Its Jewishness has been explained as due to Jewish advice in the drafting of the document in the Persian chancellory (Bertholet, op. cit., pp. 27-28; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 58). The name of God, representing his revealed character and attributes, is sometimes equivalent to the person of God (Pss. 5:11; 7:17; 20:1), and in the late Jewish period it becomes a substitute for "God" (Lev. 24:11-16). The Persian word translated done with speed or done with all diligence is better rendered as "done thoroughly" (cf. 5:8; 6:8).

Darius' officials (5:3) promptly followed his orders. With "they decided to act accordingly," Josephus implies reluctance, in keeping with his idea of bribed officials (cf. 4:7), but it does not represent the M.T. In vs. 13 as in vs. 12, read "thoroughly" instead of speedily.

14. The narrative in vs. 14 reflects the situation in 5:1-2. The same Aramaic word is used for both the command of God and the decree of the Persian kings. The commandment of God may rest ultimately on II Sam. 7:12-13; I Kings 5:4-5, but more directly upon Ezra 1:2. The decree of Cyrus is in 1:23; 6:3-5; that of Darius is in 6:7-8.

Since the temple was finished under Darius I (vs. 15), the reference to Artaxerxes (464-423 B.C.) must be an addition made by someone who thought of the king's aid to Ezra (7:12-27) and Nehemiah (Neh. 2:5-8), and especially of the king's intention (Ezra 7:27). But a tradition persisted that there was some rebuilding of the temple in the time of Artaxerxes (cf. S. A. Cook, "I Esdras" in R. H. Charles, ed., The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament [Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1913], p. 13).

15. About four and a half years after it was started (Sept. 21, 520 B.C.; cf. Hag. 1:14-15) the temple was finished. Adar (February-March) was the last Babylonian month. The third day (Mar. 12, 515 B.C.) of the M.T. is less likely than the "twenty-third day" of I Esdras 7:5 (Apr. 1, 515 B.C.), since the "twenty" is easier lost than gained in the text. Furthermore, the third day was a sabbath, when no work could be done, while the "twenty-third day" was a Friday (F. X. Kugler, Von Moses bis Paulus [Münster in Westfalen: Aschendorff, 1922], p. 215). It is unnecessary to substitute "they continued"
16 ¶ And the children of Israel, the priests, and the Levites, and the rest of the children of the captivity, kept the dedication of this house of God with joy.
17 And offered at the dedication of this house of God a hundred bullocks, two hundred rams, four hundred lambs: and for a sin offering for all Israel, twelve he goats, according to the number of the tribes of Israel.
18 And they set the priests in their divisions, and the Levites in their courses, for the service of God, which is at Jerusalem; as it is written in the book of Moses.
19 And the children of the captivity kept the passover upon the fourteenth day of the first month.

for was finished (so Batten, op. cit., p. 149) since the verb is Akkadian and usage in that language permits a translation “completed” when used of finishing a temple (Carl Bezold, Babylonisch-Assyrisches Glossar [Heidelberg: C. Winter, 1926], p. 59, col. 2, s.v. ḫū, III), as also in later Targumic Aramaic (Marcus Jastrow, A Dictionary of the Targumim [New York: G. P. Putnam’s Sons, 1903], II, 1567, s.v. בְּשֵׂר). Because of its precise date and because it feels that vs. 14 closes an episode, Torrey (Ezra Studies, p. 158) regards vs. 15 as a new section (6:15-18) by the Chronicler, but that would leave unexplained the transition from Aramaic to Hebrew at vs. 18-19.

16-18. The ceremony of dedication at the completion of the temple is reminiscent of that of the time of Solomon (I Kings 8). Such celebration is historically probable and the report may rest on the temple archives. Such stress on priestly activity is widely regarded as evidence of the Chronicler’s authorship, but in several instances the evidence points away from him. The tripartite concept of the restored community (vs. 16) suggests the Chronicler’s view but all Israel and the sacrifice of twelve he-goats (cf. 8:35), representing the tribes of Israel (vs. 17), indicate that there is a more inclusive view operative in the narrative. The sacrifices, too, are relatively modest when compared with those at the earlier dedication (I Kings 8:5), especially according to the Chronicler’s account (II Chr. 7:5). In Lev. 4:13-21 the sin offering calls for a bullock rather than a he-goat.

With renewal of sacrifices the temple staff was inducted (vs. 18), and I Esdras 7:9 adds that doorkeepers were stationed at every gate (cf. I Esdras 1:16). Organization of the clergy into divisions and courses is traced to the book of Moses (cf. 3:2), but Pentateuchal law contains no such provisions. The reference, however, may be simply to priestly dedication (Exod. 29:1-46; Lev. 8:1-36) and the appointment of Levites (Num. 3:5-9; 8:5-22). It has been recognized that if the Chronicler were the author, one should expect reference to Davidic authority for clerical organization, since that was his understanding of its origin (cf. 3:10; 8:20; I Chr. 23:1-26:32; Neh. 12:24, 45; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 61). For the service of God read with the Peshitta and the LXXL “the service of the house of God,” since “house” has been lost from the M.T.

(6) The Feasts of Passover and Unleavened Bread (6:19-22—1 Esdras 7:10-15)

The Aramaic section is concluded with vs. 18, and the Hebrew language, dropped at 4:6, is resumed. As most authorities agree, the author is the Chronicler. But it has been suggested that he has only adapted one of his sources, fitting it to its present context and modifying it to suit his own ideas (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, pp. 151-52).

19. The passover, originally a pastoral festival, finally was regarded as celebrating 20 For the priests and the Levites were purified together, all of them were pure, and killed the passover for all the children of the captivity, and for their brethren the priests, and for themselves.

21 And the children of Israel, which were come again out of captivity, and all such as had separated themselves unto them from the filthiness of the heathen of the land, to seek the Lord God of Israel, did eat, 22 And kept the feast of unleavened bread seven days with joy: for the Lord had made Israel's deliverance from Egyptian bondage (Exod. 12:1-30). It is not mentioned in the earliest Hebrew legislation but is prominent in the later codes and is described at length by the Chronicler (II Chr. 35:1-19). The fourteenth day of the first month, i.e., Nisan (cf. Exod. 12:2-3, 6), in 515 B.C. was April 21, shortly after the completion of the temple. Torrey (Composition, p. 10) holds the Chronicler responsible for the chronology which neatly makes the Passover occur right after the dedication. The expression the children of the captivity, excluding non-exiled Jews, presents the Chronicler's conception of the restored community, but it is slightly expanded in vs. 21. The “children of Israel” found here in I Esdras 7:10, however, is not original but is derived from I Esdras 7:6 (= Ezra 6:16).

20. The pro-Levite bias of the Chronicler (II Chr. 29:34) is seen in his insistence that the Levites killed the sacrifice for the priests (II Chr. 35:3-6, 10-11, 14). Vs. 20b shows that only the Levites were purified. A later writer who missed them added the priests. Purified themselves together, lit., “purified themselves as one,” is properly translated as “purified themselves to a man” by the Amer. Trans. Pure or clean is a technical term meaning “ceremonially clean.” This signifies freedom from such contamination as would prevent the ritual act from being efficacious. Such purification was done with water (cf. Exod. 29:4; Num. 8:7), just as Babylonian priests purified themselves with river water before entering the sanctuary (Johannes Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, II-III [London: Oxford University Press, 1940], pp. 747-48).

21. The community of vs. 19 was augmented by every one who had joined them, by proselytes drawn from Gentiles and half-caste Jews who had intermarried with the Gentiles (cf. 9:1-2, 12, 14; Neh. 13:23-24). According to Jewish legislation, all “clean” Jews were expected to share the Passover under penalty of ostracism (Num. 9:13); circumcised foreigners could participate on the same basis as the Jews (Num. 9:14); but all uncircumcised were forbidden to partake (Exod. 12:43-45, 48-49).

Filthiness or pollutions means “ceremonial uncleanness,” just the opposite of the ceremonial purity of vs. 20. In I Esdras 7:13 it is interpreted as “the abominations” or “the detestable things” (βαρανίας; cf. Luke 16:15; Matt. 24:15; etc.), the influences of foreign culture, particularly in religion (cf. 9:1, 11; Neh. 13:23-24, 26). The tragedy of Babylonian captivity was attributed to such foreign contamination (9:13-14), and later Jewish exclusiveness and the strong aversion to mixtures are deeply rooted in this antipathy to non-Jewish influence. To seek (cf. 4:2) is distinctly the Chronicler's own term. Although it has been interpreted as to worship, the word may have been weakened to merely “revere” (S. R. Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament [9th ed.; New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1913], p. 536, No. 7). The implied object of did eat is the Passover, which is made explicit in the LXX.

22. The feast of unleavened bread, originally a Canaanite harvest festival (Exod. 34:18-26 [J]; 23:14-16 [E], followed on the day after the Passover, the fifteenth day (cf. Lev. 23:6), and continued for seven days. Turned the heart means “changed the mind” (or “the will” or “the purpose”). King of Assyria is anachronistic in the Persian period.
made them joyful, and turned the heart of the king of Assyria unto them, to strengthen their hands in the work of the house of God, the God of Israel.

7 Now after these things, in the reign of Artaxerxes king of Persia, Ezra the son of Seraiah, the son of Azariah, the son of Hilkhiah, the son of Shallum, the son of Zadok, the son of Ahitub, Jewish scholars assume a Persian king and Josephus so translates it (Antiquities XI. 4. 8). Assyria may be loose usage or even a scribal error for “Syria” (cf. Holscher, Ezra und Nehemia, II, 516). The unidentified king is most probably Artaxerxes, whose harshly unfavorable decision (4:21-22) is about to be changed in the following narrative (7:1-28), which the Chronicler here anticipates. Artaxerxes is recalled as a supporter of the work of both Ezra and Nehemiah and as beautifier of the house of the Lord (7:27). As the versions show, the work of the house of God, the God of Israel is awkward in the M.T. Expected is either “the house of the God of Israel” (as in the LXX) or “the house of the Lord, the God of Israel” (as in the Vulg., I Esdras, and Peshitta).

III. Ezra's Return (7:1-8:36)

A. Introduction of Ezra (7:1-10=I Esdras 8:1-8)

1. Genealogy of Ezra (7:1-5)

7:1-5. The general chronological note, after these things (cf. II Chr. 32:1; Esth. 2:1; 3:1), covers an interval of 117 years, between the completion of the temple (6:15) and the journey of Ezra to Judah (7:7).

Ezra (“Help”) abbreviates such a full name as Azariah (cf. 2:2). The genealogy supplied (vss. 1:5) is an unhistorical reflection of the conviction of the Chronicler's age that so important a person as Ezra must have had a significant ancestry. As priest (cf. vss. 11-12, 21), he was not only a descendant of Aaron (vs. 5), like all Jewish priests returned from Babylonia (8:2), but he was also related to the house of the high priest. Such relationship was suggested perhaps by the name of Ezra's father, Seraiah (vs. 1), which was the same as that of the high priest slain at the fall of Jerusalem, about 188 years before Ezra's arrival in Palestine (cf. II Kings 25:18-21). Since about five generations separated Ezra from the high priest Seraiah, Ezra could not have been his son. If the link with the family of the house of the high priest is intended, the genealogy should have been carried down to a high priest closer to Ezra. The missing generations have been explained by supposing that from the time of Seraiah onward the family of Ezra was not directly in the line of the high priest but collateral to it (Ernst Bertheau, Die Bücher Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, ed. Victor Ryssel [2nd ed.; Leipzig: S. Hirzel, 1887; "Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament"], p. 88; Keil, Chronik, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 457).

7:1-26. Ezra: The “Ready Scribe.”—At last we meet the hero whose name the whole book bears; but at first only through an introduction in the third person, evidently written long afterward by some author (either the Chronicler or some intermediate redactor), whose major interests are at any rate those of the Chronicler. His emphasis is still, as in chs. 5-6, on the political approval and financial support given by different Persian kings to the rebuilding of the temple; but even more now (cf. vss. 6-10 with vss. 25-26) on the special qualifications of Ezra to teach and enforce the law of Moses in the full authoritative sense which it had acquired in the Jerusalem community by the time of the Chronicler—as statutes and ordinances laid down by God himself, under penalties that included not only imprisonment and banishment, but even death (vs. 26).
The genealogy is based on data in I Chr. 6:3-15, 50-53 (cf. Neh. 11:11), but comparison shows the list in Ezra to be textually defective (cf. Rudolf Kittel, Die Bücher der Chronik [Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1902; “Handkommentar zum Alten Testament”], pp. 89-42). Assuming three generations to a century, the present list would reach back only about 567 years, not to Aaron but to about the time of Saul (ca. 1150 B.C.). In addition to the generations missing between the fall of Jerusalem and Ezra, the present list lacks the generations named in I Chr. 6:8b-12a, which were lost apparently accidentally, due to the similarity of names. A scribe’s eyes passed from one Amariah (cf. I Chr. 6:7) to another (cf. I Chr. 6:11), omitting the seven intervening names. The genealogy does, however, share the glaring error of I Chr. 6:12 in identifying Zadok as the son of Ahitub (cf. 7:2). If I Sam. 2:22-36 has any real value, Zadok cannot be identified as the son of Ahitub, Abiathar’s grandfather (cf. William R. Arnold, Ephod and Ark [Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1917], pp. 14-15). This faulty genealogy is secondary to the Ezra narrative and does not represent Ezra’s true ancestry, which must have been originally simply “Ezra the son of Seraiah.”

2. Summary of Ezra’s Career (7:6-10)

6. This Ezra, repeating the subject of vs. 1 after the long genealogical insertion, identifies the person of the genealogy with the principal character in the narrative that follows. The M.T. permits from Babylon, but from Babylonia is more likely since, in late Jewish use the term but rarely refers to the city. Scribe (cf. 4:8) can mean an official secretary of the court (cf. II Sam. 8:17; II Kings 18:18, 37; 19:2; Esth. 3:12; 8:9). It is argued that Ezra, like the later Jewish exilarch (rēsh gālāṯāʾ), was a high court official who advised the king in all matters concerning the Jewish people (cf. Neh. 11:24; H. H. Schaeder, Ezra der Schreiber [Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1930; “Beiträge zur historischen Theologie”], pp. 44-49; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 73). The word translated ready (māḥîr) is used of scribes in Egypt in the sense of “experienced” or “skillful” (W. M. Müller, Asien und Europa [Leipzig: W. Engelmann, 1895], p. 173) and elsewhere during the Persian period and before. An Aramaic papyrus calls Ahiqar, an Assyrian scribe, “a wise and skillful [ʾıʾār] scribe” (Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, p. 212, I. 1; cf. pp. 220, 226). It is the Chronicler who transformed Ezra the royal official to the later distinctly Jewish Bible scribe, the specialist in scripture, more familiar in his own day (cf. I Chr. 2:55; Neh. 12:26; Esclus. 38:24-39:11; Matt. 2:4).

It is said of Ezra that the king granted him all his request, but the Ezra story begins abruptly and there is preserved no account of Ezra’s session with the king, such as is found in the story of Nehemiah (cf. 2:1-8). The nature of his request can be learned only from the edict of the king (vss. 13-26). It would appear that as an official in the Persian court Ezra persuaded the king that it would be to the advantage of the empire to establish Jewish law as normative in Palestine. Apparently convinced that peace and 7 And there went up some of the children of Israel, and of the priests, and the Levites, and the singers, and the porters, and the Nethinim, unto Jerusalem, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes the king.

8 And he came to Jerusalem in the fifth month, which was in the seventh year of the king.

security would be fostered by such a measure, and that the re-establishment of the Jewish cult at Jerusalem would result in greater loyalty of his subjects and the support of the powerful Jewish God for the royal house, Artaxerxes granted him all that he asked. The hand of the Lord (vs. 28; 8:22, 31; cf. 7:9; 8:18; Neh. 2:8, 18) indicates the favor of God. According to the hand implies success in proportion to God’s support, but the sense is improved by following the LXX in reading, for the hand of the Lord . . . was upon him.

7-8. Because in vs. 7 attention is turned suddenly but briefly from Ezra to returning exiles, the verse has been regarded as an addition to the text (Josef Markwart, Fundamente israelitische und jüdische Geschichte [Göttingen: Dieterich, 1896], p. 34; Sigmund Mowinckel, Ezra den Skriftlaerde [Kristiania: 1916], p. 2; Hölscher, op. cit., II, 518). But a simple emendation from and there went up (לְעָשָׂר) to “he sent up” (לָשָׂר) would refocus the attention on Ezra and eliminate the chief motive for omitting the verse (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 67). The classes of people mentioned are those found in Ezra 2:1-70, but Hölscher argues that the treatment of the singers and gate-keepers as distinct from the Levites (2:41; 3:10) is contrary to the Chronicler’s point of view, and is thus evidence for the secondary character of the verse. It is true that the singers and gate-keepers are not named among the returning Jews in 8:15 ff., but they are here a later addition derived from the Levites in 8:18-19, probably under the influence of 7:24, and possibly also with 2:41-42 in mind (ibid., p. 72). Vs. 8, which almost duplicates vs. 7b, has also been regarded as an addition (Martin Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien I [Halle: M. Niemeyer, 1943], p. 125), but the verse does advance the thought, reverting to Ezra from his companions and specifying the fifth month (July-August) as part of the date.

One of the most perplexing and controversial problems of Ezra-Nehemiah is that of the date of Ezra’s arrival in Jerusalem. Traditionally Artaxerxes is identified with Artaxerxes I (464-424 B.C.), whose seventh year was 458 B.C. Since Ezra followed Nehemiah to Palestine (cf. Intro., pp. 561-62) and was not his contemporary, the Artaxerxes must have been Artaxerxes II (404-359 B.C.), whose seventh year was 398 B.C. (H. H. Rowley, The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament [London: Lutterworth Press, 1952], pp. 131-59). It is always possible that Ezra may have come to Jerusalem some time during the reign of Artaxerxes I, after the end of the first administration of Nehemiah in 432 B.C. (Neh. 5:14), but any satisfactory date in this period is highly conjectural, without textual support. Some have arbitrarily assigned Ezra’s arrival to the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes I (433/432 B.C.), when Nehemiah left (W. H. Kosters, Die Wiederherstellung Israels in der persischen Periode [tr. A. Basedow; Heidel- berg: J. Hörning, 1895], pp. 95 ff., 116; Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, pp. 30-31; R. H. Kennett, Old Testament Essays [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1928], p. 85; formerly also W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible [New York: Fleming H. Revell Co., 1932], p. 219). Others have sought textual support for a date in the “thirty-seventh year” of Artaxerxes I (428 B.C.) by assuming the loss of “thirty” (שְׁעִים) from the text due to similarity to the beginning of the spelling of seven (שְׁבָעָה) in vss. 7-8 (Markwart, op. cit., p. 36; Bewer, Der Text des Buches Esra, p. 68; W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed.; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 624
9 For upon the first day of the first month began he to go up from Babylon, and on the first day of the fifth month came he to Jerusalem, according to the good hand of his God upon him.

10 For Ezra had prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments.

11 · Now this is the copy of the letter that the king Artaxerxes gave unto Ezra the 9 7:11 was in the seventh year of the king: 9 for on the first day of the first month he began8 to go up from Babylonia, and on the first day of the fifth month he came to Jerusalem, for the good hand of his God was upon him. 10 For Ezra had set his heart to study the law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach his statutes and ordinances in Israel.

11 This is a copy of the letter which King

1946), p. 366; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 71, 168). The date cannot be determined accurately but it must have been at least after the first administration of Nehemiah.

9. Chronological data already given in vss. 7-8 is recapitulated here. Such information, lacking in the present Ezra narrative, must have been drawn by the Chronicler from the now missing beginning of Ezra's own report. He began to go up attempts to make sense of a corrupt Hebrew text, that was the foundation of the going up. For the foundation (yeshud) read the verb "was decided upon" (yissadh; cf. Esth. 1:8). Earlier, perhaps, the first month was followed by an explanatory gloss "that is [the month] Nisan," of which ḫנ, "Nisan," was lost because of some similarity to the verb ḫנ, "was decided upon" (cf. Ehrlich, Randglossen zur hebräischen Bibel, VII, 171; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 67). Thus we translate, "For upon the first of the month (that is Nisan) the going up was decided upon." Such emendation avoids a conflict with 8:31, according to which the departure occurred on the twelfth day (Apr. 16, 398 b.c.) instead of the first day (Apr. 5, 398 b.c.). There need be no contradiction in any case since there was some delay (8:15-30) before the actual departure.

10. This verse comments on vs. 6, explaining the reason for Ezra's success through divine support and portraying him as the ideal Jewish scribe dedicated to the threefold task of seeking the law, obeying it, and propagating it. Set his heart means "set his mind" (cf. 1:1). The law of the Lord is "the law of Moses" (vs. 6). To seek the law means to study it, to determine its implications for daily life. Such study ultimately produced the oral law and the Talmud. But study was not enough, for it was obedience to the law that led to a virtuous life. Thus Judaism stresses activity rather than belief as the avenue to salvation. Such emphasis is found insistently in the older Hebrew legislation. Scribal legalism was not merely individual but also social. The learned had a missionary task to perform. Statutes and ordinances are terms found in earlier legislation (cf. Exod. 15:25; Josh. 24:25; J Sam. 30:25), especially in Deuteronomy where they are synonyms (Deut. 4:1, 5, 8, 14; 5:1; 11:32; 12:1; 26:16). Statutes originally meant something "inscribed" and a related word in Arabic means "to be right" or "to be obligatory." Ordinances, lit., judgments, signify legal decisions based on an earlier inscribed code.

B. Ezra's Commission (7:11-26=I Esdras 8:8-24)

1. Introduction (7:11-12)

An editorial verse in Hebrew (vs. 11) introduces a long document (vss. 12-26) which, like all official correspondence in the book, is written in the Aramaic language (cf. 4:8-22; 5:6-6:12). Purportedly a royal decree, it contains Ezra's commission, a statement of his authority, and a list of powers at his disposal to assure the success of his mission. The phraseology of the decree is very surprising for a Persian ruler, since it shows intimate acquaintance with Jewish terminology (cf. vs. 13, 15) and with cultic distinctions and practices prevailing in the later Jewish temple (cf. vs. 24). Such Jewishness has led to a charge that the document was forged (cf. Torrey, Ezra Studies, pp. 157-58; Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 826), or at least that an original document has been edited, supplemented, or even rewritten by a Jew (Driver, Intro. to Literature Ar-ta-xerx'es gave to Ezra the priest, the scribe, learned in matters of the commandments of the Lord and his statutes for Israel: 12 "Ar-ta-xerx'es, king of kings, to Ezra the priest, the scribe, the law of the of O.T., p. 550). A plausible explanation is presented by those who regard Ezra as an official in the Persian court, the adviser to the king for Jewish affairs (cf. vs. 6). As such, Ezra himself could have written the document or dictated its terms to be endorsed by the king and issued as an official decree (Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, pp. 64 ff.; Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 583; Schaeder, Esra der Schreiber, pp. 9, 42, 55; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 73, 76).

11. Copy (cf. 4:11; 5:6) implies a written source behind the Aramaic text. Artaxerxes (cf. vs. 7-8) is the king according to the M.T. and I Esdras, but Josephus, aware of chronological difficulty in conflict with dates in Nehemiah, and believing that Ezra has preceded Nehemiah, has substituted "Xerxes" (485-465 B.C.), the predecessor of Artaxerxes I, as the one who gave Ezra his commission. Vs. 11b obviously is a later gloss on the scribe, based on the substance of vs. 10.

12. The title king of kings, used here in the superscription, was frequently employed by the Persian rulers (cf. Dan. 2:37), as by the Babylonians before them (Ezek. 26:7). Ezra is identified as priest, but, as in the Aramaic papyri (Cowley, op. cit., No. 30, II. 1, 18: No. 38, II. 1, 12), the word used is Hebrew (kōhēn) rather than Aramaic (kumrā). Thus it would appear that the Hebrew term had been adopted in official use (cf. Schaeder, Esra der Schreiber, p. 43). Apparently on the basis of the genealogy of vss. 1-5, Ezra is identified as the "chief priest" in I Esdras 9:40 and Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5.1), but that is incorrect. Schaeder (Esra der Schreiber, pp. 46-48) has also insisted that the second title of Ezra, scribe of the law, was in the Persian period an official one, a trace of which is found in the later name of the secretariat for law (dādh dawirīh). Here the term used for law is Persian (dāt) rather than Hebrew (tōrāh; cf. 3:2). The concept was always important in Persian thought. Nor did the Persians distinguish sharply between sacred and secular law. In the Avesta, the Persian holy book, as also in later Pahlavi literature, there is no distinction between moral and legal crimes, between ecclesiastical and civil jurisprudence, for the priestly code of the Avesta, the Vendidad, is a medley of all sorts of ritual, moral, civil, and even hygienic laws (James Darmesteter, The Zend-Avesta; Part I, "The Vendidad" [Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1880; "The Sacred Books of the East"], pp. lxx-lxxi, lxxii, lxxxiv).

Under such circumstances Ezra might be expected to be successful in gaining royal support in his attempt to introduce sacred law into the Judean province. He was directed to set up authorities in a secular manner (vs. 25), and his law was to be regarded as equivalent to the law of the king (vs. 26). Royal support was doubtless forthcoming on the assumption that the land could be made secure and peaceful for Persia through the instrumentality of Jewish law (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 76). Identification of the law as that of the God of heaven (cf. 5:11; 6:9) has led Schaeder (Esra der Schreiber, pp. 48-49) to insist that Ezra was secretary for Jewish affairs in the Persian court.

The verse literally concludes "finished, and now." The words and now are the normal conclusion of the salutation of a letter (cf. 4:10), but "finished" (cf. 5:16) is a corruption which has no counterpart in the versions and is therefore omitted entirely in the RSV. Part of the corrupt word (טח) is probably a distorted fragment of the word "peace" (ונש) and its remainder (ת) is a likely distorted duplication of the letters which follow (ח; Bewer, op. cit., p. 69). The presence of "peace" in the Peshitta and I Esdras 8:9 seems to support the addition of the word "peace" in emending the text.

626
13 I make a decree, that all they of the people of Israel, and of his priests and Levites, in my realm, which are minded of their own free will to go up to Jerusalem, go with thee.
14 Forasmuch as thou art sent of the king, and of his seven counselors, to inquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem, according to the law of thy God which is in thine hand;
15 And to carry the silver and gold, which the king and his counselors have freely offered unto the God of Israel, whose habitation is in Jerusalem,
16 And all the silver and gold that thou canst find in all the province of Babylon, God of heaven. And now 13 I make a decree that any one of the people of Israel or their priests or Levites in my kingdom, who freely offers to go to Jerusalem, may go with you.
14 For you are sent by the king and his seven counselors to make inquiries about Judah and Jerusalem according to the law of your God, which is in your hand, 15 and also to convey the silver and gold which the king and his counselors have freely offered to the God of Israel, whose dwelling is in Jerusalem, 16 with all the silver and gold which you shall find in the whole province of

2. Permission to Return (7:13-14)
13. This verse is strongly Jewish in terminology. Any one... who freely offers represents an expression unusual in Aramaic but common in later Hebrew, especially in the work of the Chronicler (I Chr. 29:5; 6, 9, 14, 17; II Chr. 17:16; cf. Ezra 1:6; 2:68; Neh. 11:2). Such usage, the distinction between priests and Levites (cf. 2:36, 40), and the use of people of Israel to designate secular persons in contrast to the clergy, where the Persians would say “Jews” (cf. 4:12, 23; 5:1, 5; 6:7-8, 14), all suggest Jewish rather than Persian composition. Since those wanting to go to Judah were to go with Ezra, his commission included leading a caravan to Jerusalem.
14. The Persian king ruled absolutely, without a regularly established council. But he occasionally called in judges, political or military experts, or even just the “noblest Persians” as advisers (Herodotus History III. 31; VII. 8; VIII. 67). In Esth. 1:14 the counselors are described as “the seven princes of Persia and Media, who saw the king’s face, and sat first in the kingdom.” The basis for the number seven cannot yet be determined, but as late as the revolt of Cyrus the Younger (403-401 B.C.) the council consisted of seven of the most distinguished Persians of his staff (Xenophon Anabasis I. 6. 4-5). To make inquiries means “to investigate,” as in 4:15, 19; 5:17; 6:1. Thus Ezra was to investigate the degree to which Jewish law was being effectively obeyed in Judah.
Your God indicates that there was no ambiguity regarding the nature of the law. It was distinctly Jewish and not confused with Persian legislation. In your hand identifies the law as that favored and promoted by Ezra. The nature of this law, much debated, is not yet certainly identified. It was a code already known to the people (vs. 25; Neh. 8:1), but the law brought by Ezra from Babylonia cannot be identified with any special code of the Bible. It was probably a form of the Deuteronomistic Code, with which there had been considerable concern during the Exile, but it was a form of that code that had been somewhat modified in the direction of the Priestly Code developed during the Exile (cf. Neh. 8:1-2).

3. Gifts for the Temple (7:15-19)
15-16. With (vs. 16) indicates that two distinct groups of donors are mentioned in vs. 16, since vs. 16a is not qualified by vs. 16b, which certainly refers to Jews. The phrases all the silver and gold and in the whole province suggest a large group of donors. Some have seen here the influence of 1:4, and possibly the story of the Exodus (Exod. 10:25; 12:35-36; cf. Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 158). As an alternative it has been proposed that Ezra was privileged to levy a tax on Jewish property in Babylonia for with the freewill offering of the people, and of the priests, offering willingly for the house of their God which is in Jerusalem: 17 That thou mayest buy speedily with this money bullocks, rams, lambs, with their meat offerings and their drink offerings, and offer them upon the altar of the house of your God which is in Jerusalem. 18 And whatsoever shall seem good to thee, and to thy brethren, to do with the rest of the silver and the gold, that do after the will of your God. 19 The vessels also that are given thee for the service of the house of thy God, those deliver thou before the God of Jerusalem. 20 And whatsoever shall be needful for the house of thy God, which thou shalt have occasion to bestow, bestow it out of the king's treasure house.

Babylonia, and with the freewill offerings of the people and the priests, vowed willingly for the house of their God which is in Jerusalem. 17 With this money, then, you shall with all diligence buy bulls, rams, and lambs, with their cereal offerings and their drink offerings, and you shall offer them upon the altar of the house of your God which is in Jerusalem. 18 Whatever seems good to you and your brethren to do with the rest of the silver and gold, you may do, according to the will of your God. 19 The vessels that have been given you for the service of the house of your God, you shall deliver before the God of Jerusalem. 20 And whatever else is required for the house of your God, which you have occasion to provide, you may provide it out of the king's treasury.

the funds, but there is no evidence for such action (Carl Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901; “Handkommentar zum Alten Testament”], p. 52). The non-Jewish donors were probably “his lords” (cf. 8:25). Delivery of the gifts is mentioned in 8:24-26, 33-34.

17-18. Knowledge of Hebrew terminology and custom is evident in these verses. Not only the proper sacrifices are mentioned, but also the cereal offerings and drink offerings that regularly accompanied them (cf. Num. 15:1-10). But the usage is not that preferred by the Chronicler for designating the sacrificial animals. Speedily should be rendered “faithfully” (cf. 5:8; 6:8, 12, 13). Since it is assumed (vs. 18) that the collected funds will be more than enough for the sacrifices, the surplus is to be disposed of under Ezra's direction, but only for such cult purposes as will please the Jewish God. Will of . . . God represents a word meaning “pleasure” or “desire,” found only here and in late Hebrew. Your brethren means Ezra's fellow priests.

19. Vessels should be “utensils” in a wider sense than pots and jars, as the LXX (σκεύη) shows (cf. 1:10-11). Although I Esdras 8:17 seems to interpret them as temple vessels that had been plundered (1:7-11; 5:14; 6:5), this is but an assumption. They may have been dedicated by their donors to the service of the temple. The abrupt God of Jerusalem would be unique in the Aramaic documents. Since the LXX and Vulg. have “in Jerusalem,” it is probable that the Peshitta is right in reading “the God who is in Jerusalem” (cf. 1:3). But it is possible also that the original text was “the God of Israel, who is in Jerusalem” (cf. vs. 15).

4. ADDITIONAL FUNDS (7:20-24)

20-24. If additional funds are needed for the temple beyond the donations, such requirements are to be met by a grant of funds from the king's treasury (cf. 5:17; 6:1). You may provide it seems addressed to Ezra, who was not in position to draw on royal funds. Therefore there is incorporated in Ezra's orders a special section (vss. 21-24) which is addressed to the treasurers who are to pay the funds (cf. 1:8). These officials are to take orders from Ezra (cf. vs. 12), but in a businesslike way practical limits are put on his possible demands (vs. 22). Again speedily is “faithfully” or “exactly” (cf. 5:8).

The Chronicler's tendency to exaggerate statistics concerning the temple (cf. I Chr. 29:7) has led those who regard him as the author here to be suspicious of the royal grants (Jahn, Ezra [A und B] und Nehemia, p. 63). The list of gifts and prerogatives 21 And I, even I Artaxerxes the king, do make a decree to all the treasurers which are beyond the river, that whatsoever Ezra the priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven, shall require of you, it be done speedily, 22 Unto a hundred talents of silver, and to a hundred measures of wheat, and to a hundred baths of wine, and to a hundred baths of oil, and salt without prescribing how much.

23 WHATSOEVER IS COMMANDED BY THE GOD OF HEAVEN, LET IT BE DILIGENTLY DONE FOR THE HOUSE OF THE GOD OF HEAVEN: FOR WHY SHOULD THERE BE WRATH AGAINST THE REALM OF THE KING AND HIS SONS?

24 ALSO WE CERTIFY YOU, THAT, TOUCHING ANY OF THE PRIESTS AND LEVITES, SINGERS, PORTERS, NETHINIM, OR MINISTERS OF THIS HOUSE OF GOD, IT SHALL NOT BE LAWFUL TO IMPOSE TOLL, TRIBUTE, OR CUSTOM, UPON THEM.

has been called “not quite incredible” (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 206, note u), but Meyer did not think the sums mentioned excessive (Entstehung des Judentums, pp. 68-69). Egyptian records reveal both Persian interest in the sacrificial cultus of their subjects and Persian generosity in supporting it (Speigelberg, Die sogennante denotische Chronik, pp. 32-33; cf. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 91).

Since no uniform standard of weight was recognized in the ancient Near East, even for weights bearing the same name, the actual measure of Persian generosity cannot be determined. Talents weighed about sixty-five pounds each. Measures represents the kör, which held about eleven and two-thirds bushels of grain (however, see Vol. I, p. 155). Baths held about nine gallons apiece. Oil translates a word meaning “anointing,” apparently an abbreviation of the Hebrew expression “the oil of anointing” (cf. Exod. 25:6; 29:7; etc.). The same word is used in 6:9 and in the Aramaic papyri, but one would not expect a Persian official to use it without Jewish prompting or instruction. There would not be a very heavy demand for salt (cf. 6:9), and no limit was set for its expenditure.

23. The motive for royal support of the temple was to win the favor of the Jews and their God and to prevent their antipathy against the royal family and the Persian Empire. Practical considerations doubtless prevailed. Artaxerxes II long hoped to emulate his predecessors as conquerors of Egypt. The weak Egyptian kings of the Twenty-eighth and Twenty-ninth Dynasties (525-332 B.C.) seemed to hold promise of Persian victory, and a friendly Palestine on the flank and rear would be a military necessity for success.

24. All temple attendants (cf. 2:36, 40-43) were to be exempt from tribute, custom, or toll, by which is meant taxes and forced labor (cf. 4:13). The clergy were often granted special privileges and exemptions (J. A. Wilson in Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 212). The Gadatas inscription reflects just such favors by Darius and his predecessors (Botsford and Sihler, Hellenic Civilization, p. 162), and Josephus (Antiquities XII. 3. 3) claims that Antiochus the Great later granted such exemption from taxation. The list of attendants certainly shows Jewish influence in its compilation. Since singers represents a word (zammar) signifying either “singer” or “player,” the term “musicians” presents the same ambiguity as the Aramaic word. Ministers or servants
25 And thou, Ezra, after the wisdom of thy God, that is in thine hand, set magistrates and judges, which may judge all the people that are beyond the river, all such as know the laws of thy God: and teach ye them that know them not.

26 And whosoever will not do the law of thy God, and the law of the king, let judgment be executed speedily upon him, whether it be unto death, or to banishment, or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment.

is related to the term “service” in vs. 19. It is properly rendered as “menials,” since it presumably refers to “the sons of Solomon’s servants” of 2:55.

5. Ezra and the Law (7:25-26)

25-26. With you, Ezra the letter again turns to Ezra himself. The wisdom of your God means “the law of your God” (cf. vs. 14). The equation of wisdom and law, found frequently in late Hebrew, anticipates the usage in Ben Sirach (Ecclus. 15:1; 19:20; 21:11; 24:23-29; 34:8). This too is evidence for Jewish composition. A secular organization was to be set up for judging in accordance with the law of Ezra. Magistrates and judges are synonymous terms. Only the latter (adayān) is used in the Aramaic papyri of the Persian period (cf. 4:9). The former is Hebrew (cf. 10:14) and is not used elsewhere in Aramaic. Instead, the LXXAB, have “scribes and judges,” which presupposes an original “secretaries and judges.” Such “scribes” were secular officers, like the “notaries of the provinces” mentioned in the Aramaic papyri (Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, p. 53, No. 17, II. 1, 6).

All the people seems to mean all Jews and Gentiles of Syria and Palestine (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 206, notes u, v), but such as know the laws of your God limits the authority to Jews alone, wherever they were found in the province Beyond the River (cf. Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, pp. 313-14; Meyer, op. cit., p. 67). The injunction to teach the law to those ignorant of it doubtless refers to those Jews who had abandoned Judaism and to the more remote Jewish groups who had not kept abreast of the development of Jewish law. Official control over all Jews in the West, even outside of Palestine, is well illustrated by the instructions sent to Egypt about the observance of the feast of Unleavened Bread in 419 B.C. (Cowley, op. cit., pp. 60-62).

26. Royal approval made Jewish law the law of the king, and willful disobedience to it was to be punished with the same severity used against other law breakers. Speedily is better rendered strictly here (cf. 5:8). The punishments, arranged with decreasing severity, gave Ezra power which he appears to have been reluctant to use. Ezra’s friends threaten confiscation and banishment (cf. 10:8), but there is no evidence of the execution of that threat. The rendering banishment assumes that the problematical word וְשׁוּר represents a Semitic root (שָׁרָה), which can mean “uproot” (Ps. 52:5 [Hebrew 52:7]); from this an abstract noun banishment can be produced. Such etymology is rejected by Batten (op. cit., p. 316), who nevertheless regards the conjectured meaning as most probable. But somewhere in a truly Persian list should be found “beating,” the most common Persian form of punishment. The LXXAB, indeed, renders the M.T. as “chastisement” (μακροθέννα; cf. Heb. 12:5, 7-11; Prov. 15:5; and often in the LXX). If this is the correct interpretation of the word, it may be non-Semitic, possibly an abbreviation of “the scourge,” “whip,” or “thong” (straoshō-careman), one of the two implements for beating mentioned in the later Persian law book (Vendidad IV, 17-21; V, 43-44; etc.; cf. Darmesteter, The Zend-Avesta, p. xcvi, n. 3).
27 *Blessed be the LORD God of our fathers, which hath put such a thing as this in the king's heart, to beautify the house of the LORD which is in Jerusalem:

28 And hath extended mercy unto me before the king, and his counselors, and before all the king's mighty princes. And I was strengthened as the hand of the LORD my God was upon me, and I gathered together out of Israel chief men to go up with me.

27-28. The Aramaic edict is followed by a doxology in Hebrew (vss. 27-28). With these verses begins the Ezra document (cf. Intro., pp. 556-57) which, with some exceptions, is written in the first person. Ezra supposedly is the speaker throughout. The beginning of the Ezra document, now lost (Batten, op. cit., p. 316), must have given some account of Ezra's audience before the king and his counselors (vss. 14, 28), which resulted in his winning the right to go to Judea to establish Jewish law there. Some of the data of the original document must have been used by the Chronicler for his editorial introduction (vss. 1-26), but the beginning of the Ezra document was omitted, apparently because its substance was greatly duplicated in the Artaxerxes letter (vss. 12-26).

In I Esdras 8:25 (LXXA) vs. 27 is introduced by the note, "Then said Esdras the scribe . . .," but this is obviously a late editorial note identifying the speaker of the "I" section, for it is missing in I EsdrasBL. Such a thing as this, lit., "like this," refers not to the preceding document but to the whole idea of Ezra's return and all it implied. Thus I Esdras has "these things." Those things most in the writer's mind are then specified. In the king's heart means "in the king's mind" (cf. 6:22). A similar view is found in I Sam. 21:12; Job 22:22, as well as in the Ahigars papyri (Cowley, op. cit., p. 225, l. 163). Beautiful represents a word much used under the influence of the book of Isaiah (cf. 10:15; 44:23; 49:3; 55:5; 60:7, 9, 13, 21; 61:3; cf. Exod. 8:9 [Hebrew 8:5]; Judg. 7:2; Ps. 149:4; Arvid S. Kapelrud, The Question of Authorship in the Ezra-Narrative [Oslo: J. Dybwad, 1944], p. 43). Although much support of the temple is attributed to Artaxerxes, there is no evidence that he was responsible for such building or decoration of the temple as is implied in 6:14.

Extended means "offered," as in I Chr. 21:10. The idiom means "to let one find mercy" (cf. Gen. 39:21). Steadfast love (hēşēd) is often used by the Chronicler and by the later psalmists, but it is not found in the Jewish papyri. There, however, in a similar context, the word "mercy" (raḥmîn), as also used in Neh. 1:11 (cf. Neh. 9:19, 27-28, 51), is found. For counselors see vs. 14. I was strengthened means "I strengthened myself," in the sense of I took courage (cf. II Chr. 15:8). For hand of the LORD see 7:6. Gathered implies a process of selection. Later Jewish tradition insisted that Ezra himself selected those who were to return, that, as Rabbi Eleazar said, "Ezra did not go up from Babylon until he made it like pure sifted flour . . ." by sifting those of pure lineage ("fine
These are now the chief of their fathers, and this is the genealogy of them that went up with me from Babylon, in the reign of Artaxerxes the king.

2 Of the sons of Phinehas: Gershom: of the sons of Ithamar; Daniel: of the sons of David; Hattush.

3 Of the sons of Shechaniah, of the sons of Pharosh: Zechariah: and with him were reckoned by genealogy of the males a hundred and fifty.

C. THOSE RETURNING WITH EZRA (8:1-14—I Esdras 8:28-40)

8:1-14. In accordance with the royal edict (7:13), Ezra planned to lead back those Jews who desired to go to Judea. Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 2) adds a comment that a copy of the royal correspondence was sent by Ezra to his kinsmen in Media (cf. II Kings 17:5) and that "many of them, taking along their possessions also, came to Babylon out of longing to return to Jerusalem. But the Israelite nation as a whole remained in the country." As usual, he omits the extended lists of returnees given in the Bible, lest it interrupt the flow of his narrative.

The authenticity of the list has been challenged by those who regard it as an invention, based on 2:1-70 and interrupting the connection between 7:28 and 8:15 (cf. Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, II, 493, 519-20). But the originality of the list has been vigorously defended (cf. Rudolph, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 79). The expression "chief men" of 7:28 is related to the chief of their fathers in vs. 1, and vs. 15 fits well as the resumption of narrative when the author has interpolated a relevant list (cf. Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien I, p. 125).

It is incorrect to regard the genealogy as "an extract of those in Ezr 2 and Neh 7" (Kapelrud, op. cit., p. 45), for there are important differences. Unlike that in 2:1-70, this genealogy lists the priests (vs. 2), with no heading to identify them. Only the ancestral names indicate the priestly connection. Those listed are not Zadokites (cf. 2:36) but descendants of Aaron who became prominent in Babylonia between the time of Zerubbabel and Ezra and were not yet recognized as dominant in Palestine as late as the time of Ezra (10:18 ff.; cf. Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 402-7). The descendants of the two Aaronite families are later most important, according to the Priestly Code (cf. Num. 3:1 ff.; 25:6-15). It has been conjectured that the priests are here listed first in deference to Ezra the priest (7:11-12), and that the family of Phinehas preceded because that was the one to which Ezra belonged (7:5; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 79). But Ithamar was the youngest son of Aaron (Exod. 6:23) and might therefore be listed second. In Neh. 10:6 Daniel appears among the priests sealing the covenant. Since Ezra later selected a dozen priests who came up with him (vs. 24), the two men mentioned must have been family heads, as among the laymen.

Hattush was an individual, a prince of the line of David through Solomon and Zerubbabel. The words of the sons of Shecaniah (vs. 3) refer to Hattush and indicate 4 Of the sons of Pahath-moab: Elihoenai, the son of Zerahiah, and with him two hundred males.
5 Of the sons of Shechaniah: the son of Jahaziel, and with him three hundred males.
6 Of the sons also of Adin: Ebed the son of Jonathan, and with him fifty males.
7 And of the sons of Elam: Jeshaiah the son of Athaliah, and with him seventy males.
8 And of the sons of Shephatiah; Zebadiah the son of Michael, and with him four-score males.

That he was the grandson (cf. 5:1) of Shecaniah (I Chr. 3:22). According to J. W. Rothstein and Johannes Hänel (Kommentar zum ersten Buch der Chronik [Leipzig: A. Deichert, 1927; “Kommentar zum Alten Testament”], p. 43), “and the sons of Shemaiah” is to be omitted in I Chr. 3:22, which would make Hattush the son of Shecaniah as here and I Esdras 8:29.

It is largely the list of lay families (vss. 3-14) that causes the genealogy to be regarded with suspicion, since many of the family names found in 2:3 ff. (=Neh. 7:8 ff.) are encountered here. Although the names of remote ancestors are identical, there is some difference in order. All the names found in vss. 3-14 are encountered among the first thirteen names in ch. 2, but only a dozen families are found here in ch. 8. “Arad” and “Zaccai” are surprisingly missing, and no names beyond 2:15 are found. Although it is not mentioned specifically, the number twelve is presumably selected to represent the twelve Hebrew tribes, for the symbolism occurs elsewhere in the Ezra narrative (cf. vss. 24, 35). Although Jeshaiah and Athaliah (vs. 7) are Benjaminite (cf. Neh. 11:7; I Chr. 8:26), it is impossible to assign the families mentioned to the twelve original Hebrew tribes.

The formula here calls for listing the ancestral name, the family leader who returned with Ezra, identified by his father’s name, together with the sum of the males of that family who returned at that time. Where the formula is incomplete (vss. 5, 10) the need for restoration of text is apparent, and in the one instance of departure from the formula (vs. 13) the change is significant. Thus the name of the father of Zechariah (vs. 5) no longer survives. In vs. 4 Pahath-moab (2:6) apparently has come to indicate the family of Jeshua alone (2:6) since “Joab” appears independently later in the list (vs. 9). Missing in vs. 5 is the name of the remote ancestor, but it can be restored as “Zattu” (2:8) on the basis of the “Zathoqes” of the LXX. Similarly, in vs. 10 the LXX (“Boani”) and I EsdrasAB (“Banias”) indicate that the missing ancestral name was “Bani” (cf. 2:10). Ebed (“Servant of . . .”) in vs. 6 (cf. Judg. 9:26) could be an abbreviation of such a name as “Abdeel,” but the Greek texts suggest an original “Obed” (Ruth 4:17, 21; I Chr. 2:12; Matt. 1:5), which abbreviates Obadiah (cf. vs. 9). The name Jeshaiah (vs. 7) is identical with the name “Isaiah.” The feminine name Shelomith (vs. 10; cf. Lev. 24:11) should be vocalized “Shalomoth” (cf. I Chr. 23:9; 24:22; 26:25-28), as the Greek versions show. Hakkatan (“The Little One”) in vs. 12 may be an epithet meaning either “small” or “young” (cf. Judg. 3:9 and “James the less” in Mark 15:40).

The majority of the exiles preferred to remain in the relative comfort and security of Babylon, rather than to risk so long and dangerous a journey to what proved to be so precarious a livelihood. But with the help of a man of discretion and by the good hand of our God upon us (vs. 18), this ceremonial lack was supplied. As so often in the undertakings that make history, both human wisdom and divine guidance and blessing “had a hand” in the outcome.
9 Of the sons of Joab: Obadiah the son of Jehiel, and with him two hundred and eighteen males.
10 And of the sons of Shelomith: the son of Josiphiah, and with him a hundred and threescore males.
11 And of the sons of Bebai: Zechariah the son of Bebai, and with him twenty and eight males.
12 And of the sons of Azgad: Johanan the son of Hakkaan, and with him a hundred and ten males.
13 And of the last sons of Adonikam, whose names are these, Eliphelet, Jeiel, and Shemaiah, and with them threescore males.
14 Of the sons also of Bigvai; Uthai, and Zabbud, and with them seventy males.
15 § And I gathered them together to the river that runneth to Ahava; and there

In vs. 13 the formula is broken and three names are given without reference to paternity. The word translated last is obscure in the context. It is unnecessary to omit the word as a dittograph (cf. Ehrlich, Randglossen zur herbräischen Bibel, VII, 174; Bewer, Der Text des Buches Ezra, p. 74: Hölscher, op. cit., II, 520). Who came later is nonsense in the light of the went up with me in vs. 1. The LXXAB and I Esdras, which have “the last ones,” show the way to the proper interpretation. The three individuals comprise the last of the family of Adonikam (2:13) that remained in Babylonia. The three men were apparently of equal rank.

Of the family of Bigvai (2:14), Uthai appears to have been the son of Zabbud (or Zakkur), as the reading in I Esdras shows (cf. Bewer, loc. cit.). The Greek versions show that in agreement with the single name the correct reading of the M.T. is “with him” rather than with them. After the corruption of the text to read two names, the text was altered to with them in agreement, and that “correction” is found in the Vulg., Peshitta, and about ninety MSS. Zabbud represents the written tradition of the M.T., but Hebrew oral tradition, supported by the Vulg. and the LXX, has Zakkur. The names are easily confused in writing and it is impossible to determine which was original.

D. ACQUISITION OF TEMPLE SERVANTS (8:15-20—I Esdras 8:41-49)

15. As with every large caravan about to get under way, an open space away from the big city was used as an assembly point where the people could be organized and the equipment prepared for the expedition (cf. Jer. 41:17). Here the emigrees abode . . . in tents during the necessary period. Ezra’s camp was located on a stream flowing toward Ahava, a place not yet certainly identified. Instead of river, translate “stream” or “canal” (cf. Ezek. 1:1; 3:15). Identification which would place Ahava on the Euphrates must be wrong since that river would not be described as in vs. 15. Many attempts at identification have been made, but the most probable links it with modern Mesopotamia, the classical Maschana or Scenae, on the canal now called Ad-Duqe’l (Alois Musil, The Middle Euphrates [New York: Czech Academy of Sciences and Arts, 1927], Appendix XX, pp. 360-63). The classical name, which means “tented settlement,” suits well the description of Ahava. The place is located on the transport route along the right bank of the Tigris River at the point where it branches into two caravan routes, one leading northwest, the other going westward across central Mesopotamia.

Some have seen the prototype of the three days in the Nehemiah memoirs (Neh. 634 abode we in tents three days: and I viewed the people, and the priests, and found there none of the sons of Levi.

16 Then sent I for Eliezer, for Ariel, for Shemaiah, and for El Nathan, and for Jarib, and for El Nathan, and for Nathan, and for Zechariah, and for Meshullam, chief men: also for Joiarib, and for El Nathan, men of understanding.

2:11; Kapelrud, op. cit., p. 46, but three days is only a reasonable time to delay for organization (cf. vs. 32 for disbanding the caravan). It was apparently on the third day that the absence of the Levites was discovered, but it was not until the twelfth day that the lack was remedied and the caravan was ready to depart (vs. 31).

Perhaps in ancient times, as today in mass migrations, the chieftains rode together in advance of the caravan, followed by the various households together with their stock. At each encampment the families erected tents in a place selected by the family leader so that a halted caravan was actually a series of family camps (Charles M. Doughty, Travels in Arabia Deserta [New York: Random House, 1946], pp. 257, 161-62; cf. C. P. Grant, The Syrian Desert [New York: The Macmillan Co., 1938], p. 226). Stress on family groups explains the family structure of the genealogy. Thus, too, the absence of Levites was detected when Ezra reviewed the people and the priests.

The Levites apparently refused to leave their security and position in Babylonia for the insecurity of menial duties in the Jerusalem temple (cf. Neh. 13:10). Later Jews, embarrassed by such reluctance, rationalized the Levites' behavior by explaining that since Abraham had once dwelt in Babylonia, and the Babylonian language was similar to Hebrew, the Levites and other Jews felt at home there (Tosephta Baba Kama VII, 3; Pesahim 87b). Some insisted that Levites were in the caravan (cf. 7:7), but that they were old men who had made themselves unfit for temple service by biting off their fingers (cf. Lev. 21:16-24) rather than play their instruments at Nebuchadrezzar's orders (Yalkut II, 884; Midrash Tehillim, 137). But Ezra found no Levites and had to recruit some.

16. A group of men were appointed to represent Ezra in the gathering of the Levites. They are called leading men, but aside from Zechariah (vss. 9, 11) and Shemaiah (vs. 13), who bear very common names, none is listed among the family leaders in the genealogy (vss. 3-14). Nor can it be determined just how many members the delegation had. The M.T., LXX, and Vulg. list eleven; I Esdras*AB* has ten; while I Esdras*L* has only seven. Several names seem to be duplicated. Elnathan appears thrice and the abbreviation Nathan once, while Jarib and Joiarib are variants of the same name. One Elnathan may be a corruption of another name for which six MSS have "Jonathan." Joiarib and Elnathan, now separated from the others at the end of the verse, obviously duplicate the earlier Jarib and Elnathan, as I Esdras*L* shows. Their omission restores to the noun "chieftains" (lit., "heads") its adjectival modifier "intelligent," so that all men listed, not just the last two, are characterized as "intelligent leaders," as in I Esdras 8:44.

Grammatical ambiguity makes possible the translations "I sent to Eliezer" as well as I sent for Eliezer, as though the men were located somewhere apart from Ezra in Babylonia. But Ezra sent them to Iddo (vs. 17). No preposition is given in the Vulg. and the Lucianic Greek texts, apparently because it was recognized as the sign of the object, as in Aramaic (E. F. Kautzsch, Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, tr. A. E. Cowley [2nd English ed.; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1919], sec. 143e; cf. Driver, Intro. to Literature of O.T., p. 538, No. 39; Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 265; Bewer, op. cit., p. 75), and the translation should be: "I sent Eliezer." 17 And I sent them with commandment unto Iddo the chief at the place Casiphia, and I told them what they should say unto Iddo, and to his brethren the Nethinim, at the place Casiphia, that they should bring unto us ministers for the house of our God. 18 And by the good hand of our God upon us they brought us a man of understanding, of the sons of Mahli, the son of Levi, the son of Israel: and Sherebiah, with his sons and his brethren, eighteen:

were men of insight, 17 and sent them to Iddo, the leading man at the place Casiphia, telling them what to say to Iddo and his brethren the temple servants at the place Casiphia, namely, to send us ministers for the house of our God. 18 And by the good hand of our God upon us, they brought us a man of discretion, of the sons of Mahli the son of Levi, son of Israel, namely Sherebi'ah with his sons and kinsmen.

17. I sent them with commandment reflects the conflate reading of the M.T., but only one of the ideas, either “send” or “command,” should be translated. Hebrew oral tradition and the Peshitta call for “I commanded them,” as in the American Jewish Translation. This is understood as meaning “directing them [to]” or “I dispatched them” (cf. Exod. 6:15; Jer. 27:4). Hebrew written tradition, the LXXAB, and Arabic versions call for a translation I sent them. The Iddo (יְדֹדָן) to whom the delegation was sent must not be confused with the Iddo (יְדוֹדָן) of I Kings 4:14; Zech. 1:7; II Chr. 12:15, which is spelled differently. The name abbreviates one containing the element “Lord” (יְדֹוהָן), such as Adonijah. It may be found in Neo-Babylonian texts as mid-du-u-a (Oluf Krückmann, Neubabylonische Rechts- und Verwaltungs-texte [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1933], No. 9, l. 38). Like the leaders who accompanied Ezra (8:1, 16), Iddo is a “head” or leading man of the Jews.

Iddo was found at the place Casiphia which also is not yet identified but must have been near Ahava. Because 9:8 uses place for the holy place in Jerusalem, it has been suggested that Casiphia was a sanctuary, a Babylonian Jewish “temple” parallel to the Jewish temples in Egypt (Laurence E. Browne, “A Jewish Sanctuary in Babylonia,” Journal of Theological Studies, XVII [1916], 400-401; cf. the same author’s Early Judaism [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1920], p. 53). It has also been conjectured that Casiphia was a training school for Levites (Bertheau, Ezra, Nechemia und Ester, p. 104). But it is more probable that Casiphia was a city or village with a large Jewish colony. Place is used of a city in Hebrew when its name is already known (cf. II Kings 18:25), but the word may be used here as a determinative, an aid in reading as in Akkadian (cf. Gen. 12:6; Jer. 19:13; cf. W. E. Staples, “The Reading of Hebrew,” American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures, LVIII [1941], 139-45). It has been suggested that the name Casiphia has been distorted to Ctesiphon, the city lying just across the river from Seleucia (Hugo Winckler, “Kasipha-Ktesiphon,” Altorientalische Forschungen [Leipzig: E. Pfeiffer, 1901], Reihe 2, Bd. III, pp. 509-30). Such identification cannot be regarded as certain, but the site would be suitable if the antiquity of Ctesiphon could be demonstrated archaeologically.

The senseless combination “his brother the Nethinim” in the M.T. has been corrected to his brethren the Nethinim. It is better to read with the versions, “Iddo and his brethren.” But Iddo was probably a Levite rather than one of the Nethinim and brethren here merely indicates mutual interest and professional relationship, as elsewhere (cf. 8:2). As I Esdras shows, originally the text had “and the Nethinim,” but the conjunction was lost accidentally since it was identical with the last letter of his brethren. Thus we should read, “Iddo and his brethren and the Nethinim.” Ministers is the translation for servite, but as a cultic title it could be applied even to priests (cf. Exod. 28:35; 30:20); here it indicates menial servants, the lowly assistants of the priests.

18-20. Josephus summarizes these verses but, as usual, in the interest of the narrative he supplies no names. The good hand is as in 7:6. As I Esdras shows, the man of discretion was Sherebiah, who plays an important role in the Ezra story (8:18, 24; Neh. 8:7; 9:4-5; 10:12; 12:8, 24). Thus and before his name should be regarded as explicative.
19 And Hashabiah, and with him Jeshaiah of the sons of Merari, his brethren and their sons, twenty:

20 Also of the Nethinim, whom David and the princes had appointed for the service of the Levites, two hundred and twenty Nethinim: all of them were expressed by name.

21 Then I proclaimed a fast there, at the river of Ahava, that we might afflict our men, eighteen: 19 also Hashabiah and with him Jeshaiah of the sons of Merari, with his kinsmen and their sons, twenty; 20 besides two hundred and twenty of the temple servants, whom David and his officials had set apart to attend the Levites. These were all mentioned by name.

21 Then I proclaimed a fast there, at the (c.f. 6:8), translated namely. Sherebiah is traced to Jacob (Israel) through Levi (c.f. Exod. 6:19; Num. 3:20). All of the Levites mentioned were of the line of Merari, the son of Levi (c.f. I Chr. 6:47), the families which traditionally served the tent of meeting (Num. 4:29-33, 42-45) and helped to bear the tabernacle (Num. 10:17). Hashabiah is listed with Jeshaiah (vs. 7) as being of the sons of Merari (I Chr. 6:44-45). The antecedent of his brethren is Sherebiah of vs. 18, but their sons refers to the families of Hashabiah and Jeshaiah.

Only thirty-eight Levites were assembled, but the number of servants was swelled by the relatively large number of Nethinim (c.f. 2:43) who were induced to go to Jerusalem. Because the Nethinim are not mentioned in vs. 15, the reference to them has been regarded as an addition to the text. But 7:7 lists them as among those who returned with Ezra, and it is probable that with so few Levites returning, some special inducements may have been offered to bring servants of any order to the temple. The unusual form of the relative pronoun in vs. 20 suggests that the clause, whom David and the princes, etc., may have been added to the text. Since the Chronicler uses the relative particle several times (I Chr. 5:20; 27:27), this may be the work of his hand. There was no need to comment on the origin of the Nethinim here, and it is only here that there is preserved the tradition that David and the princes were responsible for instituting the Nethinim. The Chronicler elsewhere declares that the temple cultus derived from the time of David, but the Nethinim do not come into prominence until the postexilic period.

Mentioned by name is associated with lists of names elsewhere in the work of the Chronicler (I Chr. 12:31; 16:41; II Chr. 28:15; 31:19) and in Num. 1:17. It indicates that a full list was available and could have been given but was omitted because too many names were involved.

E. Final Preparation Before Departure (8:21-23=I Esdras 8:50-53)

Ezra assumed leadership at once, and as leader combined his secular and religious functions in seeking the protection of God for his caravan. He had assured the king that God would protect his own and therefore did not request a bodyguard (vs. 22), but he was aware of the robbers who would try to loot his caravan (vs. 31) to get the rich and valuable treasure he carried (vss. 25-28). Through fasting and prayer he sought divine protection (vss. 21-23), and the temple treasure was placed in the charge of God's holy priests (vss. 24-30). The move was successful, for although the caravan was attacked they finished the journey safely (cf. vss. 23, 31).

21-23. The self-inflicted hunger pains of a fast were calculated to influence God to pity the fasting petitioner (cf. II Sam. 12:16 ff.; Isa. 58:3) and thus gain a favorable 21-36. Prayer and Fasting.—Here some sense of historical reality and religious urgency breaks through the genealogical and ceremonial framework within which the Chronicler is so concerned to set his story; and we begin to feel something of the firsthand authenticity that is so marked in Nehemiah's memoirs. Ezra proclaims a period of fasting and prayer, because he is ashamed to ask the king for a military guard after he has so explicitly put his reliance on the hand of our God (vs. 22) for guidance and protection.

selves before our God, to seek of him a right way for us, and for our little ones, and for all our substance.

22 For I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help us against the enemy in the way: because we had spoken unto the king, saying,
The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him: but his power and his wrath is against all them that forsake him.

23 So we fasted and besought our God for this: and he was entreated of us.

24 ¶ Then I separated twelve of the chief of the priests, Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten of their brethren with them,

answer to prayer. The right way means a straight or “even” way (cf. Isa. 26:7; Jer. 31:9). In I Esdras AB 8:50 it is interpreted as a “favorable journey” (εὐοδίαν). The Amer. Trans. renders it “a safe journey.” Because of danger of ambush by local raiders who would plunder the caravan while passing through lonely desert wastes en route to the west, during the Persian period the government in control sometimes on request furnished a military escort (cf. Neh. 2:9), just as the Turks supplied janizaries during the early part of the Ottoman period (cf. Grant, op. cit., pp. 128, 137-39) and the French did in Syria in modern times. The rendering band of soldiers, lit., “a force” (cf. 4:23), represents a word used in the Jewish papyri for the detachment of soldiers posted at Assuan, and also in the Behistun papyri for the Assyrian and Persian armies. To help us, like the M.T., implies a readiness of the Jews themselves to fight, but to protect us, which is based on the Greek versions, stresses absolute dependence upon the armed escort. The great concern was felt for the children and possessions. The word translated little ones (vs. 21) is found frequently in early Hebrew but is relatively rare in the late period (cf. Isa. 9:6; Esth. 3:13; 8:11; II Chr. 20:13; 31:18). The Greek versions translate it as our children. Substance (Hebrew ṭékhéš; cf. 1:4, 6) can mean “livestock,” as in I Esdras 8:50, but here the broader interpretation of the term, accumulated goods, is preferable since Ezra sought safe arrival not only of his beasts but of the treasure (vss. 25-28) being delivered.

In Ezra’s refusal to ask for a bodyguard some have seen a rebuke to Nehemiah for lack of faith and a lauding of Ezra as superior (cf. Kapelrud, Question of Authorship in the Ezra-Narrative, pp. 52-53). It is thus supposed that the Ezra narrative here is dependent upon Nehemiah and is thus historically improbable. It may, however, be merely the expected contrast between the realistic and practical administrator Nehemiah and the religious idealist Ezra.

F. Delegation to Transport Treasure (8:24-30=I Esdras 8:54-60)

Lacking an armed bodyguard, Ezra sought some way to protect the treasure entrusted by the Persian court for delivery to the temple in Jerusalem. As material set apart for divine use, the vessels and the metals were holy unto the Lord (vs. 28). Both men, as priests and Levites (cf. Lev. 21:6; II Chr. 23:6), and temple paraphernalia (cf.

To Americans, vss. 21-23 may well seem the most momentous in the entire book in their far-reaching historical consequences. William Bradford’s History of Plymouth Plantation tells us that this was the text of John Robinson’s last sermon at Leyden, before he sent his little band of Pilgrims forth in 1620 to face the perils of the North Atlantic in autumn, and the rigors of “a stern and rock-bound coast” through that first terrible winter at Plymouth, 25 And weighed unto them the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, even the offering of the house of our God, which the king, and his counselors, and his lords, and all Israel there present, had offered:

26 I even weighed unto their hand six hundred and fifty talents of silver, and silver vessels a hundred talents, and of gold a hundred talents;

Josh. 6:19; Zech. 14:20-21) were consecrated and were then no longer subject to common use but were henceforth surrounded by taboos and restrictions placed on all of God's property. Only holy men should handle holy things. The knowledge that the valuables belonged neither to Ezra nor the people but to their God would serve to make the holy men guarding the wealth unquestionably honest and especially vigilant until their responsibilities should be discharged in Jerusalem. Implied also is the fact that God would in a special way protect what was his own.

24. Set apart means selected for the special task. Twelve was a popular number among the Hebrews, but it is here not a symbol for the twelve tribes since all of the clerics were of the same tribe. No laymen were permitted to handle holy things. In addition to the dozen priests there were as many Levites selected (cf. vs. 30). Since Sherebiah and Hashabiah were not priests (cf. 8:2) but leaders of Ezra's newly acquired Levites (cf. vss. 18-19), it is necessary to read with I Esdras the conjunction "and" before each name. It has been suggested that something like "and the Levites" has been omitted after priests (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 266). Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 2) identifies the group as "treasurers who were of priestly descent." Their brethren means the Levites.

25. Of the treasure the silver and gold constituted the freewill offering (vs. 28) collected in Babylonia for the temple (cf. 7:15 ff.). In addition to the king and counselors (vs. 25) mentioned in 7:15, the M.T. adds a third group, his lords, which appear as "leaders" in the LXX and "grandees" or "noblemen" in I Esdras. Josephus here omits the third group as in 7:15. Unworked precious metal, presumably in bars or ingots, is listed by weight alone, but the manufactured articles are listed by number and appraised value. As elsewhere, vessels may better be translated "implements" (cf. 1:7). In listing the treasure the most common and abundant metal is listed first, then gold, and finally the rare and valuable objects.

26. The figures here given, much too large to be historically probable, are doubtless the Chronicler's contribution, for he becomes overly enthusiastic in his statistics where the temple is concerned (cf. II Chr. 7:5), even where his figures can be checked against an earlier source (II Sam. 24:24; I Chr. 21:25).

The hundred talents assigned to the silver vessels does not represent the M.T., which has, lit., "a hundred silver vessels worth talents." It has been proposed to read the talents as dual, "two talents," rather than as plural (Bewer, Der Text des Buches Ezra, p. 77; cf. Rudolph, Ezra und Nehemiah, p. 82). But such a modest sum seems inappropriate in the light of the other figures. It is more probable that the actual figure, which should follow talents, has been lost from the text (cf. Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 69; Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 266). Since a talent weighed about sixty-five during which half the company of the "Mayflower" perished. Thus the "idealized history" of the Chronicler kindled some at least of the spiritual dynamic that sustained a longer and riskier journey than Ezra's, and through the "Mayflower Compact", signed in Provincetown Harbor became a creative part of the social and religious heritage of American democracy. The congregation at Leyden, like the caravan at the river Ahava, proclaimed a "day of solemn humiliation . . ., power out prayers to ye Lord with great fervency, mixed with abundance of tears." Robinson's sermon on this text took most of the day "very profitably," and his

27. Also twenty basins of gold, of a thousand dollars: and two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold.

28. And I said unto them, Ye are holy unto the LORD: the vessels are holy also: and the silver and the gold are a freewill offering unto the LORD God of your fathers.

29. Watch ye, and keep them, until ye weigh them before the chief of the priests and the Levites, and chief of the fathers of Israel, at Jerusalem, in the chambers of the house of the LORD.

30. So took the priests and the Levites the weight of the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, to bring them to Jerusalem unto the house of our God.

The bowls are of the same type as those in 1:10. The term rendered drams or darics is spelled as in I Chr. 29:7 (ןד"הרהוים) rather than as in Ezra 2:69 (cf. Neh. 7:70-72). However, the confusion in the LXXABI suggests that the spelling of the M.T. was once that in 2:69, for the error there, “the road” (πην ἄδδα), points to a confusion of the Hebrew “road” (糖尿) with the beginning letters of darics ([דרים) (דרים)

The list of treasure concludes with the unique vessels of special type and great value. They are described as being precious as gold, but Josephus calls them “more precious than gold,” which would account for their being last in a list that is apparently in an ascending scale. Since the same word is used in Hebrew for both copper and bronze, the nature of the material is uncertain and it has even been suggested that it was “a rare amalgam” (George Rawlinson, Ezra and Nehemiah [New York: Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., 1891], p. 28). The description given here seems to favor copper as a metal of beauty that could be highly polished. The KJV omits the modifier found in the M.T., which in the RSV is translated bright, apparently because the LXX has departing flock never forgot what he said to them:

I charge you before God and his blessed Angels to follow me no further than I follow Christ, ... and if God shall reveal anything to you by any other Instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive any truth by my ministry. [Two days later they left Leyden], that a goodly and pleasant citie, which had been their resting place near 12 years; but they knew they were pilgrims, and looked not much on those things, but lift[ed] up their eyes to ye heavens, their dearest countrie, and quieted their spirits.

So Ezra’s faith and courage for his journey across the Arabian Desert quickened the Pilgrims’ faith and courage that dared both the Atlantic and the winter wilderness two thousand years later, passing over thus into the spiritual heritage of the western continent to mold the history of the New World. In view of the historical results of the journeys of both these little companies, the religiously minded among their children’s children have had reason aplenty to join in the grateful acknowledgment of their “founding fathers”: The hand of our God was upon us, and he delivered us from the hand of the enemy and from ambushes by the way (vs. 31b). 640
31 Then we departed from the river of Ahava on the twelfth day of the first month, to go unto Jerusalem; and the hand of our God was upon us, and he delivered us from the hand of the enemy, and of such as lay in wait by the way.

32 And we came to Jerusalem, and abode there three days.

"glittering" and I Esdras has "glittering like gold." In the Amer. Trans. it is interpreted as "burnished." But the M.T. has "reddened" (cf. Arabic sahiba, "be red") and the term appears to be a translation of the Akkadian "red-gleaming copper" (sipparu ruššu).

G. DEPARTURE AND ARRIVAL (8:31-36=1 Esdras 8:61-64)

The first stage of the journey to Jerusalem began on the first of the first month (7:9) in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (7:7-8). But Josephus, basing his narrative on I Esdras 8:6 (=Ezra 7:8), wrongly places the movement during the seventh year of Xerxes (479 B.C.), which is too early. The delay at Ahava (cf. 8:15 ff.) took some time, but after the temple servants were gotten and the caravan organized, the departure was made on the twelfth day of the first month (Apr. 16, 398 B.C.).

31. We departed translates a word used among nomads meaning "pull up stakes" and then "depart," a word rare in late Hebrew (Job 4:21; 19:10) as might be expected, but it is appropriate here for the departure of a tented community (cf. 8:15). Josephus declares that the group "set out from the Euphrates" but that is much less likely than from the Tigris. The route along the Euphrates would be difficult and dangerous during early spring (Rawlinson, Ezra and Nehemiah, pp. 32-35). Nusil (Middle Euphrates, p. 361) says: "There was no corn ripe as yet in early April on the Euphrates, and the Jews would therefore have found neither food for themselves nor pasture for their animals. Moreover, the chiefs of the different settlements along the Euphrates, always more or less independent, would undoubtedly have troubled them with their demands. The chiefs from the surrounding country would not have hesitated to fall upon a body of strangers not protected by Persian soldiery and who, as they knew or at least imagined, had plenty of money and supplies." The alternate route, longer but safer, through more inhabited territory "led first along the right bank of the Tigris northward nearly as far as Mosul of today; then it turned west along the foot of the northern mountain range and went through the region between the desert and the settled country as far as the Euphrates, which it reached at the ford of Thapsacus in the neighborhood of the present Bālis ruins" (ibid.).

Ezra's journey took four months, culminating at Jerusalem on the first day of the fifth month (7:9), July 31, 398 B.C., including necessary delays and the journey from Syria southward to Jerusalem. Strabo (Geography XVI. 1. 8, 26-27) describes the same route as traveled by merchants of his day, and indicates that it took twenty-five days from the ford of the Euphrates (at Anthemusia) to Scenae (=Ahava) on camel back (Musil, op. cit., pp. 361-62). Ezra's large group with its livestock could scarcely match the speed of small merchant caravans.

32. Upon arrival at Jerusalem there were three days of encampment, apparently for rest and orderly demobilization of the caravan. Immigrants would have to be settled and the inevitable conflicts between the newcomers and the people in the land would have to be adjusted. Because in Neh. 2:11 a similar interval followed Nehemiah's arrival, vs. 32 here has been regarded as a borrowing from that passage by the Chronicler (cf. Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 60; Kapelrud, op. cit., p. 57), but there is nothing implausible in the narrative here. In fact, such a period would be even more necessary with Ezra's caravan than with Nehemiah's smaller company.
33 ¶ Now on the fourth day was the silver and the gold and the vessels weighed in the house of our God by the hand of Meremoth the son of Uriah the priest; and with him was Eleazar the son of Phinehas; and with them was Jozabad the son of Jeshua, and Noadiah the son of Binnui, Levites;

34 By number and by weight of every one: and all the weight was written at that time.

35 Also the children of those that had been carried away, which were come out of the captivity, offered burnt offerings unto the God of Israel, twelve bullocks for all Israel, ninety and six rams, seventy and seven lambs, twelve he goats for a sin offering: all this was a burnt offering unto the Lord.

33-34. On the fourth day, after the caravan had disbanded, Ezra turned to the less pressing but important duty of delivering the temple treasure. It was presumably turned in at “the chambers,” the storerooms or treasuries of the temple (cf. vs. 29; Neh. 10:37-39). Since the M.T. says that the things were “weighed out upon the hands” of the treasurers, it is better to read weighed into the hands of . . . rather than “under the direction of . . .” (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 267). By the hand of is certainly too ambiguous, since it is clear from the M.T. that Meremoth was the recipient of the treasure, not the one bringing it. In businesslike fashion the goods were checked by number and by weight against the inventory at Jerusalem. Such concern about accounting has led to the conclusion that the Ezra document is no mere memoir or edifying treatise but an actual report back to the king and court regarding the progress of the tasks to which Ezra was entrusted (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 83-84). Because “the same peculiar construction and the same words” are used in I Chr. 28:14-18, it has been suggested that the Chronicler has written this passage (Torrey, loc. cit.), but both passages are concerned with tabulation, and the agreement is not as verbally exact as the theory implies. The priest, Meremoth, is mentioned as having come up from Babylonia at an earlier day (cf. 2:61). Since he was of the family of Koź, who could not authenticate their right to priestly office (2:61-62), and since he is mentioned without priestly title as a builder of the wall in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:4, 21), the presence of the title priest here is significant. It has been conjectured that Meremoth’s double share of work on the wall (Neh. 3:4, 21) gained his priestly investiture (cf. Aage Bentzen, “Priesterschaft und Laien in der jüdischen Gemeinde des fünften Jahrhunderts,” Archiv für Orientforschung, VI [1931], 285). Such evidence would indicate the priority of Nehemiah’s arrival and activity in Jerusalem (cf. Rowley, Servant of the Lord, pp. 158-59). Eleazar may be the priest accused of marrying a foreign wife in 10:18. Jozabad and Noadiah were Levitical assistants to the priests. A Jozabad was one of the chief Levites who had oversight of the outside business of the temple in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:16), a role in which he appears to be functioning here. A Levite of the same name married a foreign woman (10:23). Noadiah appears only here, but he is of the important family of Binnui which, like that of Jeshua, is listed as having come up from Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:8).

35-36. Appended to the Ezra narrative are these verses in which the Chronicler’s hand is apparent both in interest and style. But the content need not be regarded as unhistorical, at least in its broad outlines, although the Chronicler may have heightened 36 * And they delivered the king's commissions unto the king's lieutenants, and to the governors on this side the river: and they furthered the people, and the house of God. 36 They also delivered the king's commissions to the king's satraps and to the governors of the province Beyond the River; and they aided the people and the house of God.

some of the details. The verses complete the episode by disposing of elements presumably neglected in the Ezra document: the presenting of the sacrifices at the temple (7:17) and the delivery of royal instructions (cf. 7:21) to the secular officials of the western provinces. Both matters lie within the peculiar interests of the Chronicler, for they concern the history and fortunes of the temple.

At that time (vs. 34 KJV) is an example of faulty verse division, since it should introduce vs. 35, as in the RSV, which here follows the LXXAB. Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 2) indicates that the sacrifices were made “when he [Ezra] had given these [treasures] over to the priests.” The nature of the offerings is not clear. He explains them not as special gifts but as regular “whole burnt offerings customarily made.” But the verse here stresses that it was the returning Jews, not those already in the land, who made the sacrifices. This would suggest that they may have been, like the thanksgiving (tōdhāh) sacrifices (Lev. 7:11-12; 22:29-30) or “joyous sacrifices” (salmē sinhāh) of the later period, thanksgiving for a safe journey. In I Esdras 8:66 the sacrifice is called a “peace offering” (σωμπίον), the word regularly used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew shelem. But only a portion of the peace offerings and thank offerings was burned; the rest was eaten by the worshiper and his friends. The only public peace offerings were the two lambs at Pentecost (cf. Lev. 23:19). Public sacrifices, as a rule, were either burnt offerings (ʾōlah) or the sin offering (ḥattāʾth). Therefore Josephus declares the sacrifices were “as an atonement for sins,” and thus agrees with the M.T., which mentions a sin offering. The term sin offering may apply only to the twelve he-goats (cf. 6:17; Lev. 7:1-38).

The figures in this verse indicate the author’s belief that the restored community represented all the twelve tribes of Israel (cf. vs. 1-14, 24), since all sacrifices are twelve or multiples of it. Obviously the seventy-seven lambs is corrupt and should be “seventy-two,” as is rendered in I EsdrasAL and Josephus. The figures here presented suggest those of the tribal sacrifices at the dedication of the early altar according to Num. 7:12-88, but the number of rams is extraordinarily large, for in Num. 7:87-88 the number of rams and lambs is identical.

36. For commissions the M.T. has, lit., “the laws” (Persian data; cf. 7:12), but the meaning is clearly weakened to mean “instructions” or “orders.” The commissions here mentioned are usually identified as those incorporated in the king’s letter (7:21-24), but the latter are addressed to the “treasurers” whereas the officers here mentioned as the king’s lieutenants are his satraps (Persian khshathrapāvan) and governors (Babylonian pāhatu; cf. 5:3, 6, 14; 6:6, 7, 13). The satraps were the vice-regents of satrapies, and as such, among the highest officials in the kingdom. Governors was a Semitic title which in the Persian period was ambiguous and could be applied to any official, including the satrap himself (cf. 5:3). Here, as in Daniel (3:2-3, 27; 6:7) and Esther (3:12; 8:9), the Persian and Babylonian titles are found side by side. It is sometimes assumed that governors is an explanatory gloss to satraps (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 330) or vice versa (Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 38), and Guthe has suggested that the conjunction might be explicative, “namely” (cf. 6:8; 8:18).

They furthered or they aided reflects a verb meaning “to lift” or “to carry,” which is extended to mean “they gave support to,” as in the Amer. Trans. (cf. 1:4; I Kings 9:11; Esth. 9:3). In the M.T. the subject could be Ezra and his companions, the they of vs. 36a, but Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 2) clarifies the subject as the officials who received the royal orders, for he says: “Being compelled to carry out his [Artaxerxes] commands they [the officials] honored the Jewish nation and assisted it in all necessary ways.”
9 Now when these things were done, the princes came to me, saying, The people of Israel, and the priests, and the Levites, have not separated themselves from the people of the lands, doing according to their abominations, even of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Jebusites, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and the Amorites.

The transition from 8:36 to 9:1 is decidedly too abrupt to be original. The necessary sequel to ch. 8 is Neh. 7:70-73, which is quite out of place in the story of Nehemiah. The entire passage Neh. 7:70-8:18 belongs between Ezra 8 and Ezra 9 (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 256). Rudolph (op. cit., p. 85; cf. pp. 14-15) would move from 8:36 to Neh. 7:72b.

IV. Mixed Marriages (9:1-10:44)
A. Report of Mixed Marriages (9:1-2=Ezras 8:68-70)

9:1. After these things had been done suggests that the crisis of chs. 9-10 occurred during the fifth month, shortly after Ezra's arrival at Jerusalem (cf. 7:8-9), but Josephus claims it was "some time afterwards," and 10:6-9 indicates a date in the ninth month (Dec. 14, 398 B.C.), almost five months after Ezra's arrival. The events of the seventh month (Neh. 7:70-8:18) had thus intervened, and these things must refer to the acceptance of the law and the celebration of the feast of Tabernacles (Neh. 8:1-18), a part of the Ezra story that has been transported to the book of Nehemiah. The proper order of the Ezra narrative would have Neh. 7:70-8:18 between Ezra 8 and 9 (cf. Torrey, Ezra Studies, pp. 255-60).

Since it is unlikely that Ezra would have remained so long ignorant of the situation concerning mixed marriages, or would have made no attempt to combat that trend, the account of earlier, futile attempts by Ezra to solve the problem may have been editorially suppressed by the Chronicler as being unworthy behavior by the community he recognized as ideal (cf. 4:1; 5:1). But it is possible also that Ezra himself had omitted from his official report the previous failures in favor of the detailed account of the more successful measures which is preserved (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 85, 87).

The term princes (sārim, vs. 2) is used by Nehemiah for district leaders (Neh. 3:9; 12:31-32). Peoples of the lands (cf. 3:3) are those found in Judea by those who returned from the Exile. The long list of people which follows is intended as a commentary on peoples of the lands. But the list is a worthless and unhistorical addition to the text, since it includes people who had long since disappeared from the scene, exterminated or assimilated by the Canaanites and Hebrews. Canaanites, Hittites, Perizzites, Jebusites, Egyptians, and Amorites were no threat to the Jews in the time of Ezra. For Amorites I Esdras 8:69 has "Edomites," which would be historically suitable since the Edomites pushed into southern Judea during the Exile and formed part of the population when Ezra arrived (cf. Neh. 2:19). Ammonites, too, were still active in Palestine (cf. Neh. 4:3, 7; 13:7-8), as were the Moabites (cf. Isa. 25:10-11; Ps. 83:6; Neh. 13:1). Ammonites and Moabites may appear because of Deut. 23:3-4 (cf. Neh. 13:1), and the list may well have been derived by the Chronicler from the injunction against foreign contacts in Deut. 7 (especially vss. 1, 3-4).

9:1-15. Family Complications.—Hard as some of us find it to sympathize with Ezra's acute concern and ruthless attitude toward mixed marriages, as that attitude appears in chs. 9-10, there is one aspect of his prayer of public confession that has touched our own consciences to the quick. Under the influence of the greater Hebrew prophets and of the Christian "social gospel," we have felt it a part of our responsibility as Christian ministers to declare and
2. The negative statement of vs. 1 becomes positive accusation here. They refers to the Jewish men. Holy race is, lit., holy seed (cf. Isa. 6:13), the "seed of Abraham" (II Chr. 20:7), the "holy people" (Deut. 7:6). Believing that God abhorred mixtures (cf. Lev. 19:19), the Jews were rebuked for mingling with their non-Jewish neighbors. Jewish leaders rather than the average Jews were guilty of the practice of foreign marriages. Rulers represents a Babylonian title for a variety of appointed officials, from governors to simple deputies, and in the Persian period even for superintendents or foremen (cf. Ezek. 23:6, 12, 23; Jer. 51:23, 57; Isa. 41:25). Its degradation in the post-exilic period is apparent in its listing between the nobles and the people (Neh. 4:14). Here they are probably only local deputies or minor leaders. The princes or officials (cf. vs. 1) should probably be identified with the "nobles," for in Neh. 4:14, in a listing similar to that found here, the officials linked with the "deputies" are called "nobles" (hōrim) instead of princes (sārim), as here. The two titles are usually regarded as identical (Meyer, Entstehung des Judentums, p. 132) and it has been proposed to omit the former title since the princes in vs. 1 are the informers (cf. Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, II, 522) and the LXXAB has but one title. But the two groups need not be identical, for the princes of vs. 1 may be those who returned with Ezra, while those in vs. 2 may represent those long resident in Judah (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 86).

The Hebrew word translated trespass suggests perfidy and is best rendered faithlessness. The LXX has "breach of covenant" (ἀνάβραχος). The word, characteristic of late Hebrew, is often used by the Chronicler (cf. I Chr. 9:1; 10:13; II Chr. 28:19; 29:19; 33:19; 36:14).

B. Ezra's Reaction to the Mixed Marriages (9:3-15)

Sensitive Ezra was severely shaken by the news that there were Jews who were married to foreigners, since he knew that the entire community was endangered by their misbehavior. Unlike Nehemiah (13:25), Ezra's action was turned against himself. So different are the reactions in the same situation that it has been regarded as evidence of a basic difference in personality, which makes it highly improbable that Nehemiah can be "simply Ezra (i.e., the Chronicler) under another name," as Torrey (Ezra Studies, p. 248) has declared (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 46).

3. Rent my garment expresses very violent action, originally the tearing off of all clothing to the point of nakedness (cf. Mic. 1:8; Isa. 20:2-4), although the practice was severely modified later (Morris Jastrow, tr., "The Tearing of Garments as a Symbol of Mourning," Journal of the American Oriental Society, XXI [1900] 23-39; "Baring of confession: O my God, I am ashamed and
Then were assembled unto me every one that trembled at the words of the God of Israel, because of the transgression of those that had been carried away; and I sat astonished until the evening sacrifice.

The Arm and Shoulder as a Sign of Mourning,” Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XXII [1902], 117-20. The attention that Ezra attracted indicates that he did more than minor damage to his clothing. The M.T. has simply my garment, using a general word for clothing, which the LXX and Syriac wrongly understood as the plural, my garments. Undergarment must be meant here, since an outer garment, a mantle, was also worn. The description of the mantle (Exod. 28:31-35) suggests that it was fashioned like a Greek chiton with a neck-hole in the midst of the cloth and highly embroidered or otherwise decorated. Mantles were worn by kings and men of high station (Immanuel Benzinger, Hebräische Archäologie [Freiburg i. B.: J. C. B. Mohr, 1894], p. 100). In I Esdras 8:71 the word is rendered as “holy garment,” presumably influenced by the use of the term mantle as part of the high priest’s vestments (Exod. 28:31-32).

Pulled hair is preferable to plucked off the hair, since the M.T. indicates that but part of the hair was pulled. Such plucking was the counterpart of the more formal cutting or shaving of hair as a sign of mourning (Amos 8:10; Jer. 16:6; Ezek. 7:18; Job 1:20), a practice forbidden by Hebrew law (Lev. 19:27; 21:5; Deut. 14:1; Ezek. 44:20).

Overcome by emotion, Ezra fell to the ground. Appalled merely suggests the emotion of terror and awe involved in the Hebrew word. “Horror-stricken” is preferable, since the word is used in Hebrew to describe objects that cause horror and abhorrence (cf. Dan. 9:27). The expression of sorrow was genuine, but Ezra seems to have made use of the occasion deliberately to gather a crowd and set the stage emotionally for his message. Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 3) interprets Ezra’s experience by saying: “He reasoned that if he commanded them to put away their wives and children born to them he would not be listened to [so] he remained lying on the ground.” Ezra has been called a “master of psychology” (Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 595), and such seems to be the case since he renounced the use of force, despite his great authority (cf. 7:25-26), and used such subtle means to influence men to do what he desired of their own volition (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 170).

4. The plight of Ezra, lying torn and disheveled in the street before the temple (cf. 10:1), stunned by the shock of the terrible news, would naturally attract a crowd of pious Jews, particularly if he was recognized as the prominent religious leader who but recently had led the community to an acceptance of the law (cf. Neh. 9–10). Doubtless it was the spectacle of silent Ezra himself rather than a full knowledge of the situation behind his shock and grief that gathered and held the people. Hence because of the faithlessness, etc., in vs. 4 is awkward in its present place. Its inappropriateness is sensed by J. Esdras, where it is freely translated as “while I mourned for the iniquity,” while Josephus (loc. cit.) states that Ezra acted thus “because the chief men among the people were guilty of the charge.” The difficult words fit better at the conclusion of vs. 3 (Ehrlich, Randglossen zur hebräischen Bibel, VII, 177; Bewer, Der Text des Buches Ezra, pp. 80-81). The words of the God of Israel need not refer to an exact passage of scripture blush to lift my face to thee, my God, for our iniquities have risen higher than our heads, and our guilt has mounted up to the heavens. From the days of our fathers to this day we have been in great guilt. . . . Behold, we are before thee in our guilt, for none can stand before thee because of this. (Vss. 6-7, 15.) The first person plural in his prayers was possibly part of the secret of the radical reforms Ezra was apparently able to bring about during his own lifetime, and of the far-reaching influence which he certainly exerted over successive generations.

5 And at the evening sacrifice I arose up from my heaviness: and having rent my garment and my mantle, I fell upon my knees, and spread out my hands unto the LORD my God, 6 And said, O my God, I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, my banning foreign marriages; the phrase suggests, rather, scripture in general, and identifies the crowd as those who had accepted the law which Ezra introduced. All versions show that the original text was "the word of the God of Israel," i.e., the law.

5. Ezra remained the center of attention until the time of the evening sacrifice (cf. 3:3), which the Peshitta explains as "the ninth hour," 3 P.M. (cf. Acts 3:1). It was an appropriate time for Ezra to cease his self-abasement and to begin to pray, for in later Judaism that time was recognized as one of the three periods prescribed for prayer (cf. Benzinger, op. cit., pp. 462-64). I arose need not imply that Ezra stood before kneeling (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 332); he merely shifted from abject prostration to a kneeling posture. There was no prescribed attitude of prayer in ancient times. One might stand (cf. I Sam. 1:26), sit (cf. I Chr. 17:16), or kneel (I Kings 8:54; II Chr. 6:13). Prostration preceded and may have followed prayer in standing or kneeling position (Benzinger, op. cit., p. 464). Hands were either lifted (Pss. 28:2; 134:2; cf. Neh. 8:6) or, as here, were spread out (Exod. 9:29; Isa. 1:15; I Kings 8:22). It has been suggested that the hands were oriented toward the altar at first, but toward heaven in the later period (Wilhelm Nowack, Lehrbuch der hebräischen Archäologie [Freiburg i. B.: J. C. B. Mohr, 1894], I, 122, Figs. 6-7; II, 260). Palms were turned upward in the gesture familiar from the orans figure in Christian catacomb art (Walter Lowrie, Monuments of the Early Church [New York: The Macmillan Co., 1923], pp. 201-4). Heaviness translates a Hebrew word later rendered as fasting, since that was the primary expression of self-abasement in later Judaism (cf. 8:21). Thus I Esdras 8:73 has "fasting" (στείχεια), but though Ezra of necessity had gone without food, nothing had previously been mentioned about fasting. The LXX quite adequately translates as "humiliation" (πατερωσις) since the word refers to the distressed state described in vs. 3. The Amer. Trans. properly renders it as "self-abasement." The present M.T. and LXX suggest that Ezra further tore his clothes before the prayer, and it is conjectured that it was for that purpose that he arose (Batten, loc. cit.), but such action is inappropriate just before prayer and it is better to emend the text to read, "with my garments and my mantle torn" (Ehrlich, op. cit., VII, 177; Bewer, op. cit., p. 81), a rendering supported by I Esdras 8:73 and reflected in the RSV.

2. Ezra’s Prayer (9:6-15=I Esdras 8:74-90)

Since ancient authors often put into the mouths of their characters speeches consistent with their personalities and appropriate to the occasion, it is difficult to determine how much of the prayer may be authentic and how much invention. It has been regarded as "thoroughly characteristic" of the Chronicler’s work (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 270, note n) and it is claimed that "from the beginning to the end we have characteristic Chronicle terminology" (Kapelrud, Question of Authorship in the Ezra-Narrative, p. 70). But the prayer has been defended as genuine, "a verbal extract from Ezra’s memoirs" (Siegfried, op. cit., p. 61; Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. xiv). Rudolph (op. cit., pp. 90-91) even conjectures that Ezra, while lying on the ground, planned what he would say and later could therefore record quite literally what was said. Although literary characteristics associated with the Chronicler must be admitted, the prayer does not have an artificial or secondary nature, but is psychologically as well as historically appropriate. It is relevant to the occasion and necessary for the development of the situation (cf. Batten, op. cit., pp. 336-37).
God: for our iniquities are increased over our head, and our trespass is grown up unto the heavens.

7 Since the days of our fathers have we been in a great trespass unto this day; and for our iniquities have we, our kings, and our priests, been delivered into the hand of the kings of the lands, to the sword, to captivity, and to a spoil, and to confusion of face, as it is this day.

8 And now for a little space grace hath been showed from the Lord our God, to leave us a remnant to escape, and to give us a nail in his holy place, that our God may lighten our eyes, and give us a little reviving in our bondage.

Reviewing the recently passed period of humiliation and suffering of the Hebrews due to the sins of the fathers (vss. 7, 13), Ezra notes the current short interval of success, when by the grace of God Persian support had been obtained for the return of a remnant and the reconstruction of Jerusalem (vss. 8-9). He then confesses that his Jewish contemporaries by intermarrying with foreigners were offending against God's law (vss. 10-12). For the offense Ezra anticipates the utter destruction of all Jews, since there were no mitigating circumstances to warrant expectation of mercy from the divine Judge (vss. 14-15). The prayer ends suddenly on a note of fear and apprehension which gives it strength. Through the prayer Ezra deliberately sought to move his audience not by assurance of divine forgiveness but by the motive of fear that the Jerusalem community, still in the uncertain throes of reconstruction, would again return to disgrace, bondage, and justified divine destruction.

6. The prayer begins in a personal vein (vs. 6a) but soon shifts (vs. 6b) to group expression as Ezra reaches out to his audience. With I am ashamed, innocent Ezra associates himself with the guilty. Lift my face indicates the attitude of prayer but also refers to the former state of humility and fear. Guilt (cf. vss. 7, 13, 15) translates a Hebrew word often used by the Chronicler (I Chr. 21:5; II Chr. 24:18; 28:10, 13; 33:23; cf. Driver, Intro. to Literature of O.T., p. 536, No. 19).

7. In general terms Ezra reviews Hebrew history in the light of the Deuteronomistic philosophy of history, which accounts for the disasters of Israel as punishment for sin (cf. Judg. 2:11-23). The sword (cf. II Kings 25:6-7, 20-21); captivity (II Kings 17:5-6; 24:14-16; 25:6-7); plundering (II Kings 24:13; 25:13-17), a word used only in late Hebrew (cf. Esth. 9:10, 15-16; Dan. 11:24, 33); and confusion of face, which the LXXAB renders more exactly as "shame of face," meaning utter shame or "humiliation" (cf. Jer. 7:19; Ps. 44:15; Lam. 2:15-16; etc.)—all symbolize the divine punishments. By the expression kings of the lands Ezra was certainly suggesting Assyria (II Kings 17:5-6) and especially Babylonia (II Kings 24:14-15; 25:6-7), who brought Israel to ruin and degradation. He expresses no resentment against the nations for their acts against Israel, since he considered all of it, and even more, as justly deserved for Israel's sin (vs. 13).

8. And now (cf. vss. 10, 12) marks a rapid transition in thought from the pre-exilic and exilic past of vs. 7 to the near-past and postexilic times. A brief moment refers to the interval between 538 B.C. (cf. Ezra 1:1) and the time of Ezra, which was marked not by God's vindictive anger but by his favor, even though it was undeserved (cf. vs. 18). The favor was shown first by God's failure to blot out offending Israel entirely and by his leaving a remnant or nucleus for a new start. Such a concept of a remnant is found in the most optimistic passages in the prophetic books (cf. Amos 5:15; Isa. 4:3; 648

1 Heb nail or tent-pin
9 For we were bondmen; yet our God hath not forsaken us in our bondage, but hath extended mercy unto us in the sight of the kings of Persia, to give us a reviving, to set up the house of our God, and to repair the desolations thereof, and to give us a wall in Judah and in Jerusalem.

The wall in Judah and in Jerusalem has caused much debate. The word used for wall (gēdhēr) is rare in late Hebrew and then is used only of an actual low wall or fence about vineyards (Isa. 5:5; Ps. 80:12), bordering a road (Num. 22:24; cf. Eccl. 10:8), or in the temple court (Ezek. 42:7). It is debatable whether the term is used of the city wall in Mic. 7:11 (Heinrich Kaupel, “Die Bedeutung von ḫēr in Esr 9, 9,” Biblische Zeitschrift, XXII [1934], 89-92; “Zu ḫēr en Esr. 9, 9,” Biblica, XVI [1935], 213-14; Andrés Fernández, “La Voz ḫēr en Esd. 9, 9,” and “Esdr. 9, 9 y un Texto de Josefo,” Biblica, XVI [1935], 82-84; XVIII [1937], 207-8). Since Ezra is listing actual accomplishments—progress toward recovery—the wall must be an actual one (cf. Mowinckel, Ezra den Skriftlaerde, p. 71; W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, A History of Israel [Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1932], II, 117; Kapelrud, op. cit., pp. 66-67; Rowley, Servant of the Lord, pp. 140-43). The reference may be to a defensive city wall, but one cannot argue for the priority of Nehemiah in Jerusalem from this fact, for, as some have recognized, the poignancy of Nehemiah’s grief over the ruined walls of Jerusalem can best be explained by news of a recent destruction of the city walls (cf. 4:23) rather than that long before, in 586 B.C. (J. S. Wright, The Date of Ezra’s Coming to Jerusalem [London: Tyndale Press, 1947], pp. 7, 18-19). The earliest attempts to rebuild Jerusalem must have involved the building of some sort of defensive rampart, even before the coming of Nehemiah. The location of the wall in Judea and Jerusalem is awkward and somewhat tautological but by no means impossible. It is unnecessary to omit either of the terms, as has been proposed (Batten, op. cit., p. 334). Nor is it necessary, therefore, to regard the expression as figurative rather than literal (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 88) and to translate protection instead of wall, even though a similar word (gēdher) is used 10 "And now, O our God, what shall we say after this? For we have forsaken thy commandments, 11 Which thou hast commanded by thy servants the prophets, saying, The land, unto which ye go to possess it, is an unclean land with the filthiness of the people of the lands, with their abominations, which have filled it from one end to another with their uncleanness.
12 Now therefore give not your daughters unto their sons, neither take their daughters unto your sons, nor seek their peace or their wealth for ever: that ye may be strong, and eat the good of the land, and leave it for an inheritance to your children for ever.
13 And after all that is come upon us for in a figurative sense by the later rabbis when they refer to "a fence [גֶּדֶר] around the law," i.e., a protection for the biblical precepts when restrictions were imposed to curb violations of biblical law [Julius H. Greenstone, "Gezerah," Jewish Encyclopedia [New York: Funk & Wagnalls Co., 1906], V, 648b).

10-12. Again with and now (cf. vs. 8) attention suddenly shifts to the terrible contemporary situation. Vss. 11-12 present the scriptural basis for Ezra's marriage reforms. As elements in a prayer they are not precise citations of scripture such as might be expected of one whose prime mission was to teach and establish the law. But the data are presented as prophetic teaching rather than law, and the writer seems unaware of the sharp distinction between law and prophecy which is characteristic of later Judaism. The usage reflects a fluid stage in the formulation of legislation, when the sources are regarded as prophetic (cf. Bertholet, op. cit., p. 41). Only in Malachi (2:11-16), however, does prophetic teaching involve this problem of foreign marriage. The verses are a medley of scriptural bits quoted sometimes in slightly modified form from Deuteronomy (cf. 7:1, 3, 12; 23:6) and loosely joined by biblical allusions which, in one instance at least (vs. 11; cf. Lev. 18:24-30), represent a free adaptation of other biblical texts. The writer, well versed in scripture, seems not bound to be exact, and can therefore freely adapt biblical ideas to make his own case clear and impressive. The Chronicler's hand is evident throughout and Torrey, who finds similar treatment of scripture in II Chr. 36:21, claims: "The Chronicler quotes as he writes—carelessly and irresponsibly" (Ezra Studies, p. 271, note s).

To possess it is a characteristic Deuteronomic expression (cf. Deut. 7:1). The words unclean and filthiness or pollutions are characteristic of priestly writings in Ezekiel and Leviticus, where they have specific ritualistic connotation. Canaan was regarded not as unclean but as desirable when the Hebrews entered (cf. Deut. 8:7 ff.; Num. 13:27-28). Involved here, as in Lev. 18:24-30, is the idea that the good land can be defiled by contagion (cf. 8:28) of unclean foreigners and their practices. Give not your daughters, etc., is adapted from Deut. 7:3. But Ezra mentions no Jewish women married to foreigners. Nor seek their peace loosely quotes Deut. 23:6 but extends the prohibitions against Ammonites and Moabites to all foreigners. Their . . . prosperity is, lit., "their good things." On peace and prosperity, cf. Jer. 33:9; Lam. 3:17. That you may be strong is a fragment of Deut. 11:8. The expression, eat the good of the land—i.e., its best produce (Gen. 45:18, 20)—seems to be drawn from Isa. 1:19.

13-14. These verses form a single sentence interrupted abruptly by a parenthetical comment (vs. 13b). Such incomplete expression is characteristic of the Chronicler's style our evil deeds, and for our great trespass, seeing that thou our God hast punished us less than our iniquities deserve, and hast given us such deliverance as this:

14 Should we again break thy commandments, and join in affinity with the people of these abominations? wouldst not thou be angry with us till thou hast consumed us, so that there should be no remnant nor escaping?

15 O LORD God of Israel, thou art righteous: for we remain yet escaped, as it is this day: behold, we are before thee in our trespasses: for we cannot stand before thee because of this.

10 Now when Ezra had prayed, and when he had confessed, weeping and casting himself down before the house of God, there assembled unto him out of Israel that has come upon us for our evil deeds and for our great guilt, seeing that thou, our God, hast punished us less than our iniquities deserved and hast given us such a remnant as this, 14 shall we break thy commandments again and intermarry with the peoples who practice these abominations? Wouldst thou not be angry with us till thou wouldst consume us, so that there should be no remnant, nor any to escape? 15 O LORD the God of Israel, thou art just, for we are left a remnant that has escaped, as at this day. Behold, we are before thee in our guilt, for none can stand before thee because of this.”

10 While Ezra prayed and made confession, weeping and casting himself (Driver, op. cit., p. 537, No. 27). All that has come presents syntax found often in his work (cf. vs. 17: 8:25) and probably not elsewhere (Kautzsch, Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, sec. 138i-k). The reference is to the Exile and the accompanying degradation (cf. vs. 7). The comment in vs. 13b in English interprets an awkward Hebrew text, "... has held back downwards more than our sins [deserve]" or "... has held back downwards some of our sins." For "has held back" (הָשַׁא) nine Hebrew MSS and the Peshitta have the graphically similar "hast reckoned" (הָשַׂא), which may be original. Although the punishment of Israel was heavy (vs. 7), it would have been even greater if they had received retribution proportionate to the offense. God's grace lightened the punishment and saved a remnant as a nucleus for rebuilding (vs. 8). Deliverance (vs. 15) is closer than remnant to the original Hebrew word “escape” (cf. vs. 8). Josephus comments: “For though they had done things deserving of death, it was in keeping with the kindness of God to exempt even such sinners from punishment” (Antiquities XI. 5. 3).

15. In a dramatically effective emotional passage Ezra draws his audience with him in humility before the bar of the divine Judge without a defense. All confess their guilt. Stand before probably has the judicial meaning of “to win vindication.” Righteous or just used of God is a confession that God has a just case against Israel (cf. II Chr. 12:6). Mercy is hoped for but no merciful second chance is expected. For two-time offenders full and complete punishment is expected, possibly with additional severity to compensate for the mercy formerly granted but abused. The tense emotional scene is psychologically contrived to induce just such action as is described in ch. 10.

C. Public Reaction to Ezra's Distress (10:1-6=1 Esdras 8:91-9:2)

The narrative of ch. 9 continues without interruption through ch. 10, but with a shift after the prayer (9:6-15) from the first person (7:27-9:15) to the third person (cf. 7:1-26). The shift has been explained by the hypothesis that the Chronicler here used a revised and amplified edition of the Ezra narrative and was thus responsible for recasting

10:1-44. Effectual Repentance.—The final chapter raises another question for the Christian message that goes well beneath all the issues concerning the historicity of this last unhappy scene, about which scholars differ widely, and likewise beyond the question of the rights and wrongs of Ezra's harsh policy in breaking up mixed marriages regardless of the rights of the wives and children involved, as we in our later day see and feel them. The strength of Ezra's own conviction, and the moving sincerity of his prayer of confession on behalf of his people, for a very great congregation of men and women and children: for the people wept very sore.

2 And Shechaniah the son of Jehiel, one of the sons of Elam, answered and said unto Ezra, We have trespassed against our God, and have taken strange wives of the people of the land: yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing.

3 Now therefore let us make a covenant with our God to put away all the wives, and such as are born of them, according to the counsel of my lord, and of those that tremble at the commandment of our God; and let it be done according to the law.

down before the house of God, a very great assembly of men, women, and children, gathered to him out of Israel: for the people wept bitterly. 2 And Shecaniah the son of Jehiel, of the sons of Elam, addressed Ezra: "We have broken faith with our God and have married foreign women from the peoples of the lands, but even now there is hope for Israel in spite of this. 3 Therefore let us make a covenant with our God to put away all these wives and their children, according to the counsel of my lord and of those who tremble at the commandment of our God; and let it be done according to the law.

it. But the existence of such a document, called "both elusive and imaginary," cannot be otherwise demonstrated (Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 832, n. 11). The difference in person has sometimes been explained as a reflection of the mood of the Chronicler who, when the third person was used, "did not happen to identify himself, in imagination, with his hero" (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 272, note w; cf. p. 245).

10:1. Hebrew MSS support both translations, when Ezra had prayed and while Ezra prayed, but the latter is preferable since it was the action and prayer that attracted the crowd. Such use of temporal clauses at the beginning of a sentence has been recognized as a stylistic characteristic of the Chronicler (Driver, op. cit., p. 538, No. 37; cf. E. L. Curtis and Albert A. Madsen, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Chronicles [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1910; "International Critical Commentary"], p. 35). Casting himself down might imply further prostration during prayer (cf. Neh. 8:6) but it probably means simply "fallen to his knees" (cf. 9:5). Ezra prayed before the house of God (cf. 4:24; 5:8; etc.), a place favored for prayer (Isa. 56:7; cf. Luke 18:10; Acts 3:1). Confession refers to the admission of guilt in the prayer (9:7, 13, 15). Unlike some prophets (cf. Jer. 31:29-34; Ezek. 18:1-9), Ezra stressed the older concept of group responsibility wherein one sinner contaminated his whole group, making even the innocent subject to penalty (cf. Josh. 7:24 ff.). The concept was fortified by the fact that captivity, exile, and return were regarded as group experiences, shared by guilty and innocent alike. Ezra attracted spectators from among the pious who had come to pray (cf. 9:4). The informal group is better called "crowd" or "multitude," as in I Esdras, even though it is described by a Hebrew term (qāhāl) later used for the formal assembly or congregation. Since out of Israel is used in an ethnic rather than geographical sense, it means "of the people of Israel."

2-4. Spokesman for the bystanders was a descendant of Elam (cf. 2:7, 31), Shecaniah, whose name resembles the mši-kin-ilipī of a cuneiform document of the time of Darius (A. T. Clay, Business Documents of Murashû Sons of Nippur Dated in the Reign of Darius II [Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1904], No. 110, 1. 3). Since he was probably the son of one who had married a foreign woman (cf. vs. 26), the problem was a vital one for him. Like Ezra, he placed himself among the guilty by using the words we have, but there is no evidence that he was an actual offender. Josephus sins of which he himself was not guilty, made such a deep impression—not only on leaders like Shecaniah (vs. 2), but on many of the people (vs. 12)—that in spite of division and opposition in some quarters (vs. 15), the laborious task of investigation and decision, by what we would nowadays call a commission, was carried out through a period of three months.

We are mercifully spared any account of the heartaches and cruelties which any such thoroughgoing policy must have involved; and we would be interested to know how generally the 4 Arise: for this matter belongeth unto thee: we also will be with thee: be of good courage, and do it.
5 Then arose Ezra, and made the chief priests, the Levites, and all Israel, to swear that they should do according to this word. And they swared.

calls him "the head [pròtos] of the people of Jerusalem," but there is no evidence that he had official position.

More optimistic than Ezra, Shecaniah announced even now there is hope for Israel. On the basis of Arabic usage one might suggest the reading in spite of this for the M.T., concerning this thing (cf. 8:23; 9:15: Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 272). The proposal for mending the broken relationship with God called for undoing as far as possible the "wrong" that had been done, and for trusting in the grace of God for forgiveness for what could not be undone. The remedy is harsh, ignoring human anguish and reflecting the low estimate of women and children as chattels to be disposed of at will, disregarding their desire and ignoring their human rights. It is in full agreement with the historically ruthless attitude of the Hebrews toward non-Hebraic inhabitants of Palestine (cf. Josh. 9:24-27; 11:20, 22-23: I Sam. 27:9; 11: II Sam. 8:2; 11:1; etc.). Put away, however, means not annihilation since it is, lit., "eject" or "send forth," implying brutal exclusion from the Jewish community of loved ones, many of whom were partially of Hebrew blood. The expression these wives or "such wives" (ibid.) interpreting the M.T., which has "all women," without further qualification. But the original text must have been "all our wives," as in I EsdrasAB, since such an error is easy in written Hebrew (Rudolph, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 92).

The reform was to constitute a renewal of the covenant between the people and their God, the contractual obligation whereby God was to guarantee the prosperity and protection of Israel in exchange for their recognition of him as the only God and their unquestioned obedience to his will. By the law is meant that which Ezra had recently introduced in Judea (cf. Neh. 8), but the present Pentateuchal legislation has no prohibition against foreign marriages in general (cf. 9:11-12). Because the matter was regarded as an infraction of the law, it was recognized as the task of Ezra, the proponent of the law (cf. 7:6; 11, 14, 25-26; Neh. 8:1-18).

5-6. With public support proposed for a campaign against foreign marriage, Ezra's plan to induce reform was a success and he was able to abandon his humble state. At once he required an oath of the leaders who surrounded him, to the effect that they would support the proposed reform. The oath was a religious act creating mutual confidence because it was a sincere and solemn promise before God (cf. Judg. 11:10), who participated in the action, watching over the agreement. The oath makers were not the comprehensive group indicated by the chief priests, etc., which reflects the Chronicler's idea of the whole community, but the leaders of those groups as they were present in the crowd.

The fasting and prayer took place before the temple (cf. vs. 1), which is described as "the court [κωλάντις] of the temple" in I Esdras 9:2. Withdrawing, Ezra went to a letter of the law was still being carried out when the Chronicler wrote this account. But we are vividly reminded of the power of strong conviction to multiply itself when it is genuinely held even by a comparative few, and of the power of such conviction to mold the future of a nation's thought and life. We have broken faith with our God . . . , but even now there is hope for Israel in spite of this. Therefore let us make a covenant with our God . . . Arise, for it is your task, and we are with you; be strong and do it. (Vss. 24.)

On that soul-searching note the book abruptly closes. But all later Judaism brings its cumulative evidence of the tenacious influence of such contagious repentance and resolve.

653
6 Then Ezra rose up from before the house of God, and went into the chamber of Johanan the son of Eliashib: and when he came thither, he did eat no bread, nor drink water: for he mourned because of the transgression of them that had been carried away.

7 And they made proclamation throughout Judah and Jerusalem unto all the children of the captivity, that they should gather themselves together unto Jerusalem; chamber (cf. 8:29), which I Esdras 9:1 and Josephus interpret as the priests' quarters (παστοφόριον). Such rooms, connected with the sanctuary, were sometimes used as storerooms (cf. Neh. 13:4 ff.), which led to the translation "treasury" in the LXX. Jeremiah's prophecy was read before an assembly in such a room (Jer. 36:10).

The chamber belonged to Jehohanan the son of Eliashib, whose identity, much debated, is important for the problem of the chronological sequence of Ezra and Nehemiah (cf. Intro., p. 562). Although Jehohanan is a common name in the postexilic period, it appears in Ezra-Nehemiah twice with the same paternity, evidently for the same person. Eliashib was high priest in the time of Nehemiah (3:1) and Jehohanan is high priest in the time of Darius II (ca. 408 B.C.; Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, p. 114, No. 30, l. 18). Since Jehohanan was grandson or descendant of Eliashib, rather than his son (Neh. 12:10-11, 22; cf. Ezra 5:1), several generations separated the two high priesthoods. Since Nehemiah was a contemporary of Eliashib (Neh. 3:1; 13:4) and Jehohanan is here a contemporary of Ezra, the sequence Nehemiah-Ezra is demonstrated (A. Van Hoonacker, "La succession chronologique Néhémie-Esdras," Revue Biblique XXXII [1923], 481-94; XXXIII [1924], 33-64). But it has been denied that Jehohanan in 10:6, who does not bear the title of high priest, has anything to do with the high priesthood (Wellhausen, "Die Rückkehr der Juden aus dem babylonischen Exil," p. 168). It is also proposed that Jehohanan may have been a son of the high priest Eliashib and a brother of Joiada (cf. Neh. 12:10-11, 22), not in the line of succession and therefore not the later high priest of the name but only a simple priest with quarters at the sanctuary (Wright, Date of Ezra's Coming to Jerusalem, p. 20). But lack of title is not significant since, unlike Neh. 3:1, the high priest is never given a title in the Ezra story (3:2, 8, 9; 4:3; 5:2). Inasmuch as there is no further description of Jehohanan, some well-known person must be meant (cf. Bernhard Stade, Geschichte des Volkes Israel [Berlin: G. Grote, 1888], II, 153, n. 1). A semiofficial person like Ezra would scarcely be entertained by an unknown or subordinate official within the sanctuary; his host must therefore have been the high priest (Albright, "Date and Personality of the Chronicler," p. 121). The verb יָשָׁמ, and when he came, is a simple scribal corruption of יָשָׁמ, where he spent the night, as I Esdras 9:2, the Peshitta, and the LXX show. There Ezra continued the fast begun that day (9:5).

D. PUBLIC ASSEMBLY (10:7-15=I Esdras 9:3-15)

7-8. Actual reform began with a great public assembly summoned by the secular authority in Jerusalem, the leaders and elders (vs. 8). The M.T. can be read either they made proclamation, with an indefinite subject, or a proclamation was made. The proclamation presupposes a courier (cf. 1:1) to spread the summons through Judah and Jerusalem. The order issued, which the LXX translates "decree" (βουλή), is the same word used in "the counsel of my lord" in vs. 3. Promptness and full participation were ensured by a severe penalty imposed on laggards and those who ignored the summons. The penalties were within Ezra's power to impose (cf. 7:26), but he delegated his powers as an administrator, as elsewhere (cf. 8:24-29; Neh. 8:4, 7-8). As part of the 8 And that whosoever would not come within three days, according to the counsel of the princes and the elders, all his substance should be forfeited, and himself separated from the congregation of those that had been carried away.

9 Then all the men of Judah and Benjamin gathered themselves together unto Jerusalem within three days. It was the ninth month, on the twentieth day of the month; and all the people sat in the street of the house of God, trembling because of this matter, and for the great rain.

10 And Ezra the priest stood up, and said unto them, Ye have transgressed, and have taken strange wives, to increase the trespass of Israel.

11 Now therefore make confession unto the Lord God of your fathers, and do his pleasure: and separate yourselves from the heathen people and from the foreign wives.

Persian Empire, subject to control and close observation (4:11 ff.; 5:6-17), not even a Jewish executive council could act in the proposed highhanded manner without such consent of the government as Ezra had won (7:26). Property of the guilty was to be confiscated, but the term used originally meant that it was to be devoted to God and condemned to human use (cf. Josh. 6:17-21). Both I Esdras 9:4 and Josephus interpret it here as "seized for the use of the temple."

The guilty were to be banned, ostracized from the society of true Israel. The Hebrew word translated congregation (gāhāl; cf. vs. 1) here means the politico-ethnic group of Jews. Only exiles were believed to constitute this group, but the Peshitta properly interprets it as "the people of Israel." In vs. 9, as in 1:5; 4:1, Judah and Benjamin indicate the extent of the restored community. The northern boundary of Judah was traced south of Jerusalem (Josh. 15:8; 18:16), which was counted as Benjaminite (Judg. 1:21), as in the Talmud later, where it is claimed that the major part of the temple was in Benjamin with the great altar of sacrifice on Judean soil (Sanhedrin 54; Yoma 12).

Although the sympathies of Benjamin were largely with the seceding tribes at the division of the kingdom (cf. II Sam. 20:1-2; I Kings 12:20), the Chronicler, as well as the priestly writer later, regarded Judah and Benjamin as the two tribes loyal to the house of David (I Kings 12:12=II Chr. 11:1).

9. The assembly was held at the end of three days (vs. 8), on the twentieth day of the ninth month (Kislev), presumably in the year of Ezra's arrival (7:8), which would be December 18, 397 B.C. The month usually marks the beginning of the great rain of Palestine, when the heavy rain (cf. I Kings 18:41; Ezek. 13:11) saturates the earth and fills the cisterns. It was, as I Esdras 9:6 interprets, "the onset of winter storms," for the rains, often icy cold, reached the peak of intensity during December and January, and snow could fall and the temperature could drop below freezing. The crowd, temporarily gathered into the city and unhoused, were trembling in the open, apparently in the plaza where the law was read (Neh. 8:1, 3, 16). The Hebrew word (rēḥōḥhā) denotes breadth of space and is used sometimes parallel to "outside" (Jer. 5:1). It is often used of a place near a gate (cf. II Chr. 32:6; Job 29:7) where assemblies were held (II Chr. 29:4) and proclamations and speeches were made (Prov. 1:20; Esth. 6:9, 11).

10-11. Ezra first accused the anxious but uncomfortable people of contracting foreign marriages, and with "and now" (cf. 5:17) he turned abruptly to outline things to be done to avert disaster. After confession there must be a positive pleasing of God shown... people of the land, and from the strange wives.

12 Then all the congregation answered and said with a loud voice, As thou hast said, so must we do.

13 But the people are many, and it is a time of much rain, and we are not able to stand without, neither is this a work of one day or two: for we are many that have transgressed in this thing.

14 Let now our rulers of all the congregation stand, and let all them which have taken strange wives in our cities come at appointed times, and with them the elders of every city, and the judges thereof, until the fierce wrath of our God for this matter be turned from us.

by the avoidance of contamination by foreign marriages. Do his pleasure approximates the M.T., while do his will reflects the interpretation of 1 Esdras, which pointedly stresses obedience to the law. With separate yourselves Ezra endorses the remedy proposed by Shecaniah (vs. 3). Since the Jews were in the majority, the exclusion of the others is implied (cf. vs. 19; Neh. 13:30).

12-15. The people readily accepted Ezra's proposals, but there were differences of opinion regarding practical procedure (vs. 13). The loud voice (vs. 12) is stressed to indicate the earnestness and like-mindedness of the group. There was but little opposition (cf. vs. 15). But the people argued that the number of cases needing investigation, the size of the unhoused crowd, and the severity of the weather prevented an immediate solution. The people were not the foreigners to be excluded, since they would be called "foreign women" (cf. vss. 2, 11), so the motive was not consideration for the victims but concern for the shivering crowd. We cannot stand (vs. 13) is idiomatic for "we cannot remain" (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 273). In the open translates the M.T. literally.

It was determined (vs. 14) to establish a Jerusalem commission to hear the cases of those accused after the assembly dispersed. The cases were to be forwarded to Jerusalem for trial from the villages and cities where preliminary hearings and investigations were held. Local officials at appointed times (vs. 14) accompanied the accused to Jerusalem, presumably as complaining witnesses and observers. The author reflects the Chronicler's view of local judgeships (cf. II Chr. 19:5-7), and it was one of Ezra's functions to appoint judges (cf. 7:25). Reference to local as well as higher courts in the Persian judicial system (Cowley, op. cit., pp. 50-51, No. 16 [435 B.C.]) makes it likely that there could have been such organization in the time of Ezra.

Although the M.T. may be understood as until the fierce wrath . . . be turned (vs. 14), it is preferable to regard it as purposive with the LXX, "to turn away the fierce wrath." The former would indicate that the reform would not be stopped short of its goal, even though the community were to feel that it had done enough to be safe from God's wrath. For the M.T. "until this matter," the versions show that the reading should be over this matter, for yb, over, has been changed to the similar yb, until, perhaps under the influence of until the fierce wrath.

It has been suggested that Neh. 9:1-2, now out of place, should follow Ezra 10:14 to introduce popular mourning and confession on the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month (Dec. 20, 398 B.C.), an ancient annual fast day for the winter solstice (Julian Morgenstern, "The Chanukkah Festival and the Calendar of Ancient Israel," Hebrew Union College Annual, XX [1947], 19-22). But under such circumstances the actual separation of the mixed families (Neh. 9:2) would occur before the completion of the Only Jonathan the son of Asahel and Jahaziah the son of Tikvah were employed about this matter: and Meshullam and Shabbethai the Levite helped them.

And the children of the captivity did so. And Ezra the priest, with certain chief of the fathers, after the house of their fathers, and all of them by their names, were separated, and sat down in the first day of the tenth month to examine the matter.

And they made an end with all the men that had taken strange wives by the first day of the first month.

Vs. 15 parenthetically indicates opposition to the reform procedure. Although all the assembly agreed with Ezra (vs. 12), several men opposed the ruthless proposal. Such opposition should be expected (cf. Neh. 13:25, 28), but admission of it runs counter to the Chronicler’s view (cf. vs. 12-13). Although such detail lends verisimilitude to the story, it has been regarded by some as a realistic touch created by the Chronicler (cf. instances of such a practice in I Chr. 21:6; II Chr. 28:12; 30:10-11, 18; Neh. 7:61-65; etc.; Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 278, note h). The interpretation were employed (cf. I Esdras 9:14) rests upon a faulty text of the LXX. The M.T. has simply “stood,” but the word should be read with the following preposition “against,” to mean opposed. The restrictive only, introducing the verse, indicates but light opposition. Meshullam (cf. 8:16) is a name found in late cuneiform documents and was also popular among Jews of the Persian period (K. L. Tallqvist, Neubabylonisches Namenbuch [Helsingfors: 1905], pp. 113, 114; Cowley, op. cit., p. 298). Shabbethai is a Babylonian-type name also found frequently in cuneiform sources and the papyri (Samuel Daiches, “Einige nach babylonischem Muster gebildete hebräische Namen,” Orientalische Literaturzeitung, XI [1908], 278). Shabbethai is called a Levite (cf. 2:40), but several Hebrew MSS, the LXXL, and I Esdras have “the Levites,” including Meshullam also in the group.

Them of supported them is ambiguous. By reading “but Meshullam” for and Meshullam the Levites are regarded as loyal to Ezra and the majority, but it is possible that them refers to the dissident faction (Morgenstern, op. cit., p. 25).

E. Action of the Jerusalem Commission (10:16-19=I Esdras 9:15-20)

16. Did so now refers to the substance of vs. 14, the appearance of the guilty at the Jerusalem court. The present Hebrew text is corrupt and difficult to interpret. It seems to describe the constitution of the Jerusalem court. To read Ezra the priest selected men, the passive verb of the M.T. must be revocalized and made singular. The LXXL, I Esdras 9:16, and the Peshitta have “Ezra the priest selected for himself.” The “for himself” (τα) has been combined with the verb selected to produce the clumsy plural verb “they selected.”

If did so refers to the action of Neh. 9:1-2, the keeping of a festival and the actual separation from foreigners, and not to the organization of the Jerusalem court, the reference to Ezra must be excised and the passive plural verb must be retained with “certain men” as its subject: “certain men were selected.” Thus, “And certain men, family heads, . . . separated themselves” (Morgenstern, loc. cit.).

The men selected were chosen by ancestral line. Such lines are clearly discernible in the organization of the lists given in Ezra (cf. vss. 25 ff.; 2:3 ff.) and Nehemiah. The
And among the sons of the priests there were found that had taken strange wives: namely, of the sons of Jeshua the son of Jozadak, and his brethren: Maaseiah, and Eliezer, and Jarib, and Gedaliah. And they gave their hands that they would put away their wives; and being guilty, they offered a ram of the flock for their trespass.

And of the sons of Immer; Hanani, and Zebadiah.

The number is uncertain but the Peshitta independently inserts the figure "twelve." That number may represent a rounding of the number of secular families in 2:3-20 since, if Joab (2:6; 8:9) is regarded as a separate family, there are nineteen primary secular families in the list. By name may be a vestige of the formula "expressed by names" (cf. 8:20) favored by the Chronicler (cf. I Chr. 4:38, 41; 12:31; 16:41; etc.; cf. Num. 1:17; Driver, Intro. to Literature of O.T., p. 596, No. 12). Lack of a list here indicates that none was available for the Chronicler, who liked lists and would have inserted it in full. That none is composed here by him is important in estimating the validity of lists he does present. It has been suggested however that by name might mean "with names," indicating that the men described were "persons of reputation" (cf. Gen. 6:4; Morgenstern, loc. cit.)

It is proposed to place Neh. 10:28-30 [Hebrew 10:29-31] between vs. 16a and vs. 16b (ibid., pp. 23-28), since that description of the action of separation from the foreigners and the taking of an oath would be more appropriate here than in its present location.

The date of the first session of the Jerusalem commission was December 26, 398 B.C., about thirteen days after the great assembly (cf. vs. 9). By the first day of the first month the work was finished at Jerusalem—April 23, 397 B.C., assuming the intercalation of an extra month in Palestine as in the Babylonian calendar in 397 B.C., which extended the period of examination somewhat (R. A. Parker and W. H. Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 B.C.—A.D. 45 [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1942], p. 32). Since they made an end refers not to the punishment of the guilty but to the conclusion of the processing of those investigated, it is preferable to read they had come to the end of.

18-19. Foreign marriages constituted a trespass (vs. 19), an unintentional breach of faith which could be rectified. The term "ignorance," (γνώμη) is used for it in I Esdras 9:20. One guilty of trespass must first right the wrong done and then make peace with God through a guilt offering. It is preferable to read their guilt offering (виноград) for the impossible guilty (виноград) of the M.T. (Abraham Kuenen, Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur biblischen Wissenschaft, tr. Karl Budde [Leipzig: J. C. B. Mohr, 1894], p. 245; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 96). A ram of the flock (cf. 7:17) suggests the law of Lev. 5:15, but I Esdras 9:20, the Vulg., and the Peshitta have "rams" here.

The location of vs. 19b prevents misunderstanding that each offender made a sacrifice. Only guilty relatives of the high priest (3:2; 2:36; Hag. 1:12) were expected to offer rams. As in the later law regarding the sin offering (Lev. 4:3, 13-14, 22-23, 27-28, 32), the higher the office and the more responsibility, the greater the penalty exacted for transgression. Listed first and separately (vs. 18) are the guilty of the family of the high priest, who might be expected to set an example for the entire people. These gave their hands during the oath, just as Zedekiah took the hand of Nebuchadrezzar in pledging allegiance (Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, I-II, p. 304).

20-23. Although guilty members of the high priest's family are singled out for special attention (vs. 18), guilty persons were found in all four priestly families (cf.
21 And of the sons of Harim: Maaseiah, and Elijah, and Shemaiah, and Jehiel, and Uziah.
22 And of the sons of Pashur: Elioenai, Maaseiah, Ishmael, Nethaneel, Jozabad, and Elasah.
23 Also of the Levites: Jozabad, and Shimei, and Kelaiah, (the same is Kelita,) Pethahiah, Judah, and Eliezer.
24 Of the singers also: Eliashib: and of the porters: Shallum, and Telem, and Uri.
25 Moreover of Israel: of the sons of Parosh: Ramiah, and Jeziiah, and Malchiah, and Miamin, and Eleazar, and Malchijah, and Benaijah.
26 And of the sons of Elam: Mattaniah, Zechariah, and Jehiel, and Abdi, and Jeremoth, and Eliah.
27 And of the sons of Zattu: Elioenai, Eliashib, Mattaniah, and Jeremoth, and Zabad, and Aziza.
28 Of the sons also of Bebai: Jehohanan, Hananiah, Zabbai, and Athlai.
29 And of the sons of Bani: Meshullam, Malluch, and Adaiah, Jashub, and Sheal, and Ramoth.

2:36-39, described as his [i.e., Jeshua's; cf. vs. 18] brethren (cf. 3:2). Following the priests (vss. 18, 20-22), the guilty Levites, who are always associated with the priests (cf. 2:40), are listed (vs. 25). Kelaiah (vs. 23) is identified as Kelita (cf. Neh. 8:7; 10:10) by a gloss older than I Esdras. It has been suggested that the identification may be a parenthetical comment by the Chronicler himself (Bewer, Der Text des Buches Ezra, p. 89). But one singer (2:41) was involved (vs. 24), and there is no reference to guilty Nethinim or children of Solomon's servants (2:43-57), the lowest orders of temple servants, since they were already largely foreigners and outside the law.

25-33. Following the list of temple servants is the much larger list of guilty belonging to the secular families of Israel (cf. 2:23-35). Malchijah (vs. 25) is named twice, but the LXX and I Esdras show that the second is an error for Hashabiah. Mijamin (cf. Neh. 10:7; 12:5) is a contraction of Miniamin. (Neh. 12:17, 41), found in Neo-Babylonian and Persian cuneiform documents (Clay, Business Documents of Murashû Sons of Nippur, No. 104, l. 2; No. 205, l. 14). The Peshitta has “Benjamin” here, and it is conjectured that the names should be equated (Noth, Personennamen, p. 60, n. 2; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 98). Abdi (vs. 26) abbreviates “Abadiah” (cf. I Esdras).

Zabad (vs. 27) is for such a name as Zabadiyah (cf. 8:8), for which Zabbai (vs. 28; cf. Neh. 3:20) may also be an abbreviation. Names with the element Zabad-, which are found in Babylonian tablets and the papyri, occur with great frequency in the Chronicler's lists and are represented in the N.T. by Zebedee (Matt. 4:21; Mark 1:19; John 21:2; Luke 5:10; Noth, Personennamen, p. 47). Since Bani (vs. 29; cf. 2:10) is read in vs. 34, another name must have been originally here or there. The LXX suggests “Binnui” (cf. Neh. 7:15), but that also is found in vs. 38 and must be excluded. Graphically similar “Bigvai” (2:14) has been proposed here (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 99). A Meshullam (vs. 29) was among those opposing Ezra's reform (cf. vs. 15). For the unique Sheal (vs. 29) the Peshitta has “Shaul” (Saul), which is better (Jahn, Esra [A und B] und Nehemja, p. 85), but the unusual conjunction before the name may be the corruption. of a letter, and I EsdrasAB, as well as Oriental MSS, suggests the name Yishai (Bewer, op. cit., p. 91; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

Bezalel (vs. 30) is a late type of name (cf. I Chr. 2:20; II Chr. 1:5) from a Babylonian prototype (mIna-šil-4Nabû; Tallqvist, op. cit., p. 78; Noth, Personennamen, pp. 32, 152).

Manasseh (vs. 30), like Joseph (vs. 42), Judah (vs. 23), Shimeon (vs. 31), and Benjamin (vs. 32), indicates a revival of the use of patriarchal names in postexilic times. For “and the sons of” (vs. 31) many Hebrew MSS and the versions indicate the use of the usual formula and of the sons of (KJV).

34-43. These verses are the most corrupt in the list. The twenty-seven names assigned to Bani (vss. 34-42) appear excessive since the next largest total is eight (vss. 30-31). Obviously several clans are combined in the total, but it is impossible to sort out the names and identify them by family in every case. The unique Uel (vs. 34) is corrupt and should be read “Joel” (cf. Neh. 11:9), as I EsdrasABL, the LXXBL, and the Peshitta show. Cheluh (vs. 35) is corrupt, but it cannot be “Koliahu” or “Jecoliahu” (cf. Bewer, op. cit., p. 92) since the divine name element is otherwise not -iahu in Ezra-Nehemiah (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.). Vaniah (vs. 36), which appears to be a Persian name (Vânya, “Worthy of Love”), is found also in the Aramaic papyri and ostraca (Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, p. 68, No. 22, l. 40; Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum [Paris: E. Reipublicae Typographiae, 1889], Part II, Vol. I, No. 154, l. 3), but the Peshitta and I Esdras indicate a corrupt text. It is suggested that the versions have the name Jonas (Bewer, loc. cit.), but since that does not occur as a family name, it is thought that it might be a corruption for Jorah (cf. 2:18), and that at this point (vs. 36) a new family name is perhaps introduced (Rudolph, loc. cit.). For and Bani (יָבַּנִים) in vs. 38 read here the graphically similar And of the sons of (יָבַּנִים) of the formula (cf. vs. 29), with the LXXAB (cf. LXXL and I Esdrasi), and the corrupt Peshitta text.

Machnadebai (vs. 40) seems to contain the element nadbi-, as in Nadbi-el (Lidzbarski, Ephemeris, III, 279; cf. Nedabiah in I Chr. 3:18), and in such names as the Moabite Kammasu-nadbi found in a cuneiform document (Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, II, 119, sec. 239). But no god Mach- is known and the Hebrew name may be corrupt. The LXXB with Machad-Nabou suggests the name Nabû or Nebo (2:29), but that family is mentioned in vs. 43. The reading “And of the sons of Ezora” is found in I EsdrasAB but that name is otherwise unknown and may represent such a graphically similar name as Azzur (Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 45), or more probably Zaccai (יְהוָה; cf. 2:9), which closely resembles the final letters of the element -nadebai (יָבַּנִים; Bewer, op. cit., p. 93). Shashai (vs. 40), found also in the papyri (Cowley, op. cit., p. 154, No. 49, l. 1), abbreviates a name with the element mentioning the god Shamash (cf. Sheshbazzar in 1:8). Zabad (vs. 43; cf. vss. 27, 33) is Zaccur in one Hebrew MS and the Peshitta. Ze'bina (vs. 43) is found frequently in Neo-Babylonian documents. Its meaning (“Bought”) has been believed to apply to orphan or abandoned children (Noth, Personennamen, pp. 231-32), but it can as well signify “Bought from God by means of sacrifices or prayers” (E. R. Bevan, The House of Seleucus [London: Edward Arnold, 1902], II, 305-6).
41 Azareel, and Shelemiah, Shemariah, Sha'rai. 41 Αζαρέλ, Σχλεμία, σχεμαρία, Sha'rai. 42 Shallum, Amariah, and Joseph. 42 Σαλλύμ, Αμαρία, καὶ Ἰσαώ. Shallum, Amariah, and Joseph. 43 Of the sons of Nebo: Jeiel, Mattithiah, Zabad, Zeboi'na, Jaddai, Joel, and Benai'ah. 43 Ο Νεβιτῶν γενεάς Ἰείλ, Ματθιθία, Ζαβάδ, Ζεβώινα, Ταήνα, Ἰάδα, Ἰούλ, καὶ Βέναία. Of the sons of Nebo: Jeiel, Mattithiah, Zabad, Zeboi'na, Jaddai, Joel, and Benai'ah. 44 All these had taken foreign wives, and they put them away with their children. 44 Ταύτας δ' ἐπέλαβε κατανόησαν καὶ ἐκβαλλόντως ἐπεβάλασαν ἐπὶ τὰς γυναῖκάς τις. All these had taken foreign wives, and they put them away with their children.

44. This verse is obviously corrupt since it is ungrammatical and vs. 44b is senseless. All these refers to the guilty men (vss. 18-43). For the Hebrew taken as married see 9:2. And some of them had wives, stating the obvious, reflects the awkward Hebrew text, “And there were of them wives.” But I Esdras reads, “And they sent them away with children,” which supplies the desired conclusion to the reform program (cf. vss. 3, 11) and forms the basis for most emendations and the translation in the RSV. In the writing of the postexilic period, as seen in the Jewish Aramaic papyri, an original text, ישנהו כוהני, “And they sent them,” could easily be corrupted to the Hebrew ישנהו כוהני, “And there were of them . . . ,” of the M.T. (Bewer, loc. cit.). The verb ישנהו כוהני, and they put, which makes nonsense of vs. 44b, is but a dittograph of ישנהו כוהני, women, and . . . . The original text was, “All these had taken foreign women but they sent them away, women and children.” Corruption of the verse led some to conclude that Ezra’s reform failed (cf. Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 815). But if the guilt offering (vss. 18-19) is historical the reform was successful, for such offering could be made only when the wrong had been righted. Moreover, the Chronicler certainly desired to leave the impression that the exclusive Judaism of Ezra was victorious and the restored community had been purged of all foreign influences. The whole story has anticipated and prepared for a successful purge. As Torrey points out (Ezra Studies, pp. 278-79), “The immediate sequel in Neh. 9:1 asserts again that they did separate themselves completely, not only from the heathen wives and their children (10:29-31), but also from all the other foreigners (9:2, cf. especially Ezr. 9:1, 10:11).” Josephus shared this view in saying, “So then, having rectified the wrong doing of the forementioned men in marrying, Ezra purified the practice relating to this matter so that it remained fixed for the future” (Antiquities XI. 5. 4). The Ezra narrative continues in Neh. 9:1-5, which describes the confession required by Ezra (vs. 11), and relates the actual separation of the mixed families.
NEHEMIAH
TEXT, EXEGESIS, AND EXPOSITION

1 The words of Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah. And it came to pass in the month Chisleu, in the twentieth year, as I was in Shushan the palace,

I. NEHEMIAH HEARS NEWS OF JERUSALEM (1:1-11)

Nehemiah was read in Greek as a separate book as late as the time of Ben Sirach (ca. 180 B.C.) and when II Macc. 2:15 was written (Ecclus. 49:13; Theodor Nöldeke, "Bemerkungen zum hebräischen Ben Sirà." Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XX [1900], 89). Nehemiah is not mentioned in I Esdras, but Josephus uses the memoirs in a form somewhat different from that in the M.T. and the LXX. He may have used an independent Greek narrative as his source when the Ezra story terminated in the MS of I Esdras that he used (Robert H. Pfeiffer, History of New Testament Times [New York: Harper & Bros., 1949, p. 245].

A. The News (1:1-4)

1:1. The title of the book is doubtless introduced by the Chronicler or a later editor who incorporated Nehemiah's text into the present literary complex of Ezra-Nehemiah. It is missing in the LXXI. The phrase The words of usually introduces prophetic books (cf. Amos 1:1; Jer. 1:1) but the Hebrew text can also be read as "the acts of," which would be more appropriate for Nehemiah's factual, historical account. The word translated words is used as the Hebrew title of the books called Chronicles.

Nehemiah ("The Lord has comforted"), sometimes abbreviated Nahum (cf. 7:7; Nah. 1:1), Naham (I Chr. 4:19), or Nahamani (7:7). The name is found in old Hebrew letters on a pre-exilic Israelite scarab (C. Clermont-Ganneau, "Sceaux et cachets," Journal Asiatique; Ser. 8, Vol. I [1883], p. 156, No. 42). It is found only in postexilic material in the Bible and is not found in the Aramaic papyri. Many attempts

1:1-3. Words That Began as Deeds—The words of Nehemiah, as Robert H. Pfeiffer points out, are "from the literary point of view... something new. They are the earliest autobiography extant written by a man who was not a king, with the exception of the grave inscriptions of Egyptian monarchs in the Middle Kingdom."

Here then we have the personal reminiscences of a leader in a national, cultural, and religious crisis, who emerged not by birth and only secondarily by official appointment, but rather by what Arnold J. Toynbee has called "challenge and response," in the midst of the crisis itself. In that sense Nehemiah's memoirs, as O.T. scholars frequently call them, have become even more than our chief firsthand source for an obscure period in Hebrew history twenty-four hundred years ago; they have also become what Homer called "winged words," borne far down on the winds of history to us of today; words both revelatory and prophetic of something characteristic in what we mean by "the democratic way of life." For here we can trace the voluntary assumption of responsibility and initiative in the midst of a social crisis by an individual whom God called and equipped for leadership, and whom men thereupon recognized and followed. As centuries afterward Lincoln, "The Rail Splitter," without benefit of birth, breeding, or education, emerged from the

1 For Introduction to Nehemiah see pp. 551-69.

2 That Hanani, one of my brethren, came, he and certain men of Judah; and I asked them concerning the Jews that had escaped, which were left of the captivity, and concerning Jerusalem.

have been made to explain the name Hacaliah (cf. 10:1), but none is persuasive and it remains one of the most difficult to interpret (George Buchanan Gray, Hebrew Proper Names [London: A. & C. Black, 1896], p. 221; Martin Noth, Die israelitischen Personen- n amen im Rahmen der Gemeinsemitischen Namengebung [Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1928; "Beiträge zur Wissenschaft vom Alten und Neuen Testament"], p. 32, n. 3).

Postexilic Jewish events, like later Babylonian and Persian business documents, are dated exactly by month, year, and usually also by the day (cf. Hag. 1:1, 15; 2:1, 10; Zech. 1:1, 7; 7:1). Chislev is the ninth Babylonian month (Kislimu or Kisliwu), a type of reckoning adopted by the Jews in postexilic times. The twentieth year was clearly that during the reign of Artaxerxes (2:1), presumably Artaxerxes I (Longimanus, 461-425 B.C.). The date of vs. 1 is thus sometime between December 5 and January 3, 445-444 B.C. But since the later event of 2:1 is dated in the first month, that in vs. 1 is obviously wrong and must be earlier. The date has been regarded as an interpolation, possibly derived from 5:14 (cf. L. W. Batten, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1913; "International Critical Commentary"], p. 182), but the error must be for the "nineteenth year" (Dec. 17 to Jan. 14). Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 6) wrongly places both Ezra and Nehemiah in the reign of Xerxes, reserving the reign of Artaxerxes for the story of Esther (ibid. XI. 6. 1-18).

Shushan or Susa (cf. Ezra 4:9), capital of Elam, was the winter residence of the Persian kings ( Xenophon Cyropaedia VIII. 6. 22). For the palace or the capital after the name, read "the fortress" (cf. Ezra 6:2).

2. Hanani abbreviates Hananiah (cf. 3:8, 30). Brethren is as elastic in Hebrew as in English. It may mean simply a fellow Jew (Exod. 2:11; Deut. 15:12), an intimate friend (II Sam. 1:26; I Kings 9:13: 20:32-33), a kinsman with some degree of actual relationship, or a blood brother. From 7:2 it seems likely that he was a genuine brother.

obscurity of the American wilderness to save his country in a crisis, so Nehemiah, the layman, emerged from the indignities of an exiled people, to save his nation, its culture, and its religion in a perilous time.

We do well to note that this historic achievement was first a bold and creative deed—and only afterward became a written narrative. For that reason the marginal rendering of the ASV, "The history of Nehemiah," or as the Exeg. suggests, the "acts of Nehemiah," tells us more about the total event in its historical and spiritual significance than words alone can ever tell. This sequence of historic deeds, afterward recounted in "winged words" that in turn quicken new and fruitful deeds, is characteristic because often repeated in our Jewish-Christian religious heritage—a heritage deeply rooted in the soil of history itself. So "saints, apostles, prophets, martyrs" speak to us still across the centuries—as Nehemiah speaks—even more by their example than by their utterance. So above all speaks still to Christian faith "the Word . . . made flesh" who "dwelt among us, . . . full of grace and truth" (John 1:14). All Christian theologies of the Incarnation bear witness to this primacy of the historic fact and the creative deed which preceded the written or even the spoken word; and our latest N.T. scholarship emphasizes this same order and sequence in the earliest history of the Christian gospel itself. Only in the minds and purpose of God does the "Word" come first: in our human experience and history Goethe's famous line tells the oft-repeated story, "In the beginning was the deed."

This same sequence—deeds first, then words—reveals to us the core of Nehemiah's character, and the secret of his influence and success. As Pfeiffer puts it:

Nehemiah was essentially a man of action. Deeply concerned over the plight of the pitiful Jewish community in Jerusalem, through his indomitable energy, self-denial, and shrewd unmasking of hostile plots, he brought new life to it . . . . He revived the dying Jewish community in Palestine and endowed it with deathless vigor.

* Ibid.
And they said unto me, The remnant that are left of the captives there in the province are in great affliction and reproach: the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire.

He does not appear in Josephus' version (Antiquities XI, 5. 6), which describes Nehemiah as walking before the city walls where he overheard Hebrew spoken by travelers. Hanani and his companions have been regarded as a special embassy sent to ask their fellow Jew in a prominent position to intercede with the king on behalf of his fellow Jews in Jerusalem (A. T. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948], pp. 513-14). But I asked indicates that Nehemiah took the initiative in questioning the men, and there is no evidence of a petition presented to Nehemiah. Who had escaped and which were left show concern for Jews who survived the catastrophe of 586 B.C., possibly those Judeans who fled for safety when the enemy approached (II Kings 25:22-26; Jer. 40:11-12). The viewpoint is distinctly Palestinian, in contrast to that of the Chronicler who viewed the survivors as those who returned from exile to found the restored postexilic community (cf. Ezra 2:1).

3. The province is Judea, a subdivision of the satrapy (cf. Ezra 2:1; 4:15; 7:16). Great affliction and great trouble translate the Hebrew "great evil." Josephus (loc. cit.) expands the narrative: "The surrounding nations were inflicting many injuries on the Jews, overrunning the country and plundering it by day and doing mischief by night, so that many had been carried off as captives from the country and from Jerusalem itself; and every day the roads were found full of corpses." The opponents are clear from 2:10, 19 (cf. Ezra 4:6-23). For reproach or shame see 2:19; 4:1-4; Ezra 9:7.

The wall of Jerusalem is described as "pulled down" or "demolished" in 586 B.C. (II Kings 25:10; Jer. 39:8; cf. Lam. 2:8-9) but the term here is simply "breached" (cf. 4:3; II Kings 14:13; II Chr. 25:23). The huge wooden gates such as barred access to ancient cities (cf. Jer. 17:27; 51:58) were burned with fire. Late Assyrian sculpture shows attacks made on city gates, using battering rams and fire (Bruno Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien [Heidelberg: C. Winter, 1920], I, 110 and Pl. 64; C. J. Gadd, Assyrian Sculptures [London: British Museum, 1934], p. 41), practices which were widely into the leader and savior of his people, already under way in this first sentence of his narrative, involved the initiative and cooperation of others besides himself. The significant part played in it by his kinsman Hanani—so often repeated in the life history of leaders who themselves are guided into their high calling by other hands that history barely remembers, or more often forgets—was a role that doubtless seemed outwardly insignificant but was inwardly indispensable. As L. W. Batten describes it:

Hanani apparently had not been in Judah himself, but he had heard tidings from a company of returning pilgrims, and had brought them to the cup-bearer, because of his high position and commanding influence, as well as his known interest in the welfare of Jerusalem. The visit was scarcely accidental, and so Hanani deserves credit for starting the important mission of Nehemiah.

It is plain from these memoirs that in a real sense Nehemiah created his own crisis by the way in which he grappled responsibly with a situation the seriousness of which others either did not recognize or were content to evade. His creative deeds, that is to say, sprang out of his vivid imagination, his sensitive conscience, and his courageous loyalty, all active in a situation which his fellows were content to regard as none of their affair. These characteristic qualities begin to appear in the first sentence of his memoirs (vs. 2). Nehemiah was "well fixed" personally, with an important post in the royal palace at Susa. He could easily have let the situation in faraway Jerusalem take care of itself: just as every citizen who learns of a sore spot in his own neighborhood, or every nation in our own shrunken world that hears rumblings from a crisis on the other side of the earth, can easily ignore it, in the complacent hope that "everything will turn out all right."

The process by which Nehemiah developed
And it came to pass, when I heard these words, that I sat down and wept, and

The conditions in Jerusalem reported by Hanani's friends in vs. 3, which, as Batten points out, seem to "require a recent calamity," are such as in twentieth-century postwar periods could be reported from all the war-devastated countries of Europe, and likewise from those parts of the Near and the Far East, where civil or guerrilla warfare prevailed. Nehemiah could have ignored or forgotten these reports, but he had imagination enough to see what they meant, and sense of loyalty and responsibility enough to regard them as his own concern. In spite of his own high and affluent position, he felt the "great trouble and shame" of the handeful of his fellow countrymen in Jerusalem as if they were his own. The sufferings and wrongs of minority groups, and of the underprivileged or oppressed in every age and scene of human history, have had to wait for their redemption until some individual or group, frequently like Nehemiah in a position of privilege or influence, has felt them as if they had befallen themselves, and taken the responsibility of their amelioration. One thinks at once of the part played in the development of British democracy in the early nineteenth century by Richard Cobden and John Bright, and by the "liberal Tories," on whose strategic and forward-looking role G. M. Trevelyan lays such stress in his British History in the Nineteenth Century. Nehemiah is a shining example of such social awareness and personal self-dedication.

4. These words can also be "these things" (cf. vs. 1). For days usually means "for some time" (cf. Gen. 40:4; I Kings 17:15; etc.). The interval of mourning between Chislev (1:1) and Nisan (2:1) would be three or four months, but Josephus asserts that Nehemiah appeared before the king almost at once. For fasted, and prayed see Ezra 9:5; for God of heaven see 2:4, 20; Ezra 1:2.
mourned certain days, and fasted, and prayed before the God of heaven,

5 And said, I beseech thee, O Lord God of heaven, the great and terrible God, that and wept, and mourned for days; and I continued fasting and praying before the God of heaven. 5 And I said, "O Lord God of heaven, the great and terrible God who

B. NEHEMIAH'S PRAYER (1:5-11a)

Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 6) states: "Then Nehemiah burst into tears out of pity for the misfortune of his countrymen and, looking up to heaven, said, 'How long, O Lord, wilt thou look away while our nation suffers these things, having thus become the prey and spoil of all?'" This prayer may be an abstract or a brief paraphrase of what Josephus found in his source, but it is appropriate to the occasion and has something of the businesslike directness and simplicity of Nehemiah's language as it is known elsewhere. In sharp contrast the biblical prayer is a rambling, indirect effusion of stilted Deuteronomistic phrases having little or no bearing on the situation that evoked the prayer. Although even C. C. Torrey has regarded the prayer as authentic (The Composition and Historical Value of Ezra-Nehemiah [Giessen: J. Ricker, 1895; "Beihete zur Zeit-schrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft"], p. 36) and it has been defended as genuine (Wilhelm Rudolph, Ezra und Nehemia [Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1949; "Handbuch zum Alten Testament"], p. 105), its integrity has not been unchallenged (H. G. Mitchell, "The Wall of Jerusalem According to the Book of Nehemiah," Journal of Biblical Literature, XXII [1903], 87; Batten, op. cit., p. 188; so also Sigmund Mowinckel, Ezra den Skriftlaerder [Kristiania: 1916]; Gustav Holscher, Die Bücher Ezra und Nehemia [4th ed., E. Kautzsch and A. Berthalet; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1923], et al.). It is strongly liturgical and might well be classified as a "folk lament" (Hermann Gunkel and Joachim Begrich, Einleitung in die Psalmen [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1933; "Göttinger Handbuch zum Alten Testament"], pp. 121 ff.). It has been suggested that the Chronicler "took this prayer [1:5-11a] from the Temple Liturgy and put it into the mouth of Nehemiah" (W. O. E. Oesterley, "Ezra-Nehemiah," in A. S. Peake, ed., A Commentary on the Bible [New York: Thomas Nelson & Sons, n.d.], p. 330). But it closely resembles the work of the Chronicler himself, who weaves together Deuteronomistic phrases as prayers (cf. Ezra 9:6-15; Batten, loc. cit.).

Since this man (vs. 11a) is senseless in its context, and the parenthetical comment that follows indicates that it refers to Artaxerxes, who has not yet been mentioned, it is probable that the prayer is misplaced, drawn from 2:4, where a definite prayer is mentioned (ibid., pp. 188, 192). That prayer must have been brief, silent, and almost instantaneous. "At this time" (vs. 6) and this day (vs. 11) would be pertinent but day and night (vs. 6) could be a later gloss to adapt it to a context in which Nehemiah into a prolonged period of what our ancestors, as well as his, called "fasting and prayer." The fact that a similar prayer of national confession in Ezra 9:6-15 is set in a similar frame of personal humiliation and strong emotion suggests that the hand of the Chronicler may well have cast or recast both the substance and the setting of these prayers into patterns of his own. We are told that both Ezra and Nehemiah, with an emotional intensity which is characteristically Oriental and Semitic, but is conspicuously not an Anglo-Saxon trait, wept bitter tears, and that Ezra rent his clothes in a penitence before the God of his fathers that was both personal and national. The prayers that follow at length, here in vss. 5-11, and in Ezra 9:6-15, bear marked resemblances to a similar and even longer prayer in Dan. 9:4-19. All three of these prayers make large use of Deuteronomistic phrases and ideas: there are four marginal references to Deuteronomy in Nehemiah's prayer, one in Ezra's, five in Daniel's. Apparently the book of Deuteronomy became for later Judaism a kind of literary and spiritual quarry, from which were brought forth not only words and phrases for written prayers, but religious insights and attitudes proper before altars of private devotion; somewhat as phrases from George Washington's well-known prayer for his country have reappeared in liturgies for public and private worship.

Whatever the critical problems and the literary relationships which scholarship may uncover within and among those four O.T. books, they keeps covenant and mercy for them that love him and observe his commandments:

666

6 Let thine ear now be attentive, and thine eyes open, that thou mayest hear the prayer of thy servant, which I pray before thee now, day and night, for the children of Israel thy servants, and confess the sins of the children of Israel, which we have sinned against thee: both I and my father's house have sinned.

mourned for certain days (vs. 4). Similarly "thy servant" (vs. 10) is expected but and to the prayer of thy servants who delight to fear thy name (vs. 11) must be a gloss making a personal prayer a communal one. Batten [ibid., p. 189] claims that "if [Nehemiah] recorded his prayer at all, it has been so elaborately worked over that the original cannot be recovered." But it is tempting to conjecture that the original prayer, appropriate after 2:4, might have been, "I beseech thee, O LORD, God of Heaven [vs. 5], that thou mayest hear the prayer of thy servant which I pray before thee now for the children of Israel, thy servants [vs. 6]. Give success, I pray thee, to thy servant now and grant him compassion in the sight of this man." Such a prayer, transferred to its present context, appears to have displaced an earlier prayer, the substance of which may be preserved by Josephus.

5. This verse differs but slightly from Dan. 9:4. A habit of stereotyped prayer may account for the presence of the personal name of God, translated LORD (cf. Ezra 1:2), found only here in Nehemiah. and for the children of Israel (vs. 6), also not used elsewhere by Nehemiah. Great and terrible are attributes of God. Terrible means "awe-inspiring" (cf. Joel 2:31; Mal. 4:5) . Despite fearsome powers, God is faithful to his covenant (cf. Ezra 10:3). Mercy or steadfast love is not to be regarded in a sentimental sense alone, for it always implies faithful compliance with the accepted terms of the covenant contract (cf. Nelson Glueck, Das Wort hesed im alttestamentlichen Sprachgebräuche [Giessen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1927]). It is "the feeling of fellowship between the Israelites themselves and between them and their God" (Johannes Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture III-IV [London: Oxford University Press, 1940], p. 541). Steadfast love, like the covenant, is limited to those in the agreement who love God and express that love by obedience to his commandments.

6. Because "hearken" has nothing to do with eyes, reference to open eyes has been called a later addition based on II Chr. 6:40 (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 104), but the expression is found elsewhere (II Chr. 7:15; Isa. 37:17). For ear the LXXI, Vulg., and Peshitta have "ears," as in II Chr. 6:40; Ps. 130:2, but the expression here is exactly as found in Isa. 37:17. God is implored to hear the plea and observe the pitiable plight so that both sight and sound might move him to respond. Thy servant is a humble formula of represent in any case a deep and sound religious insight, from which the Christian minister may profit both in the conduct of public worship and in the practice of private devotion. Personal religion has some of its deepest roots not only in its family and national heritage (vs. 6, 10), but in its ancestral and contemporary social experiences of collective temptation and failure (vs. 6-7), leading to a religious confession of social sin before the God of the generations. Not only are the sins of the fathers visited on their children, but the repentance of the children is indispensable if there is to be redemption for either generation. Our most urgent interracial and international problems are be-deviled by our inherited racial prejudices; and our economic difficulties both at home and abroad are complicated by habitual attitudes of isolation, irresponsibility, and "every man for himself." Only if we repent individually and collectively of our fathers' sins as well as of our own can either they or we be forgiven—or our children saved in their day and generation.

It is deeply significant that Nehemiah, like Ezra (9:6-7, 15), identifies himself in his prayer with the wrongdoing of his fellows and his 7 We have dealt very corruptly against thee, and have not kept the commandments, nor the statutes, nor the judgments, which thou commandedst thy servant Moses.

8 Remember, I beseech thee, the word that thou commandedst thy servant Moses, saying, If ye transgress, I will scatter you abroad among the nations:

9 But if ye turn unto me, and keep my commandments, and do them; though there were of you cast out unto the uttermost part of the heaven, yet will I gather them from thence, and will bring them unto the place that I have chosen to set my name there.

polite address toward equals or superiors (cf. Gen. 18:3; I Sam. 20:7-8; etc.), used also in Assyrian letters. Now, lit., “today” (vs. 11), seems original while day and night seems a later addition (cf. above). Since night and not “evening” is used, the reference is not to the three periods appointed for prayer (Dan. 6:10; Ps. 55:17). Confession of guilt plays a large part (vss. 6-7) before the actual petition, as in Ezra’s prayer (Ezra 9:5-15). Thy servants are the Jews (cf. 1:11; 2:20), for Nehemiah frequently used servant and calls the Jews “this people” (5:19), which may lie behind the “our nation” in the prayer in Josephus. The LXX, Peshitta, and Vulg. have “they have sinned” which, with the children of Israel, may be an earlier reading, but this has been changed (M.T. and LXXAB) to we have sinned, whereby Nehemiah, like Ezra (9:6), includes himself among the sinners. I and my father’s house has been called an addition (Gustav Jahn, Die Bücher Ezra [A und B] und Nehemja [Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1909], p. 91), but Batten (op. cit., p. 186), who thinks it genuine, infers Davidic descent for Nehemiah from it, since “the sin of his house is separated from that of the people generally” (cf. 2:3, 5).

7-8. Didst command . . . saying should preface a direct scriptural quotation, but the words cited (vss. 8-10) are no more than an assemblage of Deuteronomic phrases largely reminiscent of Deut. 30:1-5. “Trespass” or transgress is a favorite term of the Chronicler (cf. Ezra 10:2, 10). The substance of the passage is found in Deut. 4:27; 28:64, but a closer parallel is found in Lev. 26:14-15, 33. Commandments . . . statutes . . . ordinances are terms characteristic of Deuteronomy (cf. 5:31; 6:1; cf. also Ezra 7:11). Moses, who gives the commandments (Deut. 28:13-15), is frequently called the servant of God (cf. Neh. 9:14).

9. The idea of return to God, found in the prophets (cf. Jer. 4:1; 24:7), is a prominent theme of Deuteronomic writers (cf. I Kings 8:47-48=RD). Only with a real change of heart can the result of repentance be manifested in loyal obedience to the commandments. Such obedience consists in keeping the covenant, the only guarantee of life and prosperity (Deut. 28:1-2). The awkward though there were of you cast out fathers, even though he himself has had neither part nor lot in it. Yea, I and my father’s house have sinned (vs. 6b). On this identification of himself and his family with the national wrongdoing rests no small part of the leverage Nehemiah was able to bring to bear for national repentance and reform. In every generation there are plenty of people ready to confess the sins of other races and social groups than their own; and there are likewise always some who are equally ready to confess the sins of their own group or nation—while explicitly disclaiming all personal responsibility therefor. But it is those who, like Nehemiah and Ezra, are ready to say, “From the days of our fathers to this day we have been in great guilt” (Ezra 9:7), who have been able to move their less sensitive fellows toward collective repentance and conversion.

Conversely, when Nehemiah confessed so humbly the national sins of his fathers and of his own generation, and renewed his own faith 10 Now these are thy servants and thy people, whom thou hast redeemed by thy great power, and by thy strong hand.

11 O Lord, I beseech thee, let now thine ear be attentive to the prayer of thy servant, and to the prayer of thy servants, who desire to fear thy name: and prosper, I pray thee, thy servant, and to the prayer of thy servants who delight to fear thy name; and give is improved by reading though your dispersed be, for the Hebrew participle as a substantive means someone who is “banished” or “thrust away.” For your dispersed the LXX has “your scattering,” using a word (diaspora) which became a technical term for all Jews outside of Palestine. Under the farthest skies interprets the Hebrew “unto the ends of the heavens.” There is no implication of human habitation in the skies, for the reference is to the farthest horizon, where earth and sky meet. For gather them read with the LXXL, Vulg., and Peshitta, “gather you” to agree with if you return.

The place which I have chosen is not found outside of Deuteronomy in the Pentateuch (Deut. 12:5, 11, 14; 16:6, 11; etc.). The place is the site of the temple in Jerusalem, which is described as “chosen” by later Deuteronomistic editors (cf. 1 Kings 8:16, 44, 48; 11:13, 32; etc.). For my name and the expression set my name see Ezra 6:12.

10-11a. Words attributed to Nehemiah are resumed in vs. 10, after the conclusion of the “quotation” in vs. 9. Vs. 10 is apparently a paraphrase of Deut. 9:29. Reference is to exiled Jews, but Nehemiah’s own interest is not in exiles, neither at home nor abroad, but in the people of Jerusalem who survived the disaster of 586 B.C. (cf. vs. 2-3). For “thou didst bring out” of Deut. 9:29, vs. 10 uses thou hast redeemed, which is more appropriate in the historical context in Nehemiah. Such a concept of redemption is prominent in Deuteronomistic thought (Deut. 7:8; 9:26; 13:5; 15:15; 21:8; 24:18), as is also the use of strong hand (Deut. 3:24; 4:34; 5:15; etc.).

The petition begun in vs. 5-6 is resumed in vs. 11 with almost the same words of vs. 6, but with no reference to open eyes. The prayer of thy servants might be a recognition by Nehemiah of the constant prayer of Jews who, like himself, sought God’s aid for the welfare of their people. But following the prayer of thy servant, which appears original (cf. above), it seems to be an addition to the text, presumably to give it liturgical value. The paradoxical delight to fear combines two aspects of Jewish religion (cf. Ps.

in and dependence on the God of his fathers, who had revealed himself in their history as a nation, he began to get clear light on his own duty in the contemporary situation. Kneeling individually before that sacred altar, he found there new awareness both of the judgment and of the mercy of God in his people’s history (vs. 8-9), and new confidence in God’s redeeming purposes and power (vs. 10). There too he found guidance and reinforcement in the crisis of his own personal obligation and opportunity to serve and save his people (vs. 11). This final petition, as Pfeiffer points out, doubtless has more of Nehemiah’s own authentic words and spirit, and fewer signs of the Chronicler’s later editorial hand, than any other part of this prayer.

For all ministers of religion who are so often asked to offer prayer on public occasions, and quite as often to counsel their parishioners in the practice of private and family devotion, there are both illumination and guidance in the apparent relation between the authentic core of Nehemiah’s brief prayer for personal help before his critical interview with the king (vs. 11) and the longer and much more liturgical prayer of collective compassion and intercession for the people of Israel thy servants (vs. 6), into which the Chronicler has expanded Nehemiah’s brief petition. As the Exeg. points out, Josephus reports a prayer of a single sentence before the interview: “How long, O Lord, wilt thou look away while our nation suffers these things, having thus become the prey and spoil of all?” Even more relevant to the actual situation is the cry for personal help in vs. 11: Give success to thy servant today, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man.

Either of these instances of what our contemporary phrase has called “ejaculatory prayer”—even if in a sudden crisis it is no more than “O Lord, help me now,” or the even briefer outcry “O God”—is the quick upprech thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man. For I was the king's cupbearer.

7 Antiquities XI. 5. 6.

success to thy servant today, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man."

Now I was cupbearer to the king.

112:1: delight, which implies eagerness or zealousness to act because one is pleased to do so (cf. Pss. 1:2; 40:8; 112:1; cf. Rom. 7:22), and fear, connoting awe and reverence before a mighty power. The biblical concept of fear of God is complex, ranging from elemental terror to the more refined emotion implied here (H. A. Brongers, "La crainte du Seigneur," in Oudtestamentische Studien, ed. P. A. H. De Boer [Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1948], V, 151-73). My name (vs. 9) signifies God himself, evidence that the Jews' unwillingness to pronounce the personal name of God had already begun to show itself (cf. Lev. 24:11).

The actual petition, appropriate in the context of 2:1-4, begins with give success. Mercy: a plural form signifying compassionate feelings (cf. Rom. 12:1; Phil. 2:1; Heb. 10:28). Under similar circumstances a Jewish writer in Egypt used almost the same expression to wish that a Persian official might find favor before the royal court (A. E. Cowley, ed., Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth Century B.C. [Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1923], No. 30, 1. 2). This man, awkward and meaningless as it stands, would be intelligible in a prayer in the context of 2:4. The man is certainly "the king" of 2:5, previously identified as Artaxerxes (2:1).

II. NEHEMIAH'S PETITION IS GRANTED (1:11b-2:8)

Nehemiah's story resumes with now in 1:11b (cf. 1:1b) but faulty verse division puts the first sentence in ch. 1 where it appears as a parenthetic comment on 1:11a. As the Peshitta shows, it is actually the beginning of the narrative in ch. 2.

11b. As royal cupbearer (cf. Gen. 40:2) Nehemiah illustrates the success of ambitious Jews of the Diaspora against whom few avenues of advancement were closed. The office, one of the oldest and highest court positions in Babylonia (Alfred Jeremias, Das Alte Testament im Lichte des Alten Orients [2nd ed.; Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1906], p. 54; Heinrich Zimmern, "Über Bäcker und Mundschken im Alteumischen," Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, LIII [1899], 115-19), remained "an honor of no small account in Persia" (Herodotus History III. 44). The cupbearer served partly of the hand of man toward God for support and guidance which gives reality and urgency to all prayer, whether short or long. Such brief and instant prayer is the elementary school in which we all begin to learn the practice of communion with God.

But when on some public or solemn occasion the minister has to lead the "great congregation" (not yet delivered from what John Bright's noble invocation calls "coldness of heart and wanderings of mind")—unto the throne of grace—the very phrase in Heb. 4:16 is a vivid symbol of the paradoxical combination of authoritative judgment and undeserved support in our human experience of God, which H. H. Farmer has finely called "absolute demand and final succour"—then the minister in that priestly function does well, like the Chronicler, to stir complacent consciences with reminders of what God always has demanded from his people, and to widen their narrow horizons out toward the perspectives of the God who is "our dwelling place in all generations," in whose sight "a thousand years . . . are but as yesterday when it is past" (Ps. 90:1, 4). And the priestly instinct of the Chronicler is likewise a sound one, which on such ceremonial occasions sent not only his thought but his very phrases back to the scriptures of their fathers, as a reminder and bequest from the spiritual heritage and the reawakened insights of their race and nation. It was some such combination of sense for the nation's religious heritage, with his own personal prophetic insight, that made Phillips Brooks's prayer at the Harvard memorial service in 1865—at which James Russell Lowell read his well-known "Commemoration Ode"—one of the abiding memories of that historic occasion for all who were present, even though the actual words of the memorable prayer were never accessible afterward.8

1:11b-2:8. The Critical Moment.—Protestant theology from Luther onward has emphasized the spiritual significance of vocation; and

670
And it came to pass in the month Nisan, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that wine was before him: and I took up the wine, and gave it unto the king. Now I had not been beforetime sad in his presence.

In the month of Nisan, in the twentieth year of King Artaxerxes, when wine was before him, I took up the wine and gave it to the king. Now I had not been sad as taster of the king’s wine and partly as guardian of the royal apartment (cf. Xenophon Cyropædia i. 3. 8-9. 11). Presumably each royal residence had its own cupbearer. Persian reliefs show the importance of the office by placing the cupbearer in attendance upon the king before the bearer of the royal weapons and just behind the crown prince (E. F. Schmidt, The Treasury of Persepolis [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1939], pp. 23-24, 26-27, Fig. 14). Beardlessness of the cupbearer, portrayed with his napkins and fly-whisk, indicates that at least from the time of Xerxes such intimate servants were eunuchs in Persia, as they were elsewhere (cf. Gen. 40:7; Josephus Antiquities XVI. 8. 1). Thus Nehemiah, too, who also served the queen (vs. 6), was a eunuch (Peter Browe, Zur Geschichte der Entmannung [Breslau: Müller & Seiffert, 1936], pp. 37 ff.; Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 314). Emasculation should have excluded him from the Jewish community (Deut. 23:1), but in postexilic times there was a tendency to include such persons. Ps. 127 has been regarded as directed against Nehemiah, and Isa. 56:3 has been considered a reply to that attack (Alfred Bertholet, Die Bücher Esra und Nehemia [Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1902; “Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum Alten Testament”], p. 48).

2:1. Artaxerxes is Artaxerxes I, Longimanus (464-423 B.C.). Arguments for the identification with Artaxerxes II, Mnmnon (404-358 B.C.), are not persuasive (H. H. Rowley, The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament [London: Lutterworth Press, 1952], pp. 137 ff., 150 ff.). The twentieth year is probably 445 B.C. The first month, Nisan (Apr. 13-May 11), marked the end of the rainy season, when luxuriantly sprouting foliage made conditions most pleasant at Susa (cf. 1:1; George Rawlinson, Biblical Topography [New York: James Pott & Co., 1887], pp. 64-65; Ezra and Nehemiah [New York: A. D. F. Randolph & Co., 1891], pp. 76-77). For three or four months (cf. 1:4), during the season of heavy rains (December-March), Nehemiah had brooded at Susa while the king was absent, presumably at his winter palace in Babylon.

For before him read with the LXX “before me,” which can mean “under my supervision” (Num. 8:22; 1 Sam. 3:1). The wine was prepared by others, but Nehemiah gave it to the king. Sad here translates the Hebrew “bad.” By stressing the pleasing appearance of Herod’s cupbearer and other intimate servants, Josephus (Antiquities XVI. 8. 1) indicates that a prime qualification for intimate royal servants was a good personal appearance. Here he interprets the Hebrew “bad” as unwashed and unkept. But vs. 2 requires “sad of face,” and it is better to read thus with the LXXL and the Vulg.

Robert L. Calhoun in God and the Common Life* has given our own generation a noble interpretation of this characteristic Protestant conviction that all “callings,” first received from and then consecrated to God, are thereby rendered sacred. The very word “calling” carries some of these deep religious overtones that are implicit in its Latin-derived synonym “vocation.” In the brief transitional sentence with which ch. 1 closes—Now I was cupbearer to the king—introducing in ch. 2 Nehemiah’s own vivid memories of the critical moment (kairos, as Tillich would call it) which opened the way for his great enterprise, the prophet gives us a glimpse of a similar conviction about his own daily work. His office as cupbearer brought him his responsibility and gave him his opportunity. Missionaries to the Far East point out that the Chinese word for “crisis” has been built up out of two shorter words meaning “danger” and “opportunity.” Both these elements were plainly present in this crisis of Nehemiah’s own life and of his people’s future.

It was the genuineness of Nehemiah’s concern for his fellow countrymen, and for the low estate

2 Wherefore the king said unto me, Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick? this is nothing else but sorrow of heart. Then I was very sore afraid,

3 And said unto the king, Let the king live for ever: why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire?

4 Then the king said unto me, For what dost thou make request? So I prayed to the God of heaven.

2. The intimate relationship between king and cupbearer is understandable in the light of the isolation imposed on the Persian ruler by court etiquette (cf. George Rawlinson, The Seven Great Monarchies of the Ancient Eastern World [New York: J. B. Alden, 1885], II, 351; Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 86). Josephus (op. cit. XI. 5. 6) sets the scene “after dinner, when the king . . . was relaxed and in a more pleasant mood than usual.” In asking Why is your face sad? (cf. Gen. 40:7) the wise king recognized that, lacking physical distress, Nehemiah’s trouble was mental. Sadness of the heart is “pain [lupe] of heart” in the LXXL Since heart signifies “mind” (cf. Ezra 6:22; 7:10), that expression would be identical with the Greek “pain of mind” used to describe “grief.” Doubtless Nehemiah was afraid of punishment or dismissal, which might be expected for disturbing the king by his unpleasant appearance.

3. The response begins with a characteristic deferential salutation for Oriental kings (cf. I Kings 1:51; Dan. 2:4; 3:9; etc.) and builds on the king’s own deduction (vs. 2). With what has been called “the eunuch’s subtlety” (Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 314), Nehemiah in his request nowhere mentions by name Jerusalem or its fortifications, for Artaxerxes had stopped building there until further orders (Ezra 4:21-22). Nehemiah required just such countermanding orders. Jerusalem he described as the place of my fathers’ sepulchres. Since all Orientals were concerned about ancestral tombs, and the king was preparing his own burial chamber among the royal Persian tombs at Naqshi-Rustam, Nehemiah may have won sympathy through such choice of words. He lightly mentions the ruined gates (cf. 1:3) but he is silent about the walls over which there had been controversy (Ezra 4:21-22).

4. The abrupt For what do you make request? gave Nehemiah the favorable opportunity he sought. His hasty prayer before answering is lost, but traces of it may be seen in 1:5-11a, especially in the words “in the sight of this man” (1:11a).

of the capital city of his fathers, that gave him his chance in this sudden crisis to intercede with the king on behalf of both. Neither habitual disconsolateness nor calculated “play acting” would have opened to him the long road toward the shaping of Jewish history so effectively as did his own quick-thinking sincerity. Social concern about the evils of our own time that gets no farther than a constant depression of spirit beneath the burden of anxiety about them, or no farther than putting on an occasional dramatic scene out of their poignancy, is liable now as then to miss its chance to change the very situation which it deplores. Every such crisis of responsibility and opportunity, as Nehemiah himself realized, is pregnant with danger to all concerned—in a democracy as well as under a despotism. Then I was very much afraid (vs. 8a).

When his great moment came, Nehemiah was prepared to put his case before the king vividly, tactfully, and briefly. He had thought so much and so clearly about it previously in private, that (like Lincoln at Gettysburg) he could now condense the situation, as he had slowly come to see it, into a memorable summary touched with personal and contagious emotion. The city, the place of my fathers’ sepulchres, lies waste. That was not the first nor yet the last time that old social evils have finally been lifted or removed by the leverage of a genuine personal 5 And I said unto the king, If it please the king, and if thy servant have found favor in thy sight, that thou wouldest send me unto Judah, unto the city of my fathers' sepulchres, that I may build it.

6 And the king said unto me, (the queen also sitting by him,) For how long shall thy journey be? and when wilt thou return? So it pleased the king to send me; and I set him a time.

5. After the prayer Nehemiah began humbly with his request, prefacing it with the deferential if it please the king (Ezra 5:17) and if your servant has found favor in your sight. The latter expression seems related to an old Hebrew formula (cf. Gen. 34:18; 41:37; 45:16; cf. Esth. 5:14). With send me unto Judah Nehemiah avoids reference to notorious Jerusalem (Ezra 4:12, 15), which was ruined and largely depopulated (cf. 11:1-2).

6. The king's answer is interrupted unexpectedly by the words the queen sitting beside him. In later rabbinical usage the word here translated queen almost never has the polite sense of "wife" but usually implies promiscuity. The LXX renders it "concubine" (pallake). But biblical usage strongly contrasts the word to those used for inferior harem women (cf. Ps. 45:9; Dan. 5:2-3, 23; cf. J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1927; "International Critical Commentary"], p. 251), and the Talmud (Rosh Hashanah 4a) usually uses it for queen. Here, as in Ps. 45:9 and in Daniel, the Vulg. translates queen. As queen she could be only Damaspa, the one legitimate queen of Artaxerxes I (cf. Ctesias Persian Fragments, sec. 44; Ernst Herzfeld, Zoroaster and His World [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1947], I, 165-69). Since palace wives never appeared in public (Plutarch Symposium I. 1; Macrobius Saturnalia VII; Aelian, Variae historiae XII. 1), the scene is an intimate one. Reference to the queen is appropriate, since feminine influences and resulting harem intrigues were strong during Artaxerxes' reign (W. W. Tarn, "Persia, from Xerxes to Alexander," in Cambridge Ancient History, VI, 2-3; Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, pp. 312, 344). According to the LXXABL and the Vulg., the queen spoke sympathetically to Nehemiah and she may have used her influence to aid him (P. H. Hunter, After the Exile [London: Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier, 1890], I, 294; Rawlinson, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 89; Rudolf Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel [2nd ed.; Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1929], III, 616). It is even conjectured that the queen sat by the king as the result of a previous arrangement with Nehemiah (Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 315).

Nehemiah could scarcely answer the question How long? since he did not know the magnitude of his task. The Hebrew text may be translated more appropriately, "When is your going?" (Batten, op. cit., p. 193). For I set him a time the Peshitta has more plausibly, "he gave me a time," which may be original (Hugo Winckler, Altoriental-
7 Moreover I said unto the king, If it please the king, let letters be given me to the governors beyond the river, that they may convey me over till I come into Judah:

8 And a letter unto Asaph the keeper of the king's forest, that he may give me timber to make beams for the gates of the palace which appertaineth to the house, and for the wall of the city, and for the house that I shall enter into. And the king granted me, according to the good hand of my God upon me.
NEHEMIAH 2:9

9 Then I came to the governors beyond the river, and gave them the king's letters. Now the king had sent captains of the army and horsemen with me.

Timber could be "trees." For palace read fortress (cf. Ezra 6:2). The fortress of the temple, defending the north approach to the temple, included the Tower of Hananel (3:1) and possibly also the Tower of the Hundred (3:1; 12:59; J. J. Simons, Jerusalem in the Old Testament [Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1952], p. 429, n. 2). Timbers were needed for the wall of the city (I Kings 7:11-12; Ezra 5:8; 6:4). Which I shall occupy interprets a literal that I shall enter into, the latter perhaps indicating a repaired house rather than a new one. Since he did not use the abode of a former governor (cf. 5:15), he may not yet have been governor. Nor did he divert labor or supplies from his main project, the city fortification, to provide for his own comfort. For according to the good hand see Ezra 7:6; 8:18, 22.

III. NEHEMIAH, GOVERNOR OF JUDEA (2:9-20)

A. ARRIVAL IN TRANS-EUPHRATIA (2:9-11)

9. The Chronicler's hand has been seen in vs. 9-10 but with insufficient reason (Torrey, loc. cit.; Batten, loc. cit.). Officers of the army accompanied Nehemiah, but since the Peshitta and the LXXI have a single officer with the horsemén, the plural form has been regarded as due to a tendency to increase the glory of Nehemiah (Gotthard, óp. cit., p. 66). The governors (cf. Ezra 5:3, 6) were apparently the deputies of the satrap of Trans-Euphratia who controlled the areas through which Nehemiah had to pass. Josephus indicates that Nehemiah picked up Jewish emigrees in Babylon who followed progress. Without these factors the "great work" could hardly come to completion.

It is evident that in vs. 6-8 the text is confused and may not be intact (see Exeg.). But in spite of such gaps, and of possible later revisions, certain characteristics of Nehemiah still shine through the account as we have it. He knew that the time element in the situation was not only urgent but short, and he accepted a definitely limited liability for his own personal participation (vs. 6). He had looked ahead in anticipation to the middle distance, the region where the plans of so many of us, like our focus of forethought, turn 'fuzzy'; he made careful provision for that middle journey (vs. 7), even though he could not see ahead all the way to the end of the road. And he took the happy outcome of this initial interview with the king as additional assurance for his faith that the good hand of my God . . . upon me would guide and support him to the end (vs. 8). So every "hero of faith" has to continue to "walk by faith, not by sight" (II Cor. 5:7), alike through success and failure, life and death.

9-11. There Are Many Adversaries.—It is an indication that we have in our present account a firm warp of Nehemiah's actual experience, as well as a woof interwoven by the Chronicler's
10 When Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, heard of it, it grieved them exceedingly that there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel.

10 But when Sanballat the Horonite and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, heard this, it displeased them greatly that someone had come to seek the welfare of the children of Israel.

him to Jerusalem. The letters (vs. 7) were given to the governors, but Josephus asserts that Nehemiah “showed the letters to God” just as he elsewhere (Antiquities X. 1. 4) insists that Hezekiah placed the letters of the Assyrian general (II Kings 19:14) “within the temple.”

10. Displeased them greatly and grieved them exceedingly both interpret the literal Hebrew text, “And it was bad for them a great badness.” Welfare (Hebrew “good”) is interpreted as “prosperity” in the Vulg. Sanballat bears the Babylonian name mdSin-uballit (K. L. Tallqvist, Neubabylonisches Namenbuch [Helsingfors: 1905], p. 276, No. 168). Men of Babylon, Cutha, and other Babylonian cities were settled in North Israel (II Kings 17:24, 29-31). Sanballat is associated with Samaria (4:2) and Josephus (Antiquities IX. 14. 3) regularly calls the Samaritans “Cutheans.” The Hebrew names of his sons (Deliah and Shelemiah; Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, No. 30, l. 29; cf. Neh. 6:10; 7:62 and 3:30; 13:13), like the Samaritan attempt to worship with the Jews (Ezra 4:1-2), are doubtless due to Jewish missionary activity in Samaria (II Kings 17:26-28). The Horonite is perhaps an epithet linking Sanballat with Beth-horon of Ephraim (modern Beit ‘Ur et-Tahta and Beit ‘Ur el-Foqâ), commanding the most difficult passages of the ancient road from Jerusalem to Lydda and the seacoast (F. M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine [Paris: J. Gabalda, 1938], II, 98, 220; W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book [London: Thomas Nelson & Sons, 1880], pp. 533, 670). Its site was strategic for keeping in touch with Jewish affairs without neglecting Samaria where he was “governor.” It is straining credulity too far to assume that another Sanballat lived under similar circumstances in the time of Alexander the Great (Isaac Spak, Der Bericht des Joesphus uber Alexander den Grossen [Königsberg: Hartung, 1911]: C. C. Torrey, “Sanballat ‘The Horonite,’” Journal of Biblical Literature, XLVII [1928], 384, 386). Too many coincidences are essential to such a view (Cowley, op. cit., p. 110; Ralph Marcus, tr., Josephus [Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1927; “Loeb Classical Library”], IV, 498-511).

Tobiah is the Hebrew equivalent of Tabe-el (Ezra 4:7). The Ammonite indicates residence in Trans-Jordan, just north of ancient Moab. The family of Tobiah was prominent in Ammon down to Hellenistic times (C. C. Edgar, “Selected Papyri from the Archives of Zenon,” Annales du Service des Antiquités, XVIII [1918], 164-66; 231-32; Hugo Gressmann, Die ammonitischen Tobiaiden [Berlin: W. de Gruyter, 1921], pp. 663-71; H. Willrich, “Zur Geschichte der Tobiaiden,” Archiv für Papyrsforschung, VII [1924], 61-64). The homestead of the Tobiah family was found at ‘Araq el-Emir, about a dozen miles east of the Jordan and about ten miles northwest of ancient Heshbon, Moab (Josephus Antiquities XII. 4. 11; H. C. Butler, Ancient Architecture in Syria [Leyden: E. J. Brill, 1907], I, 1-25; Carl Watzinger, Denkmaler Palästinas [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1935], Vol. II, Pl. XXII). The name Tobiah found carved there may be dated as early as the time of the Tobiah who was contemporary with Nehemiah (B. Maisler, בית טוביאס (“The House of Tobias”), Tarbiz, XII [1941], 109-23; Marcus, op. cit., VII, 117, note c). The puzzling epithet the servant does not indicate subservience to Sanballat (as proposed by Rudolph, Esra und Nehemia, p. 109) but rather to the Persian king, apparently as the highest Persian official over Ammon (Albrecht Alt, idealizing hand, that in spite of the letters and soldiers the king had given him, enemies of his cause appeared even before he reached Jerusalem. Their names and residences are explicitly given. There is a distinct hint of what we moderns should be tempted to call anti-Semitism in the attitude of these non-Jewish neighbors (cf. vs. 20c) as it is stated in vs. 10. 676
11 So I came to Jerusalem, and was there three days.
12 And I arose in the night, I and some few men with me; neither told I any man what my God had put in my heart to do at Jerusalem: neither was there any beast with me, save the beast that I rode upon.

"Judas Nachbarn zur Zeit Nehemias, Palästinajahrbuch, XXVII [1931], 70). Gashmu the Arabian (cf. vs. 19) may have borne the same title. He has been regarded as a "governor" of Trans-Jordan (Ernst Sellin, Geschichte des israelitisch-judischen Volkes [Leipzig: Quelle & Meyer, 1932], II, 152), as a deputy of a higher "governor" or satrap. Such officials functioned like the later ethnarchs of whom Origen (Epistle to Africanus XIV) claims that the ethnarch of Palestine in his day was "differing in nothing from a king." Nebuchadrezzar's vassals were called his "servants" (II Kings 24:1, 10-11) and Darius, in the Behistun inscription, calls his officials "subject" (Persian bandaka), which becomes "servant" (gallā) in the Babylonian version and "servant" or "slave" (םונע misspelled for פְּלִיו) in the Aramaic version (Cowley, op. cit., pp. 253, 259, restoration in Aramaic Behistun inscription, Col. III, l. 38). The name "Castle of the Servant" (Qasr il-ʿAbd), now applied to the fortress 'Araq el-Emir, might possibly preserve the earlier title servant and not derive from the legend of the black slave and the emir's daughter, as recorded by C. R. Conder (Heth and Moab [3rd ed.; London: Macmillan & Co., 1892], p. 363).

The arrival of Nehemiah with royal support disturbed the foes of the Jews because it meant a delimitation of the powers they may have previously exercised, possibly as nonresident governors supervising Judaea. Upon arrival, Nehemiah rested for three days (cf. Ezra 8:32).

B. Inspection of the City Wall (2:12-15)

After three days Nehemiah secretly set out to assess the damage to the city wall and the magnitude of the task of reconstruction. Upon his arrival he probably approached from the north and noted the state of the walls there. He appears to have resided in the southwestern part of the city, where he could have examined the western wall for three days. Thus he set forth with a small group secretly, moving counterclockwise, to examine the southern and eastern walls.

12. Inspection in the night could be done only in bright moonlight (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 110; cf. vs. 15). I told no one refers to the Jews who had not yet been told of Nehemiah's identity or purpose. For at Jerusalem the M.T. has, lit., "to Jerusalem" (as in LXXL) or for Jerusalem. The few men were his servants since they were unmounted. The Peshitta explains that they "had come with" Nehemiah but there is nothing to indicate that Hanani (cf. 1:2) was in the group (Batten, op. cit., p. 199). The Hebrew for beast merely means a domestic animal (cf. Gen. 1:24-25), without defining its kind. A single mounted rider accompanied by servants on foot would draw less attention than a mounted party.

11-16. First Count the Cost.—Whatever may have been Nehemiah's own thinking in advance, however careful his formulation of a program for his mission, he took time enough after his arrival in Jerusalem to look around for himself; and he supplemented what others had told him about the actual situation by firsthand investigations of his own. The story of his secret midnight inspection of the ruined walls is one of the most vivid accounts of personal experience in the O.T., and its sharpness of detail, as he recalls what befell him and the animal he rode, persuades us that we have here what his own observant eye saw through the darkness, rather than any "tendentious" generalities and inventions of the Chronicler. Nehemiah was canny enough not to tell even the leaders of his own party what he had in mind until he had looked over the ground carefully himself, just as he had been canny enough in his interview with 13 And I went out by night by the gate of the valley, even before the dragon well, and to the dung port, and viewed the walls of Jerusalem, which were broken down, and the gates thereof were consumed with fire, but the beast on which I rode. 13 I went out by night by the Valley Gate to the Jackal’s Well and to the Dung Gate, and I inspected the walls of Jerusalem which were broken down and its gates which had been de-

13. The Valley Gate, important in the fortification of Jerusalem (cf. II Chr. 26:9), has been located by scholars on various sides of the city (cf. Simons, op. cit., pp. 124-25). Since the Valley (Hebrew gate) invariably means the Valley of Hinnom (Wadi er-Rabâbeh), to the south of Jerusalem, the Valley Gate was certainly in the south wall, opening toward that valley. But the exact location in the south wall is uncertain since there is a dispute as to whether the southwestern hill of Jerusalem was occupied so early. As a result of the latest excavation on the hill, it is concluded that “while the pottery would go to show that the western hill was inhabited at least towards the end of the Monarchy, it has still to be established that it was fortified then, for no well-dated masonry of that period has yet come to light” (C. N. Johns, “The Citadel, Jerusalem,” The Quarterly of the Department of Antiquities in Palestine, XIV [1950], 152). The fact that the earliest fortification found there is early Hellenistic (ibid., pp. 127 ff.; 150 ff.) has supported the view of those who insist that in the time of Nehemiah the city was confined to the southeastern hill (J. Germer-Durand, Topographie de l'ancienne Jérusalem [Jerusalem: Hôtelierie de Notre-Dame de France, 1925]; Albrecht Alt, “Das Taltor von Jerusalem,” Palästinajahrbuch, XXIV [1928], 74-98; Kurt Gallig, “Jerusalem,” Biblisches Reallexikon [Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1937; “Handbuch zum Alten Testament”], pp. 297-309; W. F. Albright, “Excavations at Jerusalem,” Jewish Quarterly Review, XVI [1930-31], 167: “Recent Works on the Topography and Archaeology of Jerusalem,” ibid., XXII [1931-32], 414-16). The discovery of a strong early wall on the western side of the southeast hill has further strengthened the one-hill hypothesis (J. W. Crowfoot and G. M. Fitzgerald, Excavations in the Tyropoeon Valley, Jerusalem, 1927 [London: Palestine Exploration Fund, 1927]). But the archaeological evidence, contrary though it appears, need not yet be regarded as conclusive since but little excavation has been done on the southwestern hill and the wall on the western rim of the southeastern hill may be merely evidence of persistent circumvallation of the royal compound on Ophel (Simons, op. cit., p. 126). Moreover, scriptural allusions and other considerations make it probable that the southwestern hill was walled in the late pre-exilic times (ibid., pp. 226-81). As Simons has indicated, “Not only the number of gates to be placed along the circumference of the city, but more especially the problem of the site of the Valley Gate is an insuperable obstacle to the one-hill-theory, every form of which so far devised is forced to detach it from the Hinnom Valley, to which its name inseparably unites it” (ibid., p. 281).

The Valley Gate is perhaps best located in the south wall, close to the southwest corner, in the same relative position as the later gate found by F. J. Bliss (Excavations at Jerusalem [London: Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund, 1898], pp. 16 ff., Pl. II, pp. 342-44; Simons, op. cit., pp. 279-80; Mitchell, “Wall of Jerusalem,” p. 112). According to 3:13 the so-called Dung Gate lay about one thousand cubits (about fifteen hundred feet) from the Valley Gate. At a little greater distance to the east from the Bliss Gate (about nineteen hundred feet), at the terminus of the southern wall and exactly at the mouth of the central (Tyropoeon) valley and on its western slope, a massive gate has been found (Bliss, op. cit., pp. 88 ff., Pl. X; Simons, op. cit., pp. 123-24, 162; Mitchell, op. cit., p. 114). The ancient Dung Gate, if in a similar position, thus lay on the road down the Tyropoeon Valley on which the modern Dung Gate (Bâb el-Mughāribeh) opens. The Bliss wall, to be sure, is later than the time of Nehemiah, but it has been claimed that “besides the hypothesis of a wall earlier than that of Bliss on a slightly more restricted line, there is also the possibility that the wall of Bliss itself replaced a much earlier one along the same course” (Simons, op. cit., p. 272). Thus the position of the Zion Gate (Báb en-Nebi Dáud) appears to be “a successor to the Gate of the Essenes and the Valley Gate on a more restricted course of the city-wall” (ibid., p. 280, n. 1). The Dung Gate is more accurately the “Refuse Gate,” since Dung translates a word equated with “dust” in poetic parallelism (cf. Ps. 113:7; I Sam. 2:8), and the gate is doubtless identical with the “Gate of the Potsherdls” of Jer. 19.2a.

678
14 Then I went on to the gate of the fountain, and to the king’s pool: but there was no place for the beast that was under me to pass.

Mentioned between the Valley Gate and the Dung Gate is the dragon well, which is found nowhere else in the Bible. It may be a popular name for a well elsewhere designated differently. It is better to read with the M.T., LXXI, and Vulg., dragon (tannin; cf. Gen. 1:20-21; Ps. 74:13; Ezek. 29:3; 32:2) rather than Jackal’s (tannin; Mic. 1:8; Lam. 4:3) since the mythical monster in ancient as in modern times was believed to lie within rivers, pools, or springs, especially when the waters tasted medicinal (cf. Ezek. 32:2) or were intermittent in their flow (cf. Strabo Geography XVI. 2. 7; Josephus Jewish Wars V. 3. 2; W. Robertson Smith, Lectures on the Religion of the Semites [3rd ed.; New York: The Macmillan Co., 1927], pp. 168-69, 171-72; Edward Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinai and Arabia Petraea [New York: J. Leavitt, 1841], I, 507). The well was probably En-rogel, lying deep in the valley, at the juncture of the Kidron and Hinnom valleys, where the “Serpent’s Stone” (I Kings 1:9) was also located. It is also called the “Well of Nehemiah” because of the tradition that he retrieved from it the sacred fire of the temple that had been concealed within it during the Exile (II Macc. 1:19-22; ibid., I, 491, n. 1). Since Nehemiah followed the wall and did not descend to the valley floor, the translation to the... Well is wrong. The complex Hebrew preposition “to the front of” indicates that he passed the wall at a point opposite the well. The LXXI translates “opposite” (kata prosôpon); the Vulg. and Peshitta read “before.”

14. The Fountain Gate, lit., “the Gate of the Spring;” led to a spring much used by the city. Opinion is divided as to whether it was the Gihon Spring or En-rogel (cf. vs. 13) but the latter seems most likely. The gate is probably to be identified with the ancient gate found before the stairs of the City of David (cf. 3:15), discovered at the southeastern corner of the city (Raymond Weill, La cité de David [Paris: Paul Geuthner, 1920], pp. 120, 128; Hugues Vincent, “Notes and Queries,” Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement for 1926, pp. 160-62; Simons, op. cit., pp. 121-24, 449). The King’s Pool has been sought both within the city wall (Alt, “Das Taltor von Jerusalem,” pp. 92 ff.) and in the Kidron Valley outside of it (Galling, Biblisches Reallexikon, p. 305). Its name has caused it to be sought in the valley southeast of the city near the king’s garden (3:15), as a basin fed by a canal from the Gihon Spring (Simons, op. cit., pp. 192-93). Many have identified it with the “Lower Pool” or “Pool of Shiloah” (cf. 3:15; Birket el Hamra), lying within the city wall just before the Fountain Gate at the end of the central valley (Gustav Dalman, “Die Wasserversorgung des ältesten Jerusalem,” Palästinajahrbuch, XIV [1918], 65 ff.; J. Fischer, “Die Quellen und Teiche des Biblischen Jerusalem,” Das Heilige Land, LXXVII [1983], 97; Weill, op. cit., p. 94). But the King’s Pool lay beyond the Fountain Gate, which is mentioned before it. A rock-cut basin in front of the Gihon Spring (the Spring of the Stairs, ‘Ain Umm ed-Deraj, the Fountain of the Virgin) would meet the requirements (Edward Robinson, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 311, n. 5, p. 499; Hugues Vincent, “La cité de David,” Revue Biblique, XXX [1921], 567-69).

the king not to stress the connection of his plans with the city of Jerusalem, about which the king had evidently received unfriendly information. Here again is the combination of careful planning with religious vision and faith which was so steadily characteristic of this man of action.
15 Then went I up in the night by the brook, and viewed the wall, and turned back, and entered by the gate of the valley, and so returned.

16 And the rulers knew not whither I went, or what I did; neither had I as yet told it to the Jews, nor to the priests, nor to the nobles, nor to the rulers, nor to the rest that did the work.

17 ¶ Then said I unto them, Ye see the distress that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste, and the gates thereof are burned with fire: come, and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem, that we be not more a reproach.

15. Beyond the King's Pool the walls approached the precipitous side of the Kidron Valley, the deep ravine running east of the city (I Macc. 12:37). By the brook is meant the torrent bed of the Kidron stream which gives the valley its name. Since the valley floor rises gradually north of the Virgin's Spring, went up correctly describes northward progress. It is debatable whether Nehemiah continued around the city (Ernst Bertheau, Die Bücher Esra, Nechemia und Ester, ed. Victor Ryssel [2nd ed.; Leipzig: S. Hirzel, 1887; "Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament"], p. 148; Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 528; Simons, op. cit., p. 444; and with some doubts Bernhard Stade, Geschichte des Volkes Israel [Berlin: G. Groote, 1888], II, 166) or turned back the way he came (Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 52; Alt, "Das Taltor von Jerusalem," p. 91; Rudolph, Esra und Nehemia, p. 112). Practical experience has shown that he could not profitably continue to inspect the walls from the valley even on a moonlight night (Selah Merrill, Ancient Jerusalem [New York: Fleming H. Revell, 1908], pp. 341-42).

C. NEHEMIAH'S ANNOUNCEMENT TO THE LEADERS (2:16-18)

Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 7) omits the secret inspection of the walls and claims that on his arrival Nehemiah gathered "all of the people" to Jerusalem and addressed them "in the middle of the temple court." The Bible indicates that he did not inform the Jewish leaders regarding his authority and plans until after his inspection of the walls.

16. The rulers (cf. Ezra 9:2) were the local officials, probably non-Jewish deputies in the city. The Jews is an inclusive term, covering the specified classes of leaders. Nobles means "freemen" and the LXX uses here the word (tois entimoi) employed by Xenophon to designate Persian nobles. With the nobles Nehemiah usually links the rulers, the politicians and bureaucrats who governed the people directly (cf. Ezra 9:2). Generally the leaders are balanced against "the rest of the people" (4:14, 19) but here is found "the rest of the doing of the work" or preferably, with other Hebrew MSS and the Peshitta, "the rest of those doing the work." That were to do the work is interpretative, anticipating work on the wall (5:16), limiting the group unreasonably. The reference is probably to the administrative personnel, those in charge of the business (Esth. 3:9; 9:3; I Chr. 29:6; Heinrich Kaupel, "Der Sinn von שחרי המלך in Neh. 2, 16," Biblica, XXI [1940], 40-44; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 110). Nehemiah got in touch with the people through the aristocrats and government officials.

17. Josephus indicates that the distress of Jerusalem was due to the ill will of its neighbors, whereas the M.T. finds it due to physical damages to the fortifications of the city (cf. 1:3).
18. Characteristic terminology of Nehemiah is seen in the hand (vs. 8: 1:10), indicating divine guidance: my God (vv. 8, 12; 5:19; 6:14; etc.); and upon me for good (vs. 8; cf. Ezra 9:12). The king's words refer to the entire scene of vss. 4-8. For Let us rise up and build the M.T. has “We will arise and build,” which is more resolute. The expression strengthened their hands (cf. 6:9; Ezra 4:4) seems parallel to the Akkadian kunnu qattē (“to make hands fast”) which, when used with an infinitive (cf. Ezra 6:22), means “to prepare to do something” (cf. Carl Bezold, Babylonisch-Assyrisches Glossar [Heidelberg: C. Winter, 1926], p. 135, col. 1, s.v. kānu, III, 1). Here the Peshitta has “to do good”; Josephus concludes, “And the Jews prepared for the work.”

D. Conflict with Neighboring Officials (2:19-20)

19. In addition to Sanballat and Tobiah (vs. 10) as an enemy of the Jews is Geshem the Arabian (also called “Gashmu” in 6:6). Arabic names suggest Gushamū (Julius Euting, Sinaitische Inschriften [Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1891], pp. 10-11; Theodor Nöldeke, “Weihhausen’s Reste arabischen Heidenthumes,” Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, XLI [1887], 715, n. 1). An official mentioned in first place in the date formula of a Lihyanite Arabian inscription found at Hegra (cf. F. V. Winnett, A Study of the Lihyanite and Thamudic Inscriptions [Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1937], pp. 14, 16, 50-51) has been identified with the Geshem of vs. 19 (H. Grimme, “Beziehungen zwischen dem Staate der Lihjān und dem Achāmenidenreich,” Orientalische Literaturzeitung, XLIV [1941], 343; Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 295; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 112-15). The ‘Abd which follows the name may be another example of the title “the servant” (cf. vs. 10), designating him as the highest Persian official of the Arabian district (Alt, “Judas Nachbarn zur Zeit Nehemias,” pp. 73 ff.). The Arabian is an administrative rather than ethnic term, indicating the province of Arabia which, during the Persian period, incorporated the earlier land of Edom, to the south of Judah, about which Nehemiah is strangely silent (Abel, Géographie, II, 122-23). Edomites have been regarded as “Arabs” in the later period (Gustav Hölscher, Palästina in der persischen und hellenistischen Zeit [Berlin: Weidmann, 1903], pp. 19 ff.). During the Exilic period Edom was an aggressive neighbor (Mal. 1:2-5; Obad. 1-21; Lam. 4:1-22; I Esdras 4:48-56; S. A. Cook, “First Esdras,” in R. H. Charles, ed., The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha [Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1913], I, 13; “The Inauguration of Judaism,” in Cambridge Ancient History, VI, 176-88; R. H. include in his call to action a reference to the support of the king, and above all to the hand of my God which had been upon me for good; their response echoes like an antiphonal trumpet, Let us rise up and build. His courage and faith quickened them into resolution and confidence.

19b-20. Derision and Threat. — As so often in crises, with the progress of the enterprise came stiffening of the opposition. Now it is charges of political rebellion and treason that Nehemiah and his followers have to face, as well as the ridicule that a “despised minority” often finds even harder to meet than misrepr
20 Then answered I them, and said unto them, The God of heaven, he will prosper us; therefore we his servants will arise and build: but ye have no portion, nor right, nor memorial, in Jerusalem.

3 Then Eliashib the high priest rose up with his brethren the priests, and they builded the sheep gate; they sanctified it, against the king? 20 Then I replied to them, “The God of heaven will make us prosper, and we his servants will arise and build: but you have no portion or right or memorial in Jerusalem.”

Then Eliashib the high priest rose up with his brethren the priests and they 20. The God of Heaven will make us prosper indicates Nehemiah's sense of mission (cf. vss. 8b, 18a) with divine as well as royal support. And we his servants, supported by the Vulg., is less exact than therefore we his servants, which links the servanthood (1:10) more directly with the divine support which promises success. We . . . will arise usually initiates an action which is then more fully specified (cf. Ezra 1:5). But draws a sharp contrast between the industrious Jews and their watching opponents. Portion, “part” or “share,” indicates possession of property. Right has the technical sense of “just claim” (H. E. Ryle, The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1893; “Cambridge Bible”], p. 171; Carl Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901; “Handkommentar zum Alten Testament”], p. 79; Bertholet, loc. cit.), or even “authority” (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 204), referring to legal right of possession or even the assumption of authority such as the neighbors claimed before Nehemiah's arrival. Memorial is, lit., “remembrance.” There was not to remain, even in the memory of man, a shred of evidence that the opponents ever had any connection with the Jewish territory.

IV. BUILDING THE WALL OF JERUSALEM (3:1-4:23)

Ch. 3 is clearly intrusive in the Nehemiah document, interrupting the narrative which is then resumed in ch. 4. Its literary style, unlike Nehemiah’s, has been likened to that of the Chronicler, and some (e.g., Torrey, Composition, p. 37) have regarded him as the editor who introduced the list. But evidence of such authorship is by no means clear, and the chapter is not a worthless fiction by the Chronicler, as is sometimes assumed. It preserves important topographic data, including local landmarks, of the Jerusalem of Nehemiah’s day, and mentions important persons and settlements which were active in the reconstruction of the city. Despite its information, however, the actual extent of the city and the exact location of the walls, gates, and other phenomena cannot be determined with certainty (cf. 2:13). Nor is it always possible to discover whether the gates mentioned were in the city wall or somewhere within the city (cf. vss. 28-30).

A complete circuit of the city wall is described, in counterclockwise fashion, from the Sheep Gate to the Sheep Gate. Nevertheless, because of a shift in formula and narrow and sharply exclusive particularism with which his confession of religious faith concludes, we can at least see that this attitude was no small factor in his success at that time, whatever seeds of trouble it planted for his successors to this day.

3:1-32. A Record of Co-operative Accomplishment.—As the Exeg. points out, this lengthy and set up the doors of it: even unto the tower of Meah they sanctified it, unto the tower of Hananeel.

Built the Sheep Gate. They consecrated it and set its doors: they consecrated it as far as the Tower of the Hundred, as far as the emphasis (cf. vs. 13) the unity of the chapter has been questioned. The first part describes the course of the wall by listing in succession the workmen assigned to its repair, while the latter part generally describes the assignments on the wall by reference to nearby landmarks. But the apparent shift in formulas may be a literary device to relieve the monotony in a long list (cf. Millar Burros, "Nehemiah 3:1-32 as a Source for the Topography of Ancient Jerusalem," Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research, XIV [1933-34], 116-21), and the increasing reference to landmarks may indicate merely that the northern and western parts of the city were residential while the older eastern part of the city, where such public features as the water works, the royal compound, and the temple area were located, abounded in familiar and significant landmarks.

A. WORKERS ON THE WALL (3:1-32)

1. THE NORTH WALL (3:1-5)

3:1. Eliashib the high priest (cf. 12:10-11) is important as a contemporary of Nehemiah, in demonstrating the chronological priority of Nehemiah (cf. Ezra 10:6; Intro., p. 562). Close to the temple area the priests are expected. The circuit of the walls begins (vs. 1) and ends (vs. 32) with the Sheep Gate, located close to the northeastern corner of the city. There was the market (vss. 31-32) where animals could be bought for sacrifices (cf. John 5:2). Between the Sheep Gate and the Fish Gate (vs. 3) lay the "fortress of the temple" (cf. 2:8) guarding the relatively weak northern approach to the city (cf. 2:8; 7:2). Part of the fortress was the Tower of the Hundred. Some follow the Vulg. in considering the hundred as a dimension in cubits (Gustaf Dalman, Jerusalem und sein Gelände [Gütersloh: C. Bertelsmann, 1930], p. 115), but it probably has military significance as the headquarters of the centurion in charge of his hundred.
Officers over hundreds are found in the early period (cf. II Sam. 18:1; II Kings 11:4), in the Persian period (Cowley, Aramaic Paapyri, No. 2, I. 11; No. 3, I. 11; No. 22, II. 19.20), and into Roman times (Matt. 8:5; Mark 15:39; Luke 7:2; Acts 27:43). The Tower of Hananel (cf. 12:39; Jer. 31:38; Zech. 14:10) apparently stood near the northwest corner of the temple area, at the most northerly point of the city, "where the Mishneh Wall [Zeph. 1:10] crossed the crest of the ridge which was later called Bezetha" (Simons, Jerusalem in the O.T., p. 343). The fortress was later the site of the Maccabean Baris (Josephus Antiquities XV. 11. 4; Jewish War I. 3. 3), and the Herodian Antonia (Josephus Antiquities XVIII. 4. 3; Jewish War I. 401), at the northwestern corner of the present Haram area (Mitchell, "Wall of Jerusalem," p. 144). Josephus (Jewish War V.
5. 8) indicates that Herod's fortress also had a tower at each of its ends.

Built (cf. vss. 2, 13-15), used almost always of work on the gates, implies considerable construction. Since it is only in the north wall that both the walls and gates are built, it is apparent that the greatest damage was suffered at that vulnerable place. Elsewhere the word "repaired" is used. The priests there sanctified the restored wall. Because such action is not described elsewhere until the general consecration (12:27 ff.), it is proposed to read ו they sanctified it (cf. vss. 3, 6) for ו they timbered it (Torrey, Composition, p. 38; Siegfried, loc. cit.; Bertholet, op. cit., p. 53); similarly, Arnold B. Ehrlich, Randglossen zur hebräischen Bibel [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1914], VII, 188, who reads ו ו
But the conjecture is textually unsupported and such action by the priests in the temple area is understandable (cf. I Kings 8:64).
2 And next unto him builded the men of Jericho. And next to them builded Zaccur the son of Imri.

3 But the fish gate did the sons of Hassenah build, who also laid the beams thereof, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.

4 And next unto them repaired Meremoth the son of Urijah, the son of Koz. And next unto them repaired Meshullam the son of Berechiah, the son of Meshezabel. And next unto them repaired Zadok the son of Baana.

Tower of Hanan'cl. 2 And next to him the men of Jericho built. And next to them Zaccur the son of Imri built.

3 And the sons of Hassenah built the Fish Gate; they laid its beams and set its doors, its bolts, and its bars. 4 And next to them Mer'emoth the son of Uri'jah, son of Hakkoz repaired. And next to them Meshuil'lam the son of Berechiah, son of Meshez'abel repaired. And next to them

* Heb him

2. The phrase next unto him (vss. 8, 10, 12, 17, 19) or next to them (vss. 4-5, 7, 9-10) introduces the workmen on the walls in proper succession. Next, lit., “at hand,” like Akkadian “to hand” (ana id), means “at the side of” or “beside” (cf. Num. 13:29; Exod. 2:5), but its use in a series is only in late Hebrew (Num. 34:3; Judg. 11:26; Job 1:14; II Chr. 17:15-16, 18; 31:15). Unto him refers to Eliashib (vs. 1) but because of the priests (vs. 1) the LXX has them. Such disagreement in number is frequent in the list (cf. vss. 12, 23, 29, 4, 5, 10) as attention shifts from the leader to his workmen. Men of Jericho: Cf. Ezra 2:34. Zaccur: Cf. Ezra 8:14. Imri abbreviates Amariah (10:3; 11:4; Ezra 7:3), as the LXX and Vulg. show.

3. For Hassenah the Vulg., Peshitta, and most Greek texts have Sennaah (cf. Ezra 2:35). Since he was a remote ancestor, as usual in this list, read “descendants of” for sons of. The Fish Gate (12:39; Zeph. 1:10) was the port of entry for fish from the seacoast. The exact location depends upon the extent of the city (cf. 2:13). Those who confine it to the southeastern hill locate it, as the Corner Gate (Jer. 31:38) where the wall bends southward, at the western city wall (Kurt Galling, “Archäologischer Jahresbericht,” Zeitschrift des deutschen Palästina-vereins, LIV [1931], pp. 87-88). More likely, since the Phoenicians controlled the fish trade (15:16), it was located like the modern Damascus Gate (Bāb el-'Amūd) in the north wall, where the central (Tyropoeon) valley entered the city (Simons, op. cit., p. 291, n. 8). Thus it was identical with the “Middle Gate” (Jer. 39:1-3) in the middle of the north wall (Mitchell, loc. cit.). Laid the beams describes the timbering of the gate frames. Set up the doors, which was a later operation (cf. 6:1), indicates the relatively late date of the list. Bolts were the metal strips fixed to the gates into which the bars (I Kings 4:13; Isa. 45:2) were placed.

4. The family of the priest Meremoth had been deprived of its status (cf. Ezra 2:59-61), but he later received the things brought to the temple by Ezra (Ezra 8:33). Thus he had apparently achieved his priestly status in the interim. His double assignment on the wall (cf. vs. 21) has been regarded as the means by which his priestly rights were regained (Aage Bentzen, “Priesterschaft und Laien in der jüdischen gemeinde des fünften Jahrhunderts,” Archiv für Orientforschung, VI [1930-31], 285), but it is unlikely that the status could be obtained so easily. Meshullam (cf. vs. 30; Ezra 8:16) was the father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (cf. 6:18). Meshezabel, his ancestor, bears the Babylonian name Mššezīzib-ду. Zadok abbreviates Zedekiah or Jehozadek. Baana was his remote ancestor (cf. Ezra 2:2). Instead of “built” (cf. vs. 3) the action is here repaired, family connections so dear to his editorial heart; but it seems to “preserve authentic data,” and as Pfeiffer also notes, it “is an invaluable source for the topography of ancient Jerusalem.”

Unfamiliar as its long lists of names and places must sound in our restless modern ears, this chapter remains a literary symbol of the careful division of labor and of the efficient co-operation of many individuals and groups that combined to make possible the rapid completion of this “great work.” As in all large

684
5 And next unto them the Tekoites repaired: but their nobles put not their necks to the work of their Lord.

6 Moreover the old gate repaired Jehoiada the son of Paseah, and Meshullam the son of Besodeiah; they laid the beams thereof, and set up the doors thereof, and the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.

lit., “made strong,” which, as the LXXI and Peshitta show, means “strengthened,” “restored,” or “fortified.”

5 The Tekoites were from Tekoa (Amos 1:1), modern Teqū, about eleven miles south of Jerusalem or five miles south of Bethlehem. Use of a different word here for nobles (נוהוים) from that employed by Nehemiah (נוהים) may indicate an author other than Nehemiah. Put their necks to is an agricultural figure of an ox plunging its neck into the yoke to move a heavy load (cf. Jer. 27:11-12), indicating voluntary co-operative effort in the task. Instead of “yoke”' the M.T. has the work of. For “their lords” of the M.T., which could refer to Nehemiah and his foremen (Siegfried, op. cit., p. 80; Bertholet, loc. cit.), the Complutensian Polyglot text has “their lord,” which could mean Nehemiah (cf. Ezra 10:5; Jer. 27:11-12; Gotthard, Text des Nehemia, p. 78; Rudolph, Esra und Nehemia, p. 116). The Vulg. with “their Lord” and the LXXI with “the Lord” refer to God but since “Lord” as surrogate for God is found elsewhere only with the pronoun “our” (Ehrlich, op. cit., p. 189), the M.T. plural is preferable, referring to those supervising the work (cf. vs. 27). The nobles spurned subservience and menial labor.

2 The West Wall (3:6-12)

6 The Old Gate, as translated by the Vulg. and Peshitta, is grammatically impossible. The M.T. is, lit., “the Gate of the Old,” to which some such substantive as “city,” “wall,” or “pool” must be appended. But nouns cannot be applied at will (Rudolph, loc. cit.) and it is unlikely that the substantive would be lost in two widely separated places (here and 12:39; Simons, op. cit., p. 276). Greek texts transliterate it as a proper name which has been identified with the “Jeshanah” of II Chr. 13:19 and the Isana of Josephus (Antiquities VIII. 11. 3; XIV. 15. 12), the modern Burj el-Isāneh on the Nablus Road, about twenty miles north of Jerusalem (W. F. Albright, “New Identifications of Ancient Towns,” Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 9 [1923], pp. 7-8; Abel, Géographie, II, 364; Gallling, Bibliaes Reallexikon, p. 304). Thus, like the Damascus Road, the gate is named for the major place toward which its road led and has been identified with the “Gate of Ephraim” (8:16; 12:39; cf. II Kings 14:19), which is missing in ch. 3 (Hugues Vincent, “Les murs de Jérusalem d’après Néhémie,” Revue Biblique, XIII [1904], 66-67; Dalman, Jerusalem, p. 296; Otto Procksch, “Das Jerusalem Jesajas,” Palästinajahrbuch, XXVI [1930], 28; E. J. Fischer, “Die Mauern und Tore des biblischen Jerusalem,” Theologische Quartalschrift, CXIII [1932], 225). But because the “Jeshanah Gate” precedes the Ephraim Gate by at least one section of wall, it has been regarded as a separate gate and some propose to emend the name to מַשְׁנָה, “the Mishneh,” instead of מַשְׁנָה, “the Jeshanah” (cf. Vincent, “Les murs de Jérusalem,” pp. 62, 67; Simons, op. cit., p. 306), and to locate it, opening northward, at the head of what Josephus calls “the southern portion” of the Mishneh Wall, the north-south wall which formed part of the western boundary of the city (Simons, op. cit., pp. 305-6, 448, Fig.

human enterprises to this day, there are plain hints of disaffection here and there. The aristocrats of Tekoa (Amos’ home town) seem to have fallen down badly: Their nobles did not put their necks to the work of their Lord (vs. 5b). Nevertheless one senses through this roster of workers, so carefully catalogued by name, a pride of residence (cf. vs. 2a), a pride of heritage (cf. vs. 2b), and toward the end a pride of calling (vss. 31-32). Nehemiah evidently knew 7 And next unto them repaired Melatiah the Gibeonite, and Jadon the Meronothite, the men of Gibeon, and of Mizpah, unto the throne of the governor on this side the river. 8 Next unto him repaired Uzziel the son of Harhaiah, of the goldsmiths. Next unto him also repaired Hananiah the son of one of its doors, its bolts, and its bars. 7 And next to them repaired Melat'ah the Gibeonite and Jadon the Meronothite, the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah, who were under the jurisdiction of the governor of the province Beyond the River. 8 Next to them Uzziel the son of Harhai'ah, goldsmiths, repaired.

56). Joiada was a “descendant” of Paseah (Ezra 2:49) and Besodeiah has a name of Babylonian type similar to that of Bezalel (Ezra 10:30). 7. Gibeon is a mound beside modern Ej-Jib, about six miles northwest of Jerusalem (W. F. Albright, “Recent Works on the Topography and Archaeology of Jerusalem,” Jewish Quarterly Review XXII [1931-32], 415-16; Dalman, Jerusalem, pp. 218 ff.). Meronoth (I Chr. 27:30) is identified with Beit Unia, about three miles north-northwest of Gibeon (Abel, op. cit., II, Map VII). Tell en-Nasbeh, about eight miles north of Jerusalem, meets all topographic requirements for Mizpah (cf. James Muilenburg, “Survey of the Literature on Tell en-Nasbeh,” in C. C. McCown, ed., Tell en-Nasbeh, Archaeological and Historical Results [Berkeley and New Haven: Palestine Institute of the Pacific School of Religion and The American Schools of Oriental Research, 1947], pp. 18-49; Abel, op. cit., II, 335). Unto the throne suggests a terminus for an assignment, but another Hebrew word is used for unto with other termini (cf. vss. 1, 8, 13, 15). Because the M.T. can mean “at the chair,” it is suggested that the seat of the governor in Jerusalem was here (Laurence E. Browne, Early Judaism [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1920], p. 148; Burrows, “Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem,” p. 137), and its location has been conjectured to be in the “Middle Tower” built against the exterior of the wall lying under the Russian Hospice, east of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (C. Schick, “Der Lauf der zweiten Mauer Jerusalems,” Zeitschrift des deutschen Palästina-vereins, VIII [1885], 267; “Nehemiah’s Mauerbau in Jerusalem,” ibid., XIV [1891], 47; cf. Simons, op. cit., p. 321). But that tower had defensive function and it is unlikely that the governor resided in depopulated Jerusalem. The throne has been regarded as the “judgment seat” of the Persian officer, parallel to the Roman procurator’s praetorium (Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 531, note a), but since Mizpah was the Judean administrative center after 586 B.C. (cf. II Kings 25:22; Jer. 40:5-10), and the Persian administrator may have held court there (cf. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1907-8], II, 354), “the seat of the governor,” etc., is appositive to Mizpah, and instead of unto “namely” is required (cf. Ezra 1:5, 11; Jer. 1:18; II Kings 12:6). The RSV is purely interpretative.

8. The unique Harhai'ah is difficult as an ancestral name. It is proposed to read instead either “the associates of the . . .” (יְהֱֵֽוֹוֹדֵ֨֝ר; cf. Job 41:6) or “the guild of the . . .” (ךְ֥֣֝֝ךְ; Rudolph, loc. cit.; Ehrlich, loc. cit.). Goldsmiths, lit., “smelters” or “refiners,” are jewelers as in vs. 31. As the Vulg. and LXX indicate, the perfumers were the mixers of ointments. The M.T. seems to indicate that in addition to repairing their wall, the men of vs. 8 abandoned Jerusalem as far as the Broad Wall, by which is understood the altering of the line of the old wall to exclude part of the former city (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 211; Burrows, “Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem,” p. 123; Gotthard, how to enlist diverse loyalties in a common enterprise, a major qualification for leadership. Of course such endless lists of names, with their oft-recurring verbal formulas, quickly become for modern readers monotonous and tire-of the apothecaries, and they fortified Jerusalem unto the broad wall.

9 And next unto them repaired Rephaiah the son of Hur, the ruler of the half part of Jerusalem.

Next to him Hanani'ah, one of the perfumers, repaired; and they restored Jerusalem as far as the Broad Wall. 9 Next to them Repha'ah the son of Hur, ruler of half the *Or abandoned op. cit., p. 82). The puzzling abandoned, which occurs again in 4:2, has led to a search for some meaning more relevant to the idea of reconstruction found in this chapter. It has been proposed to read instead of הבני, abandoned, either רֻבָּנָי, “enclosed” (cf. הָרִון, “enclosure,” in Ezek. 43:14; Ehrlich, loc. cit.), or רַבַּי, “girdled” (Siegfried, op. cit., p. 81), but by appeal to the Arabic meaning of the word (South Arabic بَعِين), and to Akkadian ّعَبِينٍ), a meaning “completed” is obtained (J. H. Mordtmann, “Neue himjarische Inschriften,” Zeitschrift der deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft, XXXIX [1885], 230; Burrows, “Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem,” p. 123, n. 9). Such conjecture is responsible for the interpretative fortified and restored, but the verb indicates some action apparently not applicable in the other assignments, and no convincing solution is at hand.

A Broad Wall is difficult to locate. Its identification with a broad wall at the eastern rim of the Pool of Hezekiah (Schick, “Der Lauf der zweiten Mauer,” p. 270) has been regarded as impossible (Merrill, Ancient Jerusalem, p. 359). It has been recognized as a fragment of an earlier wall abutting the western city wall or part of the latter wall itself (Millar Burrows, “The Topography of Nehemiah 12:31-43,” Journal of Biblical Literature, LIV [1935], 36-37), possibly part of the west wall which Galling (“Archäologischer Jahresbericht,” p. 87; cf. PI. VI) conjectures curved southeastward across the Tyropoeon Valley. Others have conjectured a place in the north wall where Joash destroyed about four hundred cubits of ancient wall (II Kings 14:13) which Hezekiah later restored, presumably with a much “broader” wall (Dalmann, Jerusalem, p. 236). But instead of Broad Wall, the Vulg. and LXX AB render the M.T. as “The Wall of the Square” (cf. Ezra 10:9), a reading requiring but the slight emendation in Hebrew from הבני, “broad,” to דברי, “square” (cf. George St. Clair, “Nehemiah’s South Wall, and the Locality of the Royal Sepulchres,” Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement for 1889, p. 99; cf. Mitchell, “Wall of Jerusalem,” p. 138, n. 35). This “Wall of the Square” may be identified with the western section of the north wall of the city, lying between the Ephraim Gate, at the western wall of the Mishneh, and the Corner Gate, a wall which formed the southern margin of the “square” just outside the Gate of Ephraim (cf. 8:16; Simons, op. cit., pp. 277, 300, 445, Fig. 56).

9. Hur, an Akkadian name ( häru, “child”; Noth, Personennamen, p. 221), persisted through the Persian period (COWLEY, Aramaic Papyri, No. 23, I. 5; No. 88, II. 4, 6, 8) and into Hellenistic times (Talqovst, Neubabylonisches Namenbuch, p. 68; cf. J. N. Strassmaier, „Arsacid-Inschriften,“ Zeitschrift für Assyriologie und verwandte Gebiete, III [1888], 149, No. 10, I. 25; cf. p. 136, I. 25). Ruler of half the district has led to some broad conclusions regarding the political organization of Jerusalem and Judea, since ancient cities were sometimes divided into administrative areas and the Assyrian title chief of the districts (ra ballet; Leroy Waterman, Royal Correspondence of the Assyrian Empire [Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1930], Pt. I, pp. 358-59, No. 512) could possibly be the equivalent of ruler of . . . the district (sar . . . pillêkh). But it is improbable that either depopulated Jerusalem or such small places as Keilah (vss. 17-18) would be under divided control. The Hebrew pillêkh could refer to a

... these. Monotonous they inevitably are for the reading of their successors who inherit what they made possible; but it was their cooperative labor and sacrifice that under God changed the course of human history.
10 And next unto them repaired Jedaidh the son of Haruman, even over against his house. And next unto him repaired Hattush the son of Hashabniah.

11 Malchijah the son of Harim, and Hashub the son of Pahath-moab, repaired the other piece, and the tower of the furnaces.

12 And next unto him repaired Shallum the son of Halohesh, the ruler of the half part of Jerusalem, he and his daughters.

district of Jerusalem, repaired. 10 Next to them Jedai'ah the son of Haru'maph repaired opposite his house: and next to him Hattush the son of Hashabne'iah repaired.

11 Malchi'jah the son of Harim and Hashub the son of Pa'ath-mo'ab repaired another section and the Tower of the Ovens. 12 Next to him Shallum the son of Hal'o'hes, ruler of half the district of Jerusalem, repaired, he and his daughters.

Or foreman of half the portion assigned to district, but it certainly here refers to much less. The cognate Assyrian term (pi'iku), in a text dealing with the building of a wall and gate, is used repeatedly for "assigned portion" (ibid., pp. 340-13, No. 486), usage which is applicable here where in each case two assignments are mentioned. Ruler then means simply the foreman or "overseer" (cf. Gen. 39:21, 23; 47:6; Exod. 1:11; etc.) responsible for "half of the assignment" of the town.

10. Harumaph ("Flat nose") is a nickname (Noth, Personennamen, p. 227; cf. Lev. 21:18). Hattush: Cf. Ezra 8:2. Unique Hashabneia is difficult but "Hashabniah" is found in 9:5 (where the Peshitta has "Hashabiah"; cf. Ezra 8:19) and "Hashabnah" is found in 10:25. These families (vs. 10) have been regarded as non-Jewish (Eduard Meyer, Die Entstehung des Judenthums [Halle: M. Niemeyer, 1896], p. 147). Here, as in vss. 23, 28-29, each man was assigned to a small portion of wall opposite his own house.

11. Malchijah the son of Harim here and in Ezra 10:51 has been used as evidence for the chronological priority of Ezra (J. S. Wright, The Date of Ezra's Coming to Jerusalem [London: Tyndale Press, 1947], p. 21), but such a conclusion is unnecessary. Malchijah is a common name and he is the "descendant" of Harim (Ezra 2:59), for whom many "sons" are listed (cf. 7:35, 42). Since the grandfather's name is often given, the Malchijah of Ezra 10:51 may have been a grandson of the person named here (Rowley, Servant of the Lord, pp. 157-58). Hashub, abbreviating "Hashabiah" (cf. vs. 17), is a descendant of Pahath-moab (cf. Ezra 2:6). Some men, like some cities, had two assignments (with vs. 4 cf. vs. 21; with vs. 5 cf. vs. 27; with vs. 18 [LXX] cf. vs. 24). "Second section" implies a previous assignment. Lack of such earlier assignment here (cf. also vss. 19-20, 30) is regarded as evidence for the incompleteness of the list and a serious omission is conjectured before this verse (Bertholet, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 54; Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 529, Batten, op. cit., p. 213).

Tower of the Ovens is preferable to tower of the furnaces since the Hebrew word (tannūr) refers to bakers' ovens rather than to kilns or to smelters (cf. Mitchell, op. cit., 130, n. 30; Merrill, op. cit., p. 364; Wilhelm Nowack, Lehrbuch der hebräischen Archäologie [Freiburg i. B.: J. C. B. Mohr, 1894], I, 146 ff.). It appears to have been located at the northwest corner of the city as part of the fortification of the Corner Gate (Jer. 31:38; II Kings 14:13) which Uzziah fortified (II Chr. 26:9). Strategically the tower protected the corner, "near the narrow neck of land linking the N.W. Hill to the S.W. Hill" (Simons, op. cit., pp. 284, 304). The assignment seems to include a section of the wall and the tower but some see the tower as a terminus (Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 531). An alternate proposal is to read ṭã, "at" (cf. I Kings 9:26; II Kings 9:27), and translate "a second assignment . . . at the Gate of the Ovens" (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 117).

12. Hallohes ("The Whisperer") is a professional title used for "snake charmer" (Ps. 58:5; Eccl. 10:11). It is not found in Ezra 2. Shallum was a foreman (cf. vs. 9). His daughters is an unusual and unexpected note since it is assumed that women would do a large share of the labor in each section. A proposed emendation to "its daughters," referring to Jerusalem and its dependent hamlets (cf. 11:25-31; Num. 21:25; 32:42; Josh. 15:45, 47; etc.) is attractive but is not supported by the M.T. or the versions.
13 The valley gate repaired Hanun, and the inhabitants of Zanoah; they built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof, and a thousand cubits on the wall unto the dung gate.

14 But the dung gate repaired Malchiah the son of Rechab, the ruler of part of Beth-haccerem; he built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.

15 But the gate of the fountain repaired Shallun the son of Col-hozeh, the ruler of part of Mizpah; he built it, and covered it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.

18 Hanun and the inhabitants of Zano'ah repaired the Valley Gate; they rebuilt it and set its doors, its bolts, and its bars, and repaired a thousand cubits of the wall, as far as the Dung Gate.

14 Malch'ijah the son of Rechab, ruler of the district of Beth-hac'che'rem, repaired the Dung Gate; he rebuilt it and set its doors, its bolts, and its bars.

15 And Shallum the son of Colho'zeh, ruler of the district of Mizpah, repaired the Fountain Gate; he rebuilt it and cov-

3. THE SOUTH WALL (3:13-14)

13. Hanun abbreviates Hananiah or Hananiel. Zanoah (Khirbet Zânû') in the Judean foothills, about twelve and a half miles west of Bethlehem (Albrecht Alt, "Die Ausflüge: Sanoah," Palästinalahrbuch, XXIV [1928], 27-28; Abel, Géographie, II, 90, 489; W. F. Albright, "Topographical Researches in Judea," Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 18 [1925], p. 11), is associated with Jarmuth and Adullam (cf. 11:30). For the Valley Gate and Dung Gate see Exeg. on 2:13. Because of the extraordinary distance between the Valley Gate and the Dung Gate, the thousand cubits that separated them is specified. Because the distance is considerably above the average, the text has been regarded as corrupt, and it is claimed that "all calculations based upon the distance stated are therefore unreliable" (Burrows, "Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem," p. 131). But since some assignments were as small as half the length of a house (vs. 20-21) the sections were by no means the same and an "average" section is hypothetical. The men of Zanoah may have been numerous and the southern wall may not have needed extensive repairs. Although the listing of some workmen on the southern wall may have been lost from the present M.T., the distance mentioned, as "a rounded underestimation," is approximately right (cf. 2:13; Simons, op. cit., pp. 280, 439). Like the Dung Gate and the Fountain Gate (2:14) in the south of the city, the Valley Gate is described as both repaired and rebuilt, the former apparently referring to the masonry and the latter to the woodwork which had been burned (cf. 1:3).

14. Rechab may be the remote ancestor of the Rechabites (cf. II Kings 10:15, 23; Jer. 35:1-19). Beth-haccherem ("The House of the Vineyard"), a fertile place with a lofty peak nearby from which fire signals could be sent (Jer. 6:1), was probably modern 'Ain Karim ("Spring of Vineyards"), about four miles west of Jerusalem, at the foot of the ridge Jebel 'Ali, upon which was found a huge cairn (Rujm et Târûd), well suited to the purpose of a beacon (C. R. Conder, "Lieutenant Conder's Reports," Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement for 1881, pp. 271-72; Abel, op. cit., II, 295). For ruler of the district see Exeg. on vs. 9. "Laid the beams," found elsewhere (vs. 3, 6), is omitted here but is reflected in the LXX.

4. THE EAST WALL (3:15-31)

15. For the unique Shallun read Shallum (cf. Ezra 2:42) with five Hebrew MSS and the Vulg. and Peshitta versions. Col-hozeh (cf. 11:5). The name ("All-Seeing") is a title (cf. vs. 12) indicating that Shallum descended from a prominent seer. Since Mizpah (cf. vs. 7) had two assignments (vs. 15, 19) the word "half" has been lost from the title (cf. vs. 9). For "laid the beams" (vs. 3, 6) the text here has covered it, a change which, together with the use of Aramaic rather than Hebrew spelling, has been regarded by some as evidence for composite structure of the chapter (but cf. above).

689
thereof, and the bars thereof, and the wall of the pool of Siloam by the king's garden, and unto the stairs that go down from the city of David.

16 After him repaired Nehemiah the son of Azbuk, the ruler of the half part of Beth-zur, unto the place over against the sepulchres of David, and set its doors, its bolts, and its bars; and he built the wall of the Pool of Siloam, and as far as the stairs that go down from the City of David.

16 After him Nehem'jah the son of Azbuk, ruler of half the district of Beth-zur, repaired its doors, and set its bolts, and its bars; and he built the wall of the Pool of Siloam, as far as the stairs that go down from the City of David.

The Fountain Gate (cf. 2:14) was both rebuilt and repaired (cf. vs. 13). At the Fountain Gate the counterclockwise progress ceases momentarily to describe an important defensive architectural complex lying behind the city wall between the Dung Gate and the Fountain Gate and connected with the latter. Within that gate a rock-cut staircase descended from the City of David to the Fountain Gate where, "long before Zedekiah [II Kings 25:4] the exit from the city via the 'stairs of the City of David' and the Fountain Gate led through a 15 metres long corridor enclosed between two strong walls" (Simons, op. cit., p. 127; cf. Figs. 10, 56).

The Wall of the Pool of Shelah was doubtless one of the two strong walls forming the corridor behind the city wall. The inner wall, crossing the Tyropoeon Valley and joining the eastern and western hills of the city, formed the barrage of the Pool of Shelah, the Lower Pool (Birket el Hamra; ibid., p. 109). The spelling Shelah may be an attempt to avoid identification with the Pool of Siloam, as is done by the Vulg. and some modern scholars (G. Ernest Wright and Floyd V. Filson, The Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible [Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1945], p. 98). The original name was apparently Shiloah (cf. Isa. 8:6), as some Hebrew MSS and most scholars agree. The Wall could have been the inner wall, the barrage of the reservoir itself, but the outer wall, the city wall about which the list is otherwise silent, could have taken the name of the Pool that it protected (Simons, op. cit., pp. 108-9, 121-22, n. 2). As part of the corridor, the Wall did not go by the king's garden nor was it of that garden, but it ran "toward" the garden, which lay below the city, at the southern end of the Kidron Valley (ibid., pp. 10, 193, 231, n. 7, 455) where the Dragon Well (2:13) sometimes overflowed from its mouth, watering the plain where gardens once extended southward from Siloam along the Kidron Valley (cf. Edward Robinson, Biblical Researches, I, 491-92; Josephus Jewish War V. 2. 2). The waters of the Gihon Spring may also have come by canal to the garden area into "the King's Pool" (cf. 2:14; Simons, op. cit., pp. 10, 193).

The City of David, site of pre-Hebrew Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:6-9), lay high on the southeastern hill where it was limited to the "Stronghold of Zion," described as "the area around and including the large tower in the northeast part of the fortifications of Jebusite Jerusalem and the gate identified by the excavators as the water-gate, the two features which overlook and guard the approaches to the Spring of Gihon, the only source of water supply in the Jerusalem of the period" (S. Yeivin, "The Sepulchers of the Kings of the House of David," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, VII [1948], 40-41, 43). Stairs descended about 165 feet in several rock-cut stages to the lower levels of the hill at the south of the city (ibid., p. 44).

Three landmarks near the city wall define the terminus of Nehemiah's assignment. The sepulchres of David (Acts 2:29) lay north of the Fountain Gate and near the east wall. Roman period quarrying has left the area mutilated with empty, demolished graves. The most likely location for the royal cemetery is within the great curve of Hezekiah's chres of David, and to the pool that was made, and unto the house of the mighty.
3:19
17 After him repaired the Levites, Rehum the son of Bani. Next unto him repaired Hashabiah, the ruler of the half part of Keilah, in his part.
18 After him repaired their brethren, Bava the son of Henadad, the ruler of the half part of Keilah.
19 And next to him repaired Ezer the son of Jeshua, the ruler of Mizpah, another piece over against the going up to the armory at the turning of the wall.

paired to a point opposite the sepulchres of David, to the artificial pool, and to the house of the mighty men. 17 After him the Levites repaired: Rehum the son of Bani; next to him Hashab’iah, ruler of half the district of Ke’ilah, repaired for his district. 18 After him their brethren repaired: Bava the son of Hen’adad, ruler of half the district of Ke’ilah; 19 next to him Ezer the son of Jeshua, ruler of Mizpah, repaired another section opposite the ascent to the

NEHEMIAH

The pool that was made, an artificial pool, lay near but its location is uncertain. Water was usually conducted from the springs outside the city to constructions within the city for defensive purposes, but it has been conjectured that this pool may have been outside the walls, in the Kidron Valley (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 119). Also nearby but not yet identifiable was the house of the mighty men, the house of the warriors, the name of which suggests David’s “heroes” (II Sam. 10:7; 16:6; 23:8; I Kings 1:10). It was presumably the barracks for the royal bodyguard.

17. Since Levites (cf. Ezra 2:49) are next in line (vss. 17-21), Bani is not the layman of Ezra 2:10. Hashabiah (Ezra 8:19), who bears a popular Levite name (cf. Neh. 10:11; I Chr. 27:17), was an administrator (vs. 9) in charge of part (cf. vs. 18) of the assignment of Keilah (Khirbet Qilä), a place about eight miles northwest of Hebron, near the Philistine border. This verse has led to the hypothesis that Keilah was settled by Levites in the Persian period (Meyer, Entstehung des Judentums, p. 178). Since Hashabiah was a “foreman” rather than a ruler (cf. vs. 9), it need no longer be denied that he was a Levite (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 217). Read his part rather than for his district since the preceding preposition is neither in nor for but the indicator of the object (cf. 9:32; 11:2; Ezra 8:16).

18. Their brethren (vss. 18-21) were also Levites. Several Hebrew MSS, the Peshitta, and corrupt Greek texts show that the Bavvai of the M.T. should be Binnui (cf. Ezra 2:10), as in vs. 24 (cf. 10:9; Gotthard, Texts of Nehemia, p. 90). Henadad (“Favor of Adad”) is not necessarily pre-exilic (Batten, loc. cit.) but, like Mordecai (Marduqaia), is postexilic, for it is of a Neo-babylonian type ḫinni-ilānī (Tallqvist, Neubabylonisches Namenbuch, pp. 68, 316 s.v ṭān; cf. Haniel in Num. 34:23) and the divine name Adad is common also in that period (ibid., pp. 1-3, 22-26).

19. Corrupt text, confusing syntax, technical terms, and uncertainty concerning topography make this verse extremely difficult. Ancients were as baffled as moderns by it, and the versions are almost useless in restoring the text. The apparent stylistic change may rest on scribal error (Batten, loc. cit.) or it may indicate deliberate variation to avoid monotonous repetition of the same formula (Burrows, “Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem,” p. 119). Ezer, abbreviated like Ezra (Ezra 7:1), was presumably a descendant of the Levite Jeshua (Ezra 2:40). Like Shallum (vs. 15), he was a “foreman” rather than a ruler (cf. vs. 9). Since Mizpah had two assignments (vss. 15, 19) the text must be emended as in vs. 15 (cf. Meyer, op. cit., p. 167).

The meaning of the word translated ascent is yet uncertain. It could be “upper chamber” (יַלְדוֹת) as in vss. 31-32, or “above,” in the sense of “northward” with the rising ground (Mitchell, “Wall of Jerusalem,” p. 155). Topographically, however, ascent seems most promising, and this sense is required by the Vulg. and Peshitta versions.

RAW TEXT END
20 After him Baruch the son of Zabbai earnestly repaired the other piece, from the turning of the wall unto the door of the house of Eliashib the high priest.

21 After him repaired Meremoth the son of Urijah the son of Koz another piece, from the door of the house of Eliashib even to the end of the house of Eliashib.

22 And after him the priests, the men of the plain.

To derive such sense the M.T. must be revocalized (from אָלָות to אָלָה; cf. Ezek. 40:26), but it is usually emended to שניים, "stairs," as in vs. 15 (see 12:37; Ezra 7:9; cf. Gotthard, op. cit., p. 91).

Armory represents a Hebrew word which elsewhere can mean "equipment" or "weapons" (Ezek. 39:9; Isa. 22:8; I Kings 10:25; II Kings 10:2). Since the word alone can scarcely mean armory, it is usually emended to "the house of weapons," with that meaning. But the Hebrew root from which it derives normally means "to bring into close contact" and "to kiss," a concept implied in the LXX, "where it meets," where there is no reference to an armory.

Even more difficult is the final word, usually translated turning, with the assumption that the wall changed direction (cf. Burrows, "Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem," p. 139). But there is no evidence for any sharp change in the direction of the wall until the vicinity of the Horse Gate (vs. 28), where a different term, corner (פינוח), is used to describe it (vs. 31; Jer. 31:38; Simons, op. cit., p. 120). As an architectural term it signifies a buttress (cf. Ezek. 46:21-22) or, on a smaller scale, the corner post of an altar (Ezek. 41:22), which is reflected in the "corner buttress" of the Amer. Trans. The LXX and Vulg. both suggest Angle assumed to mean "a corner formed by the city-wall and a wall perpendicularly abutting on it from inside the city" (ibid., n. 1). Other Semitic languages suggest the meaning "cut off," and the cognate Arabic noun means "something cut off" or "something ending abruptly." Since the term in the M.T. stands in apposition to the preceding word, usually translated armory, they must have the same significance. Thus the present M.T. could mean "from opposite the ascent of the contact, the barrier." As such the terminus would be something opposite the wall and close to it. Apparently only one such structure existed (ibid., p. 119; cf. II Chr. 26:9) but the mention of eight assignments (vss. 19-25) suggests that it was of considerable length. No topographical evidence exists for identifying the "contact," but the present M.T. suggests a natural or artificial barrier within the city, arising at some distance from the wall (vs. 19), proceeding toward the city wall to make contact with it (vs. 24), and moving away again (vs. 25).

20. Baruch ("Blessed") abbreviates such a name as Berechiah (vs. 4) or Barachel (cf. Job 32:2; 6). In twenty-three Hebrew MSS, the Vulg., and the Peshitta, Zabbai (cf. Ezra 10:28) is "Zaccai" (cf. Ezra 2:9). Earnestly: Lit., "he burned," but forced and unparalleled in this sense in Hebrew since the verb חָרָם, usually used of anger, interrupts a familiar formula. It is lacking in seven Hebrew MSS, the LXX, and the Ethiopic and Arabic versions and is apparently a corrupt and incorrect repetition of the similar after him יִזְיַד את (which precedes it and is rightly omitted in the RSV. Another section (cf. vss. 19, 21, 24, 27, 30) is unexpected since Baruch is mentioned only here. His terminus was the "doorway" of the house of the high priest Eliashib (cf. vs. 1).

21. Meremoth (cf. vs. 4) had but a short "second assignment," to the end of Eliashib's house.

22. Because the Hebrew word translated plain (حيحר) usually means the Jordan Valley (cf. Gen. 13:10-12; 19:17, 25; Deut. 34:3), the Peshitta has the men of the plain, and the Vulg. has "men of the plains of the Jordan." But the priests dwelt in the armory at the Angle. 20 After him Baruch the son of Zab'bai repaired another section from the Angle to the door of the house of Eli'ashib the high priest. 21 After him Mer'emoth the son of Uri'ah, son of Hakkoz repaired another section from the door of the house of Eli'ashib to the end of the house of Eli'ashib. 22 After him the priests,
NEHEMIAH 3:25

23 After him repaired Benjamin and Hashub over against their house. After him repaired Azariah the son of Maaseiah the son of Ananiah by his house.

24 After him repaired Binnui the son of Henadad another piece, from the house of Azariah unto the turning of the wall, even unto the corner.

25 Palal the son of Uzai, over against the turning of the wall, and the tower which lieth out from the king’s high house, that was by the court of the prison. After him Pedaiah the son of Parosh.

suburbs of Jerusalem (cf. Jer. 1:1; Luke 1:39 ff.), scarcely as far from the temple as the Jordan Valley. The term may refer to the district about Jerusalem (cf. 12:28) and means here “the men of the vicinfty.”

Lack of reference to a landmark has led to the conjecture that the verse is either incomplete or a later interpolation, possibly by the Chronicler (cf. Gotthard, op. cit., p. 93) or that it is now misplaced (Batten, op. cit., p. 218). But exact specification, lacking elsewhere (cf. vss. 2, 4-5, 9-10, 12, 17-18), need not be insisted upon here (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 120). Nor need the use of after him in vs. 23, following the priests, be evidence for the intrusion of the verse, for such disagreement is not unusual (cf. vs. 2) and has no textual significance (ibid., p. 114).

23. Benjamin (cf. Ezra 10:32) and Hashub (cf. vs. 11) lived together. Ananiah, only here in the Bible, is common in the Jewish Aramaic papyri, both in its full form and in its abbreviation ‘Anani’ (Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, No. 6, I. 20; No. 8, I. 32; No. 30, ll. 18-19).

24. Henadad: Cf. vs. 18. Because the turning is so far from the last reference to it (vs. 19), another is presumed here (Batten, loc. cit.), but it is presumably the same one which here joins the wall, for “to the barrier” indicates a terminus at the wall. Corner implies a sharp turn (cf. vss. 31-32; Job 1:19; I Kings 7:34). But if the corner of the Horse Gate (Jer. 31:40) was not in the city wall (cf. vs. 28), no corner is expected until the juncture with the north wall of the city. The corner here has been regarded as an intrusion (cf. Mitchell, op. cit., p. 157; Simons, op. cit., p. 456), but as even unto the corner the reference may not be to the city wall but to the corner of the “barrier,” which here touches the wall and again turns away (cf. vs. 19). Nothing is gained by the radical expedient of transporting and to the corner to the beginning of vs. 25 as in the RSV (cf. Burrows, “Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem,” pp. 125-26).

25. Lack of an introductory “after him” and of a verb indicates textual damage here. Repaired must be supplied. Palal abbreviates Pelalais (cf. 11:12) and the unique Uzai may be a short form of Azaniah (10:9; Noth, Personennamen, p. 185), but the form Uzain (גוזין) should be expected. Opposite indicates that “the barrier” (vs. 19) has again moved away from the wall. Nearby a tower projected from the house of the king, which is called the upper house to distinguish it, the “Solomonic” palace, from the older “House of David,” on the southern part of the hill (cf. E. J. Fischer, “Die Mauern und Tore des Jerusalem,” p. 260; Burrows, “Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem,” p. 130; Simons, op. cit., p. 130). Some, denying that there were two palaces (Batten, op. cit., pp. 218, 223-24; Gotthard, op. cit., p. 94; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 120), translate high instead of upper, thinking of a high house, with the Vulg., or of higher and lower towers, with the LXX. Which lieth out suggests a free-standing tower, disconnected from the palace. But the M.T. has, lit., “the one going out” or projecting. The tower is most probably the very large tower with a projection of 22½ feet found by Warren at his Ophel Wall where it came into line with the present Haram Wall (Charles W. 693
26 Moreover the Nethinim dwelt in Ophel, unto the place over against the water gate toward the east, and the tower that lieth out.

27 After them the Tekoites repaired another piece, over against the great tower that lieth out, even unto the wall of Ophel.

28 From above the horse gate repaired the priests, every one over against his house.

him Pedai'ah the son of Parosh 26 and the temple servants living* on Ophel repaired to a point opposite the Water Gate on the east and the projecting tower. 27 After him the Teko'ites repaired another section opposite the great projecting tower as far as the wall of Ophel.

28 Above the Horse Gate the priests repaired, each one opposite his own house.

* Cn: Heb were living

Wilson and Charles Warren, The Recovery of Jerusalem [New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1871], pp. 298-29; Mitchell, loc. cit.; Simons, op. cit., pp. 118-19, 142, 456. Since three assignments are described with relation to the tower (vss. 26, 27, 28), which was only twenty-six feet wide, one must agree that the text here is "hopelessly out of order" and that the tower must have followed the Water Gate, as in vs. 26 (cf. ibid., p. 456; *cf. p. 123, n. 1). The court of the guard was the enclosure in the house of the king in which Jeremiah was shut up (Jer. 32:2). The name Pedai'ah ("The Lord Has Ransomed"); cf. Neh. 8:4; 11:7; 13:13) is also found in the papyri (Cowley, op. cit., No. 43, l. 12).

26. The reference to the temple servants (the Nethinim; cf. Ezra 2:48), co-workers with Pedaiah, has been called "a parenthetical expression which has strayed from its original place" (Batten, op. cit., p. 219), and it is thought to be a gloss to Ophel in vs. 27, borrowed ultimately from 11:21 (Gotthard, op. cit., pp. 95-96; Rudolph, loc. cit.). But an emendation of the M.T. 장, יזיש רביע, "were living," to את אש ובו רביע, "those living," preserves the double subject (Burrows, "Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem," p. 125).

Ophel ("swelling"); cf. Deut. 28:27; I Sam. 5:6; 9, 12; 6:4) is an eminence or bulge, a mound or hill, that was fortified (cf. II Kings 5:24 and the Moabite stone, l. 22). At Jerusalem later popular usage applied the term to the whole southeastern hill (II Chr. 33:14), but it was earlier confined to the Kidron side of the hill, near the angle of the present Haram, where the first bulge of the temple hill proper overhangs the Kidron Valley, above the City of David (cf. Simons, op. cit., pp. 64-67). The Water Gate gave access to the Gihon Spring outside the city wall (cf. Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 55; Simons, op. cit., p. 121) but there is yet no evidence for such a gate in the eastern wall (ibid., pp. 122-25). Opposite suggests that the gate was near the city wall but not in it. It has been regarded as a door in the eastern part of the palace (Bertholet, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 119), but the unusual on the east may signify a gate east of the city wall. Such an ancient gate, found by Parker (Hugues Vincent, Jérusalem sous terre [London: H. Cox, 1911], p. 29, col. 2 and Pl. VI), lying a few yards below the brink of the hill exactly above the Gihon Spring, may have been "an element in the communication between the city and the shaft leading to the Spring of the Steps" (cf. Simons, op. cit., pp. 83, 165). According to the Mishnah a Water Gate was located as the most easterly one in the later south wall of the temple court (Shekalim 6:3; Sukkah 4:9; Middoth 1:4; 2:6). Possibly the words on the east are used to distinguish the gate from one within the city. Some, however, ignore the opposite and locate the Water Gate in the city wall (cf. Burrows, "Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem," p. 127; Simons, op. cit., p. 452). A great open place lay before the Water Gate (cf. 8:1, 3, 16).

27. The wall of Ophel, the terminus of the second section of the Tekoites (cf. vs. 5), might have been part of the city wall (ibid., p. 456), but lack of reference to the rebuilding of it suggests a landmark rather than a part of the external fortification with which Nehemiah was most concerned. It could be Warren's "Ophel Wall" (*cf. vs. 25; ibid., n. 1) or some other internal wall that joined the city wall somewhere just below the southeast corner of the present Haram.

28. The Horse Gate has been recognized as a city gate close to the palace, used as a private gate to the royal quarters (ibid., p. 339), but it is probably the same as 29 After them repaired Zadok the son of Immer over against his house. After him repaired also Shemaiah the son of Shechaniah, the keeper of the east gate.

30 After him repaired Hananiah the son of Shelemiah, and Hanun the sixth son of Zalaph, another piece. After him repaired Meshullam the son of Berechiah over against his chamber.

31 After him repaired Malchiah the goldsmith's son unto the place of the Nethinim, and of the merchants, over against the gate Miphkad, and to the going up of the corner.

the "horses' entrance to the king's house" (II Kings 11:16) leading from the southeastern part of the temple compound to the royal stable, which was presumably such a subterranean structure as "the stables of Solomon," on which the southern end of the present platform of the Haram area rests (Mitchell, op. cit., p. 160; Simons, op. cit., pp. 347 ff.). If the gate were thus in a relatively deep location (cf. Bertholet, op. cit., p. 56), the use of above to describe the terminus on the city wall towering over it would be intelligible. Such an area, adjacent to the temple compound, was naturally a quarter for the priests.

29. Zadok (cf. vs. 4) was a "descendant" of Immer (Ezra 2:37) the priest, and Shemaiah (Ezra 8:13) the "descendant" of Shechaniah (cf. 12:3) may also have been a priest, but since the gatekeepers were Levites (cf. Ezra 2:42; Ezek. 44:11) and the names are common, he may have been a Levite (cf. Ezra 2:40). Some identify the East Gate with the Water Gate of vs. 26 (cf. Burrows, "Source for Topography of Ancient Jerusalem," pp. 120-21), but it more probably was in the wall of the temple court where Ezekiel's plans called for an East Gate reserved for the prince, opened only on holy days (Ezek. 46:1 ff.). The Mishnah also mentions but one gate on the East "on which was portrayed the Palace of Shushan," a gate through which the high priest who burned the red heifer and his party went out to the Mount of Olives (Middoth 1:3-4). This gate might have been the predecessor of the present "Golden Gate" (Bab el-Dahiriyeh) in the eastern wall of the Haram area (cf. Simons, op. cit., p. 540).

30. Hananiah (cf. Ezra 10:28) of vs. 8 and Hanun of vs. 13, neither of whom were given paternal names earlier, collaborated in this second assignment. For Shelemiah the LXXDR have "Telemiah," suggesting the "Telem" of Ezra 10:24 and the "Talmon" of 7:45; 11:19; 12:25 (cf. Gotthard, op. cit., p. 97). Zalaph means "Caper Bush." Sixth son is without parallel in genealogical lists. It is due to a very early textual corruption of possibly a marginal note correcting Telemiah to Shelemiah (ibid.), or of some such place of origin as "the Shemeshite" (of 'Ain Shemesh; cf. Josh. 15:7; 18:17; Jahn, Ezra [A und B] und Nehemja, p. 103) or, since Hanun is associated with Zanoah (vs. 13), as a corrupt fragment of an earlier "inhabitants of Zanoah" (Bertheau, Ezra, Nekhemia und Ester, p. 175; Bertholet, loc. cit.). Meshullam, with two assignments (cf. vs. 4), was the father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (cf. 6:18). Instead of "his house" (cf. vss. 23, 28-29) the M.T. has his chamber (cf. Ezra 8:29; 10:6). This could have been a dwelling (Ezra 10:6) or a storeroom (Ezra 8:29) and the Vulg. and LXX here render "his treasury" (cf. Neh. 10:38-39; John 8:20). Could this be the chamber later used by Tobiah (cf. 13:4-7, 7-9)?

31. A Masoretic note at vs. 31, "half the book," indicates the belief that Ezra-Nehemiah formed a single work. Since son in the M.T. can mean guild membership (cf. vs. 8), Malchijah (cf. Ezra 10:25) was not the goldsmith's son but one of the goldsmiths. The terminus of his assignment was a house in which the Nethinim (cf. Ezra 2:48) and merchants (cf. vs. 32) were associated. Its nature is uncertain but its location in a 32 And between the going up of the corner unto the sheep gate repaired the goldsmiths and the merchants.

4 But it came to pass, that when Sanballat heard that we builded the wall, he was wroth, and took great indignation, and mocked the Jews.

The significance of the word rendered Muster is uncertain since it could mean also "visit," "attend," or "appoint." It has been regarded as a gate between "the less sacred part of the enclosure, where the traders did business, [and] the sanctuary proper" (Mitchell, op. cit., p. 161). It is also considered to be a gate leading to "the appointed place" (miphqâd) belonging to the temple, outside of the sacred area (cf. Ezek. 43:21; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 120-21). Some, calling it the "inspection Gate," locate it near the northern end of the east wall of the city and identify it with the Benjamin Gate (cf. Jer. 37:12-13; Dalman, Jerusalem, p. 140; Simons, op. cit., pp. 340-42). If opposite refers to the gate rather than to the house of the Nethinim and merchants, the gate would be a landmark, not part of the city wall. The later temple court had but one gate in its eastern wall (Middoth I:4). Another point of reference, according to the M.T. and Vulg., was an upper chamber (nîḥîy; cf. Judg. 3:23-25; I Kings 17:19, 28), apparently a protecting watchtower at the northeast corner of the city (cf. Bertholet, loc. cit.; Simons, op. cit., pp. 342, 452). The LXX and Peshitta render the word less plausibly as the going up (nîḥîy; cf. vs. 19).

5. Remainder of the North Wall (3:32)

32. The circuit of the defenses is completed with the restoration of the section of wall from the upper chamber (vs. 31) to the Sheep Gate (cf. vs. 1). This was repaired by the goldsmiths and the merchants whose business lay in that area. Then, as today, the goldsmiths were bankers (cf. Mark 11:15; Matt. 21:12). Together with the merchants they "sold and bought in the temple" (Mark 11:15). Presumably such tradesmen, in the vicinity of the Sheep Gate, dealt in sacrificial animals (cf. John 2:14) and other materials for use in the temple.

B. Reaction of the Judeans' Neighbors (4:1-3=Hebrew 3:33-35)

Nehemiah's narrative, interrupted at 2:20 by the intrusion of ch. 3, is resumed in ch. 4. Since 4:1-6 presumes some progress in restoration beyond the situation in ch. 2, the effect of the insertion of ch. 3 is somewhat to indicate a lapse of time. But such progress as is assumed is not enough to ensure final success (cf. vs. 6), and certainly not the completeness suggested by 3:3, 6.

4:1-2. Here when signifies "after" rather than "at the time that." Sanballat (cf. 2:10) acted promptly when reports indicated that work had begun. We were building is 4:1-6. Increasing Tensions.—Various as are the interpretations that have been offered, and the textual emendations that have been proposed for the better understanding of this chapter (see Exeg), the events of the middle of the twentieth century have provided a revealing social and psychological commentary on the tensions in which Nehemiah's project speedily became involved. The problems and attitudes which confronted early Zionism in Palestine twenty-four centuries ago have emerged again in the similar but more violent conflict between the Jews who have returned to their ancient homeland to re-establish Israel there and the long-time Arab inhabitants of that same land. Thus can history repeat itself centuries afterward—on an enlarging scale and with more complicated results.

And he spake before his brethren and the army of Samaria, and said, What do these feeble Jews? will they fortify themselves? will they sacrifice? will they make an end in a day? will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the rubbish which are burned?

preferable to we built, since the work was still far from complete. The corrupt text of vs. 2 has perplexed both ancient and modern translators. So divergent are their results that the versions help but little in recovering a convincing text. Confusion increases when the questions in the verse are regarded as mocking in character (cf. vs. 1), since those of Sanballat are best understood as a serious assessment of the situation. Tobiah introduced the note of ridicule. Brethren indicates allies (cf. Amos 1:9) as well as fellow Samaritans, since Tobiah was a member of the group (cf. vs. 3). The Hebrew “force” (hāyīl), often rendered army (cf. Ezra 4:23), is not translated adequately by the “multitude” (frequentia) of the Vulg. The term has been assumed to mean the upper-class Samaritans, the political, economic, and military leaders (Albrecht Alt, “Die Rolle Samarias bei der Entstehung des Judenthums,” Festschrift Otto Procksch [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1934], pp. 12-13), but that would call for some differentiation from brethren that is not readily apparent. As governor of Samaria (cf. 2:10) Sanballat had troops and Nehemiah clearly expected armed intervention at Jerusalem (vs. 13 ff.). Brethren reflects civil leaders and the army indicates the military officers at the conference over the Jewish problem. To object to army because a fight would have been the result (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 226) is to assume that the council was held within sight of Jerusalem, but the M.T. has no such setting. These feeble Jews might seem to indicate such a locale, but that rendition of the LXXI does not agree with the M.T., the Vulg., and the Peshitta which simply call the “feeble Jews.” The council may have met in Samaria.

Since Sanballat was informed both directly (2:19-20) and by rumor (vs. 1) of the Jewish plans, the question concerns motive (cf. 2:19; 6:6-7), and the translation is best as “What are the feeble Jews about to do?” (Höscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 474, note g). Fortify translates the difficult word which is usually rendered “abandon” (cf. 3:8) but cannot mean that here. Things is purely interpretative, for the M.T. has “for themselves.” Will they sacrifice? may be but a faulty repetition of Will they restore (cf. Ehrlich, Randglossen, p. 191), but it is probably the serious question “Will they [only] sacrifice?” which implies that royal protection was previously confined to the religious cult, but raising the city defenses might indicate an interest in rebellion (cf. 3:19; 6:6-7) which would go beyond the permitted sacrificing. Will they make an end in a day? follows the Vulg., but the question is about the building itself, not the speed of the work. It is possible that the text is corrupt and should read, “Will they continue their building to the end?” (ibid.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 122). Revive sometimes means restoring to life (e.g., I Sam. 2:6; Deut. 32:39; Hos. 6:2), but it is also used of restoring a city (I Chr. 11:8), as in Phoenician (Zellig S. Harris, A Grammar of the Phoenician Language [New Haven: American Oriental Society, 1936], p. 100; Julian Obermann, Discoveries at Karatepe [Baltimore: American Oriental Society, 1948], pp. 15, 38). Burned ones at that renders a trailing circumstantial clause, “and they are burned.”

Part of the tension that Nehemiah faced seems to have arisen from genuine anxiety and fear on the part of his Samaritan neighbors. The Exeg. agrees with Batten that “Sanballat seems to have been seriously alarmed at Nehemiah’s activity.” Tobiah, on the other hand, was disposed to ridicule the Jewish effort: If a fox goes up on it he will break down their stone wall! (Vs. 3b.) This combination of angry suspicion and bitter mockery stirred the volatile personality of Nehemiah to an outburst of imprecatory prayer against the enemies of his 3 Now Tobiah the Ammonite was by him, and he said, Even that which they build, if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stone wall.

4 Hear, O our God; for we are despised: and turn their reproach upon their own head, and give them for a prey in the land of captivity:

5 And cover not their iniquity, and let not their sin be blotted out from before thee: for they have provoked thee to anger before the builders.

3. Tobiah (cf. 2:10), reacting to Sanballat’s seriousness, mocks the Jewish efforts. For fox (read by all the versions) it is possible to translate “jackal” (shī‘āl; cf. Judg. 15:4; Ezek. 13:4; Lam. 5:18; Ps. 63:10; Batten, op. cit., p. 225). Break down, used elsewhere of breaching a wall (cf. II Kings 14:13), here means to “dig through.”

C. NEHEMIAH’S IMPRECAITION (4:4-5 = Hebrew 3:36-37)

Although the imprecation has been regarded as the Chronicler’s (C. C. Torrey, Ezra Studies [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1910], p. 226), its brevity suggests Nehemiah’s work (cf. 1:11) rather than the Chronicler’s wordy compositions (cf. 1:5-11; 9:6-38; Ezra 9:6-15). Its violence, too, bespeaks the volatile personality of Nehemiah (cf. 13:25).

4. The salutation is such as is found in Pss. 54:1-2; 64:1; Dan. 9:17. Our god reflects Nehemiah’s style (cf. 5:9). The idea of being despised was one of the inducements that brought Nehemiah to Judea (1:3). He sought to reverse the situation so that the enemies would suffer Israel’s fate. Instead of give them up to be plundered the Vulg. and LXX translate as though the “plunder” of the M.T. (bizzāh) were the “scorn” (bizzāh) mentioned just before.

5. In lines borrowed from Jer. 18:23b, God is urged not to forgive the sins of the enemies of the Jews. Nehardean tradition would make the text conform more closely to that of Jeremiah by omitting the initial and which links vs. 5 closely to what precedes (Bertheau, Ezra, Nechemia und Esther, p. 226; Gotthard, Text des Nehemia, pp. 108-9). Cover (nodah), meaning “to hide,” used of God’s gracious concealing of sin (Pss. 32:1; 85:2), replaces the more familiar verb (nōs) with the same meaning used in the Jeremiah passage. Blotted out means “to wipe out,” and its cognate in Arabic means “efface,” “erase,” “obliterate.” Iniquity or guilt (law) means not perversity but error, “deviation from the right path,” as its Arabic cognate shows (Paul Lagarde, Mittheilungen von Paul de Lagarde [Göttingen: Dieterich, 1884], I, 236-37). Their sin likewise means error or going wrong in the sense of “missing the mark.” As error rather than perversity the sin in Jer. 18:23b would seem to indicate common human frailty, but the writer here, burned ones at that?” 3 Tobi’ah the Ammonite was by him, and he said, “Yes, what they are building—if a fox goes up on it he will break down their stone wall!” 4 Hear, O our God, for we are despised; turn back their taunt upon their own heads, and give them up to be plundered in a land where they are captives. 5 Do not cover their guilt, and let not their sin be blotted out from thy sight; for they have provoked thee to anger before the builders.

people (vss. 4-5). The violence of his imprecation grates harshly on modern ears; but it must be remembered that such vehemence against enemies appears more than once in the psalms (cf. Pss. 79:4-12; 123:3-4; 137:7-9). So likewise does the confident readiness to identify the feelings of patriotic Zionists with the purposes of God (cf. Ps. 69:19, 27-28). The prior religious question, whether the ethical and spiritual conditions, long since laid down by the major prophets for the successful reoccupation of their Promised Land, under the judgment and with the blessing of their God, had as yet been met by the Jewish people themselves—that crucial question is here not even raised, much less faced with searching of heart and conscience. And the deeper religious problem of the right of mortal man to identify his immediate projects with the purposes of God, and then to pray for divine vengeance on those who oppose them (as Paul later faced that problem so searchingly in Rom. 12:19), is even more completely bypassed. It is not only Jesus’ parable of the Pharisee and the publican that raises these 6 So built we the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof: for the people had a mind to work.
NEHEMIAH

7 But it came to pass, that when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and the Arabians, and the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites, heard that the walls of Jerusalem were made up, and that the breaches began to be stopped, then they were very wroth, sensing the fact that the quotation does not exactly fit his specific case, appends the central reason for need of punishment, a reason indicating not simple "error" but deliberate, malicious, perverse conduct. The present awkward Hebrew text does not clearly state the reason, and the versions are of little help in recovering it. The M.T. has, lit., "for they provoked to anger before the builders." They have provoked thee reflects the Arabic version (cf. Deut. 31:29), but while the verb is used of Hebrew action, some argue that it was not used of a similar action by heathen people (Browne, Early Judaism, p. 97). Omitting the before, the Vulg. has "they mocked the builders" (cf. 2:19; 4:1). The Peshitta, if an obvious doublet is omitted ("the building") has "because they were furious against the builders," and this may be original.

D. FURTHER PROGRESS IN CONSTRUCTION OF THE WALL (4:6=Hebrew 3:38)

6. Nehemiah reported that the work progressed despite opposition. If all the wall is retained, then unto the half thereof must indicate its height, but the versions do not all have such a text. The all is omitted by the Peshitta and it has been argued that walls to be repaired (3:4) must have stood, at least in part, more than half their height when the work began. Then the reference would be to their circumference rather than their height (Gotthard, op. cit., p. 109; Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 532, note c; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 123). But the height would be necessary for the stopping of the breaches (4:1; Batten, op. cit., p. 228). However, neither height nor circumference alone may have been thought of, and the writer may have had in mind just half of the complete task of construction. The statement that the people had a mind to work is surprising in the light of the morale reflected in vs. 10. Since the Peshitta has "all" (א) instead of "heart" (פ= mind; cf. Ezra 6:22; 7:10), the text may have been, "it was half finished and all the people were working" (cf. Gotthard, loc. cit.).

E. CONSPIRACY AGAINST JERUSALEM (4:7-12=Hebrew 4:1-6)

7. When Jewish success was apparent in the fortification of Jerusalem, their neighbors on all sides were aroused. The Arabians were on the south, holding lands formerly belonging to Edom (cf. 2:19). After Tobiah, the Arabic version lists "Gashmu the Arabian," as in 2:19. The Ashdodites were named for one of the five principal Philistine cities (Josh. 11:22), Ashdod (modern Esdud), about three miles from the sea and about midway between Joppa and Gaza. It was the chief city of an Assyrian province (A. T.

deeper questions so inescapably for the Christian conscience today: they were squarely faced centuries before Christ by the greatest of the Hebrew prophets themselves (cf. Jer. 51:27-34; Amos 2:4-5; 5:14-27), as they were faced at a crisis in American history by Abraham Lincoln in his Second Inaugural Address.

We are on firmer religious ground in vs. 6, when Nehemiah (or the Chronicler) ceases to be so dogmatically certain about the purposes of the Almighty and so sure of the impossibility of God's forgiving Israel's enemies, and returns rather to the prosecution of his own immediate and God-given task. So we built the wall. . . . For the people had a mind to work. It is always man's part to do that which will not be done by other than human hands in the sustaining faith that God in his own time and way will "establish . . . the work of our hands upon us" (cf. Ps. 90:17 with Phil. 2:12b-13).

7-11. Without Were Fighting, Within Were Fears. When suspicion and ridicule did not 8 And conspired all of them together to come and to fight against Jerusalem, and to hinder it.

9 Nevertheless we made our prayer unto our God, and set a watch against them day and night, because of them.

10 And Judah said, The strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed, and there is much rubbish; so that we are not able to build the wall.

Olmstead, History of Assyria [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1923], p. 309] and the name may have survived to designate that district in the Persian period when the Persians adopted the administrative areas of the Assyrian provincial system (Albrecht Alt, "Nachwort über die territorialgeschichtliche Bedeutung von Sanheribs Eingriff in Palästina," Palästinajahrbuch, XXV [1929], 84; "Judas Nachbarn zur Zeit Nehemias," p. 72, n. 1). Thus the Ashdodites were the western neighbors of Judea. Omitted by Josephus, the Arabic version, and the LXXAB, the word Ashdodites is usually regarded as a later addition, under the influence of 13:23 ff. But the M.T. is supported by the Peshitta and the Vulg., and some Greek MSS have a corrupted name resembling the later Greek name of Ashod, "Azotus" (cf. Acts 8:40). The province survived into the later Persian period (cf. 13:23-24) and Ashdod was sacked in the Hellenistic period (I Macc. 5:68; 10:84).

Were made or going forward interprets a M.T. that uses for the progress on the wall the figure of the healing of a wound (cf. Jer. 8:22; 30:17; 53:6) which is rendered by the Vulg., "the wounds of the wall were closed" (cf. II Chr. 24:13). After vs. 6, began to be stopped is difficult unless "half of it" represents the height of wall (cf. Batten, loc. cit.). But began may be a redundant, nontemporal use of the word (cf. Ezra 5:2). Since 6:1 indicates that breaches still existed then, began here means simply that the work of filling the breaches was just starting.

8. It is unnecessary after vs. 1 ff. and 2:19 ff. to say that the enemies plotted together or conspired. The "assembled" of the Vulg. and the LXX is due to the to fight which follows immediately. To cause confusion is closer to the M.T. than the interpretative to hinder. Confusion renders a Hebrew noun elsewhere found as "error" (Isa. 32:6), quite similar in meaning to "iniquity" (cf. vs. 5). It is probable that the meaning here is to be explained by the cognate Arabic word in the sense of "din of battle," from a verb meaning "to make war" or "to make an uproar" (cf. Ehrlich, loc. cit.). It and in it represent the Hebrew "for him," which, because cities are feminine gender (cf. 2:17), is sometimes emended to "for her." More probably it (כְּבָשׁ) is a scribal error for "for us" (כְּבָשׁ) or "for me" (כְּבָשׁ), as in the LXX, which is even more characteristic of Nehemiah's style (Batten, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 124).

9. For הַיָּדָיִם, against them, the Peshitta reads יְנֵיה, "over us," but the original may have been יְנֵיה, "over her," referring to Jerusalem, for the Vulg., apparently influenced by vs. 13, has "we set watchmen upon the wall." For because of them the M.T. has, lit., "from their face," which can mean as a protection against them (cf. Gen. 7:7; Jer. 35:11).

10. Tension in the narrative is heightened by the realistic revelation of weakness in the Jewish camp. Surprising after 4:6, it reflects just the situation expected as the difficult work progressed. Since the context is military here, such reference to labor has led to the charge that the verse is intrusive (Batten, op. cit., p. 229; Rudolph, loc. cit.). It is recognized as a fragment of a lament of the burden-bearers and its metric structure (Qīnāh meter) and internal rhyme (sabbāl and nākhal) support the conjecture. The meter requires that and Judah said be part of the poem, not an introduction to it (Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 532; Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 633). Judah means not the ancient tribe but the entire postexilic community. Decayed and 11 And our adversaries said, They shall not know, neither see, till we come in the midst among them, and slay them, and cause the work to cease.

12 And it came to pass, that when the Jews which dwelt by them came, they said unto us ten times, From all places whence ye shall return unto us they will be upon you.

13 ¶ Therefore set I in the lower places behind the wall, and on the higher places, I even set the people after their families with their swords, their spears, and their bows.

failing, used here of failing strength (cf. Ps. 31:10), renders a Hebrew word meaning "to stagger," elsewhere used of tottering from weakness due to fasting (cf. Ps. 31:10). The LXX has, more dramatically, "shattered."

11. The opening words may have been suggested by those of vs. 10, as attention shifts suddenly from Judah to its enemies. Our adversaries, lit., "our besiegers," is rendered our enemies by the Peshitta.

12. The Hebrew text is incomplete and its last part is so corrupt as to make nonsense. Again the versions differ widely as they make the best of a corrupt text. The first part of the verse is clear and the general context of the message can be calculated from Nehemiah's reaction (vss. 13 ff.). An attack, threatened in vs. 11, is confirmed in vs. 12 by rumors of it reported from all sides.

Reports came in from the outlying Jews who lived by them, i.e., by the enemies of Jerusalem. The words came and ten times suggest that the Jews of outlying towns (cf. 3:5, 7, 13-14, 16-17) periodically went home and later returned with news of their districts, or that increasing tension drew a certain number of outlying Jews to Jerusalem for safety. Ten times is a general round number (cf. Gen. 31:7, 41; Lev. 26:26; Num. 14:22; 1 Sam. 1:8; Job 19:3).

Because מַלְאךָּסֹפְּתוֹ מִלְוָה מִלְוָה, from all the places, is difficult to connect in the M.T., it is proposed to read instead מַלְאךָּסֹפְּתוֹ מִלְוָה, "all the plans," and חָסְבָּה, "they planned," for דָּבָר; יִשְׁלָחֵם, ye shall return, translating "all the plots that they devised against us" (cf. Ehrlich, op. cit., p. 192; Rudolph, loc. cit.), but the versions do not support that ingenious emendation. The incomplete M.T., lit., "from all the places where," is filled out by they live in the Peshitta, and the LXXABK suggests that the verb יִשְׁלָחֵם, "they will come up," has been lost from the M.T., possibly because of its similarity to יִשְׁלָחֵם, against us. The verse is best translated by the Amer. Trans. which has, "When the Jews came who dwelt beside them, they said to us ten times, 'From all the places where they dwell they will come up against us.'"

F. JEWISH DEFENSIVE MEASURES (4:13-23 = Hebrew 4:7-17)

13. The object of the first set I, lost in textual transmission, was probably "builders" or "workmen." In the lower places does not reproduce the M.T., which has "from" rather than in. Lowest parts, as "the places below," could refer to places at the base of the wall outside the city where building stones were being prepared. Higher places stop the enterprise, mockery passed over into the threat of aggressive attack. This was the more dangerous because complaints over the hard labor and difficult conditions of the work were already weakening the morale of the Jews themselves (cf. vs. 10). To this outward and inward crisis Nehemiah applied his own characteristic combination of confidence in God (vss. 9, 14) with preparedness for all eventualities (vss. 9b, 15). The situation was one that exposed 14 And I looked, and rose up, and said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, Be not ye afraid of them: remember the Lord, which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters, your wives, and your houses.

15 And it came to pass, when our enemies heard that it was known unto us, and God had brought their counsel to nought, that we returned all of us to the wall, every one unto his work.

16 And it came to pass from that time forth, that the half of my servants wrought in the work, and the other half of them held both the spears, the shields, and the bows, and the habergeons; and the rulers were behind all the house of Judah.

translates a word elsewhere meaning "bare," in reference to a smooth, cleared rock surface (Ezek. 24:7-8; 26:4, 14). The LXX has open places, perhaps "cleared places." The word seems intended to determine more exactly the preceding general statement, behind the wall (Hermann Guthe and L. W. Batten, The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1901; "The Sacred Books of the Old Testament"], p. 47). It indicates cleared working areas within the walls to which the workmen were transferred so that work could be continued with safety. Families indicate the larger social groups, such as the clan. Lacking a professional Jewish army, weapons were in the hands of all the workmen.

14. The awkward and I looked is improved by the introduction of the object to read "I saw their fear" (Bertholet, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 59; Gotthard, op. cit., p. 120) or "I saw that they were afraid" (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 126). Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5.8) declares "the Jews were so alarmed that they nearly gave up building," and vs. 15 indicates that work stopped and the workmen left their posts on the wall. Again three groups are distinguished (cf. 2:16) as Nehemiah urges the Jews to share his trust in God (cf. vs. 20: 2:18). The words great and terrible again characterize God (cf. 1:5; Deut. 7:21; 10:17).

15. Their counsel is their plan or "their purpose" (cf. Ezra 4:5). No violence is implied, but Josephus (ibid.) claims that "they killed many of the Jews."

16. From that time forth means from the setting of the guard, when the Jews were persuaded to return to work. Servants, lit., "youths," were Nehemiah's own men who could be appointed to work on the walls (cf. 5:16) or to guard duty (cf. 13:19). Such "youths" were not slaves, for they had funds of their own (5:10), but were military retainers (Gen. 14:24; I Sam. 25:5 ff.; II Sam. 2:14 ff.; I Kings 20:14 ff.). They have been called part of Nehemiah's bodyguard (Batten, op. cit., p. 231) and their equipment suggests the short spears, wicker shields, long bows and iron-scaled armor of the Persian soldier (cf. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 239). Lacking is "the short sword slung from a girdle on the right hip," but since the list begins with and it is possible that the "swords" were originally listed also (cf. Bertholet, op. cit., p. 60). Coats of mail scattered workers to hostile surprise, rumors of which had been cunningly spread abroad. The psychology on both sides of the "cold war" between Russia and the Western democracies after World War II will help us to understand better the seriousness and the complexity of Nehemiah's problem at this crisis.
17 They which builded on the wall, and they that bare burdens, with those that laded, every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon.

18 For the builders, every one had his sword girded by his side, and so builded. And he that sounded the trumpet was by me.

19 ¶ And I said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, The work is great and large, and we are separated upon the wall, one far from another.

is preferable to the archaic habergeons, which indicated mail covering of the neck and breast, for Herodotus (History IX. 22) and Pausanius (Description of Greece I. 27. 1) mention golden-scaled armor worn by the Persian Masistius and fragments of iron and bronze scale armor were found at Persepolis, as well as some gold-covered iron scales (Schmidt, Treasury of Persepolis, pp. 44-46, Figs. 27 b, c, d, e).

Behind all the house is enigmatic unless it means that the servants stood guard over workers. The present M.T. indicates that the rulers stood back, apparently out of danger, but that seems unlikely. To render "supported" for behind is to employ modern idiom. A clear context demands the elision of the troublesome rulers (Rudolph, loc. cit.) even though the word is used by Nehemiah (12:82) and is here well attested by the versions (Kittel, op. cit., III, 683; Gotthard, op. cit., p. 124). It could easily be a dittograph of the preceding coats of mail (angganin; Holscher, Esra und Nehemia, p. 533). House of Judah means "Judeans" (Zeph. 2:7; Zech. 8:13, 15, 19; 10:3, 6; 12:4; Jer. 3:18). As the LXX and Vulg. show, who were building on the wall of vs. 17 should follow house of Judah in explanation. Both the burden-bearers and masons (vss. 17-18) were included in this group.

17. Perhaps because the soldiers were few the builders also were armed for defense. With those that laded suggests a second class of laborers, a view supported by the Vulg. and Peshitta. But the M.T. has a plural participle of uncertain meaning. Laded presumes a faulty spelling in the M.T. (השביע). The LXX translation "armed" (enoplōri) suggests that the difficult word, may be an error for ἔσθρημα, "were armed" (Siegfried, Esra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 88; Gotthard, op. cit., pp. 125-26; Rudolph, loc. cit.). Weapon here suggests something thrown, and the LXXAB translates it thus (bolida). Burden-bearers, who carried smaller stones or baskets of debris on their heads or shoulders, would usually have one hand free for the missile.

18. As the Peshitta indicates, the builders here were stonemasons, in contrast to the laborers of vs. 17. Since they needed both hands for work, their weapon had to be girded where it would be available but out of the way. The sword was perhaps a short one (cf. Judg. 3:16), such as Persian soldiers used (cf. vs. 16).

18b-20. Because the work on the walls was widely spread and there were relatively few defenders at any point, a system of alarms had to be instituted. A horn was to summon the workmen in time of attack. The trumpet (shophar) was a curved horn of a results. It is difficult to tell from the ambiguous account and the frequently obscure text, which is all we now have to go on, whether vss. 17-18 are a typically Oriental symbolism (defensive weapon in one hand, constructive tool in the other) for the fact that both guarding and building went forward together within the well-organized group, or whether vs. 16, with its picture of half the company at work and half on guard, is an original account which the Chronicler later combined with the other picture in vss. 17-18, characteristically not noticing.
20 In what place therefore ye hear the sound of the trumpet, resort ye thither unto us: our God shall fight for us.

21 So we labored in the work: and half of them held the spears from the rising of the morning till the stars appeared.

22 Likewise at the same time said I unto the people, Let every one with his servant lodge within Jerusalem, that in the night they may be a guard to us, and labor on the day.

23 So neither I, nor my brethren, nor my servants, nor the men of the guard which cow or ram. By me of the M.T. and Vulg. (vs. 18b) suggests that a single trumpeter accompanied Nehemiah, who expected to be at the point of attack where the alarm would be sounded. But that would give the foe the advantage, and good generalship would call for a number of trumpeters at strategic points to spread the alarm. The LXX and Peshitta, reading “next to him,” referring to the builder, suggest a system of alarms, and Josephus (loc. cit.) claimed that Nehemiah “stationed trumpeters at intervals of five hundred feet, with the command to give the signal to the people if the enemy appeared.” Nehemiah concludes his instruction with the comforting promise that the Jews would not face the enemy alone but with the support of God, in whose cause they labored.

21. The words half of them held the spears obviously intrude from vs. 16, presumably because labored at the work is found in both verses.

22. Most Judeans lived in the outlying towns (cf. 3:2, 5, 7, 14-17) with relatively few people in the city (7:4; 11:1-3). The new security of the city made it advisable for those in the vicinity to come within its completed walls in time of danger. It is sometimes assumed that the order (vs. 22) was directed to workmen in Jerusalem who were from out of town and had gone back and forth to their homes to gain recruits for the night watch, to prevent shirkers from being absent without leave, and to avoid possible contacts between Jewish traitors and the enemy (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 127). But the order was perhaps general, part of the means for defending the city.

His servant translates a word used in vs. 16 for military personnel, but it is unlikely that each Jew had a military retainer. Some have proposed to emend the text to read “like my servants,” with reference to Nehemiah’s men (vs. 16; ibid.). Others prefer emending to “his followers” (cf. Gen. 14:24; I Sam. 25:5 ff.). These critics limit the term to the officials of outlying towns and their followers, but that the word ever meant “fellow citizens” is unlikely. The word here most probably is collective, used for household servants of the people about to move to Jerusalem.

The verse should conclude with a balanced expression with nouns of the same force. Some Hebrew MSS have “for a guard” and “for work,” but the M.T. labor is not exactly parallel to the preceding word guard. It would be preferable to read “a working force,” but such usage is not attested elsewhere (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 234).

23. Josephus (loc. cit.) summarizes this verse by saying of Nehemiah: “He himself made the rounds of the city by night, never tiring either through work or lack of food and sleep, neither of which he took for pleasure but as a necessity.” But the verse or more probably not caring, about the resulting obscurities. In any case, Nehemiah’s gift for executive leadership knew how to enlist both workers and leaders in the forefront of the common task; how to guard against daytime surprises by their enemies at weak or isolated points (vss. 9, 18b-20); and how to protect his men against surprise or deceit at night, when the suburban workers had returned to their homes (vs. 22). Such foresightedness and effi-followed me, none of us put off our clothes, saving that every one put them off for washing.

5 And there was a great cry of the people and of their wives against their brethren the Jews.

Now there arose a great outcry of the people and of their wives against their crises indicates that his associates were also under pressure, ready to work or fight as needed. Since brethren, usually "fellow Jews," is more restricted in 5:14, it could refer here to close kinsmen (cf. 7:2). Servants were retainers of Nehemiah (cf. vs. 16). Men of the guard could mean the Persian bodyguard (2:9; cf. Bertholet, loc. cit.), but it also could refer in general to any who guarded the workmen (cf. vs. 18, 21). It is unlikely that who followed me indicates "who supported me" (cf. vs. 16). With "who escorted me" the Amer. Trans. identifies the guardsmen (2:9) but this is invalid if the reference is to armed Jews. The clause is perhaps a mistaken gloss under the influence of behind all the house of Judah (vs. 16; cf. Rudolph, loc cit.). It contributes nothing but confusion and should be omitted.

The conclusion of the M.T., "every man his missile the water," is nonsense. It is disputed both in ancient and modern times whether the word rendered his weapon (שׁלחה) should be the noun "his missile" (cf. vs. 17) or the verb "stripped himself" (שׁלחתו). The Vulg. interprets, "Every man stripped himself when he was to be washed." (cf. KJV, every one put them off for washing). But the verb is not used of "undressing," even though the rendition "let down" appears in an entirely different context in Jer. 38:6. Furthermore, the reference to remaining clothed (vs. 23a) is inadequate. One expects, then, a reference to having weapons ready constantly for an emergency. But if his weapon is correct, the water (ウォート) must be wrong. It could be emended to in his hand (sword; Torrey, Composition, p. 39, n. 1; Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 68), as in II Chr. 23:10, or to "lay at his right hand" (כְלָכָה; cf. II Sam. 14:19; Keil, Chronik, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 536; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 126-27).

V. Economic Problems (5:1-19)

A. Internal Jewish Problems (5:1-13)

Again the story is unexpectedly interrupted by extraneous material, purely socio-economic problems not directly connected with the building of the wall. The interpolation may again be a device to indicate a lapse of time (cf. 4:1), but it is possible that the insertion was made to illustrate further hindrance to the reconstruction due this time to internal conflict.

Since the wall was completed in the short interval of fifty-two days (6:15), it is unlikely that the economic situation was due to the draining of farm labor to construction work in the city (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 128). The situation presumed in the chapter was certainly the result of a long drought (cf. vs. 3), possibly the disaster that depleted the temple stores and drove the Levites to seek a livelihood in the country (cf. 13:5, 10-12). The substance and tone of the chapter suggest the circumstances of ch. 13 and the date in vs. 14 indicates that the narrative was written toward the end of Nehemiah's administration, long after the walls were completed.

ciency of organization put heavy burdens on the endurance and loyalty of each and every worker from the break of dawn till the stars came out (vs. 21), and then forbade them (including their leader himself who shared their exposure to attack) to rest at night without their clothes on their backs and their weapons at hand. Such was the complete and patient co-operation that made possible the accomplishment of the "great work" (6:15).

5:1-13. A Man's Foes . . . They of His Own Household.—Nehemiah's account of his problems with the enemies of his people suddenly shifts to an acute difficulty within his own group, one which has a curiously contemporary sound. Then, and ever since, great undertakings
2 For there were that said, We, our sons, and our daughters, are many: therefore we take up corn for them, that we may eat, and live.

1. IMPOVERISHED JEWS FORCED INTO SLAVERY (5:1-5)

Small Jewish landowners were reluctant to relinquish their inherited property (cf. I Kings 21:1-16), for from the land they both earned their living and paid their taxes and the property was capital that could be mortgaged for funds to prevent acute distress. But in real-estate loans the creditor took over the property, and the produce of the fields was applied toward the interest on the loan (F. R. Steele, Nuzi Real Estate Transactions [New Haven: American Oriental Society, 1943], pp. 44-49; Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 299). Every loan, however small, required collateral as a pledge—even so little as a cloak (Exod. 22:26; Deut. 24:13). Those without property who needed considerable sums to redeem their property or for living expenses were sometimes driven to the extremity of selling the services of their daughters (Exod. 21:7), sons (II Kings 4:1), or themselves (Lev. 25:39) as collateral. Sometimes the poor were sold into virtual slavery for as little as a pair of shoes (Amos 2:6; 8:6).

As early as the Covenant Code (Exod. 21:2-3) humanitarian considerations provided that Hebrew bondsmen were to be released every seventh year, the year of jubilee, and such provisions were found in the later codes (Deut. 15:12), but in the Priestly Code the interval between jubilees was increased to fifty years (Lev. 25:10). With Ezekiel real estate, too, was then to be restored to its original owners (Ezek. 46:17) and the Priestly Code made similar provisions, at least concerning lands outside of Jerusalem (Lev. 25:10, 13, 23, 28, 31; cf. 27:20-24; Num. 36:4). But reality worked against such idealistic legislation, and it is doubtful whether the jubilee ordinances were ever observed. In the one recorded instance of observance (Jer. 34:14-17) the bondsmen were re-enslaved almost at once, and later generations circumvented the laws of jubilee by means of the prosbol invented by Rabbi Hillel.

5:1. The complaint of the poor regarding their lot was chronic in the ancient Near East, but the great outcry against the wealthy Jewish brethren, who stood to profit from loans, was an unusual and concerted protest against prevailing practices which could not be ignored.

2-3. The M.T. of vs. 2 seems to complain that large families required much food and this has been interpreted to mean that “the population had increased faster than the means of support” (Batten, op. cit., p. 238). But Hebrews never complained about large families, and the real grievance is about the gradual loss of property and subsequent enslavement. It is better to read instead of עָרִיב שֶׁהוֹלָגוּ, many, the graphically similar עַרְבֵּים, “pledging,” making the construction agree with we are mortgaging in vs. 3 (Siegfried, Esra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 89; Gotthard, Text des Nehemia, p. 131; Rudolph, loc. cit.). It is highly probable that vs. 2 is but an early corruption of vs. 3, for the verses begin alike and are almost identical in Hebrew word order. Our daughters (הָעַדוֹת, vs. 2) is a corruption of our houses (הָעִבְדֵית, vs. 3). Then our fields, our vineyards of vs. 3, which would have been unintelligible before our daughters, was replaced by our sons, perhaps under the influence of vs. 5. As indicated above, many (vs. 2) corrupts mortgaging in 3 Some also there were that said, We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards, and houses, that we might buy corn, because of the dearth.

4 There were also that said, We have borrowed money for the king’s tribute, and that upon our lands and vineyards.

5 Yet now our flesh is as the flesh of our brethren, our children as their children: and, lo, we bring into bondage our sons may eat and keep alive.”

3 There were also those who said, “We are mortgaging our fields, our vineyards, and our houses to get grain because of the famine.”

4 And there were those who said, “We have borrowed money for the king’s tax upon our fields and our vineyards. Now our flesh is as the flesh of our brethren, our children are as their children; yet we are forcing our sons vs. 3. It is better to read חמקנום, “And we have taken” (Ehrlich, Randglossen, p. 194), for the M.T. let us get. In the present context of vs. 2 the concluding that we may eat, and live is logical. In the Vulg. “for their price” (דשא) in vs. 2 seems a corruption of the similar because of the dearth (בעזרה) of vs. 3. Greek texts refer to eating in vs. 3, and the Peshitta in vs. 3 adds “and live” after because of the dearth. Needless repetition and anticipation of material is avoided and no essential substance is lost if vs. 2 is regarded as a corrupt duplicate of vs. 3. For we are mortgaging the Peshitta interprets, “we are selling.” Instead of “we have taken,” it is possible to render that we might buy, since the later Hebrew verb has that sense (Marcus Jastrow, A Dictionary of the Targumim [New York: G. P. Putnam’s Sons, 1903], II, 717), which is also attested by the Akkadian cognate (laqû; Bezold, Babylonisch-Assyrisches Glossar, p. 161, col. 2). To interpret the Hebrew word for dearth to mean the farmer’s need for grain when he has used up his own produce (Batten, op. cit., pp. 238-39) is an unjustified softening of the meaning, for the word, meaning “be hungry,” elsewhere signifies not mere “need” but actual famine (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 129). Frequent famines were encountered in the relatively infertile mountain regions, strongly dependent upon rain (cf. Gen. 42:5; I Kings 18:1-2; II Kings 6:25 f.).

4. The king’s tribute was an additional tax to that of vs. 15, assessed for the needs of the kingdom (cf. Ezra 6:8; 7:20). The fifth satrapy, including Cyprus, Syria, and Palestine, was assessed 350 talents (Herodotus History III. 91). Little ever returned to the satrapy, and the king’s tendency to insist on payment in metal drained the empire of gold and silver and drove the landowners into the hands of local loan sharks everywhere in the empire (Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, pp. 298-99). It is unnecessary to omit our lands and vineyards, which is appended awkwardly in the M.T., under the assumption that the property has already changed hands (Guthe and Batten, op. cit., pp. 47-48; Siegfried, loc. cit.; Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 61), for the pleading and borrowing was a constant process and not all lands were yet held as pledge. The versions all boldly attempt to retain the words, and the LXXĄΒ makes “and our houses.” The preposition “upon” is introduced in the LXX, as though the properties were collateral for a loan, and this may be original (Jahn, Esra [A und B] und Nehemia, p. 110; Gotthard, op. cit., p. 132; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 128).

5. Although the Peshitta begins this verse with the formula used to begin vs. 3, 4, the yet now of the M.T. in the conclusion of the protests is intended to show the most extreme results of the economic policy, since each protest was increasingly more severe. Our flesh and our children do not declare that the poor are as good as the rich, but emphasize the fact of racial unity between the oppressors and their victims. This is made explicit in the LXX, which adds after our sons the words “for we are one flesh.”

Table because they could not afford to buy more food; for those likewise who had mortgaged their property to buy food when it was scarce, or had sold their children into slavery to pay their taxes. Even warier was his indignation at his fellow Jews who had taken advantage of hard times and short supplies to enrich themselves at the cost of their own Jewish brethren.

I was very angry (vs. 6).

Twenty-four centuries have passed between and our daughters to be servants, and some of our daughters are brought into bondage already: neither is it in our power to redeem them; for other men have our lands and vineyards.

6 And I was very angry when I heard their cry and these words.

7 Then I consulted with myself, and I rebuked the nobles, and the rulers, and said unto them, Ye exact usury, every one of his brother. And I set a great assembly against them.

Flesh is used in our sense of “blood.” Not a foreign tyrant but a racial brother was responsible for the abuses and the distress. If parents had to make a shocking confession, at least there lay behind it the implication that their fellow Jews were actually responsible for the situation.

Brought into bondage (שָׁבַל) means “to press,” then “to tread,” and finally, “to oppress,” but the addition of to be slaves after it indicates that enslavement is not involved in the verb itself. After specific reference to enslavement of both sexes, the charge is repeated with reference to some of our daughters. Some omit the repetitious material (Jahn, loc. cit.), but if it is retained obviously the verb must have a different meaning. In Esth. 7:8 that verb definitely has sexual significance, for the LXX there has, “Wilt thou even force the woman in my house?” Here the verb “press” or “tread” is a euphemism for rape (cf. C. D. Buck, A Dictionary of Selected Synonyms in the Principal Indo-European Languages [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1949], p. 279). The LXXI here has “some of our daughters have been taken by force,” but this has been explained as arising through dittography (cf. Gotthard, loc. cit.).

Stripped of their capital, the complainants were helpless, unable to do more than pay the interest on their debt. Neither is it in our power is incomplete and, as does the M.T., needs something like to redeem, as in the Vulg., or to help it. The M.T. has, lit., “And there is not the power of our hands” (cf. Deut. 28:32). To our fields and our vineyards the Peshitta adds “and our possessions.” For בָּעְלָם, “belongs to others” (M.T.), the LXX has בָּעְלֵי הָעִנְיָנִים, “belongs to the nobles,” which some regard as original (Jahn, loc. cit.; Gotthard, op. cit., p. 133), but that reading, although it gives the proper interpretation, seems to be wholly conjectural and the M.T. is preferable (Ehrlich, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 128).

2. NEHEMIAH’S PROTEST AND SOLUTION (5:6-13)

6. Nehemiah became violently angry when his moral sense was aroused (13:8, 21, 25). Their outcry is the complaint of vs. 2-5. These words may mean “these things.” Instead of I was very angry, which renders the Hebrew idiom (cf. 4:1; 4:7), the Peshitta and the LXX have “and I was much grieved.” This probably is due to the beginning of vs. 7, but the M.T., supported by the Vulg., seems original, for it fits well the temper of “and I contended” in vs. 7.

7. Consulted with myself is translated by the LXX as “my heart took counsel within me,” and the Vulg. has “my heart thought with myself.” Thus the “heart” in the M.T. indicates “mind” (cf. Ezra 6:22; 7:27). The Amer. Trans. interprets the M.T. properly this very human story of long ago and the “chiselers,” “scroungers,” war profiteers, and black market operators and customers of our own experience. Most communities, especially the smaller ones, still find it hard to forgive or forget the leaders of organized religion who “devour widows’ houses, and . . . make long prayers” (Mark 12:40)—though not always “for a pretense.” And every generation may have its share of politicians who in a time of 8 And I said unto them, We, after our ability, have redeemed our brethren the Jews, which were sold unto the heathen: and will ye even sell your brethren? or shall they be sold unto us? Then held they their peace, and found nothing to answer.

9 Also I said, It is not good that ye do: ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God against them, 8 and said to them, “We, as far as we are able, have bought back our Jewish brethren who have been sold to the nations; but you even sell your brethren that they may be sold to us!” They were silent, and could not find a word to say. 9 So I said, “The thing that you are doing with “after thinking it over,” but such translations are possible only by adopting the Aramaic or Akkadian meaning of the verb “to counsel” (cf. Dan. 4:27). Hebrew usage demands a translation “my heart was king over me” (Batten, op. cit., p. 240). Those who believe that Nehemiah acted impulsively, motivated by emotion, emend the text to “my heart was turned within my body” (cf. Hos. 11:8; Ehrlich, op. cit., pp. 194-95) or “my heart trembled” (Jahn, op. cit., p. 111), and the Peshitta has “my heart was broken within me.” The M.T. is preferable.

As usual, Nehemiah dealt with the officials before going directly to the people (cf. 2:16). I rebuked and I brought charges against represent the M.T., “I contended with.” The complaint seems not against exacting interest or against usury, which was illegal (cf. Deut. 23:20), but against the demand for important capital as a pledge. The verb involved (קדש) always means “to loan on pledge” (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 130) so the complaint is properly rendered by the American Jewish Translation as “Ye lend upon pledge” (cf. Deut. 24:10). Unsuccessful with the nobles themselves, Nehemiah appealed to the people directly through a popular assembly (cf. vs. 13).

8. Jews enslaved by Jews were to be released in the year of jubilee (Lev. 25:10, 13, 39-41) but those enslaved by the heathen or the nations had to be redeemed (cf. Lev. 25:47-49). Nehemiah here indicates that such ransom were being paid to redeem fellow Jews. The M.T. “acquired” is interpreted as bought back or redeemed. Some consider the practice limited to Jews brought home from Persia (Bernhard Stade, Biblische Theologie des Alten Testaments [Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1905], I, 323), but others think only of Jews in Gentile hands in and about Judea (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 241). The program of purchase was limited only by “the sufficiency among us,” which means, as the Vulg. shows, as far as we are able. The LXX has “of our free will,” which some regard as better than the M.T. (Gotthard, op. cit., p. 135; Batten, loc. cit.). An ambiguous M.T. is rendered by the Vulg. and the LXX as those who have been sold, but the American Jewish Translation, “that sold themselves,” is preferable, indicating such sales as in vvs. 2, 5.

The leaders were berated for driving fellow Jews to desperation with their demand for pledges. As in the Vulg. and the LXX, the Amer. Trans. presents the statement to the leaders as a rhetorical question, implying that the greedy Jews were responsible for Jewish enslavement. The practice was economically as well as morally wrong since it compelled the spending of the limited Jewish capital for the ransom. For the M.T. shall they be sold unto us it is proposed to read ורכשו, “so that we should purchase” (Rudolph, loc. cit.; cf. Vulg. “for us to redeem them”).

9. Fear was to be the basis for reform. The nobles stood in relation to God as their subservient underlings did to them (cf. Ps. 123:2), trembling lest they displease (Ps. 119:120). Since God is “terrible” (cf. 1:5; 4:14) it is difficult to see how fear could be separated from “dread” (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 242). Jewish devotion moved between national and world crisis can see nothing farther away or more important than winning the next election, by fair means or foul.

Nehemiah's method of dealing with these perennial human problems was characteristically forthright. He was not satisfied to “view with alarm” in a political or commencement address before an audience in which the offenders were scantily represented, or even to write vigorous letters to the newspapers. He went straight to because of the reproach of the heathen our enemies?

10 I likewise, and my brethren, and my servants, might exact of them money and corn: I pray you, let us leave off this usury.

11 Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their oliveyards, and their houses, also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and the oil, that ye exact of them.

Thepoles of fear and love. The loving God sometimes chastised his children (Prov. 3:11-12), but the respectful and obedient experienced God's love. The fear of God was thus synonymous with righteousness (cf. Job 1:1, 8) and inseparable from it (Ps. 111:10; Prov. 1:7; cf. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture III-IV, pp. 623-27). The righteous found freedom from fear in his relationship with God because the fear of God consumed all other fears (cf. Ps. 27:1).

Failure to fear God meant divine reprisals, both personal punishment and national degradation. Taunts suggests the return of destruction and disgrace (cf. 1:3). The M.T. now identifies the nations as enemies, a common concept in later Judaism; but here some would reserve the first term, nations, for the Gentiles who bought Jews as slaves (cf. vs. 8) and the second, enemies, for Nehemiah's foes, and would omit one of the terms (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 248). But the omission of the nations here by the LXX^ABR is no more than an easy error in copying, and the LXX^L with the other versions has both terms.

10. Nehemiah and his companions also made loans to the needy. Brethren may mean actual kinsmen (cf. 4:23). The Peshitta has “my sons” but reads my brethren for my servants, which follows in the M.T. Servants (cf. 4:16) is again misunderstood by the LXX, which has “my acquaintance.” With Let us leave off, Nehemiah and his people associate themselves with those who are guilty of the now-condemned practice of taking pledges. To avoid this conclusion, to which both the M.T. and the Vulg. point, it is proposed to emend the text to read, “And we have remitted this interest” (ibid., pp. 242-43), but there is no textual support for such translation. Others hold that Nehemiah not only condemned holding a pledge and charging interest but also favored the remission of the principal loan itself as an extension of the practice planned for the year of jubilee (cf. Deut. 15:1-11), a view expressed also by the Vulg., “Let us forgive the debt that is owing to us” (Bertholet, op. cit., p. 62). Because of its similarity in content to vs. 11, and possibly because of the uncertainty of the Hebrew word translated interest or usury (cf. vs. 7), the versions differ widely at the end of the verse. The M.T. must mean “Let us leave off, I pray, this taking on pledge.”

11. Among the items to be restored by the wealthy, in addition to those listed in vs. 3, are added olive orchards, which are constantly mentioned in the Deuteronomistic legislation underlying Nehemiah's proposals (cf. Deut. 6:11), and wine and oil, which do not appear in the complaints (vs. 2-5) but were likely commodities to be pledged. The oil is fresh oil of the new crop (yishār) and the wine is “new wine” (tīrāsh). Thus creditors were not to substitute old stock that they would like to move in exchange for the fresh crop that was pledged.

Hundredth part is difficult to interpret since a return of 1 per cent would have no his offending brethren, not only in private but in public (vs. 7). He used appeals not only to their better nature (vs. 9a) but also to their patriotic pride (vs. 9b). He was not satisfied with their promises to emend their ways, but put them on public oath (vs. 12). And he even went so far as an imprecatory prayer that to our modern ears sounds very much like a curse upon those who did not keep their promise (vs. 13). According to his own account of the 12 Then said they, We will restore them, and will require nothing of them; so will we do as thou savest. Then I called the priests, and took an oath of them, that they should do according to this promise.

13 Also I shook my lap, and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labor, that performeth not this promise, even thus be he shaken out, and emptied. And all the congregation said, Amen, and praised the LORD. And the people did according to this promise.

14 ¶ Moreover from the time that I was appointed to be their governor in the land been exacting of them.” 12 Then they said, “We will restore these and require nothing from them. We will do as you say.” And I called the priests, and took an oath of them to do as they had promised. 13 I also shook out my lap and said, “So may God shake out every man from his house and from his labor who does not perform this promise. So may he be shaken out and emptied.” And all the assembly said “Amen” and praised the LORD. And the people did as they had promised.

14 Moreover from the time that I was appointed to be their governor in the land of Judah, from the twentieth year even unto the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that is, twelve years, I and my brethren have not eaten the bread of the governor.
15 But the former governors that had been before me were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, besides forty shekels of silver; yea, even their servants bare rule over the people: but so did not I, because of the fear of God.

the moneylenders for if, as seems likely, the date twelve years (vs. 14) is genuine, the passage could not have been earlier than the end of his administration (433/432 b.c.).

14-15. Subject peoples had to support the local Persian bureaucracy (vs. 15) in addition to tax and tribute (Ezra 4:13). During the twelve years of his administration Nehemiah refused to make such local assessments, which would have meant an additional burden on the Jewish economy. He paid the expenses of his administration himself.

Only here does Nehemiah refer to his appointment. He was not a “satrap” (Batten, op. cit., p. 245) but a minor official, perhaps more the rank of the later Greek ethnarch (cf. Ezra 5:14). Governor is an ambiguous term, but the satraps themselves sometimes gave their title to their subordinates (George Rawlinson, The History of Herodotus [New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1859], II, 462). Nothing certain is known about the former governors (cf. Ezra 2:2), but probably some at least were Jewish (Julius Wellhausen, Israelitische und Jüdische Geschichte [Berlin: G. Reimer, 1894], p. 150; Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 88, n. 1). Ezra’s silence regarding them has been regarded as evidence for the arrival of Nehemiah before Ezra (Albin Van Hoonacker, “Néhémié et Esdras,” Le Muséon, IX [1890], 160-61).

Bread of the governor was the food allowance (cf. Mal. 1:7-8), since bread (vs. 15) means food in general. But the forty shekels of silver were not besides the food, for the word in the M.T., עָנָן, “after,” is never used in the sense of “in addition” in Hebrew (cf.
Rudolph, op. cit., p. 132). English versions usually ignore the preposition ד before the word bread in the M.T. and the versions, but the American Jewish Translation rightly translates “for bread” (cf. E. F. Kautzsch, ed., Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, tr. A. E.
Cowley [2nd English ed.; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1910], sec. 119p; Eduard König, Historisch-comparative Syntax der hebräischen Sprache [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1897], sec. 332o; Rudolph, loc. cit.). Thus the silver was the amount collected by the governor for food. The Vulg., which has “every day” (quotidie), suggests an original Hebrew text “for one day” (יָומֹן, יומָנָה), of which the words “for day” (יומֹן) have been lost before the graphically similar word bread (יום) and the “one” (יום), also read by the Ethiopic version, has been altered to the quite similar “after” (יומָנָה) of the present text. The original text was thus, “and they took from them for bread for one day forty shekels of silver.” And wine is an intrusion due to its presence in vs. 18 (cf.
Rudolph, loc. cit.).

Were chargeable unto interprets the M.T., “they made heavy upon the people.”
Since the LXXL includes the word “collar” (kloion), it is assumed that יָשָׁךְ, “yoke,” shown a fine sense of personal responsibility by maintaining a large official household at his own expense, in view of the general destitution, instead of demanding for them the food allowance of the governor. And if his final appeal to God, Remember for my good . . . all that I have done for this people (vs. 19), strikes on our modern ears as a bit like trying to drive a religious bargain with a God before whose righteous judgments “all have sinned and fall short” (Rom. 3:23), we Christians must remember that both he and the Chronicler, who preserved his memoirs for us, were alike living not under grace but under “the law.”

16 Yea, also I continued in the work of this wall, neither bought we any land: and all my servants were gathered thither unto the work.

17 Moreover there were at my table a hundred and fifty of the Jews and rulers, besides those that came unto us from among the heathen that are about us.

has dropped from the M.T. in error before the similar by, upon. Laid heavy burdens upon presumes such emendation (cf. Isa. 47:6; I Kings 12:10, 14).

The verb rendered bare rule over or lording it over, related to the word “sultan,” means in late Hebrew “to domineer” or “to be master.” The youthful subordinates of the former governors did not share the rule but rather were insolent and haughty toward the Jews (Batten, loc cit.). Nehemiah protests his innocence of such exploitation (cf. Paul in I Cor. 9:12; II Cor. 11:9). He did not use his full power because he was a God-fearing man (vs. 9).

16. This seems an intrusion into the statement of the expenses of the governor's table (vss. 14-18) but it is a side comment introduced because of the reference to presumptuous servants in vs. 15b. Here Nehemiah offers positive assertion that he and his staff were not like his predecessors. Both he (cf. 4:18, 21, 23) and his servants (4:16, 23) worked on the wall. Since they had no special assignments (ch. 3) the servants apparently worked where needed, while Nehemiah moved about (4:18, 20) as supervisor. His activity is described as “strengthening” the wall (cf. 3:4). Because the verb “be strong” has many meanings, the versions have such divergent renditions as “I did not treat them harshly” (LXX̄AB̄), “I was of good courage” (Peshitta), and “I prevailed” (LXX̄).

This wall (M.T. and Peshitta) suggests Palestinian authorship, but the Vulg. and the LXX have “the wall.” Reference to the purchase of land in connection with the building of the wall led to the suggestion that the material is out of place and should be with vss. 1-5 since Nehemiah refused to take advantage of the needy as the wealthy had done to acquire property cheaply (ibid., p. 246). It has been suggested that in the building of the wall property owners had a particular responsibility and that Nehemiah, without property, was doing more than was required. But it is clear in ch. 3 that all workmen were not property owners in Jerusalem. It is also suggested that during Nehemiah’s administration there was a general redistribution of land (Wilhelm Bolle, Das israelitische Bodenrecht [Berlin: Dissertation, 1940], pp. 86 ff.), but this is unlikely, for Nehemiah would have given the details of such an important reform. Bought we involves the “servants” in Nehemiah’s action and this interpretation is defensible (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.), but at least five Hebrew MSS and all the ancient versions indicate that the M.T. should be emended to I . . . acquired.

17. Resuming the subject of vss. 14-15, Nehemiah describes the size of his household and the expense of feeding it. Just as Solomon supported his court (I Kings 4 22-23), it was perhaps the Persian custom for administrators to feed their own staff and retainers (cf. Meyer, op. cit., pp. 132-33). Satraps collected more than the royal assessment of tribute to support their establishments (Rawlinson, History of Herodotus, II, 462) and lesser officials were likewise responsible (cf. vs. 14). Jews and rulers implies two groups, but since the officials were Jews (cf. 2:16; 4:14, 19; Ezra 9:2), it is best, with the Peshitta, to make the terms identical and read, “the Jews, namely the officials.” Such officials resided in Jerusalem (cf. 11:1). The second group, which fluctuated so much in size that no exact number could be given, were apparently visiting officials and their retinue, part of the steady flow of supervisors necessary for the functioning of the extended bureaucracy of the empire. These came to Judea from the nations round about. It is unnecessary to identify this group as Jewish refugees newly arrived who were cared 18 Now that which was prepared for me daily was one ox and six choice sheep; also fowls were prepared for me, and once in ten days store of all sorts of wine: yet for all this required not I the bread of the governor, because the bondage was heavy upon this people.

19 Think upon me, my God, for good, according to all that I have done for this people.

for until they could be established in the community (Batten, loc. cit.). Such persons would perhaps be considered part of the former group of Jews.

Like Solomon (I Kings 4:22 ff.), Nehemiah lists the food necessary for a single day. The quantity has been estimated to be sufficient for four or five hundred people if, as seems probable, other foods supplemented those listed (ibid., pp. 246-47). For sheep the Vulg. has “rams,” and through confusion of similar Hebrew words, the LXX and, Ethiopic, and Peshitta versions have “goats” (דבוריים). Solomon lists fowl (I Kings 4:23), and birds were regular items in the diet of the Persian period (cf. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 183). In addition to doves, geese, and such clean (cf. Deut. 14:11) wild birds as partridge (I Sam. 26:20), quail (Exod. 16:13; Num. 11:31), and the sparrow (cf. Matt. 10:29; Luke 12:6), chickens were eaten. A cock appears on a seal as early as ca. 600 B.C. (W. F. Albright and P. E. Dumont, “A Parallel Between Indic and Babylonian Sacrificial Ritual,” Journal of the American Oriental Society, LIV [1934], 109, n. 7) and chickens are common from the Persian period onward (Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, pp. 349-50).

Wine was supplied but the awkward M.T. cannot tell the quantity. Every ten days or once in ten days translates a Hebrew text “in the interval of ten days” (cf. Ludwig Köhler, “Hebräische Vokabeln III,” Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, LVIII [1941], p. 229). Jahn (Ezra [A und B] und Nehemja, p. 113) emends the text to “and of wine ten baths every day,” but the quantity (almost eighty gallons) seems excessive and the required emendation is too severe. Assuming the loss of לְבֵן, “vessels,” before לְבֵן, “all,” which it resembles, the text would be “vessels of all kinds of wine” (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.). Two Hebrew MSS which have “a skin” [םֵלֶב] of wine” suggest that instead of לְבֵן, of all sorts, the original may have been skins of [םֵלֶב] wine in abundance.

The M.T. needs such a verb as “I gave,” supplied in the Vulg., but it is reasonable to suppose that the verb was originally understood to be prepared.

Bondage, used of taskwork in Egypt (Exod. 1:14; 2:23), has more implication of slavery than the context here requires. It would be suitable for the arduous task of working on the wall (cf. Gotthard, Text des Nehemia, p. 144), but since the reference in vs. 18 is to “service” required to pay taxes during difficult economic times, “service” or servitude is sufficiently strong.

19. Nehemiah’s declaration of virtue is not a self-righteous boast (cf. Luke 18:11-14) but an expression in harmony with the ancient Egyptian proverb, “A man’s virtue is his monument; forgotten is the man of evil repute” (cf. James H. Breasted, The Dawn of Conscience [New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1933], p. 160). It parallels similar statements, such as that of Amen of Beni Hasan, et al., in both Egypt and Babylonia (ibid., pp. 213-14; cf. Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 650). Here, as elsewhere (13:14, 22, 31), with an eye to the future, Nehemiah pleads that he may be remembered for his virtuous acts, just as did the Egyptian Uzahor who said, “O thou gods of Sais! Think of all the good that the Chief Physician Uzahor-empiris has done!” (Cf. H. K. Brugsch, A History of Egypt Under the Pharaohs, tr. Philip Smith [London: John Murray, 1881], II, 306; cf. Berthelet, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 63.)
VI. CONTINUATION OF WORK ON THE WALL (6:1-19)

A. PSYCHOLOGICAL ATTACKS ON NEHEMIAH (6:1-14)

1. Plot to Trap Nehemiah Away from Home (6:1-4)

6:1. This chapter resumes the narrative of the building of the wall (ch. 4). Again the interpolation of the digressive material in ch. 5 may serve as a literary device to indicate a lapse of time (cf. ch. 3) during which the work progressed, for in 6:1 there is no longer a breach in it and the gate openings have been completed (cf. 2:13). But a parenthetic note states that the doors, the wooden leaves to replace those burned (cf. 1:3; 2:17), had not been set in their sockets. This comment has been termed a gloss (Hölscher, Esa und Nehemia, p. 586; Gotthard, op. cit., p. 146), but its substance is essential for understanding Nehemiah's excuse (cf. vs. 3b) after claiming that the wall was finished (vs. 1) and the later (vs. 15) announcement of the completion of the wall.

The success of the Jews was reported to their enemies.

Tobiah has been regarded as added in vs. 1 because he is missing in vs. 2, and there is no preposition before his name in vs. 1 (Hölscher, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 134); but the preposition is found in twenty-three Hebrew MSS as well as in the Peshitta and the LXXL (Gotthard, op. cit., p. 145), and the absence in vs. 2 may be explained otherwise. Sanballat and Tobiah are usually mentioned together (cf. 2:10, 19). The rest of our enemies doubtless included the Ashodites (cf. 4:7).

2. By messenger Sanballat and Geshem (2:19) sought to trap Nehemiah away from home. The Vulg. interprets the M.T. to declare that the meeting was in order to frame a treaty, but this merely reflects the influence of "let us take counsel together" (vs. 7; cf. Gotthard, op. cit., p. 146). Such apparently harmless meetings were a common deceitful means for eliminating enemies (cf. Jer. 41:1-3; I Macc. 12:39-53; 16:11-24). To do me harm shows Nehemiah's suspicion and explains his reluctance to go. Some think "Tobiah" has been lost accidentally in this verse, but it is possible that he dissociated himself from the action because he disapproved of the personal violence anticipated (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 249). Ono (cf. Ezra 2:33) lay in the Wadi Musâra, in the Sharon Plain, almost nineteen miles from Jerusalem. It was possibly selected for the meeting because the area had long been a neutral district directly under Persia and not part of the provinces of Philistia, Judea, or Samaria, perhaps even from late Assyrian times (Alt, "Judas Nachbarn zur Zeit Nehemias," pp. 72-73, n. 5; Gustav Beyer, "Die Stadtgebiete..."

6:1-9. An Ancient War of Nerves.—What had been in ch. 4 merely mockery and threats on the part of the enemies of Nehemiah's undertaking pass over now into subtler forms of what we call "a war of nerves." No small part of the present-day relevance of these memoirs comes from their plain indication of the way in which Nehemiah met and overcame these even more searching tests of his courage, patience, and faith.

The first attempt of his persistent and unscrupulous enemies was their apparently innocent proposal of a private conference in a village at some distance, which Nehemiah viewed as a trap to do him bodily harm. He met it with a combination of personal fearlessness and social responsibility that reveals a real leader at his best. I am doing a great work and I cannot come down. Why should the work stop while I leave it and come down to you?
THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

3 And I sent messengers unto them, saying, I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down: why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you? 4 Yet they sent unto me four times after this sort; and I answered them after the same manner. 5 Then sent Sanballat his servant unto me in like manner the fifth time with an open letter in his hand:

3-4. Nehemiah dealt subtly (cf. 2:3) with his foes, concealing his suspicions and fears, gaining time with each exchange of messages, but never committing himself to a definite appointment. His constant excuse was that his great work would not permit his absence from Jerusalem. Why, inappropriate in Nehemiah's letter, is not found in the versions. The LXX, Vulg., Ethiopic, and Peshitta all render "lest," which is a possible translation of the Hebrew word הָשָׁם (Ezra 4:22; 7:23; cf. Gen. 27:45; Ehrlich, Randglossen, p. 196; Rudolph, loc. cit.) Although the N.T. expresses a definite refusal to meet, the LXX merely defers decision on an indefinite basis, "As soon as I shall have finished it, I will come down to you." This presupposes no other Hebrew text but translates והָשָׁם, leave, in the sense "leave off," "be finished" (cf. ibid.). In this way indicates that the letters were all substantially the same (cf. II Sam. 15:6), urging a meeting, but they doubtless became more urgent and stronger as time went on.

2. CHARGE OF SEDITION (6:5-9)

With the fifth letter Sanballat put greater pressure upon Nehemiah by charging that the work was preliminary to rebellion and that Nehemiah intended to proclaim his kingship. The real pressure came with the threat that the king would be informed (vs. 7). The letter in Ezra 4:8-16, addressed to Artaxerxes, if not one written before Nehemiah's arrival (cf. Neh. 1:3), could be just such a letter instigated by the Samaritans (cf. Ezra 4:10).

5-6. The Ethiopic version interprets open letter as meaning "not sealed." Some explain that an unsealed letter would be an insult (Thomson, Land and Book, p. 132; cf. Gotthard, op. cit., p. 148), but one would scarcely insult a person being enticed to a meeting (Batten, op. cit., p. 252). It could have been an unsealed papyrus sheet, but even more probably it was an ostraca, a letter on a pottery fragment which could be neither folded nor sealed. Such are known from the time of Jeremiah (Harry Torczyner, et al., The Lachish Letters [London: Oxford University Press, 1938]; G. R. Driver, Semitic Writing from Pictograph to Alphabet [London: British Academy, 1948], Pl. 53, No. 3) and even earlier (Raymond A. Bowman, "Aramaic, Aramaic, and the Bible," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, VII [1948], G. R. Driver, op. cit., Pl. 55, No. 1).

(Vs. 3.) How often through the centuries since has that trumpetlike reaffirmation of the significance and urgency of a present responsibility heartened the resolution of other leaders in later crises, and lifted the spirits of their followers with its contagious confidence! No wonder this stirring sentence has echoed down the generations as probably the most oft-quoted text from Nehemiah, and his most characteristic spiritual bequest to posterity. Nor is it simply a text for church leaders who in every generation must "rebuild the walls of Zion" and "strengthen her gates." It has its own message to all of us modern folk who have to live and do our daily work within reach of the telephone, the postman, and the doorbell. From the early morning hours when we try to keep a few moments clear in our closet for private devotion, or together before the family altar, to the end of the day when we try to drop to sleep
6 Wherein was written, It is reported among the heathen, and Gashmu saith it, that thou and the Jews think to rebel: for which cause thou buldest the wall, that thou mayest be their king, according to these words.

7 And thou hast also appointed prophets to preach of thee at Jerusalem, saying, There is a king in Judah: and now shall it be reported to the king according to these words. Come now therefore, and let us take counsel together.

As the LXX and Peshitta show, vs. 6 is to be tied closely to what precedes by restoring in the M.T. the "and" that has been lost through haplography at the beginning of the verse. According to these words is a senseless, disturbing intrusion from vs. 7. If nations has its derogatory connotation, heathen, it is Nehemiah's rather than Sanballat's term, for the latter would have used the word "peoples," as in Ezra 4:10. The letter is possibly but a summary of the original (cf. Siegfried, Esra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 94). It is reported (cf. I Cor. 5:1), lit., "it is heard" (cf. Deut. 4:32), indicates that the letter passes on gossip among the neighbors of Judea regarding Jewish motives. Gashmu, mentioned parenthetically, is the Geshem of vs. 1; 2:19.

Most serious, if the charge reached the king, was the accusation that Nehemiah had set himself up as king, for the Persian rulers dealt harshly with usurpers, as the Behistun Inscription shows. The Hebrew behind thou mayest be their king is "thou art being a king for them," but the Vulg. renders freely, "thou hast a mind to set thyself king over them," which is a possible translation of the M.T. (Gotthard, op. cit., p. 149). The LXX and Ethiopic versions likewise express purpose with you wish to become their king.

7. Prophets, long connected with kingship in Israel, selected such usurpers as Jeroboam (I Kings 11:29-31) and Jehu (II Kings 9:1 ff.) , stirring rebellion against the existing king (cf. Jer. 28:1-4, 11). The Jews had a reputation as a rebellious people (cf. Ezra 4:12, 15). There may have been some foundation to the rumor, for the success of Nehemiah in refortifying Jerusalem, rallying the Jews, and defeating their adversaries may have induced some enthusiastic prophets to consider that the messianic age had come and that Nehemiah would be king (cf. Bertholet, op. cit., p. 64; Batten, op. cit., p. 253; Rudolph Smend, "Uber die Genesis des Judenthums," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, II [1882], 147), just as Haggai (2:21-23) and Zechariah (3:8; 4:6-10; 6:10-15) favored Zerubbabel. But it is inconceivable that Nehemiah started the rumors or favored the idea.

without taking too much anxious thought for the morrow, some peremptory ring of interruption or distraction or plausible appeal keeps bidding for our limited supply of time, attention, energy. How slowly, and through how many mistakes in perspective or decisiveness, do we learn to say to all the enemies of our major responsibilities, I am doing a great work and I cannot come down.

After this stratagem and reply had been repeated four times, the next device of Nehemiah's enemies was an open letter, charging his people with planning rebellion, and him with personal ambition to be king—all this to be reported promptly to the Persian king. Their plausible proposal then was for a conference to consider what to do about these current reports. This misrepresentation Nehemiah met with a flat denial and the countercharge that the reports themselves were a deliberate "plant." His shrewd insight into the motives behind all this— to weaken the morale of his people, and to arouse fear in his own heart—led him, so the English texts would suggest, into a moving prayer to God for strength of hands and heart in the face of such unscrupulous opposition:
8 Then I sent unto him, saying, There are no such things done as thou sayest, but thou feignest them out of thine own heart.

9 For they all made us afraid, saying, Their hands shall be weakened from the work, that it be not done. Now therefore, O God, strengthen my hands.

8. Bluntly and directly Nehemiah denies the rumors and charges his foes with fabricating them. Thou feignest them and you are inventing them are milder and less exact renderings than the LXX, “You are falsifying them.” Here again heart renders the M.T. literally, but its significance is psychologically mind.

9. This has been regarded as but a fragment of the original text (Ehrlich, Randglossen, pp. 197-98) or as “an interpolation by the Chronicler or a modification of some comment of Nehemiah” (Batten, op. cit., p. 254). But it is Nehemiah’s statement concluding the episode, interpreting and evaluating it. It progresses beyond the preceding narrative. They all includes all of those conspiring with Sanballat (cf. vs. 1). The Jews had been fearful earlier, when strong force threatened an almost defenseless people (cf. 4:8; 11-12, 14), but the threat to accuse them of sedition was even more terrifying because they stood to lose everything in an act of retaliation. Their hands shall be weakened idiomatically signifies demoralization (cf. II Sam. 4:1; Isa. 13:7; Jer. 6:24; 50:43; Ezek. 7:17; Zeph. 3:16; and Torczyner, Lachish Letters, No. VI, ll. 5-6). With the following from the work it constitutes a pregnant construction in the sense “so that they cease working” (Siegfried, op. cit., p. 95; cf. Kautzsch, Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, sec. 119y). But the Vulg., with “our hands would cease,” thinks of a literal meaning, “to let the hands hang lax.”

The M.T. exhorts strengthen my hands, to which O God is added in the English translations without textual authority, interpreting the words as a hasty prayer. But the versions have no prayer here and it is unlikely that one was intended. Without the “my God” of 5:19, or some sort of introduction, the M.T. begins too abruptly (cf. Bertholet, loc. cit.; Ehrlich, Randglossen, p. 197). It is too late at the time of writing for such a prayer to be effective (Rudolph, loc. cit.) and the terminology, when used elsewhere, always refers to human rather than divine support (Ehrlich, loc. cit.). The expression makes most sense as Nehemiah’s evaluation of the entire episode. Since he had won additional support by his conduct it is better to translate with the Vulg., “I strengthened my hands all the more.”

But now, O God, strengthen thou my hands (vs. 9b; yet see Exeg.).

Though Nehemiah had never heard of the “isms” that baffle and tax the patience of later generations, or of the propaganda techniques on a world-wide scale that modern newspaper and radio publicity have made possible, he confronted tactics which required wisdom and patience, as these also are required now. Amid all the equivocations and slipperiness around him, Nehemiah steadied himself, and found a new and greatly needed supply of patience in the dependability and integrity of God. Here is a resource in both private and public prayer of which in our own time we have special need, as it becomes daily more evident that ahead of us lie at the best long years of difficult dealing with similar disingenuousness and unscrupulousness, alike on the part of political and social groups at home and of powerful nations and other types of mind abroad. Anglo-Saxons especially, with a heritage of forthrightness and fortitude in conflict, and then of good sportsmanship afterward, and the assumption that if only representatives of both sides can “get together” around a conference table they can surely work out some agreed solution, simply are not used to and have little patience with psychological and social problems of this kind. We shall have to develop new resources, not only in our politics and diplomacy but in our personal and social religion as well, if we are to meet the tests and run the long gauntlets of the years ahead.
10. Shemaiah (cf. Ezra 8:13, 16) the son of Delaiah (cf. Ezra 2:60) was a descendant of Mehetabel, whose name otherwise is known only as that of an Edomite princess (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chr. 1:50). Sometimes he has been regarded as a prophet, principally because meter was discovered in his pronunciation. The metrical material, however, is not a prophetic oracle but the simple disclosure of a plot. Since Shemaiah apparently had access to the temple area, and there is no reproof from Nehemiah to the suggestion that they should meet within it, we may conjecture that he was a priest, possibly one of those who were particularly friendly with Tobiah (cf. vs. 12, 18-19; 13:7-9).

The enigmatic who was shut up (cf. Jer. 36:5) has led to much speculation. Those who consider Shemaiah a prophet think here of ecstatic seizure (cf. Isa. 8:11; Ezek. 3:14; Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 630, n. 2). Others suggest cultic impurity (cf. I Kings 14:10; Jer. 36:5; Bertholet, op. cit., pp. 64-65), but Nehemiah would have avoided contact with him, and the very thought of a defiled one entering the temple would be abhorrent. Some suggest that the reference is to a prophet's symbolic action (cf. Isa. 20:1 ff.; I Kings 22:11 ff.; etc.)—self-enclosure to emphasize the message that Nehemiah must be shut up to save his life (ibid.). None of these explanations is persuasive; nor does the similar expression in Jer. 36:5 help. In both instances the "shutting up" could be voluntary withdrawal because life was endangered. Shemaiah may have been, or pretended to be, a hunted man like Nehemiah. It is best, however, to translate, "who was confined at home," as in the Amer. Trans., and admit our ignorance of its meaning. The Vulg. interprets by context "in secret."

Shemaiah's initial proposal, that Nehemiah should seek refuge in the temple area, was legitimate, for Israelites had the right of asylum in the holy place (Exod. 21:13; I Kings 1:50-53; 2:28-34), but that did not involve entering the temple building since the altar of asylum was outside (I Kings 8:64; II Kings 16:14). It was the suggestion that they enter the building itself and shut the doors for greater safety that shocked Nehemiah. The only entrance to the building was closed by cypress doors (I Kings 6:33-34). It is unnecessary to insist that Shemaiah urged Nehemiah to hide in the holy of holies (debhir; cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 256; Gotthard, op. cit., p. 152; Ehrlich, op. cit., p. 199) for Shemaiah mentioned only the hekhal, a term used for the temple itself but more specifically for the large, principal room just before the holy of holies.

10-14. Hired Prophets.—Then came the subtlest stratagem of all, one that may well give pause to all servants of organized religion, because it reveals the temptations and perversions to which religious men and spiritual leaders in every generation are themselves personally exposed. Even Jesus himself, as the story of the temptation in the wilderness plainly shows, had to meet and overcome plausible arguments for his personal satisfaction and prestige that appealed to his assured conviction of a commission from God, and were buttressed by quotations from scripture—for the devil's own purposes!

Now Nehemiah's enemies hired two religious prophets (one of them a woman?), who are specifically named in the story, besides others who are referred to as a group (vs. 14b), to 11 And I said, Should such a man as I flee? and who is there, that, being as I am, would go into the temple to save his life? I will not go in.

12 And, lo, I perceived that God had not sent him; but that he pronounced this prophecy against me: for Tobiah and Sanballat had hired him.

13 Therefore was he hired, that I should be afraid, and do so, and sin, and that they might have matter for an evil report, that they might reproach me.

14 My God, think thou upon Tobiah and Sanballat according to these their works, and reward them according to their work; and upon the works of his hand give him fourscorefold:

11. Although sometimes frightened (cf. vs. 9; 2:2), Nehemiah was a courageous man. His fear of violating the temple was greater than his fear of personal attack. Such a man as I here means one “holding the highest position in the state, and so carrying great responsibilities” (Batten, op. cit., pp. 256-57). A second reason for refusal to enter is indicated by being as I am. Since the temple building was for priests alone, and intruders were subject to death (cf. Num. 18:7), the expression might mean that Nehemiah had no priestly status that would permit his entry. But since he was a eunuch (cf. 1:11b) the words would have even greater significance, since such blemished men would profane the sanctuary (cf. Lev. 21:17-20, 23; Deut. 23:1).

12-13. Briefly Nehemiah commented on the real basis of his refusal. An unusual placement of the negative in Hebrew produces “a not-God sent him,” a text stronger than God had not sent him, contrasting divine and human commissions. Not divine inspiration but money motivated Shemaiah. The plot appears to be the subtle work of Tobiah, whose name is appropriately listed first. Because of this and the singular word hired, it is suggested that mention of Sanballat is intrusive (Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 537). If the name is retained, the M.T. must be emended with the versions to read “they hired him.” Also with the LXXBn, Ethiopic, and Peshitta versions against me should be added, but the Peshitta, “to kill me,” is perhaps due to vs. 10.

For this purpose he was hired should be omitted as a dittoigraph (cf. Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 48); and sin also is an editorial addition, perhaps by the Chronicler who regarded lay intrusion into the temple as a grievous sin (cf. II Chr. 26:16, 18; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 138). Evil name means “a bad reputation.” Religious laxity in a cult-conscious community would undermine the governor’s authority and destroy his leadership.

14. The episode concludes with a general imprecation against Nehemiah’s enemies (cf. 4:4-5; 13:29). Although the Vulg. has “remember me,” the simple remember is preferable. As Nehemiah pleaded with God to remember his good deeds, presumably for reward (cf. 5:19), so he now asks that the deeds of his enemies be remembered for punishment. Again Tobiah is listed first and Sanballat may be added (Hölscher, loc. cit.;
and on the prophetess Noadiah, and the rest of the prophets, that would have put me in fear.

15 So the wall was finished in the twenty and fifth day of the month Elul, in fifty and two days.

Rudolph, op. cit., p. 136), for the M.T. and the LXX have simply “his deeds.” The tendency to augment the list of enemies is seen in the Arabic and Peshitta versions, which add to the M.T., “and their companions.” Their works and these things that they did represent emendations based on the LXX, Peshitta, and Vulg. after the list of names had been expanded.

The imprecation passes from Tobiah to the prophets who aided him against Nehemiah. The rest means not all of the prophets but just those who were antagonistic. Some Greek texts (LXXB8; Codex 55) and the Ethiopic version have “priests” instead of prophets. Noadiah (Ezra 8:33), called a prophetess, is given special attention. Although prophetesses functioned in Judah (cf. II Kings 22:14), they were rare. All versions except the LXXL have “prophet” here. The suggestion that Noadiah was the one who warned Nehemiah that Shemaiah was a false prophet (cf. vs. 12; Batten, op. cit., p. 258) is unlikely. Nothing is known of any incident involving Noadiah, but it has been argued that fragmentary traces of some such episode survive (cf. vs. 10) in the present Nehemiah narrative (Ehrlich, op. cit., pp. 198-99).

B. COMPLETION OF THE WALL (6:15-16)

15-16. Nehemiah attained his goal by completion of the wall after fifty-two days. Work began on August 11, 445 B.C., and was completed on October 2, within six months of his obtaining leave from the king. Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 8), who places the work during the reign of Xerxes (cf. Ezra 4:6), presents quite different figures. He claims that the work took two years and four months (about 850 days) and was completed during the ninth month (Kislev; cf. Neh. 1:1; Dec. 11-Jan. 10) of the twenty-eighth year of Xerxes (478-477 B.C.). Some have conjectured that Josephus had another text of Nehemiah (cf. Marcus, Josephus, VI, 391, note f), but the difference is perhaps due to copyist errors in a faulty Greek text (J. A. Bewer, “Josephus' Account of Nehemiah,” Journal of Biblical Literature, XLIII [1924], 224-26). The shortness of the time has led to a challenge of the integrity of the verse. It is argued that Nehemiah could scarcely have been in Jerusalem much more than two months, and that “the whole verse looks like the work of the Chronicler” (Batten, op. cit., p. 259), a view even more radical than that of Torrey (Ezra Studies, p. 227), who claims: “It appears that Nehemiah's own personal memoir ended either with 6:15 or with 6:19.” The shortness of time, however, may merely indicate that most of the task was the repair of already standing walls (cf. Hölscher, loc. cit.). Furthermore, the work was pressed to its conclusion in a sustained drive, even at great sacrifice of personal comfort (cf. 4:6, 21, 23). The project is comparable to the building of the wall of Athens under the urging of Themistocles (Herodotus History VIII. 71).

The enemy reaction to the completion of the walls has been regarded as “hopeless as it stands” (Batten, loc. cit.). The enemies were Sanballat and his colleagues, while himself to prayer. And even if his prayer sounds to us directed rather more toward vengeance on his enemies and on these hired prophets than toward courage for himself or God's guidance and blessing for his "great work," we can plainly see that not the least of its answers came in the reinforcement of the stoutheartedness and shrewd insight of which he already possessed so much.

15-19. Victory at Last.—Beneath the reserve of what sounds to us like understatement we can sense both the gratitude and the pride of 16 And it came to pass, that when all our enemies heard thereof, and all the heathen that were about us saw these things, they were much cast down in their own eyes: for they perceived that this work was wrought of our God.

17 Moreover in those days the nobles of Judah sent many letters unto Tobiah, and the letters of Tobiah came unto them.

18 For there were many in Judah sworn unto him, because he was the son-in-law of Shechaniah the son of Arah; and his son the nations round about were the close neighbors of the Jews. Although several Hebrew MSS by their spelling (אַרְיָא) remove the ambiguity of the text (אֶרְיָא) to read were afraid, it seems probable that the RSV mg. reading they saw is correct, for the passage reflects the chagrin and frustration of the foe at their inability to stop the building. The enemies heard the reports of the completion of the work but the immediate neighbors saw the task completed.

The apodosis is ambiguous. The M.T., unique in the O.T., has, lit., “Then they fell much in their eyes.” This is usually taken to mean “they fell in their own estimation” and so is rendered in their own eyes or in their own esteem. But “they” might refer to the enemy, and their to the nations, indicating a loss of prestige for Sanballat and his allies among the neighbors of the Jews, who witnessed the completion of the fortification despite the plots and blustering of the foes of the Jews.

Because “fall” is not used elsewhere in the figurative sense of “to decrease [in esteem],” it has been proposed to emend the M.T., אליך, to read אליך, “and it was marvelous” (August Klostermann, Geschichte des Volkes Israel [Munich: C. H. Beck, 1896], p. 219; Ehrlich, op. cit., p. 200; Jahn, Esra [A und B] und Nehemja, p. 116; Siegfried, Esra, Nehemia und Esther, pp. 96-97; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 137). Thus “fear” is eliminated and a better connection with the last part of the verse is obtained, “It was very marvelous in their eyes and they knew” (cf. Ps. 118:23). The marvel was accomplished not by human effort alone but by the assistance of God. The verse is an apt and fitting conclusion to the story of the building of the wall. Josephus (loc. cit.) concludes his story of Nehemiah: “He was a man of kind and just nature and most anxious to serve his countrymen, and he left the walls of Jerusalem as his eternal monument.”

C. Jewish Correspondence with Tobiah (6:17-19)

17-19. After the completion of the walls one expects their dedication, which does not appear until 12:27 ff. Instead, there follows a statement concerning Tobiah’s connections with Judeans who served as his propagandists and spies. As part of the plots against Nehemiah to hinder the building the material is anticlimactic, and the expression in those days seems to indicate that period of conflict. If intended to introduce the story of Tobiah’s activity in Jerusalem (13:4-8), the verses are much too early. Torrey Johanan had taken the daughter of Meshullam the son of Berechiah.
19 Also they reported his good deeds before me, and uttered my words to him. And Tobiah sent letters to put me in fear.

The son of Arah: and his son Jehoahanan had taken the daughter of Meshullam the son of Berechiah as his wife. 19 Also they spoke of his good deeds in my presence, and reported my words to him. And Tobiah sent letters to make me afraid.

first (1896) assigned the verses to Nehemiah (Composition, p. 50), but later (1910) was convinced that they were the Chronicler’s (Ezra Studies, pp. 226, 248, n. 51). Usually the verses are regarded as genuine (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 15; Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 837), possibly a supplement added by Nehemiah himself (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 139).

Tobiah (cf. 2:10) married the daughter of Shechaniah (cf. 3:29), a noble of the family of Arah (cf. Ezra 2:5), and contrived to have his son Jehoahanan marry the daughter of Meshullam the son of Berechiah, who repaired two sections of wall (cf. 5:4, 30). Hebrew usage requires that “to wife” (as his wife) be added to the M.T., had taken, and the LXX, Ethiopic, and Arabic versions do so. Through such contacts Tobiah had many friends among the Jewish nobles who were bound by oath to him. The Hebrew “lords of an oath” translates the Akkadian term meaning “a sworn ally” (bél adā; Bezold, Babylonisch-Assyrisches Glossar, p. 88, col. 1). The Peshitta explains that there could be no enmity between parties under oath (II Sam. 21:7).

The text of vs. 17 is awkwardly un-Hebraic and obviously corrupt and the versions have great difficulty with it. It is best explained as a nominative absolute construction (cf. Hebrew of Gen. 94:8): “As for many of the nobles of Judah, their letters were passing to Tobiah.” This translation assumes that the first letter of the word translated “multiplied” (מערב (מרב) is a dittograph of the last letter of the preceding word “those” (혼). Without the extra letter the word is many (ריב). The preposition “of” (ה) has been lost before nobles (נדיר) through haplography (Ehrlich, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 137).

Good deeds is interpretative of the M.T., which has “his good things.” Ten Hebrew MSS, instead of “his good things” (משברות (משברות), spell out the word in such fashion that it can be vocalized as “his rumors,” with reference to the Aramaic word for “rumor” ( mesure). Such emendation has been proposed (Abraham Geiger, Urschrift und ubersetzung des Bibel [Breslau: J. Hainauer, 1857], p. 44; Immanuel Löw, “Miscellen; No. 3, Schriftwissenschaft. Neh. 6:19,” Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XXXIII [1913], 154-55). Both the Peshitta and Arabic versions understand the word as “favorable reports.”

My words (vs. 19) could mean “my business” (cf. I Sam. 21:8) or “my acts” (II Chr. 13:22; 35:27; I Kings 11:41). The nobles were informers who kept Tobiah in touch with Nehemiah’s activities in Jerusalem. Letters also came directly, presumably to Nehemiah himself. Such information is introduced abruptly in the M.T., but the versions all show that the conjunction and added in the English versions is justified. It has been lost in the M.T. through haplography, due to the last letter of the preceding word (ה).
7:1 Now it came to pass, when the wall was built, and I had set up the doors, and the porters and the singers and the Levites were appointed.

2 That I gave my brother Hanani, and Hananiah the ruler of the palace, charge over Jerusalem: for he was a faithful man, and feared God above many.

7:1-3 The events of 7:1-3 would have occurred shortly after the completion of the walls and should have been expected after 6:16, which might have followed 7:3; but since 6:17 ff. is of an extraneous nature, the former order is preferable.

7:1. The reference to the setting up of the doors is parallel to was built, as a second note of time. Not yet in place in 6:1, the doors were certainly in position in 6:16. Gatekeepers were appointed when the city fortifications were completed. Since the singers and the Levites tended not the city gates but the temple gates (cf. vss. 43-45), the words are intrusive here from vv. 43 ff. (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 138). The singers and the Levites is unusual in reversing the order in which they are normally mentioned (cf. Gotthard, Text des Nehemia, p. 160). The Vulg. has “I appointed,” which Gotthard favors, but since such minor officials were perhaps appointed by a subordinate it is better to read were appointed. The Chronicler is held responsible for the intrusive the singers and the Levites (Rudolf Smend, Die Listen der Bücher Ezra und Nehemia [Basel: Schultzze, 1881], p. 26; Gotthard, op. cit., p. 160), and Torrey (Ezra Studies, p. 227), who holds that Nehemiah’s record ended at 6:15 or 6:19, insists that vs. 1b “could have been written by no one else” but the Chronicler, who believed that all such services were a cultic feature from the beginning and were restored by Nehemiah when the walls were completed (Composition, pp. 41 ft.).

2. In preparation for his return to Susa at the conclusion of his work, Nehemiah was concerned to appoint someone to be in charge of the city in his absence. Some assume that two men were appointed (ibid., p. 42; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 140), but it is improbable that two officials bearing the same name would rule Jerusalem simultaneously (Gotthard, loc. cit.). Hanani and Hananiah are identical names, the former an abbreviation of the latter. Obviously and joining the names is explicative (cf. Ezra 6:8; 8:18; see Kautzsch, Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, sec. 154a, n. 1b): “My brother Hanani, that is Hananiah.” He is perhaps the “brother” of 1:2. Because the second element of the title (bērāh) is used of the temple complex (I Chr. 29:1, 19), and the Vulg. translates it “house,” Torrey (loc. cit.) sees in the title the “ruler of the temple” (prostatēs tou hierou) of II Macc. 3:4 (cf. Josephus Antiquities XX. 6. 2), and “the ruler of the house of God” of I Chr. 9:11; II Chr. 31:13 (cf. Emil Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, tr. S. Taylor and P. Christie [Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1885], Div. II, Vol. I, p. 267). The LXXI renders it as “citadel” (bareōs), and the Peshitta uses the word found in Ezra 6:2. It has been assumed that “the fortress” mentioned was connected with the temple (cf. 2:8; I Macc. 11:20-24; Batten, op. cit., pp. 262-63), but the term could be used of Jerusalem itself as a fortified place (cf. 1:1; Ezra 6:2; Esth. 1:2, 5; etc.). The title is then parallel to “commander of the city” (Judg. 9:30; I Kings 22:26; II Kings 23:8) and “the one over the city” or “the general of the city alike against surprise and treachery. There is a vivid glimpse of the odds against which he had carried out his “great work,” and likewise of the scanty support and small resources at his disposal, in what may be the final phrases.
3 And I said unto them, Let not the gates of Jerusalem be opened until the sun be hot; and while they stand by, let them shut the doors, and bar them; and appoint watches of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, every one in his watch, and every one to be over against his house.

many. 3 And I said to them, “Let not the gates of Jerusalem be opened until the sun is hot; and while they are still standing guard let them shut and bar the doors. Appoint guards from among the inhabitants of Jerusalem, each to his station and each city,” later found at Alexandria and elsewhere (Pierre Jouquet, Macedonian Imperialism and the Hellenization of the East [tr. M. B. Dobie: New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1928], p. 89). The title presumably indicates his post after appointment. Possibly it was he who appointed the gatekeepers and supervised the guarding of the city.

3. Because an attack of the city under cover of darkness was still anticipated, emergency regulations were instituted. Oral tradition (Qerê) and the versions (cf. also 5:9) indicate that Nehemiah gave the orders, but it seems probable that Hananiah did, as the Hebrew written tradition (Kethibh) has it.

The gates were open during daylight hours but the Hebrew text is obscure in setting the time of opening. It suggests that they remained closed after sunset until the sun was rising high in the sky. Closing must have been before dusk, but no definite time can be ascertained from the present M.T. Its “until [or “while”] they are standing” is meaningless. And while they stand by reflects the Vulg., “and while they were yet standing by.” They (םנ) is ambiguous. It cannot refer to Hanani and Hananiah (cf. above), but there is no other antecedent. It has been considered a corruption of “the people” (םנ; Ehrlich, op. cit., p. 202), but the closing would scarcely be determined by the sleeping habits of the citizens (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 138). A similar view is obtained by regarding “standing” as opposite to “lying down,” giving the meaning “while the people are still up and about” (cf. the Kethibh of Ps. 134:1; Ehrlich, loc. cit.), but it is doubtful whether the verb רַעִי, “stand,” can support such a meaning. Others interpret they to mean the “guards” (cf. vs. 1), leading to “while they were watching” in the LXX and while they are still standing guard, but this has been challenged as “much too obvious” and its use of “stand” is regarded as unparalleled (Rudolph, loc. cit.). Other interpretations require emendation of the Hebrew text. On the basis of the Peshitta, “while the day is standing,” it has been rendered “while it [the sun] stands” in the sky before sunset (Gotthard, op. cit., p. 42; Batten, op. cit., p. 265). More extensive change lies behind the conjecture “while it [the sun] is yet over the sea” with the meaning “before it sinks into the sea” (Rudolph, loc. cit.). This emendation employs some consonants of the M.T. but presumes corruptions which, while possible, seem improbable.

When closed for the night the gates were to be made fast, since the M.T. means not merely “closed” but “made fast” or “barred.” By relating the Hebrew root מָמַס to the word מַרָּד, “riddle,” which is derived from the Aramaic cognate (ורַד) of the Hebrew root מָמַס, the verb has been explained as “locked up” (ibid.).

In addition to the gatekeepers (vs. 1) other watches were posted, presumably at the wall. Opposite his own house (cf. 3:10, 23, 28-29) seems to indicate that guards mounted the wall opposite their houses. Rudolph (ibid.), thinking of a partitive construction, suggests that part of the guards were at fixed posts and part patrolled before the individual houses. But while the expression is used distributively, there is no evidence for of his own memoirs: The city was wide and large, but the people within it were few and no houses had been built.

How many Christian ministers and missionaries in every generation have had to occupy new territory for the church against similar odds, and with like pioneering resourcefulness! But Nehemiah’s faith and courage had long since looked far into the future, and had built not for the present actualities of the situation, which were small enough, but for the unrealized possibilities which he foresaw through the eyes of his faith and hope in God. In that sense he was not only a “man of action”: he was also a “hero of faith,” one who might well have been included in the honor roll of Heb. 11.
4 Now the city was large and great: but the people were few therein, and the houses were not builded.

5 ¶ And my God put into mine heart to gather together the nobles, and the rulers, and the people, that they might be reckoned by genealogy. And I found a register of the genealogy of them which came up at the first, and found written therein, the partitive construction in Hebrew, and it is certainly not mandatory in Isa. 3:5, which is cited in support. Torrey (Composition, pp. 41-42), thinking of the guards in I Chr. 26:12-19 and the later police of Jerusalem (cf. Schürer, op. cit., Div. II, Vol. I, pp. 264-68), thinks that just such an organization is proposed here by the Chronicler. But no elaborate or permanent organization need be implied, for what is involved is a setting up of a temporary group to function during the emergency, until the city should have a larger population.

B. The Populating of Jerusalem (7:4-73a)

4. Jerusalem was ruined and relatively uninhabited, with little for the new fortification to protect. Nehemiah, like Alexander and his successors who established cities, had the problem of populating it (cf. Jouquet, op. cit., pp. 88, 367 ff.). Wide and large translates a M.T. "wide of hands and large." The word "hands" so troubled translators that it is omitted in the LXX, Ethiopic, Peshitta, and Vulg. and some propose to omit it here (Gotthard, loc. cit.), but the idiom appears elsewhere (Gen. 34:21; Judg. 18:10; Isa. 22:18; 35:21; Ps. 104:25: I Chr. 4:40). Its origin doubtless lies in the gesture of spreading the arms in order to convey the idea of "stretching widely to the right and left." Large here presumably indicates great length.

No houses had been built directly contradicts vs. 3 and other passages in which "his house" means a building within the city (cf. 3:10, 23, 28-29). Some interpret "house" figuratively as "family" (cf. Gen. 18:19; Deut. 25:9; etc.), referring to the fact that during the Exile many families were exterminated, never to be restored (cf. Paul Haupt, "Batim lo benuyim," Johns Hopkins University Circulars, XIII [1894], 108; cf. Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 49; Siegfried, Esra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 98; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 140). It could mean literally that no new buildings had yet been erected within the city. Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 8) understood the words literally, claiming that Nehemiah "prepared houses for them at his own expense" and Ben Sirach too (Ecclus. 49:13), in addition to praising Nehemiah for his work on the walls, adds that he "raised up our homes again."

Josephus seems to link vs. 4 with 11:1 ff., and it has been suggested that his Greek source had ch. 11 immediately after vs. 4 (Torrey, Ezra Studies, pp. 32-33; cf. Jahn, Esra [A und B] und Nehemja, p. 118). But the genealogy (vss. 5-73a) could have been in his source, for Josephus was inclined toward omitting long genealogies lest they encumber his narrative (cf. Antiquities XI. 3. 10; cf. Exeg. on Ezra 2:1).

5. Preliminary to the redistribution of the population Nehemiah planned to make, he undertook an assembly of the people for a census (I Chr. 9:22; Luke 2:1-4), which he regarded as an act of divine inspiration (cf. 2:12, 16). With my God the M.T. has the informal and personal style of Nehemiah (cf. 2:8, 12, 18; 5:19; 6:14; etc.) but the 5-73. The Role of Inconspicuous Individuals.

—(See Expos. on 3:1-32; Ezra 2:1-67.) Even the uncritical reader of our English versions can sense the change of style and mood that marks the insertion into Nehemiah's terse and vivid memoirs, by the Chronicler's later editorial hand, of another of the endless genealogical lists of names by families, of which the Chronicler himself was so fond. The insertion here is another version of Ezra 2, different in minor details, but plainly based on the same or a variant source.
These are the children of the province, that went up out of the captivity, of those that had been carried away, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away, and came again to Jerusalem and to Judah, every one unto his city;

Who came with Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Nehemiah, Azariah, Raamiah, Nahamani, Mordecai, Bilshan, Mispereth, Bigvai, Nehum, Baanah. The number, I say, of the men of the people of Israel was this;

The children of Parosh, two thousand a hundred seventy and two.

The children of Shephatiah, three hundred seventy and two.

The children of Arah, six hundred fifty and two.

The children of Pahath-moab, of the children of Jeshua and Joab, two thousand and eight hundred and eighteen.

The children of Elam, a thousand two hundred fifty and four.

These were the people of the province who came up out of the captivity of those exiles whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried into exile; they returned to Jerusalem and Judah, each to his town.

They came with Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Nehem'iah, Azari'ah, Ra-am'i'ah, Naham'ani, Mor'decai, Bilshan, Mis'pereth, Big'vai, Nehum, Ba'ananah.

The number of the men of the people of Israel: 8 the sons of Parosh, two thousand a hundred and seventy-two. 9 The sons of Shephati'ah, three hundred and seventy-two. 10 The sons of Arah, six hundred and fifty-two. 11 The sons of Pa'hath-moab, namely the sons of Jeshua and Jo'ab, two thousand eight hundred and eighteen. 12 The sons of Elam, a thousand two hunversions all have simply God, which has been regarded as original (Gotthard, loc. cit.). My mind rather than mine heart properly interprets Hebrew psychology (cf. Ezra 6:22; 7:27). The intent implied by to gather together or to assemble is possible through a slight change of vowels in the M.T. which can now be read only “and I assembled.” The purpose of the assembly is lost in the LXX, which has “I gathered into companies.” The Vulg. “to muster them” indicates a census, and the Peshitta adds “according to their families” (cf. Luke 2:2-4).

During the census, which involved written records (cf. vs. 64; Ezra 2:62), a genealogical list was found which was purported to list Jews who had returned from Babylonia (vss. 6-73a; Ezra 2:1-67). There is considerable controversy over the authorship of the list. It has been regarded by some as the Chronicler’s work (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 227; Jahn, op. cit., p. 119; Guthe and Batten, loc. cit.), but others argue for its authenticity (cf. Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 67; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 141). The whole list is certainly not as early as the time of Cyrus, where the Chronicler puts it (Ezra 1:1), and the present context indicates a time prior to the arrival of Nehemiah; but some want to date the passage as late as ca. 400 B.C., shortly after the time of Nehemiah (Hölscher, Esra und Nehemia, p. 502; Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., pp. 822, 836).

The connection between the book of the genealogy and of those who came up at the first is decidedly awkward. The second element is supplemental: “the book of genealogy, those coming up,” etc. The Peshitta lacks “those coming up at the first,” which is usually regarded as a gloss by the Chronicler (Siegfried, loc. cit.; Guthe and Batten, loc. cit.; Josef Markwart, Fundamente israelitische und jüdische Geschichte [Göttingen: Dieterich, 1896], p. 35; Herrmann Guthe, Geschichte des Volkes Israel [Freiburg i. B.: J. C. B. Mohr, 1899], p. 259). The principal argument for the deletion (cf. Gotthard, loc. cit.; Bertholet, op. cit., p. 68), however, is not syntactical roughness or omission from the Peshitta, but the belief that the first refers to the time of Cyrus, when the list does not exactly reflect conditions of that period. But the words can mean “previously” (cf. II Sam. 7:10; 20:18; Jer. 7:12; Isa. 52:4), which is suitable here since the list seems to refer to various returns to Palestine from the time of Cyrus (cf. Ezra 1:1) down to 515 B.C. (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 15-17).

6-73a. For detailed notes on the great list see Ezra 2:1-67 which is almost identical.
13 The children of Zattu, eight hundred forty and five.
14 The children of Zaccai, seven hundred and threescore.
15 The children of Binnui, six hundred forty and eight.
16 The children of Bebai, six hundred twenty and eight.
17 The children of Azgad, two thousand three hundred twenty and two.
18 The children of Adonikam, six hundred threescore and seven.
19 The children of Bigvai, two thousand threescore and seven.
20 The children of Adin, six hundred fifty and five.
21 The children of Ater of Hezekiah, ninety and eight.
22 The children of Hashum, three hundred twenty and eight.
23 The children of Bezai, three hundred twenty and four.
24 The children of Hariph, a hundred and twelve.
25 The children of Gibeon, ninety and five.
26 The men of Beth-lehem and Netophah, a hundred fourscore and eight.
27 The men of Anathoth, a hundred twenty and eight.
28 The men of Beth-az'maveth, forty and two.
29 The men of Kirjath-jearim, Chephi'rah, and Beeroth, seven hundred forty and three.
30 The men of Ramah and Gaba, six hundred twenty and one.
31 The men of Michmash, a hundred and twenty and two.
32 The men of Beth-el and Ai, a hundred twenty and three.
33 The men of the other Nebo, fifty and two.
34 The children of the other Elam, a thousand two hundred fifty and four.
35 The children of Harim, three hundred and twenty.
36 The children of Jericho, three hundred forty and five.
37 The children of Lod, Hadid, and Ono, seven hundred twenty and one.
38 The children of Senaah, three thousand nine hundred and thirty.

dred and fifty-four. 13 The children of Zattu, eight hundred forty and forty-five. 14 The children of Zac'cai, seven hundred and sixty. 15 The sons of Bin'nu, six hundred and forty-eight. 16 The sons of Be'bai, six hundred and twenty-eight. 17 The sons of Azgad, two thousand three hundred and twenty-two. 18 The sons of Adoni'kam, six hundred and sixty-seven. 19 The sons of Big'vai, two thousand and sixty-seven. 20 The sons of Adin, six hundred and fifty-five. 21 The sons of Ater, namely of Hezek'i'ah, ninety-eight. 22 The sons of Hashum, three hundred and twenty-eight. 23 The sons of Be'zai, three hundred and twenty-four. 24 The sons of Hariph, a hundred and twelve. 25 The sons of Gibeon, ninety-five. 26 The men of Beth-lehem and Neto'phah, a hundred and eighty-eight. 27 The men of An'athoth, a hundred and twenty-eight. 28 The men of Beth-az'maveth, forty-two. 29 The men of Kir'iath-je'arim, Chephi'rah, and Be'er'oth, seven hundred and forty-three. 30 The men of Ramah and Gaba, six hundred and twenty-one. 31 The men of Michmas, a hundred and twenty-two. 32 The men of Bethel and Ai, a hundred and twenty-three. 33 The men of the other Nebo, fifty-two. 34 The sons of the other Elam, a thousand two hundred and fifty-four. 35 The sons of Harim, three hundred and twenty. 36 The sons of Jericho, three hundred and forty-five. 37 The sons of Lod, Hadid, and Ono, seven hundred and twenty-one. 38 The sons of Sena'ah, three thousand nine hundred and thirty.
39 The priests: the children of Jedaiah, of the house of Jeshua, nine hundred seventy and three.
40 The children of Immer, a thousand fifty and two.
41 The children of Pashur, a thousand two hundred forty and seven.
42 The children of Harim, a thousand and seventeen.
43 The Levites: the children of Jeshua, of Kadmiel, and of the children of Hodevah, seventy and four.
44 The singers: the children of Asaph, a hundred forty and eight.
45 The porters: the children of Shallum, the children of Ater, the children of Talmon, the children of Akkub, the children of Hatita, the children of Shobai, a hundred thirty and eight.
46 The Nethinim: the children of Ziaha, the children of Hashupha, the children of Tabbaoth, 47 The children of Keros, the children of Sia, the children of Padon, 48 The children of Lebana, the children of Hagaba, the children of Shalmai, 49 The children of Hanan, the children of Giddel, the children of Gahar, 50 The children of Reaiah, the children of Rezin, the children of Nekoda, 51 The children of Gazzam, the children of Uzza, the children of Phaseah, 52 The children of Besai, the children of Meunim, the children of Nephisheshim, 53 The children of Bakbuk, the children of Hakupha, the children of Harhur, 54 The children of Bazlith, the children of Mehida, the children of Harsha, 55 The children of Barkos, the children of Sisera, the children of Tamah, 56 The children of Neziah, the children of Hattipha.
57 The children of Solomon's servants: the children of Sotai, the children of Sophereth, the children of Perida, 58 The children of Jaala, the children of Darkon, the children of Giddel, 59 The children of Shephatiah, the children of Hattil, the children of Pochereth of Zebaim, the children of Amon.
60 All the Nethinim, and the children of Solomon's servants, were three hundred ninety and two.
61 And these were they which went up also from Tel-melah, Tel-haresha, Cherub, Addon, and Immer: but they could not show their father's house, nor their seed, whether they were of Israel.

62 The children of Delaiah, the children of Tobiah, the children of Nekoda, six hundred forty and two.

63 ¶ And of the priests: the children of Habaiah, the children of Koz, the children of Barzillai, which took one of the daughters of Barzillai the Gileadite to wife, and was called after their name.

64 These sought their register among those that were reckoned by genealogy, but it was not found: therefore were they, as polluted, put from the priesthood.

65 And the Tirshatha said unto them, that they should not eat of the most holy things, till there stood up a priest with Urim and Thummim.

66 ¶ The whole congregation together was forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore, and six:

67 Besides their manservants and their maidservants, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred thirty and seven: and they had two hundred forty and five singing men and singing women.

68 Their horses, seven hundred thirty and six: their mules, two hundred forty and five:

69 Their camels, four hundred thirty and five: six thousand seven hundred and twenty asses.

70 ¶ And some of the chief of the fathers gave unto the work. The Tirshatha gave to the treasure a thousand drams of gold, fifty basins, five hundred and thirty priests' garments.

71 And some of the chief of the fathers gave to the treasure of the work twenty thousand drams of gold, and two thousand and two hundred pounds of silver.

72 And that which the rest of the people gave was twenty thousand drams of gold, and two thousand pounds of silver, and threescore and seven priests' garments.

73 So the priests, and the Levites, and the porters, and the singers, and some of the 61 The following were those who came up from Tel-me'lah, Tel-har'sha, Cherub, Addon, and Immer, but they could not prove their fathers' houses nor their descent, whether they belonged to Israel: 62 the sons of Delai'ah, the sons of Tobi'ah, the sons of Neko'da, six hundred and forty-two. 63 Also, of the priests: the sons of Hobai'ah, the sons of Hakkoz, the sons of Barzil'la'i (who had taken a wife of the daughters of Barzil'la'i the Gileadite and was called by their name). 64 These sought their registration among those enrolled in the genealogies, but it was not found there, so they were excluded from the priesthood as unclean; 65 the governor told them that they were not to partake of the most holy food, until a priest with Urim and Thummim should arise.

66 The whole assembly together was forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty, besides their menservants and maidservants, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred and thirty-seven; and they had two hundred and forty-five singers, male and female. 68 Their horses were seven hundred and thirty-six, their mules two hundred and forty-five, 69 their camels four hundred and thirty-five, and their asses six thousand seven hundred and twenty.

70 Now some of the heads of fathers' house gave to the work. The governor gave to the treasury a thousand darics of gold, fifty basins, five hundred and thirty priests' garments. 71 And some of the heads of fathers' houses gave into the treasury of the work twenty thousand darics of gold and two thousand two hundred minas of silver.

72 And what the rest of the people gave was twenty thousand darics of gold, two thousand minas of silver, and sixty-seven priests' garments.

73 So the priests, the Levites, the gatekeepers, the singers, some of the people, the 6 Ezra 2. 66 and the margins of some Hebrew MSs Hev lack their horses...forty-five people, and the Nethinim, and all Israel, dwelt in their cities: and when the seventh month came, the children of Israel were in their cities. temple servants, and all Israel, lived in their towns.

And when the seventh month had come, the children of Israel were in their towns.

which have a space between vs. 73a and vs. 73b and by the fact that in Ezra 8:1 this portion of the long dittograph (see below) introduces a new narrative. The Amer. Trans., the American Jewish Translation, and the RSV attach vs. 73b to the beginning of ch. 8.

The difficulty of the passage apparently arises from the fact that vs. 73 is the result of the conflation of two originally quite similar sentences (cf. ibid., pp. 14-15). One, which formed the proper conclusion to the list of ch. 7, originally resembled the text of Ezra 2:70, where the text is better preserved. The other, which originally formed the conclusion of Ezra 8, following Ezra 8:36, must have been quite similar, referring also to a return of exiles and employing similar categories. Some statement about the distribution of the people in Ezra's caravan has long been sought (Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 588-89; H. H. Schaeder, Esra der Schreiber [Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1930]; "Beiträge zur historischen Theologie"], pp. 22-23; Rudolph. loc. cit.). It has been suggested that Ezra 8:36 should be followed by such a concluding statement as, "And the priests and Levites and some of the people dwelt in Jerusalem and the rest of the people were in the cities of Judea" (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 15), after which the narrative would continue with Neh. 7:73b (ibid., p. 85; cf. pp. 14-15). The "in Jerusalem" of the above conjecture is not found in the M.T. but it is in I Esdras 5:46.

The consolidation of the similar sentences produced some inconsistencies. The singers and porters, appropriate in the great list (vss. 44-45), must have been absent from the conclusion of Ezra 8, since those categories were not included in his caravan (cf. Ezra 8:15-20). Furthermore, it is contradictory to read both some of the people and all Israel in the same verse. All Israel would be inappropriate for the relatively small group accompanying Ezra, but would be suitable in a list describing a number of people settled in Judea. Some of the people could indicate the distribution of Ezra's caravan, but it would really fit the situation better after Nehemiah had repopulated Jerusalem (cf. 11:3, 20).

VIII. Reading the Law (7:73b-8:18)

With this chapter, suddenly Ezra, not Nehemiah, is the principal figure and it is doubtful whether Nehemiah plays any role (cf. vs. 9). Obviously it is part of the Ezra narrative and should be linked in sequence with Ezra 8 (cf. Torrey, Composition, p. 34; "The Ezra Story in Its Original Sequence," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures, XXV [1909], 279 ff.; Ezra Studies, pp. 255-58, 265-78; Winckler, Altorientalische Forschungen, Reihe 2, Bd. III, p. 472; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 142). The present disorder of text has been explained as a disruption of the Chronicler's final work, occurring perhaps near the end of the third century B.C. when a copyist, who regarded Neh. 7:70-73 as a simple variant of Ezra 2:68-70, having copied Ezra 8:96, transferred the section which he considered the true sequel of Neh. 7 to the book of Nehemiah. It was then necessary to transpose Neh. 9:1-10:39 from Ezra also to follow the reading of the law in Neh. 8 (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 258). Less mechanically it can be explained that the late editor, with a bias against foreigners, placed the mixed marriage reform as Ezra's first act and reserved the popular acceptance of the law until the city was organized and secure enough to guarantee the continuance of the postexilic community devoted to the law (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 144). Because constructions and vocabulary toward which the Chronicler is partial are unquestionably found in the chapter, there is considerable difference of opinion regarding the historicity of the events that it relates. Pfeiffer (Intro. to O.T., pp. 832, 827-28), noting that Neh. 8-10, or parts of it, are generally attributed to Ezra's memoirs, admits

731
And all the people gathered themselves together as one man into the street that was before the water gate: and they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded to Israel.

8:1-18. Repentance a Road to the Joy of Forgiveness.—There is general agreement among O.T. scholars that this chapter was originally part of the Ezra story, following Ezra 8 (as it does in the earliest Greek translation which we know as I Esdras). There is likewise a widespread belief that the events it narrates, like the expedition of Ezra as a whole, took place after Nehemiah’s first visit to Jerusalem in 445 B.C. to rebuild its walls—possibly during the Year’s celebration.

A. Assembly to Hear the Law (7:73b–8:2)

7:73b–8:2. The seventh month raises a chronological problem. The last reference to Ezra was some eighteen years earlier (Apr. 23, 397 B.C.; Ezra 10:17). If Ezra preceded Nehemiah to Jerusalem the silence of Nehemiah regarding him would be most surprising. To explain the silence it is claimed that after a brief ministry Ezra left the country not to return until the time of Neh. 8 (cf. Andreas Fernández, “Epoca de la Actividad de Esdras,” Biblica, II [1921], 481 ff.; Joseph Fischer, Die Chronologischen Fragen in den Büchern Esra und Nehemia [Freiburg i. B.: Herder, 1903; “Biblische Studien”], pp. 74, 90), or that after a preliminary failure Ezra went into temporary retirement (C. T. Wood, “Nehemiah-Ezra,” Expository Times, LIX [1947-48], 53-54) but neither explanation is plausible. Inasmuch as the chapter belongs after Ezra 8, as indicated above, the seventh month would fall in 398 B.C., the year of Ezra’s arrival at Jerusalem (Ezra 7:9), since Ezra, whose prime mission was to introduce the law (Ezra 7:14, 25-26), would probably begin his task as soon as he arrived. In I Esdras 9:37 ff., where the assembly follows the narrative in Ezra 10, the seventh month would fall in Ezra’s second year, about six months after the events of Ezra 10:17 (397 B.C.; Bertholet, op. cit., p. 68: Markwart, Fundamente Geschichte, p. 36), but that is less likely since the reference in I Esdras 9:37 (=Neh. 7:73a) to a settlement of the people is more suitable after Ezra 8:31-32, which mentions people to be settled. The first day of the seventh month, New Year’s Day, was particularly holy (cf. Ezra 3:6). The assembly has been regarded as a celebration of the New Year (cf. Holscher, Esra und Nehemia, pp. 542 ff.), but the short duration of the meeting and the apparent lack of preparation for it mark the event as something extraordinary (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 149). The assembly began on September 28, 398 B.C. (cf. Ezra 7:8).

The Water Gate cannot yet be located with certainty (cf. 3:26). Josephus and I Esdras, under the influence of Ezra 10 and possibly of the later Water Gate of the 7 And Ezra the priest brought the law before the congregation both of men and women, and all that could hear with understanding, upon the first day of the seventh month.

Lord had given to Israel. 2 And Ezra the priest brought the law before the assembly, both men and women and all who could hear with understanding, on the first day temple, locate the meeting in the temple area. If the Water Gate were in the city fortifications rather than the temple area, it would mark the assembly as a unique and extemporaneous civic movement rather than as a religious festival (cf. ibid., p. 145). Instead of street read “the broad place” or “plaza” (cf. Ezra 10.9).

All the people (vs. 1) included both men and women, a situation unusual enough for comment since women ordinarily had little share in religious meetings. All that could hear with understanding (vs. 2) doubtless included the “sons and daughters” (cf. 10:28) who had shown ability to understand the law (Joseph Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth [tr. Herbert Danby; New York: The Macmillan Co., 1926], pp. 237-38). As in Ezra 2:64 (cf. Ezra 10:8, 12, 14), the assembly is described technically as a formal congregation, but the Vulg. and I Esdras have “multitude,” and the Peshitta has simply “before the people.”

Scribe (cf. Ezra 7:6) is an appropriate title for Ezra as one concerned with the law (Ezra 7:10, 21) but, as elsewhere, he is also called the priest (cf. Ezra 7:11). The Peshitta and I Esdras use the double title as in Ezra 7:11-12, 21. The people called for the law of Moses [cf. Ezra 3:2] commanded by God (Ezra 7:23).

Attempts to identify the law read by Ezra are numerous, varied, and inconclusive (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 169). The editor certainly regarded it as the whole Pentateuch, a view shared by some modern scholars (cf. Julius Wellhausen, Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels [5th ed.; Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1905], pp. 407-8; August Dillmann, Die Bücher Numeri, Deuteronomium und Josua [2nd ed.; Leipzig: S. Hirzel, 1886], pp. 672 ff.; Schaeder, Esra der Schreiber, p. 69; Sellin, Geschichte, II, 140 ff.), but none of the citations made from it (vss. 14-15; Ezra 9:11-12) agrees with the Pentateuch, and the day of Atonement (Lev. 16) does not appear in Neh. 8. Usually it is thought to be a specific code, and some attempts are made to identify it by the elapsed time of the reading (cf. J. M. Powis Smith, The Origin and History of Hebrew Law [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1931], pp. 118-19; Browne, Early Judaism, p. 188; Bertholet, op. cit., p. 69). But due to the variable element of interpretation, which took some time (cf. vs. 8), such identifications can be but tentative and uncertain. Possibly instead of reading a full code in sequence a series of judiciously selected passages were read to arouse popular repentance and create a will to adopt the law as binding (Kegel, op. cit., pp. 135 ff.; 173 ff.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 145). The law was presumably the law “in his hand” which Ezra brought from Babylonia (Ezra 7:14, 25 ff.). As such it has been identified with the Holiness Code or Ezekiel’s plan of restoration “both of which had been written in Babylonia a century before” (Pfeiffer, loc. cit.). Thus usually the law of Ezra is identified with the Priestly Code or some work of which that was a part (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 373; Harlan Creelman, An Introduction to the Old Testament [New York: The Macmillan Co., 1917], p. 244), but J. M. P. Smith (op. cit., p. 119), who is inclined toward that view, recognizes that “the Code as introduced by Ezra was in an earlier form than that in which we now have the Priestly Code.” Torrey (Ezra Studies, p. 262, n. 14) claims that “the laws quoted and accepted in the story do not belong, as a rule,
3 And he read therein before the street that was before the water gate from the morning until midday, before the men and the women, and those that could understand: and the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the law.

4 And Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit of wood, which they had made for the of the seventh month. 3 And he read from it facing the square before the Water Gate from early morning until midday, in the presence of the men and the women and those who could understand: and the ears of all the people were attentive to the book of the law. 4 And Ezra the scribe stood on a to the priestly legislation.” What appears to be priestly material is regarded by some as the Chronicler’s own contribution based on later usage (ibid., pp. 187-88, 192-94).

The strongly Deuteronomic tone of Ezra-Nehemiah has led to the conjecture that Ezra’s law was the Deuteronomic Code (cf. ibid., pp. 186-88). The objection of Smith (loc. cit.) to such identification because Deuteronomy was pre-exilic and Ezra’s law was new is scarcely valid since the code need not have been one drawn up by Ezra or edited by him. In fact, there would be special merit in one that would be binding because of its antiquity (cf. vs. 9). Ezra 7:25a and Neh. 8:1 seem to forbid the assumption of a new law. Ezra could have brought the Deuteronomic legislation from Babylonia for that code, which had a profound effect upon the development of exilic thought, was being supplemented and edited down to about 400 B.C., close to the time of Ezra (cf. Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., pp. 182, 187). Rather than a full code, some think of an assemblage of pre-exilic laws with some new passages in addition (Martin Noth, Die Gesetze im Pentateuch [Halle: M. Niemeyer, 1940], p. 62; cf. p. 1, n. 2; Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien I [Halle: M. Niemeyer, 1943], p. 100; Gerhard von Rad, Das Geschichtsbild des chronistischen Werkes [Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1930], pp. 38 ff.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 169).

B. The Reading of the Law (8:3-8)

8:3. Because the scroll is not opened until vs. 5, some argue that vs. 3 should be omitted (cf. Hölsher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 543), but possibly after a mere statement of the fact of the reading (vs. 3), the author felt the need of describing the procedure in detail (vss. 4 ff.) because the unusual event was significant for future practice (cf. Bertholet, loc. cit.). The M.T. and versions here read and he read but and they read (vs. 8) indicates that Ezra’s companions participated in the reading. Since the reading session was long (cf. vs. 3), Ezra would need relief. Reading began at daylight—“from the light,” which I Esdras interprets as “from dawn,” and the LXX as “from the hour of the sun’s giving light.”

4-8. Close parallels have been recognized between this detailed description of the reading of the law and the Chronicler’s account of Josiah’s presentation of the Deuteronomical Code (cf. above) and there are some broad parallels with the assembly in the time of Solomon described in II Chr. 5-7 (Torrey, “Ezra Story in Its Original Sequence,” pp. 287 ff.; Composition, p. 59). Both meetings were during the seventh month (vs. 2; cf. II Chr. 5:2-3); the leader mounted a platform (vs. 4; cf. II Chr. 6:13), the people stood at the blessing (vss. 5-6; II Chr. 6:3) and dispersed to keep the feast with joy after the ceremony (vs. 12; II Chr. 7:8-9). The Chronicler could have used a book of Ezra as his model (cf. Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 832), but it is usually assumed that the Chronicler’s narrative served as a model here. It has been suggested that the scene reflects the synagogue at the time of the Chronicler, but it has also been suggested that Neh. 8 formed the prototype of the service of the later synagogue (Ismar Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst [Leipzig: G. Fock, 1913], p. 157). What the Chronicler missed in the Ezra source here, he perhaps supplied from the synagogue service of his own day (cf. vs. 7; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 149).

4. Ezra stood on a wooden structure which placed him above all the people (vs. 5), so that he could be seen by the great crowd. The word mīghādāl is elsewhere rendered
5 And Ezra opened the book in the sight of all the people; (for he was above all the people;) and when he opened it, all the people stood up:

"tower," except in 9:4, where the same object is described. Although its use suggests the tall pulpit (mimbar) of the Arab mosque, it was considerably larger, for at least a dozen men sat with Ezra upon it. Doubtless it was wooden scaffolding made for the purpose. The LXXAbr omits for the purpose, but because the same consonants (ἐπὶ) can be read "for speaking," the LXXL, Peshitta, Arabic, and Vulg. versions read thus, and the LXXL adds "to the people."

The importance of the meeting was shown by the presence of important men who shared the platform with Ezra. There is no evidence to support the frequent assumption that the men were priests or Levites. In fact, the lack of titles and the presence of such rare names as Anaiah (cf. 10:29) and Hashum (cf. 7:22) indicate that they were laymen (cf. ibid., p. 147). Since it was "the people" who called for the law (vs. 1), laymen are not unexpected. Presumably there was the same number of men on each side of Ezra, but there is a question whether the number was seven, so favored by the Jews (so Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 50; Bertheau, Ezra, Nehemiah und Ester, p. 272), or six, which might very well symbolize, if not represent, the twelve tribes (cf. Ezra 8:35; so Bertheolet, loc. cit.; Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 268, note c). The M.T. and versions agree in naming the six men at Ezra's right, but there are confusion and difficulty with those to the left. Meshullam, omitted in I Esdras 9:44, may be the superfluous name in the M.T. since it (משעלם) may be the result of a corruption (as הכנש) of "on the left hand" (פשעה ימימה), which it resembles (cf. ibid., note b).

The names have been regarded as worthless (Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 179, n. 4) and, lacking evidence of paternity, they cannot with certainty be identified with similar names in other lists. As the LXX and Vulg. show, the full name of Shema was Shemaiah (cf. Ezra 8:13). Most of the names occur elsewhere. Zechariah may be the Zaccur of 10:12 and the anomalous Hashbaddanah, which is certainly corrupt, suggests the Hashabnah of 10:25 (cf. Hashabnah of 3:10; 9:5).

The book was not a codex but a scroll. The process of opening was actually one of unrolling (cf. Isa. 34:4). The people, seated on the ground in Oriental fashion, showed their respect for the law when they stood up. The verb "stand" (שומן) often means to "rise" (cf. Job 29:8; Ezek. 2:1; Dan. 10:11; 12:13; Esth. 8:4), and while not inappropriate, it is unnecessary to translate "stood still," indicating intent listening (cf. Ehrlich, Randglossen, p. 202). The standing may have been a spontaneous act, but it appears that there may have been some liturgical procedure already accepted for the reading of scripture (Bertheolet, loc. cit.). The blessing (vs. 6) might have been an extended prayer (cf. Dan. 2:19 b ff.) or the words of a song (e.g., I Chr. 16:8 ff.; Bertheolet, op. cit., p. 273). The Chronicler might have been expected to insert a long prayer on this occasion (cf. I Chr. 29:10 ff.; Ezra 9:6 ff.) but it may have been somewhat Tabernacles or Booths, which had come to be widely celebrated in his own later time.

But along with these evident interests of the genealogist and the ceremonialist go certain insights into vital religion of every age. According to the Chronicler's deep conviction, the first result of the fuller understanding of the law as the revealed will of God for his people (as the Priestly Code now set it forth) was a sudden sense of judgment and of guilt before 6 And Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God. And all the people answered, Amen, Amen, with lifting up their hands: and they bowed their heads, and worshipped the Lord with their faces to the ground.

7 Also Jeshua, and Bani, and Sherebiah, Jamin, Akkub, Shabbethai, Hodiah, Maaseiah, Kelita, Azariah, Jozabad, Hanan, Pelaiah, and the Levites, caused the people to understand the law: and the people stood in their place.

shorter (Rudolph, loc. cit.). Benedictions are usual even today before reading scripture, and various formulas for that purpose are given in the Talmud (Berakoth 11b). The epithet the great god, rather unusual in Hebrew (cf. 9:32; Deut. 10:17; Jer. 32:18; Ezra 5:8), is found in the Jewish papyri (Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, No. 72, 1. 15). It suggests the Neo-Babylonian use of that title (ilu rabû; Sidney Smith, Babylonian Historical Texts [London: Methuen & Co., 1924], Pl. I obverse, l. 3) and the similar “great Lord” (bēlu rabû), used of the god Marduk in the Cyrus Chronicle.

The repetition of Amen (cf. 5:13) expresses great emphasis (cf. John 1:51; 3:3; 5:19; etc.). Public prayer was concluded with an amen in the time of the Chronicler (cf. I Chr. 16:36), and Paul expected it “at the giving of thanks” (I Cor. 14:16). The popular utterance was accompanied by such a lifting up of hands as Ezra had done during prayer (cf. Ezra 9:5), and as Ezra had cast himself down (Ezra 10:1) the people bowed “fell down before the Lord.” Bowed, which always precedes the verb worshipped (I Chr. 29:20; II Chr. 29:30; cf. Bertheau, loc. cit.), means “bending over” in the first stages of prostration. Thus bowed their heads is less accurate than “bowed,” and the Peshitta interprets it as “they knelt,” which suggests Ezra’s humble posture in Ezra 9:5. Since it is obvious that the final state of prostration, with their faces to the ground (cf. Ezra 10:1) would not be held during the entire meeting, there is no explicit reference to rising from it.

7-8. Reading the law (vs. 8) should follow directly after the preparatory acts of vs. 4-6, but reference to the interpretation of the law, which normally would follow the reading, is made to precede it. If vs. 7 is genuine, with a reference to interpretation, it is obviously out of place. Some regard it as the Chronicler’s work, possibly added to give to the Levites the greater prominence in the role of interpreters which they enjoyed in the Chronicler’s day (Guthé and Batten, op. cit., p. 18; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 147, 149; Gerhard von Rad, Deuteronomium-Studien [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1947], pp. 8 ff.). Others consider the reference to the Levites as genuine, although the list of names may be supplementary (cf. Bertheolé, loc. cit.). Priestly law enjoined the descendants of Aaron to teach the law (Lev. 10:11), and the Levites in vs. 9 are described as teaching it. “The Levites . . . taught the people” (vs. 9) has been regarded as a title of habitual office (Albin Van Hoonacker, Le sacerdoce lévique [London: Williams & Norgate, 1899], p. 50 ff.), and Johannes Nikel (Die Wiederherstellung des jüdischen Gemeinwesens nach dem babylonischen Exil [Freiburg i. B.: Herder, 1900; “Biblische Studien”], pp. 22, 171, 226), who translated it as “teachers,” believed that such professional teachers instructed the people in the law, whereas the “scribes” expounded and supplemented it. The versions, however, have no reference in vs. 7 to Levitical

God on the part of all the people. But the Chronicler puts upon the lips of Nehemiah as governor, and of Ezra as priest, his own profound conviction that this fuller understanding of the will of God was in a deeper sense a reason for joy and gratitude to God who had made it possible (vs. 10c).

It is significant that the whole stress of this chapter is on the understanding of the law as the will of God for his people—as if that were instruction but present the Levites in the role of marshals. The Peshitta claims that they "were attending to [גָּשַׁב] the people" while the Vulg. more explicitly states, "The Levites made silence among the people in order to hear the law." In vs. 11 and 9:4-5 some of the Levites are marshals for the crowd, directing them in liturgical performance. Hölscher (Ezra und Nehemia, p. 546, note h) suggests that the Levites taught the people in groups or classes as in a church school. Such an interpretation would suit the last statement of the verse if that is to be rendered the people stood in their place, possibly as a result of the activity of the Levites. The verb "stand" can mean "stand still" (cf. Ehrlich, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 146; cf. Job 30:20), but the M.T. lacks the verb which gives such an interpretation, although it is present in the Vulg. and Peshitta. If the M.T. is to be understood in agreement with the Peshitta and Vulg., the verse would not be out of order, for it was necessary to quiet the crowd before the reading.
NEHEMIAH 8:8

8 So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading.

None of the thirteen men named (vs. 7) is listed among the laymen seated with Ezra (vs. 4), but the majority can be identified with Levites elsewhere. Seven are among those in ch. 10 and four of them are also found directing the people in 9:4-5. For Shabbethai and Jozabad see 11:16; Ezra 8:33; 10:23. Since most of them are identifiable as Levites, it may be assumed that all were, and it is preferable to read "namely the Levites" for and the Levites or to omit and as in I Esdras 9:48, the Vulg., and the RSV. Inclusion of Akkub (cf. Ezra 2:42) the gatekeeper (7:45; 11:19; 12:25), if he is the same person, may indicate the Chronicler's hand here, for while the gatekeepers are carefully distinguished from the Levites in 7:45 ff. (=Ezra 2:42 ff.), the Chronicler regarded them as Levites (cf. I Chr. 23:5).

They read now means the Levites of vs. 7, but if vs. 7 is interpolated the readers would be Ezra and his companions (vs. 4). Distinctly represents the technical term used in Ezra 4:18, meaning "translated at sight." It is wrong to think here of translation into Hebrew from Babylonian laws (Cowley, op. cit., p. xxvi, n. 1), for the original Hebrew text was doubtless translated aloud as Aramaic, the common speech of post-exilic Palestine (Bowman, "Arameans, Aramaic, and the Bible," pp. 81-82). The rabbis regarded this verse as the earliest reference to the Targ. They said, "And they read"—that is the text; 'explained,' that is the Targums" (Megillah 18b; Jerusalem Megillah I, 9; IV, 1; Genesis Rabbah, 36, 8; Jalkut II, 61, 1071). The Babylonian Talmud asserts, "Originally the Law was given to Israel in Hebrew writing and the holy language. It was again given to them in the days of Ezra in the Assyrian [i.e., Aramaic] writing and the Aramaic language" (Babylonian Talmud: Sanhedrin 21b; Nedarim 37b; cf. Megillah 3a; Jerusalem Megillah 74d). Distinctly should thus be interpreted "translating at sight and giving understanding." Since the concluding words of the verse refer to the result of reading in the prescribed manner, it is better to render so that rather than and.

all they needed (vss. 2-3, 8-9, 12-13). It was reserved for their descendant Paul centuries later, through his own early experience of life under the law, and then through the forgiving and redeeming grace of God revealed to him on the Damascus road and in the life and death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, to discover that legalistic religion by its very nature puts burdens on the consciences and wills of sensitive-souled men which they are not able to carry, burdens from which only the forgiving love and power of God as revealed through Christ could admit Paul and his fellow Christians to the joy of the Lord (cf. Rom. 6:7-23). In this deeper sense the good news of the N.T. gives a profounder meaning and fulfillment to vs. 10 than the "understanding of the law" (on which the Chronicler laid such stress), by its very nature and in view of human nature as we all know it within ourselves, could ever do.
9 ¶ And Nehemiah, which is the Tirshatha, and Ezra the priest the scribe, and the Levites that taught the people, said unto all the people, This day is holy unto the Lord your God: mourn not, nor weep. For all the people wept, when they heard the words of the law.

10 Then he said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto him for whom nothing is prepared: for this day is holy unto our Lord.

C. INJUNCTION TO CELEBRATE WITH JOY (8:9-12)

The weeping after the reading of the law is usually explained as due to repentance for past sins and fear of punishment to come (cf. Josephus Antiquities XI. 5. 5). Browne (Early Judaism, p. 188) conjectured that the reading for the first day covered Deut. 1-15, "which contained enough commandments and threats to cause all the weeping of the people." An entirely new law would scarcely have had this effect. It must have been regarded as the ancient, binding law of Moses which had been neglected in Palestine during the exilic and postexilic periods. Later Jewish teachers taught that Ezra re-established the law in Palestine when the law was forgotten (Midrash: Sukkah 20a; Sifre on Deut. 48, p. 84b; Tanaim, p. 43), and he was later often placed on a par with Moses because of it (Tosefta Sanhedrin IV, 7; Jerusalem Megillah 1, 9; Talmud: Sanhedrin, 21b). Another interpretation of the weeping denies that it was due to a reaction to the law and finds it in evidence of an old Canaanite festival which began with rites of mourning for dead Tammuz. In combating this popular celebration the Deuteronomic revision of the feast of Booths stressed rejoicing rather than cultic weeping (Julian Morgenstern, "Supplementary Studies in the Calendars of Ancient Israel," Hebrew Union College Annual X [1935], 54, n. 82). The teaching here is then understood to be an affirmation of the joyous character of the feast of Booths about to be described. Since the festival is unnamed and its announcement found some Jews unprepared for it (vs. 10), the feast was probably not an ancient, well-established one. It has been regarded as a special festival instituted without precedent to celebrate the recovery of the law (cf. Ryle, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 244). Such unique festivals are found elsewhere (cf. Esth. 9:16 ff.; I Macc. 4:59; II Macc. 10:6-8; 15:36; John 10:22). The attitude of joy and thanksgiving at the reception of the law reflects the spirit of Deuteronomy (cf. Deut. 12:12; 14:26; 16:11 ff.).

9. The M.T. includes Nehemiah in the gathering, but he plays no significant part. The omission of him in I Esdras 9:49 is not important since that version, which ignores him otherwise, would naturally omit him here. As Ezra and Nehemiah were not contemporaries (cf. Intro., p. 562), the name of Nehemiah must be an addition, possibly inserted by the editor who transposed chs. 8-9 to its present position, which thus made the man contemporary (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 148). The epithet Tirshatha (cf. Ezra 2:63), interpreted by some as the governor, is not applied elsewhere (5:14, 18; 12:26) to Nehemiah, who is always called "governor" (pehah; cf. Ezra 5:3; 8:86). Some regard the epithet as genuine and the name Nehemiah as a gloss (Guthrie and Batten, op. cit., p. 50; Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 269, note e; Gotthard, Text des Nehemia, p. 43; Van Hoonacker, Le sacerdoce légitime, p. 50 and note). But which is the Tirshatha appears also to be a gloss, possibly from 10:1, which may have been added when Nehemiah was inserted, or even later as a gloss on a gloss (cf. Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 102; Smend, Die Listen, p. 18; Nikel, op. cit., p. 200, n. 1; Stade, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, II, 177, n. 1; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

10. The day is called holy unto our Lord, but the basis for its holiness is not explained. Nor do the people appear to be aware of the significance of the first day of the Lord: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the Lord is your strength.
11 So the Levites stilled all the people, saving, Hold your peace, for the day is holy; neither be ye grieved.
12 And all the people went their way to eat, and to drink, and to send portions, and to make great mirth, because they had understood the words that were declared unto them.
13 And on the second day were gathered together the chief of the fathers of all the people, the priests, and the Levites, unto Ezra the scribe, even to understand the words of the law.

seventh month. Although it became New Year’s Day in postexilic times (cf. Ezra 3:1), and later the feast of Trumpets (Lev. 23:23-25, Num. 29:1-6), there is no more expectation of a feast here than in Ezra 8:1. Batten (op. cit., p. 357) claims that “the observance of the day as described does not conform to the law,” and he sees in the absence of all reference to trumpets or to a “holy convocation,” an indication that Ezra was ignorant of the Priestly Code that some suppose he introduced into Palestine.

The fat, a plural term, means such “fat pieces” as the Oriental regarded as the daintiest morsels, rich food in contrast to ordinary fare. The sweet, also plural in Hebrew, could mean sweet wine (cf. LXX; Amos 9:13), but it meant as well any supersweet nectarlike drink served at special celebrations. The Vulg. interprets it as wine sweetened with honey (mulsum). Portions were gifts of food (cf. 13:10; I Sam. 1:4; Esth. 9:19, 22) which have been compared to the gifts given by Arabs to their guests (lawiyyya; Julius Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums [Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1887], p. 114) and are evidence of generous hospitality connected with festal offerings (cf. I Sam. 9:13; II Sam. 6:19: 15:11; etc.). The LXX and I Esdras wrongly consider that the portions were for the poor “that have nothing” (Batten, op. cit., p. 358), for they were sent to others as well (cf. Esth. 9:22). The M.T. behind to him for whom nothing is prepared presents unusual Hebrew syntax favored by the Chronicler and in prose found almost exclusively in Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah (cf. Arvid S. Kapelrud, The Question of Authorship in the Ezra-Narrative [Oslo: J. Dybwałd, 1944], p. 86; Kautzsch, Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, sec. 152v; König, Historisch-comparative Syntax, sec. 380f). Its sense is properly rendered by the Peshitta, “to whoever has not prepared for himself.” Emphasis is on brotherly assistance to help kinsmen, caught unprepared by the short notice, to celebrate the feast.

11. Because it is largely repetitive, this verse is regarded by some as an unnecessary addition by the Chronicler (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 149). But it is not mere repetition for it supplements the preceding statement, “describing more particularly the method by which the people were quieted” (Batten, loc. cit.; cf. vs. 3 supplemented by vss. 4-8). Again (cf. vs. 7) the Levites are portrayed as marshals, keeping the crowd in order and passing instructions on to them.

D. Celebration of the Feast of Booths (8:13-18)

13. A smaller group, secular and ecclesiastical leaders who needed to know the law to enforce it, met on the second day. Heads of fathers’ houses is used in the Ezra story (8:1) but never in Nehemiah’s work. Unto Ezra has been called an interpolation (Albin Van Hoonacker, Nouvelles études sur la restauration juive après l’exil de Babylone [Paris: Ernest Leroux, 1896], p. 239; cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 360), but probably means simply that Ezra presided (Siegfried, op. cit., p. 103). The LXX, Vulg., and Peshitta omit even before to understand or to study and are rightly followed by the RSV.
And they found written in the law which the Lord had commanded by Moses, that the children of Israel should dwell in booths in the feast of the seventh month:

And that they should publish and proclaim in all their cities, and in Jerusalem, saying, Go forth unto the mount, and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths, as it is written.

So the people went forth, and brought them, and made themselves booths, every one upon the roof of his house, and in their courts, and in the courts of the house of the law. And they found it written in the law that the Lord had commanded by Moses that the people of Israel should dwell in booths during the feast of the seventh month, and that they should publish and proclaim in all their towns and in Jerusalem, "Go out to the hills and bring branches of olive, wild olive, myrtle, palm, and other leafy trees to make booths, as it is written."

So the people went out and brought them and made booths for themselves, each on his roof, and in their courts and in the 14. The Pentateuch nowhere presents written instructions for keeping the feast of Booths as described in this section. Closest parallels are in the Holiness Code (Lev. 23:39-43), but there are striking differences. There the festival begins on the fifteenth day (Lev. 23:39), while here it is the third, and the reference to the Exodus, prominent in the Holiness Code (Lev. 23:43), is unmentioned here. It has been argued that Neh. 8 reflects the original date in the Holiness Code (Lev. 23:33-43) before that was altered in harmony with the later priestly legislation (Morgenstern, "Studies in Calendars," pp. 53, 56, 69). The implication that the harvest was still in progress points to a date in Neh. 8 at the beginning of the seventh month rather than at its middle (ibid., pp. 61-62, n. 97).

For booths and the feast see Exeg. on Ezra 3:4.

15. Nowhere is it written in the law (vs. 14) that the leaders are to publish and proclaim the feast. Unto the mount suggests that one mountain could supply all the branches named. The hills reflects the idea that not a single mountain but the hill country of Judah is meant. The writer may have had in mind the wooded area west of Jerusalem, in the mountains west of 'Ain Kârim (cf. Gustaf Dalman, Arbeit und Sitte in Palästina [Gütersloh: C. Bertelsmann, 1928], I, 77).

As in Lev. 23:40, boughs were to be used during the festival, but the lists have only the palms and thick trees in common. The olive appears in Nehemiah, but there is no reference to the willows of Lev. 23:40. The myrtle (יַלְדָּהָה אֲרֵס) graphically resembles somewhat the spelling of the "goodly trees" (יַלְדָּהָה אֲרֵס) of Leviticus. The latter suggests the ligni pulcherrimi of the Vulg. for "the oil tree" of the M.T., which the Peshitta interprets as "nut trees" and the LXX as "cypress." This tree has been identified with the wild olive (oleaster; cf. Isa. 41:19), but since the wild olive has few if any berries, and those without oil (Thomson, Land and Book, p. 53; Dalman, op. cit., I, 68), the identification is incorrect for "oil tree." Early Jewish commentators (Saadiah, Aruch, Kimhi on Isa. 41:19) agree with the LXX that the "oil tree" was the resiniferous cypress or pine. Luther called it the balsam. Leafy trees were perhaps dense foliage which could easily form a crude shelter. Although Jewish tradition calls such trees "myrtle" (J. H. Hertz, ed., The Pentateuch and Haftorahs: Leviticus [London: Oxford University Press, 1932], p. 256), which is here mentioned specifically, the Peshitta has "willow" (Lev. 23:40). Palm branches, too, would be useful for building, but though palm is mentioned a number of times (cf. Judg. 4:5; Joel 1:12), it was as rare in Palestine in ancient as in modern times (Dalman, op. cit., I, 64 ff.), and was not commonly in the highlands. There is not now in scripture any written legislation concerning the building of the booths.

16-17. The festal celebration is regarded as unique in Hebrew history. By regarding son of Nun (Josh. 1:1) as an interpolation, some identify Jeshua with the high priest contemporary with Zerubbabel instead of with Joshua the leader during the conquest of God, and in the street of the water gate, and in the street of the gate of Ephraim. 17 And all the congregation of them that were come again out of the captivity made booths, and sat under the booths: for since the days of Jeshua the son of Nun unto that day had not the children of Israel done so. And there was very great gladness.

courts of the house of God, and in the square at the Water Gate and in the square at the Gate of Ephraim. 17 And all the assembly of those who had returned from the captivity made booths and dwelt in the booths; for from the days of Jeshua the son of Nun to that day the people of Israel had not done so. And there was very great reof Canaan (J. D. Michaelis, Ubersetzung des Alten Testament mit Anmerkung für Ungelehrte [Gottingen: Wittwe Vandenhoeck, 1783], XII, 66; Klostermann, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, p. 247; Siegfried, op. cit., p. 104), and a single Hebrew MS supports such emendation. The name Jeshua is spelled Joshua elsewhere. It is the same as that used for the high priest (Ezra 2:2) and others (cf. 3:19; 7:11, 43; 8:7; 9:4-5; Ezra 2:6, 36, 40; 3:9: 8:33). The spelling alone, however, is insufficient evidence for emendation, and no historical facts warrant departure from the M.T. If it were the high priest, the paternity “son of Jozadak” (cf. Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2) would be expected (Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 72).

There is considerable dispute as to the basis for regarding the festival described here as unique in Hebrew history. Some consider that the institution was entirely new (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 362), but the feast was certainly an old one (cf. Ezra 3:4) which the Chronicler mentions elsewhere (II Chr. 8:18). Others find the novelty in the dwelling in booths (Berthau, Esra, Nechemia und Ester, p. 279; Kegel, Kulturreformation des Esra, p. 190), but that practice too was ancient, and the feast is already called the feast of Booths in Deut. 16:13, 16. Ryle (Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 248), stressing done so (vs. 17), sees the new element in the strictness of the observance. More probably the uniqueness lay in the complete centralization of the feast in Jerusalem, so that not only was the festal sacrifice made in Jerusalem (cf. Deut. 16) but the booths were confined to Jerusalem also (Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 593-94; Sellin, Geschichte, II, 139; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 153).

Such centralization explains the distribution of the booths within the city (vs. 16). Because of congestion in the ruined city, the booths were set up in every available place. Some were erected on the flat roofs of the houses, where huts of summer boughs were sometimes erected by the poor when they had no cool upper chamber (cf. Nowack, Lehrbuch, I, 140-41; Gottlieb Schumacher, Across the Jordan [London: Richard Bentley & Son, 1886], p. 89). Although the Canaanites used their roof tops for places of sacrifice (cf. II Kings 23:12; Jer. 19:13; 32:29; Zeph. 1:5), it is unnecessary to regard the booths of vs. 16 as a “certain counter-weight for Yahwe,” as a concession to the Jews who were still inclined toward the ancient Canaanite practice (cf. Kapelrud, op. cit., pp. 89-90); this would not account for the other booths. The courts of the houses, where booths were set up, were paved areas, often planted with trees and containing a well (II Sam. 17:18), which lay before the houses, separated from the street by a high wall. Booths were also erected in the temple courts. House of God (cf. Ezra 1:3) for the temple (cf. Ps. 135:2) is one of the Chronicler’s preferred expressions (cf. Ezra 1:3-5, 7; 2:68; etc., ibid., p. 90). Other booths, presumably for those from outside Jerusalem, were erected in the “broad place” (cf. Ezra 10:9) of the Water Gate (cf. 3:26) and the Gate of Ephraim. The Gate of Ephraim (cf. 12:39) was so named because its road led northward to Ephraim. It is located about four hundred cubits (about twelve hundred feet) from the Corner Gate (cf. 3:11; Jer. 31:38), according to II Kings 14:13. From 12:39 one may assume that it lay between the Wall of the Square (3:8) and the Mishneh Gate (3:6) and is probably identical with the “first gate” of Zech. 14:10 (Simons, Jerusalem in O.T., p. 278). The gate was located approximately in the middle of the first north wall, where the principal east-west and north-south roads now cross, between the citadel and the Haram-es-sherif (C. Schick, “Der Lauf der zweiten Mauer,” pp. 279 ff.; cf. Simons, 18 Also day by day, from the first day unto the last day, he read in the book of the law of God. And they kept the feast seven days; and on the eighth day was a solemn assembly, according unto the manner. joying. 18 And day by day, from the first day to the last day, he read from the book of the law of God. They kept the feast seven days; and on the eighth day there was a solemn assembly, according to the ordinance.

op. cit., p. 234). The square where the booths were erected was doubtless the square north of the city wall, the “square” of the Wall of the Square (3:8), the “place” of the “first gate” (Zech. 14:10; ibid., p. 278, n. 1).

All the assembly (cf. Ezra 10:1) is here identified as returned exiles, ignoring those who had not been exiled. Such a view is usually associated with the Chronicler (Ezra 9:8). Some have claimed that the attitude “is a result of theoretical deliberation on the basis of Ezra 1–6, and has nothing to do with reality” (Kapelrud, loc. cit.); but it is possible that the returned exiles were so numerous as to give their name to the entire community (Bertholet, loc. cit.).

18. The expression day by day, favored by the Chronicler (S. R. Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament [new ed.; New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1981], p. 505), occurs only in Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah (1 Chr. 12:22; II Chr. 8:13; 24:11; 30:21; Ezra 3:4; 6:9). An eighth day celebration (vs. 18) is not mentioned in earlier legislation where the feast of Booths is but seven days long (Deut. 16:13; Ezek. 45:25; Lev. 23:34, 36a, 39a). The reference to such a day in the Holiness Code (Lev. 23:39) has been regarded as a later priestly interpolation (ibid., p. 55; J. M. P. Smith, Origin and History of Hebrew Law, p. 86; cf. Morgenstern, “Studies in Calendars,” p. 53), for it is found in the Priestly Code (Lev. 23:36; Num. 29:35) where, however, it was celebrated on the twenty-second day of the seventh month. Usually the eighth day is ascribed to the Chronicler, who also supplied it in II Chr. 7:8-10 (cf. I Kings 8:66; Browne, Early Judaism, p. 188). It is possible, however, that the custom of an eighth day was already in practice in the time of Ezra, who adopted it without reference to earlier legislation (Morgenstern, “Studies in Calendars,” pp. 56-57, 64).

Legislation in Deut. 31:10-11 requires that the law should be read “at the end of seven years, at the exact moment of the sabbatical year, at the feast of Tabernacles,” which has been interpreted as meaning at the end of every seven-year period (Carl Steuernagel, Übersetzung und Erklärung der Bücher Deuteronomium und Josua [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1923; “Handkommentar zum Alten Testament”], p. 111). Morgenstern, who believes that Ezra read the law in 458-457 B.C., has determined that the year was such a sabbatical year, and that Ezra was acting in conformity with the legislation of Deut. 31:10-11 (“Studies in Calendars,” pp. 70-71, n. 107). It is unlikely that such a date for Ezra can be maintained (cf. Ezra 7:7-8). More probably the daily reading of the law during the feast was one of its unique features (cf. vs. 17), since it is not elsewhere prescribed in Jewish legislation. Later, when a feast day was established to mark the completion of the annual cycle of the reading of the Pentateuch, this celebration (Simhath Torah: “The Joy of the Law”) was placed in the calendar on the eighth day of the festival, at the close of the celebration of the feast of Booths—celebrated on the twenty-second day of the seventh month (ibid., pp. 9-10).

According to the ordinance (vs. 18) corresponds to as it is written (vs. 15), but no commands are preserved for the observance of the eighth day service on the tenth day of the seventh month. Priestly law calls for its observance on the twenty-second day of that month (Lev. 28:36; Num. 29:35-38).

With the successful completion of his mission, the story of Ezra is concluded (cf. Hölsher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 544). Josephus (Antiquities XI. 5. 5) observes: “And it was his fate, after being honored by the people, to die an old man and be buried with great magnificence in Jerusalem.” With the increasing importance of the law in Judaism, the stature of Ezra increased in the minds of his people, and later traditions
Now in the twenty and fourth day of this month the children of Israel were assembled with fasting, and with sackclothes, and earth upon them.

Now on the twenty-fourth day of this month the people of Israel were assembled with fasting and in sackcloth, and with abounding concerning his life, his devotion to the law and its propagation, his founding of synagogues, and his death and burial (cf. M. Munk, Esra ha sofer [Frankfurt: Israelit & Hermon, 1983]).

IX. Mixed Marriage Reform (9:1-5a)

The expression this month now links ch. 9 with ch. 8, but it is out of place, for the transition from joyous celebration (ch. 8) to deep mourning (ch. 9) is hardly understandable. The idea that the mood of 8:9 returned after the brief festival (e.g., Bertholet, loc. cit.) is psychologically improbable (Jahn, Esra [A und B] und Nehemja, pp. 128-29). Vs. 2 shows that the sorrow was due not to the reading of the law but to mixed marriages. Some scholars transpose ch. 8 to follow chs. 9-10 (W. H. Kosters, Die Wiederherstellung Israels in der persischen Periode [tr. A. Basedow; Heidelberg: J. Höning, 1895], pp. 64 ff.), but it is more likely that ch. 9 should be related to Ezra 10, which is also concerned with mixed marriage. Others insert Neh. 9:1-2 between vs. 14 and vs. 15 of Ezra 10 (Julian Morgenstern, "The Chanukkah Festival and the Calendar of Ancient Israel," Hebrew Union College Annual, XX [1947], 22), or between vs. 15 and vs. 16 of that chapter (Frieder Ahlemann, Die Esra-Quelle; ein literarkritische Untersuchung [Greifswald: Dissertation, 1941] cited by Rudolph, op. cit., p. xxxi; Ahlemann, "Zur Esra-Quelle," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, LIX [1942-43], 78, 85, 88 ff.), but such proposals place the actual separation of the mixed families (9:2) before the preparation to do so (Ezra 10:16 ff.; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 155). It is better to have ch. 9 follow Ezra 10:44 (Torrey, Composition, p. 32; Ezra Studies, pp. 254, 274, note p; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 154) as a second stage of the marriage reform, after Ezra's most extreme measures had been carried out.

Some regarded vs. 4-5a as the work of the Chronicler, who missed the Levites in vss. 1-2 and introduced them on the basis of late Levitical custom (Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, pp. 105-6; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 156; et al.). But lacking knowledge of the place of Levites in services at the time of Ezra, it seems arbitrary to conclude that the practice in vss. 4-5a was foreign to his age and therefore reflects later times. Reading the text (vs. 3), however, intrudes into a context otherwise concerned with fasting, weeping, and penitence. It is possibly a post-Chronicler supplement inserted by the editor who disrupted the order of the Ezra narrative, or by a later person who felt it necessary to have the reading of the law here as in previous assemblies (e.g., 8:2-8, 18). Vs. 3 shows strong influence of 8:7b-8a (cf. ibid., p. 155).

9:1. This month is the first (Nisan) of 397 B.C. (cf. Ezra 10:17) and its twenty-fourth day was May 16. For fasting see Ezra 8:21. Sackcloth (saq) was a coarse hairy cloth worn as a sign of mourning (H. F. Lutz, Textiles and Costumes Among the Peoples of the Ancient Near East [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1923], pp. 25, 176-77). Originally worn as a loincloth (Gen. 37:34; I Kings 20:31) bound with a rope directly against the skin without the benefit of soft undergarments (I Kings 21:27; II Kings 6:30; Jer. 48:37; Job 16:15), the later garment may have been somewhat more extensive. Earth appears in the Peshitta as "ashes." Such material has been identified as dust taken originally from the grave and ashes from articles burned with the body (II Chr. 16:14; 21:19; 22:18).

---

9:1-37. Collective Confession and Intercession. —The setting of this entire chapter is that of a general assembly of the people, planned with liturgical care (vss. 4-5), for the further reading of the law (vs. 8a), and then for a public service of worship and confession (vs. 3b). In this solemn setting Ezra the priest offers a lengthy prayer (vss. 6-37) of national confession, beginning with a doxology of praise (vs. 6). The history of God’s covenant dealings with his
2 And the seed of Israel separated themselves from all strangers, and stood and confessed their sins, and the iniquities of their fathers.

3 And they stood up in their place, and read in the book of the law of the Lord their God one fourth part of the day; and another fourth part they confessed, and worshipped the Lord their God.

4 ¶ Then stood up upon the stairs, of the Levites, Jeshua, and Bani, Kadmiel, Shebaniah, Bunni, Sherebiah, Bani, and Chenani, and cried with a loud voice unto the Lord their God.

2. If ch. 9 is a sequel to ch. 8, separated themselves means nothing, but it is intelligible as the final formal proclamation of divorce if Ezra 9–10 is antecedent (Browne, op. cit., p. 191). The contrast here is between the seed of Israel, the “holy seed” (Ezra 9:2), and the strangers who, as early as the time of Haggai (cf. Ezra 4:1), were excluded from the Judean community. The foreigners are clearly the non-Israelite “people of the land” (Ezra 9:1). The confession of sin is not only personal but collective (cf. 1:6b), covering all sins during Israel’s history. Sins and iniquities (cf. 4:5) appear as synonyms, indicating cultic failure to obey God’s law rather than personal moral defects.

3. Someone stood while the law was read (cf. 8:5), but the pronoun they is ambiguous; it apparently refers to the seed of Israel (vs. 2), but it was probably intended to designate “the Levites” of vs. 4, those who were to read (cf. F. W. Schulte, Esra, Nehemia und Esther [Leipzig: Velhagen & Klasing, 1876], p. 172). The verb too is ambiguous, since it would mean “to take places” (cf. 8:7) or “to rise” from a kneeling position. For in their place see 8:7b.

According to 8:3, the reading lasted half a day, but here, where the half day is divided between reading and confession, the reading time is less. A quarter day is assumed to be three hours. The LXX indicates that the confession was directed “to the Lord.” It is suggested that the act was not private confession but public participation in the hearing of the penitential psalm (vss. 5b-57; Bertheau, op. cit., p. 281), but that psalm is entirely unrelated to this episode. For worshiped the M.T. has, lit., “prostrated themselves,” which is understood to mean that the confession was made while lying prostrate (Siegfried, op. cit., p. 105).

4-5a. Here again (cf. 8:7, 11) the Levites appear as marshals, leading the crowd and directing the service. Each list (vss. 4, 5a) in the M.T. has eight Levites, but the totals differ in the versions and the passage has been called textually hopeless (Bertheot, loc. cit.). It is conjectured that the original figure was the round number seven (cf. 8:7; chosen people Israel is then reviewed at great length and in detail, with the steady refrain of God’s mercy (vss. 17b, 20, 31) and justice (vs. 33), in spite of the presumption (vs. 16) and disobedience (vss. 17, 26, 30-31, 34) of Israel.

(On such public liturgical prayers see Expos. on 1:4-11; Ezra 9:1-15.) The occasion of this elaborate service and lengthy prayer is plainly intimated in vs. 2; the issue is that of mixed marriages, as in Ezra 9–10. The details of setting
5 Then the Levites, Jeshua, and Kadmiel, Bani, Hashabniah, Sherebiah, Hodiah, Shebaniah, and Pethahiah, said, Stand up and bless the Lord your God for ever and ever: and blessed be thy glorious name, which is exalted above all blessing and praise.

Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 51), or that the sum of the two lists was originally eleven, six in vs. 4 and five in vs. 5, which, with Ezra himself, would make the number twelve, the traditional number of Hebrew tribes, a number favored by the Chronicler (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 280).

Usually the lists are regarded as originally identical, as in the Peshitta, and variants are explained away as textual corruptions. But such duplication appears senseless, and there must originally have been some basis of differentiation not now ascertainable. It is conjectured that the first group (vs. 4) began the ceremony with an invocation, and the second (vs. 5) then called the group to participate in the prayer (ibid.). But five of the eight Levites have identical names. Jeshua, Bani, and Kadmiel, usually first when listed (cf. 8:7; 10:9), here also head the lists. Shebaniah and Sherebiah appear in their usual order in vs. 5 but are reversed in vs. 4. For Shebaniah some Hebrew MSS and the LXXAL have Shechaniah (cf. Ezra 8:3), which is favored by some (ibid., p. 279; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 152) but is found in only a few MSS of Neh. 10, to which the names here listed seem to be related. The other names are found elsewhere for Levites: Chenani (vs. 4) abbreviates Chenaniah (I Chr. 15:22); Hashabneiah is an error for Hashabiah (cf. 10:11; 12:24). For Hodiah, cf. 8:7; 10:13. Pethahiah (cf. Ezra 10:23), missing in 10:9 ff., is probably the Pelaiah of 8:7; 10:10 (ibid.).

Stairs is used only here in the sense of a platform if it is intended to represent the structure of 8:4, but "the stair of the Levites' seems to refer to a well-known cult apparatus used by the Levites on such occasions. The loud voice led to the suggestion that the Levites, responsible for working with groups out of doors, cultivated high, loud, far-carrying voices (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 364).

X. Penitential Psalm (9:5b-37)

This section presents not prose narrative but a long penitential psalm. The LXX links the psalm with the narrative by introducing in vs. 6, and Ezra said, which is widely accepted as a "probable" emendation. But the psalm begins with a doxology (vs. 5b) and the words and Ezra said would be an obvious intrusion. There is no clear evidence of strophic structure in the entire psalm, but Rudolph (op. cit., p. 157) observes that if dubious vs. 22 is omitted, Neh. 9:9 ff. shows symmetrical structure with a preliminary section in three strophes (16+8+8=32 lines); a central seven-line strophe (vs. 24-25); and a final section of four strophes (8+8+8+32 lines). The date and authorship of the original psalm have been much debated but with widely varying results. It has been called "a litany written for the worship of Northern Israel on the occasion of a day of fasting, confession, and prayer," soon after 722 B.C. (Adam C. Welch, "The Source of Nehemiah IX," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XLVII [1929], 190-37; Post-Exilic Judaism [Edinburgh: William Blackwood & Sons, 1935], pp. 42-43), but such a view is as extreme as that which assigns it to the and date are not quite the same as that of the similar assembly reported in Ezra 10:9-12, but the purpose is the same—bluntly stated in vs. 38. The worship is to lead up to a signed and sealed written declaration by their political and religious leaders of their purpose with regard to mixed marriages. The account is set in the third person with Ezra as officiating priest, assisted by Levites who are named (vs. 4-5). The prayer itself, cast in Deuteronomic phrase and forms of thought, presumably by the Chronicler whose philosophy of Jewish history it 6 Thou, even thou, art LORD alone; thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all things.

6 And Ezra said: “Thou art the LORD, thou alone; thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the...
that are therein, and thou preservest them all; and the host of heaven worshippeth thee.

7 Thou art the Lord, the God, who didst choose Abram, and broughtest him forth out of Ur of the Chaldees, and gavest him the name of Abraham; earth and all that is on it, the seas and all that is in them; and thou preservest all of them; and the host of heaven worships thee.

7 Thou art the Lord, the God who didst choose Abram and bring him forth out of Ur of the Chaldees and give him the name creator and preserver of all. And Ezra said could only be intrusive in such a context, as indicated above. The uniqueness of the Lord paraphrases Deut. 6:4, and Deuteronomic thought is reflected throughout the verse as well as through the entire poem. Although a different Hebrew verb is used for "created," the references to creation are based on Gen. 1:1, 6-8; 2:1. The combination of heaven and the heaven of heavens may derive from Deut. 10:14. Heaven of heavens, indicating belief in a plurality of heavens (cf. Deut. 10:14; I Kings 8:27; Pss. 68:33; 148:4; II Enoch 8:1-9:1; 10:1-6; 21:6-22; cf. Eph. 4:10; II Cor. 12:2-4), means "the highest heaven" (cf. Deut. 10:14; I Enoch 60:1; 71:5). A host is a well-ordered army (cf. Isa. 40:26; 45:12), but the host of heaven is a group created by God (Gen. 2:1) and described as standing, in attendance like courtiers, on each side of God's throne (see I Kings 22:19). They are described as the sun, moon, and stars (Deut. 4:19; Isa. 40:26), sometimes personified (cf. Judg. 5:20; Job 38:7: Ps. 148:3) and brought under God's subject (cf. Isa. 24:21). The verb thou preservest, lit., "enlivenest," implies both "bringing into existence" and "preserving" (cf. I Sam. 2:6; Deut. 32:39; Ezek. 13:18-19).

C. Election of the Hebrews and the Covenant (9:7-8)

7-8. With vs. 7 begins a retrospective examination of Israel's history such as is characteristic of later Jewish writing strongly influenced by the Deuteronomic philosophy of history (cf. Pss. 78; 105; 106). In it the poet shows the faithfulness of God to his chosen people despite their faithlessness. Although the Exodus is usually stressed as prime evidence of God's favor, and it has been argued that all pre-Sinaitic covenants are secondary (cf. Kurt Galling, Die Erwählungstraditionen Israels [Giessen: A. Topelmann, 1928], p. 54), it is recalled that in that event God's act was but the consequence of his oaths to the patriarchs (Deut. 7:8). Like the E writer, our poet counts Hebrew history from the call of Abraham and God's covenant with him, the basis of God's promises to Israel.

Although the writer depends largely upon sources that are Deuteronomic or earlier, there is unmistakable evidence of familiarity with the work of the later priestly redactor in the reference to the change of the name of Abram (cf. Gen. 17:5) and the migration from Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. 11:31). Such evidence has argued for a late date for the psalm, and those who would date it early must explain its presence. The proposal to regard vs. 7-8 as additions to the text (Welch, "Source of Nehemiah IX," p. 132) is extreme since these verses contain the all-important promise. It is preferable to regard only the troublesome priestly element as the redactor's gloss and thus to omit Abram and bring him forth out of Ur of the Chaldees and give him the name (cf. Julian Morgenstern, "Chanukkah Festival," p. 20, n. 33). Although Abram and Abraham are but variant spellings of the same Amorite name (Abi-ram; cf. Num. 16:1; J. A. Montgomery, Arabia and the Bible [Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, (vs. 33). Behold, we are slaves . . . and we are in great distress (vss. 36-37). Suffering follows disobedience as its divine penalty—so simple is the prayer's doctrine of evil, on which Job has not yet thrown his more discerning light, still less the suffering servant of the Lord in Isa. 40-55.
8 And foundest his heart faithful before thee, and madest a covenant with him to give the land of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Jebusites, and the Girgashites, to give it, I say, to his seed, and hast performed thy words; for thou art righteous:
9 And didst see the affliction of our fathers in Egypt, and hearest their cry by the Red sea;
10 And showedst signs and wonders upon Pharaoh, and on all his servants, and on all the people of his land: for thou knewest that they dealt proudly against them. So didst thou get thee a name, as it is this day.

1934), pp. 167-68), it is probable that the name was here originally Abraham, as in Deut.
1:8; 6:10; 9:5. Abraham's selection appears arbitrary, but it was found that his heart ("mind," Ezra 6:22) was faithful. The Hebrew word rendered faithful means "firm," "steady," "reliable." The LXX translates it faithful as in Gal. 3:9. Of God's promises to Abraham (Gen. 12:1-4, 7) the poet stresses "unto thy seed will I give this land."
For to give the land the versions have "to give him the land," which may be original (Gotthard, Nehemia, p. 43).

The list of peoples (vs. 8), superficially in agreement with Gen. 15:18-21 (J), is closer to Exod. 3:17 (R Di), which adds the "Hivites." But the LXX1, Peshitta, and Arabic versions add the Hivites before the J ebusites in Neh. 9:8 and some would so emend the M.T. (ibid.). Hivites were found in central Palestine, chiefly at Gibeon (Josh.
9:7) and Shechem (Gen. 34:2) and were made subject to taskwork after the time of Solomon (1 Kings 9:20 ff.). To the five peoples of Ezra 9:1 the M.T. here adds the Girgashites, who are apparently identical with the Qaraqish of Hittite records (Abel, Geographie, I, 325; cf. W. F. Albright, reviewing F. M. Abel's Geographie de la Palestine, Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society, XV [1935], 189). They appear to have lived in Trans-Jordan, for they joined Jericho against Israel (Josh. 24:11). The LXX of the parallel text (Exod. 3:17) also lists the Girgashites.

D. EGYPTIAN SOJOURN AND EXODUS (9:9-11)

From the promise to Abraham the writer's mind leaped to the Egyptian sojourn, the first great threat to fulfillment of the promise. By his power, revealed through signs and wonders, God broke the bonds that held his people and frustrated the pursuers who would pull Israel back to Egypt.

9-10. Vs. 9 paraphrases Exod. 3:7 (J), changing "afflictions of my people," referring to Egyptian persecution (Exod. 1:8-16), to affliction of our fathers. Their cry, which in Exod. 3:7 refers to the reaction to the taskmasters, here occurs at the Red Sea, apparently influenced by the thought of Exod. 14:10. As usual the "Sea of Reeds" of the M.T. is called the Red Sea in the Vulg. and LXX. The words signs and wonders show the influence of Deut. 6:22. The chronological sequence in vs. 10 should make signs and wonders follow the Exodus, if not signify the Exodus itself. But in Deut. 6:22 they cluded the plagues (Exod. 7-12), which the words and on all the people of his land show is true here also. The phrase "all his household" of Deut. 6:22 is here rendered all his servants, which the Peshitta interprets as "all his army."

One motive for God's intervention was that the Egyptians acted insolently against Israel, here expressed in the actual words used by Jethro in Exod. 18:11 (J). Against them (M.T.) is interpreted as against our fathers but without textual authority.
Another motive, popular in later times, was to increase God's reputation (name; cf.
748
11 And thou didst divide the sea before them, so that they went through the midst of the sea on the dry land; and their persecutors thou castest into the deeps, as a stone into the mighty waters.

12 Moreover thou leddest them in the day by a cloudy pillar; and in the night by a pillar of fire, to give them light in the way wherein they should go.

13 Thou camest down also upon Mount Sinai, and spakest with them from heaven, and gavest them right judgments, and true laws, good statutes and commandments:

14 And madest known unto them thy holy sabbath, and commandedst them precepts, statutes, and laws, by the hand of Moses thy servant:

Exod. 9:16; Isa. 63:12, 14). In associating the signs and wonders with the name, the writer shows dependence upon Jer. 32:20.

11. The crossing of the Red Sea closely paraphrases Exod. 14:21-22, with some recollection of words of the Song of Moses (Exod. 15:5, 10). For “they sank” (Exod. 15:5, 10) the poet has thou didst cast, under the influence of Exod. 14:27. Into the mighty waters, found in Exod. 15:10 but with a different adjective, here is influenced by Isa. 43:16, which uses the words of Neh. 9:11. Persecutors for the pursuers of the M.T., LXX, and Peshitta shows the influence of the Vulg.

E. The Wilderness Wandering (9:12-21)

12-21. After frustrating the enemy (vss. 9-11), to keep his promise of delivering Canaan to Israel God had to save his people from such natural terrors of the wilderness as loss of direction, famine, death by thirst, and finally from the results of Israel’s own rebellion and apostasy.

1. Salvation from Natural Dangers (9:12-15)

12. Moreover, or “furthermore,” omitted by the RSV, links vs. 12 with what precedes. God guided Israel through the wilderness (cf. Exod. 13:21-22 [J]). The J writer thought of God as being “in a pillar” but “in” can also mean by instrumentally. To give them light (cf. Exod. 13:21) could refer only to the pillar of fire, but the Vulg., “that they might see,” could refer to both pillars. By changing the number of the pronoun, Deut. 1:33 is expertly adjusted to in the way wherein they should go.

13-14. Inevitably the giving of the law at Sinai (Exod. 19:18, 20 [J]; 20:22b [R]; Deut. 4:36a) would be mentioned in the story of the wilderness, since it was part of the plot of the psalm that Israel later disobeyed those laws. Despite its importance, the writer who places the matter of the law almost parenthetically between references to salvation from natural terrors (vss. 12, 15) is much more moderate in his treatment of the subject than might be expected of the Chronicler under the circumstances.

The imagery is drawn from the J account (Exod. 19:18c, 20), but from heaven (cf. Exod. 20:22b [R]) indicates that the writer shares the concept of revelation from heaven rather than the earlier view that God spoke “face to face” with Moses (Deut. 5:4; 34:10). For judgments see 1:7; for statutes and commandments see Ezra 7:11. Only the sabbath law is given special attention. Although there was some early concern about the sabbath (Amos 8:5), it becomes a principal concern in the postexilic period (13:15-21; Jer. 17:19-27; Mark 2:23-28; Luke 13:10-17).
15 And gavest them bread from heaven for their hunger, and broughtest forth water for them out of the rock for their thirst, and promisedst them that they should go in to possess the land which thou hadst sworn to give them.
16 But they and our fathers dealt proudly, and hardened their necks, and hearkened not to thy commandments, 17 And refused to obey, neither were mindful of thy wonders that thou didst among them; but hardened their necks, and in their rebellion appointed a captain to return to their bondage: but thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and forsookest them not.

15. Rescue from hunger and thirst is indicated by passing reference to the miracles of the bread from heaven (cf. Exod. 16:3-27 [J]) and the water . . . from the rock (cf. Exod. 17:6 [J]; Num. 20:7-13 [R]), which are mentioned again in vs. 20. The section concludes with a reference to the treasured promise of God. To go in to possess the land is a Deuteronomic expression (cf. Deut. 9:5). Which thou hadst sworn interprets a Hebrew text, “which thou hast lifted up thy hand,” referring to the gesture of making an oath (cf. Exod. 6:8; Ezek. 20:28; 42; 47:14; Ps. 106:26). God swore to give Canaan to Israel (Gen. 26:3; Exod. 33:1; Num. 14:23) and the poet is ever eager to affirm it.

2. ISRAEL’S REBELLION AND APOSTASY (9:16-18)

Not only the wilderness but also the deliberate acts of Israel could have frustrated God’s plan to fulfill his promise. But God resolved to keep his promise despite all the difficulties Israel put in the way of its fulfillment.

16. If and is retained in they and our fathers, they would refer to Moses’ contemporaries and our fathers to the poet’s more immediate ancestors. Since both probably refer to the same people, ancestors in general, and should be rendered “namely,” as explicative (cf. 7:2; Ezra 6:8; Siegfried, op. cit., p. 108; Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 75; Rudolph, Esra und Nehemia, p. 158). Dealt proudly is the same as the expression used in vs. 10 of the hated Egyptians (cf. Deut. 1:43; 17:13). Stiffened their neck, a figure borrowed from the driving of oxen who resist guidance, indicates stubbornness (cf. Deut. 10:16; Jer. 7:26; 17:23; 19:15).

17-18. Easy forgetfulness of God’s wonders performed for Israel (Exod. 3:20) was regarded as evidence of disbelief in the power of God (Num. 14:11). Seven Hebrew MSS, the LXX, and Ethiopic versions show that ברי in their rebellion, is an easy error for בשתם, in Egypt, as in Num. 14:4. Appointed a leader makes a mere proposal in Num. 14:4 into a historical fact for which there is no evidence elsewhere. The crowning sin of the wilderness was the rejection of the Lord for the molten calf (Exod. 32:1-8) and the identification of that calf with the resucer and protector of Israel. The LXX and Peshitta assimilated the M.T. text here to that of Exodus by substituting “these are the gods” (Exod. 32:4, 8) for this is thy God, and the Peshitta adds the vocative “O Israel.” For such perfidy Israel deserved to be punished and abandoned by its God but, despite the hindrances and provocations, God continued to help Israel, to fulfill his promise. The concept of a God ready to forgive is found elsewhere (cf. Exod. 34:6-7; Amos 7:2; Ps. 130:4; etc.). The exact expression is in Dan. 9:9, from where it is supposed to have been borrowed (Siegfried, loc. cit.), but more probably Neh. 9:18 may depend on Num. 14:19-20 (J) and Daniel may borrow from here.
18 Yea, when they had made them a molten calf, and said, This is thy God that brought thee up out of Egypt, and had wrought great provocations;

19 Yet thou in thy manifold mercies forsokest them not in the wilderness: the pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither the pillar of fire by night, to show them light, and the way wherein they should go.

20 Thou gavest also thy good Spirit to instruct them, and withheldest not thy manna from their mouth, and gavest them water for their thirst.

21 Yea, forty years didst thou sustain them in the wilderness, so that they lacked nothing: their clothes waxed not old, and their feet swelled not.

22 Moreover thou gavest them kingdoms and nations, and didst divide them into corners: so they possessed the land of Sihon, and the land of the king of Heshbon, and the land of Og king of Bashan.

didst not forsake them. 18 Even when they had made for themselves a molten calf and said, ‘This is your God who brought you up out of Egypt,’ and had committed great blasphemies, 19 thou in thy great mercies didst not forsake them in the wilderness; the pillar of cloud which led them in the way did not depart from them by day, nor the pillar of fire by night which lighted for them the way by which they should go. 20 Thou gavest thy good Spirit to instruct them, and didst not withhold thy manna from their mouth, and gavest them water for their thirst. 21 Forty years didst thou sustain them in the wilderness, and they lacked nothing; their clothes did not wear out and their feet did not swell. 22 And thou didst give them kingdoms and peoples, and didst allot to them every corner; so they took possession of the land of Sihon king of Heshbon and the land of Og king

3. God’s Protection in the Wilderness (9:19-21)

19. Due to his forgiving nature and his determination to fulfill his promise to Abraham, God did not forsake Israel (cf. Ezra 9:9) in the wilderness. For the pillars see Exeg. on vs. 12.

20-21. In vs. 20 the poet apparently plays on the words “withheld” (מָנָא) and manna (cf. vs. 15). But the gifts of God were not all material. Possibly with the ideas of vs. 13-14 in mind, the poet declares that God gave his good Spirit to instruct them (cf. Num. 11:17, 25). The LXXI renders good spirit (cf. Ps. 143:10) as “the Holy Spirit.” The Pentateuch does not mention the gift of the Holy Spirit, but the idea “is in harmony with the later conception [Isa. 63:11]” (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 368).

Vs. 21 is a “free quotation” of passages in Deut. 8:4, 9 (ibid.), mentioning the material needs of Israel supplied by God during forty years in the wilderness. For didst thou sustain them (vs. 21) the Vulg. has properly, “thou didst feed them,” since the Hebrew verb means “to supply with food” (Gen. 50:21), an idea not found in Deut. 8:4. The Deuteronomist was also concerned about the supply of clothing during the wandering. Our poet takes over his statement, their clothes did not wear out. Later Jewish teachers, concerned about children outgrowing their clothes, taught that the clothes of their children grew with their bodies, “like the shell of a snail” (cf. Rashi on Deut. 8:4; Justin Dialogue with Trypho 131). Deut. 8:4 also refers to the problem of sore feet. Since the Hebrew verb is later used of the “swelling” of dough, swell is appropriate, but the versions differ in interpretation. The Vulg. has “their feet were not worn” (attribi), apparently assimilation to the statement about the clothes, and the Peshitta and LXX have “were not split open.”

F. Conquest of Canaan (9:22-25)

The climax of the poet’s story is the delivery of Canaan to Israel by God, in fulfillment of his promise to Abraham.

22. This verse, which anticipates the conquest in vs. 24, appears to be intrusive, since vs. 25 belongs with vs. 21, and vs. 22 disrupts the strophic structure of vs. 9-37 (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 157, 160). Israel’s first successes were against the kingdoms and

751
23 Their children also multipliedst thou as the stars of heaven, and broughtest them into the land, concerning which thou hadst promised to their fathers, that they should go in to possess it.

24 So the children went in and possessed the land, and thou subduedst before them the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, and gavest them into their hands, with their kings, and the people of the land, that they might do with them as they would.

25 And they took strong cities, and a fat land, and possessed houses full of all goods, wells digged, vineyards, and oliveyards, and fruit trees in abundance: so they did eat, and were filled, and became fat, and delighted themselves in thy great goodness.

peoples of Trans-Jordan (Num. 21:21-35). The defeat of the Amorites Sihon and Og was long remembered as a great providential event in Hebrew history (Pss. 135:11; 136:19-20). Heshbon (Tell Hesbán), capital of Sihon’s kingdom, lay east of the Jordan, between the Arnon and Jabbok rivers (Num. 21:24; Deut. 1:4; 2:26-27; John Garstang, The Foundations of Bible History: Joshua-Judges [London: Constable & Co., 1931], p. 384). Bashan was the broad fertile land in Trans-Jordan lying southward from Mount Hermon as far as the land of Gilead. It was famous for its oaks (Isa. 2:13; Zech. 11:2; Ezek. 27:6) and its cattle (Amos 4:1; Ps. 22:12).

Into corners translates a Hebrew text, “according to a corner,” which is difficult to interpret. Ancient translators were as confused as moderns. The usual interpretation every corner or “to its utmost extent” (Francis Brown, S. R. Driver, C. A. Briggs, eds., A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament [Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1928], p. 802) is forced and unsuitable. Since the word also means “side,” “edge,” “border,” and is used for the points of the compass (cf. Ezek. 47:17-20; Josh. 15:5; 18:12, 14-15, 20), it is proposed to read the plural form (lāpē`óth) and translate it as “boundaries” (cf. Ehrlich, Randglossen, VII, 206; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 160) or as “according to designated boundaries” (Bertholet, op. cit., p. 74; Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 51).

23-24. Didst multiply their descendants affirms further fulfillment of the promise to Abraham (Gen. 15:5; 22:17; 26:4; Deut. 1:10). The children were Joshua’s Israelite contemporaries. Thou didst subdue clearly indicates that the conquest was not the work of Israel but God’s deed, in fulfillment of his promise. The use of the verb subdue (נשׂך; cf. Deut. 9:3 RSV; Judg. 4:23) suggests a play on the word Canaanites (כנענים) in the same verse (cf. “manna” in vs. 20; Ehrlich, loc. cit.; Siegfried, op. cit., p. 109; Bertholet, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 109). Subdue indicates that the writer did not share the view that the Canaanites were exterminated (cf. Josh. 1–12) but the LXX here interprets as “thou didst destroy.”

25. Since the Israelites were to do with the Canaanites as they pleased (vs. 24), a general description of the conquest is given in vs. 25. Most of the expressions are taken from Deuteronomy (cf. Deut. 6:10-11; 8:7-9; etc.). The Deuteronomist favors fortified cities (cf. Deut. 3:5). Fat land means a fertile, rich land (cf. vs. 35; Num. 13:20). Beginning with houses full of, the rest of the verse largely abbreviates Deut. 6:11. For hewn out the Vulg. has “made by others,” obviously assimilating Deut. 6:11, “which thou diggest not.” Fruit trees are not mentioned in Deut. 6:11, but to cut down fruit trees during a siege of a city is forbidden (Deut. 20:19-20).
NEHEMIAH 9:27

26 Nevertheless they were disobedient, and rebelled against thee, and cast thy law behind their backs, and slew thy prophets which testified against them to turn them to thee, and they wrought great provocations.

27 Therefore thou deliverest them into the hand of their enemies, who vexed them: and in the time of their trouble, when they cried unto thee, thou hearest them from heaven; and according to thy manifold goodness God who gave such plenitude. The verb rendered delighted themselves or 'lived bountifully' appears only here but seems related to a word for "luxury" or "dainty" (II Sam. 1:24; Jer. 51:34). In Syriac the verb has the sense of "to revel" or "to live licentiously," and it may have been chosen here to indicate the apostasy that accompanied the prosperity. The expression became fat has the same force, since in Deuteronomy "becoming fat" is derogatory, associated with apostasy (cf. Deut. 32:15).

G. Sin and Punishment in Canaan (9:26-31)

After keeping his promise to deliver Canaan to Israel, God expected the Israelites to keep their part of the covenant, obeying his commandments. But well fed and at ease, Israel felt no need of God for sustenance and guidance. They concentrated on the luxuries he provided and ignored his demands. They rebelled and provoked him greatly, rejected his law (vs. 26), ignored his commands (vss. 29-30), and acted insolently (vs. 26). Despite such behavior, God was gracious, merciful (vs. 31), and patient (vs. 30). Repeatedly he warned his people (vss. 26, 29-30) to turn to him (vs. 26) and his law (vs. 29). His Spirit (vs. 30; cf. vs. 20) warned through the prophets (vs. 30), but Israel killed the prophets (vs. 26) and ignored God. To reach his people and hold them God had to use other means. Here the poet adopts the Deuteronomistic view of Hebrew history as a series of cycles of oppression, salvation, freedom, and apostasy which led to still more oppression (cf. Judg. 2:11 ff.).

In times of apostasy God withdrew his protection from his disobedient people, abandoning them to hostile neighbors (vss. 27, 30) who oppressed and dominated Israel (vss. 27-28). In distress Israel cried pitifully to God (vs. 27), who heard them from heaven and each time answered by giving a savior (vs. 27) to rescue them from their tormentors and restore them in loyalty to their God. He never forsook his people (vss. 30-31) or let them lose their racial identity completely. But Israelite loyalty was short-lived. After an interval of rest and ease (vs. 28) the cycle was renewed with rebellious disobedience and the rejection of God and his law.

26. The violence of Israel's rejection of God is indicated by the statement that they cast [God's] law behind their back. Earlier the expression referred to the casting of God himself (cf. I Kings 14:9; Ezek. 23:35). Since law was something of a surrogate for God himself (cf. vs. 26 with vs. 29) the expressions may be identical. Death of the prophets indicates the kingdom period, from which some murder stories are known (I Kings 18:4, 13; 19:10, 14; Jer. 2:30, 34; 26:20 ff.). Such crimes were most grievous since the prophets were regarded as channels for the Spirit of God (vs. 30; cf. Jer. 26:15). Testified against, a favorite Deuteronomistic expression, means "to bear witness." The figure is drawn from the courts, and the prophets and God (cf. vs. 29) are regarded as accusers of guilty people. The new provocations, which implies contemptuous or blasphemous acts, translates the same Hebrew word used in the molten calf episode (vs. 18).

27. The word for enemies differs from that in vs. 28 and the translation "into the hand of the tormentors and they tortured them," and in the time of their torment" indicates a possible play on the word "torment" (cf. vss. 20, 24; Batten, op. cit., p. 369).
mercies thou gavest them saviours, who saved them out of the hand of their enemies.

28 But after they had rest, they did evil again before thee: therefore leftest thou them in the hand of their enemies, so that they had the dominion over them: yet when they returned, and cried unto thee, thou heardest them from heaven; and many times didst thou deliver them according to thy mercies;

29 And testifiedst against them, that thou mightest bring them again unto thy law. yet they dealt proudly, and hearkened not unto thy commandments, but sinned against thy judgments, (which if a man do, he shall live in them;) and withdrew the shoulder, and hardened their neck, and would not hear.

30 Yet many years didst thou forbear them, and testifiedst against them by thy Spirit in thy prophets: yet would they not give ear: therefore gavest thou them into the hand of the people of the lands.

31 Nevertheless for thy great mercies' sake thou didst not utterly consume them, thy great mercies thou didst give them saviors who saved them from the hand of their enemies. 28 But after they had rest they did evil again before thee, and thou didst abandon them to the hand of their enemies, so that they had dominion over them; yet when they turned and cried to thee thou didst hear from heaven, and many times thou didst deliver them according to thy mercies. 29 And thou didst warn them in order to turn them back to thy law. Yet they acted presumptuously and did not obey thy commandments, but sinned against thy ordinances, by the observance of which a man shall live, and turned a stubborn shoulder and stiffened their neck and would not obey. 30 Many years thou didst bear with them, and didst warn them by thy Spirit through thy prophets; yet they would not give ear. Therefore thou didst give them into the hand of the peoples of the lands. 31 Nevertheless in thy great mercies thou didst not make an end of them or for-

From heaven: Cf. vs. 13. Saviors who saved them may be another word play. In Judg. 2:16 “judges” is used instead of saviors, but the latter is used in II Kings 13:5 as here.

The manifold mercies of God were responsible for salvation.

28. Had rest refers to the period of peace and freedom after God's protection was restored (cf. Judg. 2:19). Many times indicates the frequency of the cycle of apostasy, oppression, and salvation. The difficulty of the Hebrew text, which has been called “unhebraic” (Ehrlich, loc. cit.) and “impossible on any just principles of Hebrew syntax” (Batten, loc. cit.), is glossed over by translators. Rudolph (op. cit., p. 164), however, argues that the adjective many appears in an unusual position by analogy to the syntax of numerals (cf. Jer. 16:16; I Chr. 28:5).

29. Israel's sins are specified in vs. 29. The parenthetic comment associated with the commandments and ordinances quotes from memory Lev. 18:5 (cf. Ezek. 20:11). Probably a later addition to the text, it is best interpreted as by the observance of which a man shall live. On the basis of Lev. 18:5 the later rabbis taught that aside from public idolatry, murder, and adultery, all commandments are in abeyance whenever life is endangered (Hertz, Pentateuch and Halalorahs: Leviticus, p. 175). Israel is here portrayed again as a stubborn ox (cf. vs. 16). The imagery is apparently derived from Zech. 7:11 (Hos. 4:16). Withdrawd the shoulder is, lit., "gave a withdrawing shoulder," describing an ox refusing to accept the yoke. For stiffened their neck see Exeg. on vs. 16.

30. For many years see Exeg. on many times in vs. 28. Thou didst bear with them should probably be emended as in the American Jewish Translation to "didst extend mercy unto them," in agreement with such passages as Ps. 36:10; 109:12; Jer. 31:3 (Gotthard, Nehemia, p. 44; Batten, op. cit., p. 370; Berthelet, op. cit., p. 75; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 166). By thy Spirit through thy prophets seems to reflect Zech. 7:12 (cf. II Pet. 1:21). The prophets are the organs through which the divine agent, the Spirit, takes effect.

31. Despite Israel's guilt, God did not make an end of them. Because God was gracious and merciful, Israel still existed as a people (cf. Jer. 5:18; 30:11).
nor forsake them; for thou art a gracious and merciful God.

32 Now therefore, our God, the great, the mighty, and the terrible God, who keepest covenant and mercy, let not all the trouble seem little before thee, that hath come upon us, on our kings, on our princes, and on our priests, and on our prophets, and on our fathers, and on all thy people, since the time of the kings of Assyria unto this day.

33 Howbeit thou art just in all that is brought upon us; for thou hast done right, but we have done wickedly:

34 Neither have our kings, our princes, our priests, nor our fathers, kept thy law, nor hearkened unto thy commandments and thy testimonies, wherewith thou didst testify against them.

H. Plea for Mercy and Salvation (9:32-37)

With now (vs. 32) the writer turns from remote history to more recent times, especially his own day. In the sin—repentance—redemption cycle to which the poet subscribed he finds himself and his fellows in the period of foreign domination. From his anguish the psalmist cries as his ancestors had done many times before, with the expectation that, as always before, God would pity his people and provide a savior.

32. The chain of divine epithets here is strongly reminiscent of 1:5 (cf. Deut. 10:17). Trouble or hardship means “weariness” and is used of Israel’s distress in Egypt (Num. 20:14) and in the wilderness (Exod. 18:8). The word has been regarded as almost technical, like “the Exile,” consisting of all the defeats, humiliations, and persecutions suffered at foreign hands with God’s consent. Us includes Israelites in all periods who suffered hardships, down to the writer’s own day. Since all thy people are mentioned, our fathers may come from vs. 34 (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 168). Such hardship is thought to have begun in Assyrian times (cf. Ezra 9:7; Siegfried, op. cit., p. 111), but there were many complaints earlier, as in the book of Judges. For kings of Assyria the Vulg. and Peshitta have “the king of Assyria,” which may have meant Sennacherib (701 B.C.; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 161); but it is preferable to read kings with the M.T. and regard the expression in a general sense of “from the time that foreign kings began to rule over Israel” (Bertheau, op. cit., p. 290).

33-35. The writer here declares that despite Israel’s hardships, God has not acted unjustly. The verses have been regarded as “the expanded counterpart” of Ezra 9:9, 13, 15 (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 275, note w). Because the two passages are concerned with a similar situation and are both influenced by Deuteronomic reasoning, it is to be expected that the ideas will sometimes be similar, but there is scarcely enough verbal similarity to show actual dependence. For the justice of God (cf. vs. 8b; Ezra 9:15) see Deut. 32:4. In all that has come (cf. M.T. of Ezra 9:13): The preposition can be rendered “about” or “concerning.” The expression hast done right, lit., “hast done truth” or “hast exemplified the truth” (Amer. Trans), is rendered hast dealt faithfully due to the LXX, “made faith.” The contrasting expression, have done wickedly, exhibits the usage of late Hebrew (cf. Dan. 9:5; 12:10).

34. The people listed are the former lawless generations. Prophets, mentioned in vs. 32, are here omitted because they were obedient instruments of God (cf. vs. 26, 30). For the testimony of God see vs. 30. Commandments and testimonies are grouped in Deut. 6:17; II Kings 23:3. Testimonies or warnings is a term favored in Deuteronomy (cf. 4:45; 6:17, 20; etc.).
35. They contrasts with we in vs. 36. In the contrast between the failure of the ancestors to serve God (vs. 35) and the consequent servitude to foreigners (vs. 36) the writer may be playing on the word “service” (cf. vs. 20, 23-24; cf. Ehrlich, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 162). Their kingdom refers to the independent pre-exilic Hebrew monarchy. “Thy kingdom,” found in two Hebrew MSS, the LXX, and Peshitta versions, is assimilated to thy great goodness, which follows. Great goodness is the abundance of material blessings (cf. Jer. 31:12, 14). The preposition in is textually well attested but is awkward and meaningless as usually translated. It is better read “in exchange for” (Kautzsch, Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, sec. 119p), since the preposition is elsewhere so used with the verb “serve” (cf. Gen. 29:18, 20; Hos. 12:12). For gavest before them or set before them it is preferable to read with the Peshitta and Arabic versions “gave to them” (Gotthard, loc. cit.).

36-37. The play on the verb “serve” in we are servants (cf. Ezra 9:9) is lost by rendering the noun as slaves. The masters are the kings of vs. 37. Because the Persian period was regarded as a relief from Babylonian bondage (cf. Ezra 1:3), it has been thought that the miseries of the Greek period are reflected here (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 371). But though life was not too severe under Persia, there was always a desire for independence (cf. Hag. 2:6-8; Zech. 3:8-10; 6:10-12). The overlords were presumably Persian kings whom God set over the Jews (Ezra 5:12) because of their sins.

Foreign domination rankled, but the primary and immediate concern of the author was the economic loss in Palestine as goods were passed over to foreign lords. Eat the fruit thereof (cf. vs. 25) and enjoy ... its good suggest Jer. 2:7 (cf. Isa. 1:19). The Persian kings, who continued the Assyro-Babylonian assessments of tribute in the provinces (Esth. 10:1), are accused of draining off the best produce of the land, and their excessive demands often created economic disaster (cf. 5:2-4).

They have power also over our bodies refers to forced labor, either as taskwork (cf. Ezra 4:13) or military conscription (A. H. Sayce, An Introduction to the Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther [3rd ed.; London: Religious Tract Society, 1889], p. 60; Bertholet, loc. cit.; Bertheau, op. cit., p. 291). Cattle were taken for draft purposes in war and, since the word is also used for riding animals (cf. 2:12, 14), perhaps also for the cavalry.

The psalm has often been regarded as fragmentary, mangled in its conclusion. Some expect a supplication for the restoration of Israel (Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 51; Kosters, Wiederherstellung Israels, p. 67; Siegfried, op. cit., p. 112) and Rudolph (loc. cit.) expects some promise to rectify the former neglect of the law, but he explains its lack by the hypothesis that ch. 10 was considered to satisfy such a need. However, the poem seems complete, ending forcibly (cf. Ezra 9:15) with the anguished cry, we are in great distress, an appeal for the pity of the merciful God (vs. 32) who had proved himself ever ready to help his people who called on him in their distress (cf. vs. 27). Anything more would weaken the effectiveness of the conclusion.
XI. Pledge of Reform (9:38–10:39)

It has been conjectured that this section is the report of an agreement made before Cyrus' edict in 538 B.C. between Palestinian Jews who survived the captivity of 586 B.C. and fellow Israelites who remained behind after the disaster of 722 B.C. It is suggested that the religious agreement was effected to preserve the national Israelite identity in the time of crisis (Adam C. Welch, "The Share of N. Israel in the Restoration of the Temple Worship," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XLVIII [1930], 179-87). This hypothesis is not demonstrable. The late religious concepts reflected in the chapter make it extremely improbable. Many regard it rather as part of the Ezra story in some way associated with the reading of the law (ch. 8) and the psalm in ch. 9. As such ch. 10 is usually regarded as the Chronicler's work, an attempt to show that although Ezra's efforts may have failed (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 173), his work with the law had a successful conclusion (Torrey, Composition, p. 34; Ezra Studies, p. 265).

More probably the chapter has nothing to do with the Ezra narrative (Winckler, Altorientalische Forschungen, Reihe 2, Bd. III, p. 472; cf. Bertholet, op. cit., pp. 75-76; Rudolph, loc. cit.), but its principal section (9:38; 10:28-39) shows a definite relationship with ch. 13. Stylistic relationships with ch. 13, which have been posited (Bertholet, op. cit., p. 76), are held not demonstrable (cf. Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, pp. 545-46; Rudolph, loc. cit.; Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 246; see Exeg. on 9:56-87). Nevertheless, there is such undeniable agreement in subject matter between the two passages that it seems likely that apart from the list of names (vss. 1-27), ch. 10 is best explained as a summary of the items included in the oath which Nehemiah required during his second administration (cf. 13:25). As such the material is now dislocated and belongs after ch. 13 (cf. Winckler, op. cit., Reihe 2, Bd. III, p. 483; Batten, op. cit., p. 873; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

Such unity as ch. 10 now has is due to the editor who placed it here as a conclusion to the Ezra story, for the chapter contains diverse elements drawn from sources having nothing to do with Ezra. The long list of names (vss. 1-27) intrudes into the material (9:38; 10:28-39) which outlines the principal laws to which the pledge was given. If the Chronicler were the author and the list of names referred to those approving Ezra's law, the name of Ezra rather than Nehemiah would have headed the list (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.). But the rest of ch. 10 is also composite. Two hands are "fairly clearly marked," with vss. 33, 37b-39a as a later addition (Browne, vss. 33, 37-39a; cf. his Early Judaism, p. 192; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 178). Many have regarded the Chronicler as the author of the chapter (cf. Torrey, Composition, pp. 21, 27-28), but the view is by no means unanimous. Though the Chronicler might be regarded as editor, it has been argued that he was using a genuine source, apparently drawn from the temple archives (Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 173-74; Otto Eissfeldt, Einleitung in das alte Testament [Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1934], p. 592). More extreme is the view that the author was a layman of the time of Nehemiah's second administration, "one of the participants [in] the measures taken by the people to perpetuate Nehemiah's reforms" (Batten, op. cit., pp. 372-73).

A. Introduction (9:38=Hebrew 10:1)

The LXX, Peshitta, and Vulg. all treat 9:38 as the conclusion of ch. 9, but the M.T. regards it as the beginning of ch. 10. It is actually an editorial insert to connect the two chapters. As a conclusion to ch. 9 it is a weak anticlimax, destroying the effectiveness of 9:37, but its substance is now necessary as background for 10:1. Some think 9:38 too abrupt for transition to 10:1, and insist that a more full account of the framing of the document mentioned in 10:1 has been lost (Kosters, op. cit., p. 65; Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 135; Siegfried, loc. cit.). Others regard that hypothesis as unnecessary, Now those that sealed were, Nehemiah, the Tirshatha, the son of Hachaliah, and Zidkijah, and Torrey (Ezra Studies, pp. 275-76, note v), who regards the Chronicler as author, considers the transition as "smoothness itself" when compared with the Chronicler's links found elsewhere (e.g., 12:27; I Chr. 28:19; Ezra 2:68; 7:27).

9:38. Since ch. 9 offers no good basis for a covenant, the antecedent of the enigmatic because of all this is ambiguous. If the Hebrew preposition "in" here signifies because, the antecedent is the reading of the law and its consequences (Ezra 9 ff.), of which Neh. 9 is but a minor, intrusive element (cf. ibid., p. 276 and note x; Bertholet, op. cit., p. 75). But the preposition can mean "in spite of" (cf. Isa. 5:25; 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4; Ps. 78:32), thus signifying "despite all this distressing situation" (i.e., 9:35-37), which is reflected in the rendering "And yet for all this" (ASV and American Jewish Translation; cf. Ehrlich, Randglossen, VII, 207). The latter rendition puts the Jews in the fine light of taking the initiative in the reconciliation with God.

Instead of the word for covenant (9:8; Ezra 10:3), the M.T. here uses one which is related to the word "firm" and is found elsewhere only in 11:23. The noun, here rendered "faith" by the LXX, perhaps means "a firm, trustworthy agreement," and the entire expression is a late variation of the earlier "cut a covenant" (Ludwig Köhler, ed., Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti Libros [Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1950], p. 62). Nothing in the M.T. justifies seal or set their seal to it, which is added for smooth reading. The word used, "the one sealed," means a "sealed document." Seals were used in antiquity to ensure privacy and protect business documents and as substitutes for signatures, but neither use seems pertinent here. It was not necessary to conceal or protect the public document and it is probable that, as in the Jewish papyri of the period, no seals accompanied the Jewish signatures. The expression "sealed document" which may once have signified a business document with appended witnesses' names, sealed externally for security (cf. Jer. 32:11, 14), seems later to mean simply a signed document, a development indicated by later Jewish use of hittûm for "signature" and Aramaic hâthôm for "signer" or "witness" (Jastrow, Dictionary of Targumim, s.v. חותם and חתמה). The document is not given verbatim but in an abstracted form. "For what purpose the record was made we are not informed" (Batten, op. cit., p. 374), but it is obvious from ch. 13 that the document was a pledge to support some laws that needed special confirmation during or after Nehemiah's second administration.

The hand of the Chronicler is seen in the list because the eighty-four signatures form a multiple of twelve, a device which has been regarded as favored by the Chronicler (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 284). But it is probable that the number is not significant since some names seem to have been lost from the list (cf. vss. 14-27; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 174).

In 9:38 the listing was said to be "princes," "Levites," and "priests," but the actual list (10:1-27), from a different source, names two secular leaders followed by the priests, Levites, and princes (cf. Ezra 8:1 ff.; 10:18 ff.). Levites are before the priests in II Chr. 19:8; 30:21, but the order princes, Levites, and priests is unique.

10:1-39. The Law and the Testimony.—The declaration thus solemnly signed and sealed by the leaders of the people, beginning with Nehemiah as governor, priests, Levites, and princes pledges them by a curse and an oath (vs. 29) to renounce mixed marriages, not to buy or sell on the sabbath, and to contribute regularly to the support of the temple ritual (vs. 39b). Ceremonial religion is henceforth to have full trial and complete obedience, so far as documents and pledges can guarantee them on behalf of frail and forgetful human nature.
1. Civil Authorities (10:1)

10:1. The introductory phrase in the M.T., “and over those being sealed,” is difficult. “Seal unto it” or “at the sealing” (cf. Batten, loc. cit.) cannot derive from the M.T., nor can the passive M.T. produce those that sealed or those who set their seal. The plural form of the M.T. has been emended to “the sealed document” (Siegfried, loc. cit.) as parallel to 9:38, but that is regarded as “a violent measure” (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 172). The plural noun clearly refers to those named in the list, as both the LXX and Vulg. show. Some propose to emend the present M.T., מְשֹׁרַתֹת, to מְשֹׁר, “the ones sealing” (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 282), but it is possible simply to revocalize the present C.T., מְשֹׁרַתֹת, to read הַהַשָּׁרַת, “the signers,” or הַחַשָּׁרַת, “the signatures” (cf. 9:38 above). The Hebrew preposition before “the signers,” already present in the LXX and the M.T. due to the influence of 9:38, is difficult. It must either be omitted, as in the Vulg., or be displaced by “these” (והם), as in the Peshitta and Arabic versions.

Hecaliah and Zedekiah are the secular authorities in Judea (cf. 7:7; Ezra 2:2). Nehemiah is identified as the governor by his father’s name, Hacaliah (cf. 1:1), and by the title Tirshatha (cf. 7:65, 70; Ezra 2:63). The title is inserted awkwardly before the father’s name. The presence of Nehemiah rather than Ezra is significant (cf. above). Torrey (Ezra Studies, p. 284) claims that Ezra “was regarded as above the necessity of taking this oath, which had in it something of the nature of a confession of evil-doing (cf. 9:1 ff., 10:29 f. . . .),” but it would be natural for Nehemiah, as governor and viceroy, to head the list.

The ancestry and office of Zedekiah are unknown, but his presence in the list shows that he was a prominent person. He has been regarded as possibly an official secretary (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 174), and it is proposed to identify him with the Zadok of 13:13, whose name abbreviates Zedekiah, who is conjectured to be the one who drew up the document (Rawlinson, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 48). Others, with greater likelihood, regard Zedekiah as a local leader, perhaps chief of a council of elders (Meyer, op. cit., p. 136; Siegfried, loc. cit.; cf. 11:8), in contrast to Nehemiah the viceroy. It is unlikely that he is an unhistorical creation of the Chronicler (cf. Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 283), for a forger would have used a better-known name (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.).

2. Priests (10:2-8—Hebrew 10:9-9)

2-8. The list of priests is closely related to that in 12:1-6 of the time of Zerubbabel, and that in 12:10-21 from the time of the father of the high priest Eliashib. Comparison of the lists, which are almost identical in order, indicates that what seem unique names in each list are usually only abbreviations or scribal errors (see Exeg. on 12:1-6, 10-21).

The names are not those of individual contemporaries of Nehemiah but of eponymous ancestors (cf. 12:12-18), and they apparently are to be understood as indicating individuals of the later day, the actual signers, who were representative of the earlier families. From the list it has been concluded “that the priestly families in Palestine had been newly arranged and that now there was actually a striving for the order in I Chr. 24, wherein all are traced to Aaron and his sons” (Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 406; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 175).
9 And the Levites: both Jeshua the son of Azaniah, Binnui of the sons of Henadad, Kadmiel;
10 And their brethren, Shebaniah, Hodijah, Kelita, Peliaiah, Hanan, 11 Micha, Rehob, Hashabiah, 12 Zaccur, Sherebiah, Shebaniah,
13 Hodijah, Bani, Beninu.
14 The chief of the people; Parosh, Pahath-moab, Elam, Zattu, Bani, 15 Bunni, Azgad, Bebai,
16 Adonijah, Bigvai, Adin, 17 Ater, Hizkijah, Azzur,
18 Hodijah, Hashum, Bezai, 19 Hariph, Anathoth, Nebai, are the priests. 9 And the Levites: Jeshua the son of Azaniah, Bin'nu of the sons of Hen'adad, Kad'mi-el; 10 and their brethren, Sheban'iah, Hod'i-ah, Keli'ta, Pe'a'iah, Han'an, 11 Mica, Rehob, Hashabi'ah, 12 Zaccur, Sherebi'ah, Shebani'ah, 13 Hod'iah, Bani, Beni'nu. 14 The chiefs of the people: Pa'rosh, Pa'hath-mo'ab, Elam, Zattu, Bani, 15 Bunni, Azgad, Be'bai, 16 Adoni'jah, Big'vai, Adin, 17 Ater, Heze'ki'ah, Azzur, 18 Hod'i'ah, Hashum, Be'zai, 19 Hariph, An'-

3. Levites (10:9-13)

9-13. Three prominent Levites are mentioned, followed by a larger group of their brethren. However remote, there was a blood tie between all Levites, but it is difficult to determine here whether brethren means blood ties or priestly office (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 375). Jeshua is identified as the son of Azaniah (vs. 9), presumably to differentiate him from Jeshua the contemporary of Zerubbabel. The versions, Neh. 12:8, and some twenty-nine Hebrew MSS show that the conjunction before Jeshua in the M.T. should be elided. Again there is confusion here between Binnui (3:24; Ezra 8:33) and Bani (8:7; 9:4, 5), but it is preferable to read Binnui (cf. 12:8). For sons of Henadad (3:18, 24; Ezra 8:3) and for Kadmiel see Ezr 2:40; 3:9; etc.

Most of the names are found elsewhere in the lists of Levites (8:7; 9:4-5; Ezra 8:18-19, 33). Duplications cause some uncertainty. Repetition of Shebaniah and Hodiah (vs. 10; cf. vss. 12-13) in the same order looks like a doublet, but Shebaniah (vs. 10, 12) might be an error for Shechaniah in either passage and the latter is supported by some Hebrew MSS and the Peshitta (cf. 9:5). Shebaniah has better textual support and is associated with Levites while, except in twenty Hebrew MSS in 9:4, Shechaniah has no Levitical connections. Beninu (vs. 13) has been called “unintelligible” (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 172) and is found nowhere else in Hebrew. The proposal to read “Chenani” (cf. 9:4) instead (ibid.) is unsupported by MSS or versions, and it is preferable to read “Binnui” (3:24; 12:8; Ezra 8:33). Micha (vs. 11), which abbreviates Michael (“Who Is Like God”) or Michaiah (“Who Is Like the Lord”), is the name of a Levite in 11:17. Rehob (vs. 11) is not a Levite elsewhere.

As with the priests, ancestral rather than personal names are listed, doubtless indicating either families or family representatives. Those listed are apparently not only descendants of exiles (cf. Ezra 2:40) but also of those who had remained in the land. It is suggested that the Levites in postexilic times were largely not organized into families. Hence some personal names should be expected in the list, and Kelita (vs. 10; Ezra 10:23) has been proposed as such a name (Meyer, op. cit., p. 179; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 175).

4. Laymen (10:14-27)

14-27. The label chiefs of the people is unusual since “the chief of the fathers” is preferred in Ezra-Nehemiah (Ezra 1:5; 4:2, 3; 8:1; 10:16; Neh. 7:70; 8:13; 12:12, 22-23). Part of the list (vss. 14-19) shows relationship to the great list in Ezr 2 and Neh. 7 but it is apparently not directly dependent upon either list. It is perhaps derived from a prototype of the great list. Like Ezra 2:30, the list includes Magpiahs (vs. 20), which Neh. 7 omits, and like Neh. 7:24 and I Esdras 5:16, it includes the Hariph (vs. 19) lacking in Ezr 2. The order Hashum, Bezai (vs. 18) is as in 7:22-23 in contrast to

760
20 Magpiash, Meshullam, Hezir, athoth, Ne'bai, 20 Mag'piash, Meshul'lam, Hezir, 21 Meshezabel, Zadok, Jaddua, Hezir, 21 Meshez'abel, Zadok, Jud'du-a, 22 Pelatiah, Hanan, Anai'ah, 22 Pelati'ah, Hanan, Anai'ah, 23 Hoshea, Hananiah, Hashub, 23 Hoshe'a, Hanani'ah, Hashub, 24 Hallohash, Pilecha, Shobek, 24 Hallo'hash, Pi'ilha, Shobek, 25 Rehum, Hashabnah, Maaseiah, 25 Rehum, Hashab'nah, Ma-ase'i'ah, 26 Ah'i'ah, Hanan, Anan, 27 Malluch, Harim, Ba'anaah.

28 The rest of the people, the priests, the Levites, the gatekeepers, the singers, the temple servants, and all who have separated themselves from the peoples of the lands to the law of God, their wives, their sons, their daughters, all who have knowl-

Ezra 2:17-19. In several respects it differs from either of the other lists: both Bani and Banni are found in vss. 14-15, and in vss. 17-18 are included Azzur and Hodiah, missing from the other lists, but Azzur is found in I Esdras 5:15; and in vs. 15 the order Assad, Bebai is opposite to that in 7:16-17; Ezra 2:11-12.

Furthermore, there is here in ch. 10 no reference to the families of Shephatiah, Arah, and Zaccai (Ezra 2:4-5, 9). It is suggested that the editor omitted them because they were not in Ezra 10:25 ff. (Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 545), but others then should also be missing. It is unlikely that the families refused to subscribe to the pledge (Bertheau, Ezra, Nehemias und Ester, p. 300), nor is it likely that they died out after the time of Zerubbabel. The names have probably been accidentally lost from the list (Meyer, op. cit., p. 154) in which case the original number of names would be larger than eighty-four and the thesis that used the multiple of twelve as a clue to the Chronicler's authorship would fail (cf. Exeg. on vs. 1).

Almost all the place names of the great list (7:25 ff.; Ezra 2:20 ff.) are omitted, but the inclusion of Anathoth (vs. 19) indicates that the names were available (cf. 7:27; Ezra 2:23). Anathoth has been regarded as a slip by the "forger" of the document (Hölscher, loc. cit.), but it is here a personal name (cf. I Chr. 7:8), perhaps indicating that people of Anathoth who established a new family elsewhere bore the name of their former home (Meyer, op. cit., p. 156; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

Beginning with Meshuch'alam (vs. 20) the great "standard" list is supplemented by a series of personal names (vss. 20-27) which have been regarded as those of the political leaders of the places mentioned in the great list (Ezra 2:20 ff.; Bertheau, loc. cit.; Meyer, loc. cit.) or the names of the builders in ch. 3 (Hölscher, loc. cit.). Rudolph (loc. cit.) has shown that the names here do not closely follow the order of names in ch. 3, as Hölscher has charged. Even though some of the names might be identical with those in ch. 3, it is clear that the standard list is augmented by new families, some of which may have split off from the older houses.

I. MIXED MARRIAGES (10:28-30)

28. Since vss. 1-27 are interpolated, vs. 28 originally followed 9:38. In the original document, then, the signers were not named and the list was supplied by the editor who thought it relevant. The rest of the people refers to those who did not sign the document. Only this is original and the remainder of the verse is an elaboration by the Chronicler, showing his special interest in cult personnel (ibid., p. 174). It is claimed that "this verse, which betrays the Chronicler's authorship with almost every phrase, fairly represents the whole chapter. From this point on to the end, we can recognize everywhere his peculiar style and diction, and his own special hobbies" (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 276,
29 They clave to their brethren, their nobles, and entered into a curse, and into an oath, to walk in God's law, which was given by Moses the servant of God, and to observe and do all the commandments of the Lord our Lord, and his judgments and his statutes;

note c). Although most scholars see frequent evidence of the Chronicler's hand here, it is by no means certain that he is the author. The document may have been an authentic source which he adapted to his purpose (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 173).

The priests, the Levites, etc., are parallel to the rest of the people, but the Chronicler is not responsible for all the classes listed. Since the gatekeepers, singers, and Nethinim are here, as in Ezra 2:41 ff., listed separately, while the Chronicler includes them all in the one category of Levites (cf. I Chr. 15:22-23; 23:3 ff.), the names following the Levites must be a post-Chronicler addition. Perhaps a trace of the junction is to be seen in the "and" before the gatekeepers in some Hebrew MSS. For separated themselves see Ezra 6:21; for peoples of the lands see Ezra 3:3.

As in 8:2-3, women and children were involved in the pledge. Younger children are excluded by the phrase all who have knowledge and understanding (cf. 8:2). The conjunction linking knowledge and understanding is found in the LXX and Peshitta but not in the M.T. The Vulg. has simply "all that could understand," and some have regarded the word understanding as a gloss to having knowledge (Ehrlich, Randglossen, VII, 207; Paul Haupt in Guth und Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 70), but and could be rendered "namely," as an explicative (cf. 9:16). Rudolph, rejecting all emendation, reads the M.T. as "everyone who understands to have insight," comparing "knowing how to play" in I Sam. 16:16 (op. cit., p. 174: cf. König, Historisch-comparative Syntax, sec. 410b; but cf. Kautzsch, Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, sec. 120b).

29. For their nobles, in apposition to their brethren (cf. 3:5), the noun is used that is found in 3:5 rather than that favored by Nehemiah (cf. 2:16; 4:14; 5:7; 6:17; 7:5), and is therefore regarded as originating from another source, conjectured to be the temple archives (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 173). Entered into a curse (cf. Ezek. 17:13): accepted the threat of dire consequences if a person proved unfaithful to his oath. Such penalties were normally written out (cf. Deut. 29:20-21) and may originally have been specified in the document. The word used for curse (ālāḥ) had the implication of a poisonous, disintegrating effect (cf. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture I-II, p. 437). The oath was a promise (cf. Lev. 5:4) 'or a vow (cf. Num. 30:3; 11, 14; Josh. 9:20). To walk in God's law is reminiscent of the Deuteronomic "to walk in his ways" (cf. Deut. 8:6; 11:22; 26:17; 30:16; etc.). Deuteronomic phraseology is also seen in to observe and do all the commandments (Deut. 28:15; cf. Deut. 15:5; etc.) and in the Lord our Lord (Deut. 1:6, 19, 20, 25; etc., lit., "Yahweh, our Lord"; cf. Ezra 1:1). Which was given by Moses means "which the Lord had commanded by Moses" (cf. 8:14). For servant of God see 1:8; 9:14.

The actual text of the document (cf. 9:38) is gone. What remains are "the specific forms of an agreement," as though the provisions of the document were abstracted. Each of the items of agreement is introduced by a conjunction that is usually rendered and, but, because it is explanatory (cf. Ezra 8:18), is better translated "to wit" (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 276). The editor doubtless thought of the law involved as that brought by Ezra, but since the material here is related to events at the time of Nehemiah's second administration (cf. 13:10), the identification of the law rests on the chronological sequence of Ezra and Nehemiah (cf. Ezra 7:7-8). It is said of this chapter (see above, Exeg. on 9:38-10:39), "Two hands are fairly clearly marked, verses 34, 38-40a (E. V. 33, 37-39a) being additions. The later hand is undoubtedly the Chronicler. The earlier hand might quite well be the actual covenant." (Browne, Early Judaism, p. 192.) The
And that we would not give our daughters unto the people of the land, nor take their daughters for our sons:

And if the people of the land bring ware or any victuals on the sabbath day to sell, that we would not buy it of them on the sabbath, or on the holy day: and that we would leave the seventh year, and the exaction of every debt.

Also we made ordinances for us, to charge ourselves yearly with the third part ordinances and his statutes. We will not give our daughters to the peoples of the land or take their daughters for our sons; and if the peoples of the land bring in wares or any grain on the sabbath day to sell, we will not buy from them on the sabbath or on a holy day; and we will forego the crops of the seventh year and the exaction of every debt.

We also lay upon ourselves the obliearlier stratum reflects Deuteronomic legislation, while the later shows the ideas and practices of the late priestly laws.

Foreign marriages were forbidden by the reform of Nehemiah (13:23-27) as well as that of Ezra (9:1-10:44). These contacts violated early Hebrew legislation (Exod. 34:16; Deut. 7:3). Peoples of the land (cf. Ezra 9:2, 11) included those of Ashdod, Ammon, and Moab.

2. Sabbath Observance (10.31)

Another area of Nehemiah’s reforms was sabbath observance (13:15 ff.). Foreigners brought their wares to the city on the sabbath (13:16), tempting the Jews to trade and violate the day (13:15, 17). The Jews here pledge to ignore the tradesmen and keep the sabbath and the holy day. The latter may mean fast days (cf. Exod. 12:16; Num. 28:18, 26; 29:1, 7, 12, 35) as well as the new moon festivals which were usually linked with the sabbath (Amos 8:5; II Kings 4:23). Wares is explained by the words following, since the conjunction should be rendered not or but “especially” or “namely” (cf. Ezra 6:8). Grain (šébher) means threshed grain rather than victuals (cf. Gen. 42:1-2, 19, 26; Amos 8:5).

The sabbatical year (cf. 5:1) is naturally thought of in connection with the sabbath. The pledge we would leave the seventh year is exceedingly compressed and doubtless textually corrupt. Collocation of leave and seventh year clearly indicates that the subject is the law requiring the farmer to leave his field fallow during the seventh sabbatical year (Exod. 23:11; cf. Lev. 25:2-7). The word ‛ebhul’āth, “product” (cf. Exod. 23:10; Lev. 25:3), which has been omitted accidentally, should be restored to read the crops of the seventh year (cf. Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 276, note d). Frequently a shortage of grain is reported as due to the keeping of the law of the sabbatical year (cf. I Macc. 6:49, 53; Josephus Antiquities XIII. 8. 1; XIV. 16. 2), and the statement of Tacitus (History V. 4) and Caesar’s remission of tribute during a sabbatical year both attest the observance of the law (Josephus Antiquities XIV. 10. 6).

The abrupt phrase the exaction of every debt is an afterthought appended to the pledge of sabbatical year observance. It pledges to forego the collection of debts during the sabbatical year (cf. 5:1; Deut. 15:1-4). Connection here with 5.7, 10 is apparent in the use for exaction of a Hebrew word meaning “a loan made on pledge” in 5:7, 10. The M.T. has “the loan of every hand.” A creditor in Deut. 15:2 is called “the lord of the loan of his hand,” which means “the loan which his own hand has given,” and which, therefore, it has a right to call in” (S. R. Driver, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Deuteronomy [New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1895; “International Critical Commentary”], p. 175). Thus here “hand” means that hand which holds a document proving debt.

3. Temple Tax (10:32-33)

The temple tax pledge is consonant with Nehemiah’s great concern during his second administration regarding the support of the temple (cf. 13:10-14). In postexilic of a shekel for the service of the house of our God;

33 For the showbread, and for the continual burnt offering, and for the continual burnt offering, of the sabbaths, of the new moons, for the set feasts, and for the holy gation to charge ourselves yearly with the third part of a shekel for the service of the house of our God: 33 for the showbread, the continual cereal offering, the continual burnt offering, the sabbaths, the new moons, times, without the financial support of the monarchy, the temple was dependent directly upon the community. This does not contradict Ezra 6:4; 7:20 ff., which point to Persian aid, for that royal support was in the form of limited amounts of material which ultimately had to be replenished (cf. Bertheau, op. cit., pp. 304-5; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 178).

Ezekiel planned temple dues payable to the prince who would then be responsible for the expenses of public worship (Ezek. 45:13 ff.), but this was never put into effect. It was apparently Nehemiah in his concern for temple support who established an assessment of one-third shekel payable yearly as a head tax for this purpose. Later the tax is one-half shekel yearly (cf. Matt. 17:24, 27), and the Chronicler assumed that this amount was first fixed by Moses (II Chr. 24:6, 9), since the priests believed that in Moses’ day a special assessment of one-half shekel was imposed on all males twenty years old and above for the work of the tabernacle (cf. Exod. 30:11 ff.; 38:25 ff.).

The discrepancy between the one-third shekel (vs. 32) and the half shekel (Exod. 30:11-12) has been perplexing. It is possible that an earlier tax was raised when it was found insufficient, but it is more probable that the tax was constant and the variant figures are based on different standards of weight. Persian coinage consisted of one-third, one-fourth, one-sixth, and one-twelfth shekels (cf. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 188), and the one-third shekel was introduced into Palestine during the Persian period (cf. Immanuel Benzinger, Hebräische Archäologie [Leipzig: J. C. B. Mohr, 1894], pp. 193-94). Based on the Babylonian standard, this Persian system was current as far as Persian Lydia in the west. One-third shekel of that standard weighed about 112.2 grams troy weight. The later half shekel was apparently based on the standard of the Phoenician tradesmen, which became that used for coinage in Persian Syria and presumably for early Hebrew coins (cf. G. F. Hill, “Shekel,” in T. K. Cheyne and J. Sutherland Black, eds., Encyclopaedia Biblica [New York: The Macmillan Co., 1903], Vol. IV, col. 4446). Such a Phoenician standard half shekel also weighed about 112.2 grams troy weight and was thus the equivalent of the earlier one-third shekel. Thus vs. 32 indicates a source earlier than the Chronicler and at variance with the practice of his day.

Ordinances (cf. Ezra 7:10) is preferable to obligation or “charge” since the noun is plural. The word is usually rendered “commandments,” referring to God’s commands found in a code of law. Assessment is specified as for the service of the temple, reflecting the Chronicler’s manner of indicating the cult (cf. Ezra 8:20).

33. The appended list (vs. 33) of items covered by the temple tax is a later addition, possibly by the Chronicler. It reflects conformity to the later priestly legislation rather than to Deuteronomy. Showbread is mentioned early (I Sam. 21:6; I Kings 7:48) as sacred bread, a dozen unleavened cakes each of one-fifth ephah of fine flour, placed in two piles on a table in the shrine or temple. Originally, as in Babylonia (Heinrich Zimmern, Beiträge zur Kenntniss der babylonischen Religion [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1901], pp. 94-95), it was intended as food for the God. After a week the cakes were replaced and the old ones eaten by the priests within the sanctuary (cf. Exod. 25:23 ff.; Lev. 24:5-9). The Chronicler calls it “the bread of piling” (I Chr. 28:16) or “bread of arrangement” (I Chr. 9:32; 23:29; etc.), and showbread is used only in the Priestly Code (Exod. 25:25 ff.; 35:13; 39:36; Lev. 24:5 ff.).

For the continual offerings see Ezra 3:2-5; 7:17. Sabbath offerings were supplementary sacrifices made on the sabbath (cf. Num. 28:9-10). For new moons and set 34 And we cast the lots among the priests, the Levites, and the people, for the wood offering, to bring it into the house of our God, after the houses of our fathers, at the appointed feasts, the holy things, and the sin offerings to make atonement for Israel, and for all the work of the house of our God.

feasts see Ezra 3:5. Holy things must be public sacrifices purchased with temple funds. They are usually regarded as those mentioned in II Chr. 29:33; 35:13. The sin offering (cf. Ezra 8:35) is not prominent in legislation until the time of Ezekiel (40:39; 42:13; 43:9-25; etc.) and the Priestly Code (Lev. 4:1 ff.). For atonement see 8:18 (cf. I Chr. 6:49; II Chr. 29:24; Lev. 4:13-21; 16:21-28). Because another Hebrew word is used here for work, not that in vs. 32, which means cultic functions, it is argued that all the work means not all other unspecified cultic functions but work of construction and repair in the temple (cf. II Kings 12:5 ff.; 22:3 ff.; Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 79; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 179).

4. Wood Offering (10:34)

34. The wood offering was another item with which Nehemiah had been concerned (13:31). Since a fire had to burn perpetually on the great altar (Lev. 6:12; cf. Josephus Jewish War II. 17. 6), an adequate supply of trees and brush for fires (cf. Josh. 9:21-22; I Kings 17:10; Jer. 7:18; etc.) was essential for the sacrificial system (cf. Gen. 22:3; Lev. 1:7; I Kings 18:23). Hewers of wood are mentioned in references to subject peoples in the early period (cf. Josh. 9:21, 23, 27), but nowhere until the time of Nehemiah (13:31) is there any provision for systematically supplying wood. Hence, as it is written is perplexing and has been regarded as evidence of the Chronicler's irresponsibility (Torrey, Esra Studies, p. 277, note g). But it is not clear whether the statement refers to Lev. 6:12 alone or to the entire matter of the wood offering. If the latter is intended, we must assume that some such prescription as that covered in vs. 33 was once in the law but is no longer preserved (cf. Bertholet, loc. cit.; Browne, op. cit., p. 193; cf. Julius Wellhausen, "Die Rückkehr der Juden aus dem babylonischen Exil," Nachrichten von der königliche Gesellschaft der Wissenschaft zu Göttingen [1895], p. 174, n. 1; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 180).

The term fathers' houses (cf. Ezra 2:59) means family groups. It has been argued that the priests would not have gathered wood (Batten, Esra and Nehemia, pp. 377-78), but though the list of classes may have been additional, the text must reflect ancient usage, for the Talmud mentions "the wood-offerings of the priests" (Henry Malter, ed., The Treatise Ta'anit of the Babylonian Talmud [Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1928], p. 215). The versions and several Hebrew MSS indicate that "and" has been lost before the Levites in the M.T. The rotation of the task was determined by casting lots, the Urim and Thummim (cf. Ezra 2:63), manipulated by the priests (cf. Judg. 18:14-21; Deut. 33:5; 8, 10; Raymond A. Bowman, "Yahweh the Speaker," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, III [1944], 7-8). Since the lots apparently could answer only a single question with "Yes" or "No," the process was tedious and prolonged where many people were involved (cf. I Sam. 10:19-24). While year by year indicates yearly assignment, at times appointed (cf. Ezra 10:14) refers to intervals within the year. According to the Mishnah, the wood supply was replenished nine times each year (Malter, op. cit., pp. 200-201), and Josephus (Jewish War II. 17. 6) mentions a festival of wood carrying.

It is unnecessary to charge that vs. 34 interrupts a list of sacrifices (vss. 33, 35) and is therefore out of place (Batten, op. cit., p. 378) for, if vs. 33 is recognized as the interpolation, there is no list of sacrifices in which to intrude, and vs. 32, concerned with a money gift to the temple, is followed in vs. 34 by a gift of material. Vs. 35, also dealing with commodities, follows naturally.
times appointed year by year, to burn upon the altar of the Lord our God, as it is written in the law:

35 And to bring the firstfruits of our ground, and the firstfruits of all fruit of all trees, year by year, unto the house of the Lord:

36 Also the firstborn of our sons, and of our cattle, as it is written in the law, and the firstlings of our herds and of our flocks, to bring to the house of our God, unto the priests that minister in the house of our God:

5. First Fruits (10:35-36)

35-36. The first fruits (bikkûrim; Lev. 23:17, 20 [J]; Exod. 34:22, 26 [E]) were an important part of Nehemiah's reform (13:31) because they formed the basis for Levite support (cf. 13:10-12). Semitic nomads sacrificed the first-born of cattle and flocks (cf. S. A. Cook, "Sacred Tribute in Arabia," in W. Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, pp. 458-65), and the sacrifice of first fruits was part of the Canaanite cultus adopted by the Hebrews (René Dussaud, Les origines cananéennes du sacrifice israélite [Paris: E. Leroux, 1921], pp. 163-73; Georges Contenau, La civilisation phénicienne [Paris: Payot, 1928], pp. 157-40). Like the first mowings of the field paid to the king (Amos 7:1), the first fruits were a charge on the produce of the land, paid as tribute to the Deity as "landlord." Nothing of the new crop could be eaten until the divine proprietor received his due (Lev. 23:14). It was probably believed that the whole nature of the yield of a commodity was inherent in the first of the produce, that the first fruits represent the whole, and that "the entire power and blessedness of the harvest are concentrated in them" (cf. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture III-IV, p. 301).

The double use of all in the KJV reflects the cumbersome M.T. and Vulg. but the LXXomit the first all, as in vs. 37, and the Peshitta and many Hebrew MSS omit the second one. First born of stock and men were also to be offered according to the law (Exod. 13:2). First born males were sacrificed on the eighth day (Exod. 22:30; Deut. 15:19-20). Human sacrifice perhaps developed subsequent to animal sacrifices and by analogy to them (W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, Hebrew Religion, Its Origin and Development [2nd ed.; New York: The Macmillan Co., 1937], p. 182; Pedersen, op. cit., p. 318 and note on p. 697) and was apparently taken over by the Hebrews in imitation of the Canaanites. It is argued that the Phoenicians abandoned human sacrifice between the eighth and sixth centuries B.C. but that Hebrew religion sanctioned such sacrifices prior to 621 B.C. (Otto Eissfeldt, Molk als Opferbegriff im punischen und hebräischen und das Ende des Gottes Moloch [Halle: M. Niemeyer, 1935], pp. 48-55; Ras Schamra und Sanchunjaton [Halle: M. Niemeyer, 1939], pp. 69-71); however, the latter statement has been vigorously repudiated (W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel [2nd ed.; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946], pp. 168-64; cf. Pedersen, loc. cit.). Vs. 36 is silent about the redemption of human first born (Exod. 13:13; 34:20; Num. 18:15; cf. Luke 2:22-24), which was doubtless presumed in the pledge. Cattle in a general sense means "beasts" (cf. 2:12, 14), usually domestic but sometimes wild animals (Mic. 5:8; Deut. 28:26; Isa. 18:6). Pure animals were sacrificed and unclean ones were slain or redeemed (Exod. 13:13; 34:20; Num. 18:15-16).

As it is written refers not only to the practices mentioned but also to those assumed. The reference to the law has been regarded as out of place, perhaps drawn from vs. 34 (cf. Batten, loc. cit.), since the firstlings, etc., which follows, is best seen as explanatory to cattle. But the explanatory matter also may be a secondary gloss (ibid.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 178; et al.).
37 And that we should bring the first-fruits of our dough, and our offerings, and the fruit of all manner of trees, of wine and of oil, unto the priests, to the chambers of

37 and to bring the first of our coarse meal, and our contributions, the fruit of every

6. Voluntary Contributions and Tithes (10:37a)

37a. The first (réshith) literally translates a word meaning either chronologically "first" or, in a qualitative sense, "prime." The term is used ambiguously in Deuteronomy, sometimes equal to the "first fruits" (bikkûrim) of vs. 35, and sometimes in the wider sense of "contribution," parallel in use to the word rendered contributions (terûmah) here and in vs. 39 (cf. G. B. Gray, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Numbers [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1903; "International Critical Commentary"], pp. 227-29). In the former sense it refers to raw produce brought to the temple (vs. 36; cf. Num. 18:13) and presented with ceremony (cf. Deut. 26:2-10), while in the latter sense it is rather a prepared gift brought to the priest (vs. 37; cf. Deut. 18:4) at his call, given apparently with little or no ceremony. Furthermore, the nature of the first as a simple contribution, rather than first fruit offering, is seen in the fact that some of the gifts do not fall into the seven categories specified for the first fruits (wheat, barley, wine, figs, pomegranates, olives, and honey; cf. Deut. 8:8; Mishnah, Bikkurim 1:3; 3:9).

Among the donations for the support of the clergy was a substance identified as coarse meal ('arésâh), apparently related to an Akkadian word (arsânu) for "grain grits" (cf. Bezold, Babylonisch-Assyrisches Glossar, p. 69, col. 1), in Syriac "hulled barley" (Paul Lagarde, "Kleingkeiten," Nachrichten von der königliche Gesellschaft der Wissenschaft Göttingen [1889], pp. 301 ff.), and in New Hebrew "barley meal" (Jacob Levy, Neuhebräisches und chaldäisches Wörterbuch [Leipzig: F. A. Brockhaus, 1883], III, 702, s.v. כֵּמִי). But the term is used in the Talmud and is known in Armenia as a prepared porridge or paste of barley meal or wheat, related to the Arabic keshk (Persian kashk; Babylonian Talmud, Nedarim 41b, cf. A. R. S. Kennedy, "Food," in Cheyne and Black, Encyclopaedia Biblica, Vol. II, col. 1539; Lagarde, "Kleingkeiten," pp. 301-2; Dalman, Arbeit und Sitte, III, 271). Since the substance could be made into a "cake" (Num. 15:20-21), it is probable that the gift to the priests was dough in its first mixed stage (cf. Mishnah, Hallah 1:9; Tosefta Hallurim; Targum Jerusalem 1; cf. Dalman, op. cit., IV, 52). In the LXX of Num. 15:20-21 the text uses the same word "dough" (φόρμα) found in Rom. 11:16. Furthermore, since there is no prescription of first fruits of fruit trees in the Torah (cf. Pedersen, op. cit., p. 302), the reference here to the fruit of every tree must be to a special voluntary gift. References here to wine and oil (5:11) are also to gifts additional to "first fruits."

Since the word rendered our contributions is but a parallel and later term to that translated the first, the former (cf. vs. 39) must be omitted, as in the LXXAB. Some conjecture that it has been inserted from Ezek. 44:30 (Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, pp. 212 ff.; Rudolph, loc. cit.). The word tithes, related to the word "ten," seems based on the secular practice whereby a king claimed the prime part of his subjects' produce. In Egypt the common assessment was 10 per cent (cf. G. C. C. Maspero, The Struggle of the Nations [tr. M. L. McClure; New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1897], p. 312), also in Babylonia (Otto Eissfeldt, "Zum Zehnten bei den Babyloniern," in Wilhelm Frankenberg, ed., Abhandlungen zur semitischen religionskunde und sprachwissenschaft, Wolf Wilhelm grafen von Baudissin [Giessen: A. Töpelmann, 1918], pp. 163-74), and among the Hebrews (I Sam. 8:15, 17). The divine assessment is known at least as early as the eighth century B.C. (Amos 4:4; cf. Gen. 14:20; 28:22), but legislation for it is not found until the Deuteronomic Code, when it apparently was already an ancient custom in Israel (Deut. 14:22-29; cf. J. M. Powis Smith, "The Deuteronomistic Tithe," American Journal of Theology, XVIII [1914], 119-26; cf. S. R. Driver, Deuteronomy, pp. 166-73). As in Deut. 14:22-29, the tithes here are of our ground, levied on crops alone (cf. Num. 18:21-24). The Mishnah declares: "Everything that is eaten and is watched over and grows out the house of our God; and the tithes of our ground unto the Levites, that the same Levites might have the tithes in all the cities of our tillage.

38 And the priest the son of Aaron shall be with the Levites, when the Levites take tithes: and the Levites shall bring up the tithe of the tithes unto the house of our God, to the chambers, into the treasure house.

39 For the children of Israel and the children of Levi shall bring the offering of the corn, of the new wine, and the oil, unto the tree, the wine and the oil, to the priests, to the chambers of the house of our God; and to bring to the Levites the tithes from our ground, for it is the Levites who collect the tithes in all our rural towns. 38 And the priest, the son of Aaron, shall be with the Levites when the Levites receive the tithes; and the Levites shall bring up the tithe of the tithes to the house of our God, to the chambers, to the storehouse. 39 For the people of Israel and the sons of Levi shall bring the contribution of grain, wine, and of the ground is subject to tithe" (Maaseroth 1:1). The most scrupulous tithing was done by Pharisees, who were even concerned about "mint and anise and cummin" (Matt. 23:23; cf. Luke 11:42).

The tithes originally belonged to the farmer (Deut. 14:22 ff.), who, when they were eaten, was to share them with the Levites and the needy (Deut. 12:12, 19; 14:27; 16:11, 14; 26:12). The statement that the tithes are to be brought to the Levites indicates a later development of the law. As the need of the cult developed, it was believed that God ceded his tithe to the priests (Num. 18:11 ff. [P]) and it was given to the Levites (Num. 18:21-24).

7. Chronicler’s Supplement (10:37b-39a)

These verses, which reflect the cultic ideas and practices of the later period, are usually regarded as supplemental, added by the Chronicler to make the material conform to the practices of his own day.

37b-38. A later conception of the tithes is reflected in the priestly collection of them. When the Levites were given the tithes, they had to turn over a portion, the tithe of the tithes, to the priests (Num. 18:25-32). As a tax due to the clergy, the tithe was not always collectible (cf. 13:10-15) and later provision was made for the Levites to go after it. The presence of a priest with the Levite collector may be to ensure a proper share for the priests (Batten, op. cit., p. 379). Son of Aaron indicates the sharp cleavage between the Levite and the true priest in the Priestly Code, wherein the Levites are the priests’ servants (cf. Ezra 2:40-42). By the Christian period the priests themselves collected the tithe (cf. Josephus Antiquities XX. 8. 8; XX. 9. 2). In the definite character of the priest is seen an attempt by the writer to indicate the practice of his day (Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 277, note i). Jewish scholars, recognizing the discrepancy between Deuteronomic legislation and the usage of their day, reasoned that Ezra deprived the Levites of their tithe because of their reluctance to return to Palestine (cf. Ezra 8:15; Talmud: Kethuboth 26a; Yebamoth 86ab; Hullin, 131b; cf. Munk, Ezra ha sofer, p. 26).

Since cities would scarcely produce agricultural material for tithes, it is proposed to interpret the M.T. as "hamlets" or towns (cf. Batten, loc. cit.), as in the Peshitta. The final word of vs. 37, lit., “our work,” is rendered as our tillage, and interpreted as “dependent on our agriculture” (Amer. Trans.). Since the tithe was collectible also in Jerusalem, the interpretation rural towns is inadequate (Rudolph, loc. cit.). "Our work" can have cultic meaning (cf. vs. 32; Ezra 8:20), and "the cities of our work" can mean "the cities of our cultus," signifying "wherever the Hebrew law of the tithe was operative" (cf. Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemiah und Esther, p. 116; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

39a. This verse, beginning with for, is a supplementary explanation of the preceding and may be an even later addition to the M.T. (Jahn, Ezra [A und B] und Nehemia, pp. 145-46). The people are to bring the first fruits (vss. 35-37; cf. II Chr. 31:5-7), while the Levites gather the tithes. (vs. 38, cf. 13:12). But here the Levites, who in vs. 38 chambers, where are the vessels of the sanctuary, and the priests that minister, and the porters, and the singers: and we will not forsake the house of our God.

And the rulers of the people dwelt at Jerusalem: the rest of the people also cast lots, to bring one of ten to dwell in chambers, where are the vessels of the sanctuary, and the priests that minister, and the porters, and the singers: and we will not forsake the house of our God.

Now the leaders of the people lived in Jerusalem; and the rest of the people cast lots, one of ten to dwell in chambers, where are the vessels of the sanctuary, and the priests that minister, and the gatekeepers and the singers. We will not neglect the house of our God.

The chambers (cf. Ezra 8:29) held not only the produce gathered but also the vessels of the sanctuary (cf. Ezra 1:9; 7:19). The vessels need not be limited to storage jars (cf. 13:9) since the term is more inclusive (cf. Ezra 1:6).

In listing the order of the clergy residing in the chambers (cf. Ezra 10:6), the M.T. omits the Levites but the Peshitta mentions them, and the term “ministers” in the LXX and Vulg. implies them (cf. Num. 3:5 ff.). The present M.T. must now be read the priests that minister, interpreted as those who must reside in the temple during their course of duty. But the LXX, Vulg., and Peshitta indicate that the M.T. has omitted the conjunction “and” before “the ministers,” which apparently refers to the Levites. The porters, and the singers (Ezra 2:42) dwelt in the chambers, but the Nethinim (Ezra 2:43) lived in Ophel (3:26). The singers too lived outside the temple (12:29), apparently when not on duty.

8. Pledge to Support the Temple (10:39b)

39b. We will not neglect is, lit., we will not forsake. The conjunction is like that preceding each pledge in the original document (cf. vss. 29, 31, 32, 34, 35, etc.). By omitting it and emending the verb to read “They will not neglect,” the passage has been made part of the supplemented material (Jahn, op. cit., p. 146), but the M.T. and versions are firmly against such emendation. The text has been regarded as concluding a construction begun in vs. 31, summing up the preceding details to form a proper conclusion to the Ezra story. But the statement seems more natural and appropriate as a reaction to Nehemiah’s question in 13:11 (cf. Meyer, op. cit., p. 213).

XII. Distribution of Peoples (11:1-36)

This chapter begins abruptly, showing relationship with ch. 10 neither chronologically nor in substance. Since chs. 8–10 are out of order (cf. Exeg. on 7:73b), the connection suggested by the conjunction now or and is usually considered to be with 7:73a. After a few verses relating the repopulation of Jerusalem (vss. 1-2), the chapter 11:1-36. A Census by Families of Jerusalem and Its Environs.—Here follows another genealogical list, arranged this time by places of residence in and around Jerusalem. One out of ten (vs. 1) lived within the new city walls: they were chosen by lot, or by their function as priests, Levites, and temple servants in the maintenance of the elaborate temple ritual. The other nine tenths dwelt in the villages outside the walls, the names of which (though not of their inhabitants) are listed with meticulous care.

769
Jerusalem the holy city, and nine parts to dwell in other cities. people cast lots to bring one out of ten to live in Jerusalem the holy city, while nine consists of two diverse lists, purporting to give the population of rebuilt Jerusalem (vss. 3-24) and the other cities and towns of Judea (vss. 25-36).

A. Repopulation of Jerusalem (11:1-2)

Since vss. 1-2 belong after 7:73a, there are some who insist that they are part of an earlier document from the time of Zerubbabel, indicating the distribution of Judeans during the period following the first return in the time of Cyrus (ibid., p. 99, n. 2; Heinrich Ewald, The History of Israel [tr. J. E. Carpenter; London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1874], V, 159, n. 2; Stade, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, II, 98, n. 1). Inasmuch as it is probable that ch. 7 was part of Nehemiah's memoirs (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 11-15, 141), the verses may properly represent the distribution of population in Nehemiah's own day. They are but a fragmentary introduction to the lists that follow, but they appear to be an authentic reflection of another of Nehemiah's social reforms. They belong in the general context of 7:4 ff., but the actual connection is conjectural. The fragmentary character of vss. 1-2 and their present association suggest that although they may have been part of Nehemiah's document, they are not in their original form but are a later editor's application of them (cf. Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 81). It has been proposed that at the beginning a sentence now lost explained that the census list (7:6-73a) suggested to Nehemiah how the city should be populated and that 11:1 ff. indicated that solution (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 181). It is possible, however, that there was originally a more extensive passage between the list in ch. 7 and vss. 1-2. It is conjectured that as a result of the meeting (7:5) the leaders volunteered to go to Jerusalem, but that even then the population there was insufficient, and that at a second meeting it was decided to follow the plan reflected in vss. 1-2 (cf. Bertheau, Esra, Nechemia und Ester, p. 311).

Such violent population shifting as is here presumed has many parallels in antiquity, for great transportations of people were made in late Assyrian times (cf. Ezra 2:1; 5:12), and in the Achaemenid period and later people were forcibly transplanted to populate the cities that were being founded (Diodorus of Sicily XVII. 83. 7; XVIII. 4. 4; Herodotus History VII. 156; Pausanius Description of Greece VIII. 27. 3-5). Thus, when depopulated Jerusalem (7:4) had been fortified and was ready for its people, it was only natural that its efforts should be made to restore authority there and increase its population for its defense and to augment its prestige.

11:1. The original Hebrew title "princes" (ASV) was gradually weakened to rulers or leaders (cf. Ezra 10:14), and the Peshitta here interprets as "elders." These were the "nobles" (6:17), doubtless the "heads of families" or "chiefs of the people" (cf. vs. 3; 7:70; Ezra 2:68), in contrast to the Jewish masses. The leaders were actually in Jerusalem during Nehemiah's administration (cf. 6:17) and later, in the time of Ezra (cf. Ezra 8:29). The leaders alone were insufficient to guarantee its defense and dignify its status as religious and civil center. Problems of reconstruction that remained within the city, even after the walls were completed (7:4), made it difficult to induce Judeans to leave the countryside to accept the obvious hardships and difficulties of the city. Compulsion was exerted through the casting of lots (cf. 10:34), since that was recognized as the voice of God. One out of ten seems to indicate an individual basis of selection, which would disrupt family groups. But it is probable that selection was made on a family basis. The goal seems to have been a Jerusalem containing one tenth of the community (cf. Smend, Die Listen, p. 23). Since nine parts renders a M.T. that is, lit., "nine handfuls," which may have had its origin in distribution of commodities by handfuls (cf. Bertheau, op. cit., p. 312), the expression may indicate family or clan groups as the basis of selection.

The nine tenths not drafted remained in their places in the country. The M.T., "in the cities," is usually interpreted as in other cities or in the other towns, indicating 2 And the people blessed all the men, that willingly offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem.

3 ¶ Now these are the chief of the province that dwelt in Jerusalem: but in the cities of Judah dwelt every one in his pos-tenth remained in the other towns. 2 And the people blessed all the men who willingly offered to live in Jerusalem.

3 These are the chiefs of the province who lived in Jerusalem; but in the towns a contrast between Jerusalem and smaller places (vss. 25-29). For cities the Peshitta interprets "villages" or "hamlets."

Holy city, previously used by Second Isaiah (48:2; 52:1), is used here as it frequently is later (cf. Dan. 9:24; Tob. 13:9; Matt. 4:5; 27 53, etc.). The title is preserved in the modern Arabic name for Jerusalem, "The Holy" (El-Quds). From the "holy of holies" of the temple, the place par excellence where God met man, it was believed that God's holiness spread to the whole temple, the whole temple mount, the whole city of which that mount was a part, and finally to the whole land, of which Jerusalem was the capital.

Before the long process of lot (cf. 10:34) was completed, some volunteered to move to Jerusalem. They have been regarded as additional to the ten per cent selected (Batten, op. cit., p. 267), but the reaction of the people indicates that the volunteers diminished the number to be chosen and therefore were to be applauded for their sacrifice. It is argued that the Hebrew text demands that "the leaders," not the people, should be the subject of blessed, and the translation should be, "And they, namely the leaders of the community, thanked the people who were called; not all, but only such as those who volunteered" (cf. Ehrlich, Randglossen, VII, 209). Although three Hebrew MSS support such an interpretation, the usual one is grammatically defensible and is preferable (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 182; Kautzsch, Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, secs. 117n, 145b,c).

Characteristically, Nehemiah stresses the joyful aspects of the situation and sublimes the trials, hostility, and difficulties. Later writers credit Nehemiah not only with the fortification of the city but also with the building of houses for the people brought to the city (Ecclus. 49:13; JosephusAntiquities XI. 5. 8).

B. Leaders Dwelling in Jerusalem (11:3-24)

Reference to the settlement of Jerusalem (vss. 1-2) suggests the relevance of the list of leaders who dwelt at Jerusalem (vss. 3-24), which indubitably is related in some fashion to the list in I Chr. 9:2-34. Although it has been suggested that the list was a pre-exilic one incorporated by Nehemiah (F. X. Kugler, Von Moses bis Paulus [Münster in Westfalen: Aschendorff, 1922], pp. 289-90, 300), it is improbable that such a list would have survived the Exile, and it is likely that the document was not part of the Nehemiah record but a supplement added by the Chronicler who believed it relevant.

The exact relationship to the material in I Chr. 9 has been long disputed. Some, noting that the Chronicler was concerned about the distribution of peoples, believed that he would be expected to show interest in the settlement of Jerusalem (cf. Meyer, op. cit., p. 186), and frequently argued that both passages are his unhistorical invention (Torrey, Composition, pp. 42-43, 50; Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 880; Meyer, op. cit., pp. 189 ff.; Hölscher, Esra und Nehemia, p. 551; cf. Edward L. Curtis and Albert A. Madsen, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Chronicles [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1910; "International Critical Commentary"], p. 168). But others contend that I Chr. 9 is an interpolated document, not the work of the Chronicler (Immanuel Benzinger, Die Bücher der Chronik [Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1911; "Kurzer Hand-comentar zum Alten Testament"], p. 35; Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtlichestudien, p. 122; J. W. Rothstein and Johannes Hänel, Kommentar zum ersten Buch der Chronik [Leipzig: A. Deichert, 1927; "Kommentar zum Alten Testament"], pp. 180-89; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 183). It is probably a postexilic list (Smed, Die Listen, p. 7), which is conjectured to be excerpted from the temple archives (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.).
session in their cities, to wit, Israel, the priests, and the Levites, and the Nethinim, and the children of Solomon's servants.

4 And at Jerusalem dwelt certain of the children of Judah, and of the children of Benjamin. Of the children of Judah; Athai the son of Uziah, the son of Zechariah, the son of Amariah, the son of Shephatiah, the son of Mahalaleel, of the children of Perez; of Judah every one lived on his property in their towns: Israel, the priests, the Levites, the temple servants, and the descendants of Solomon's servants. 4 And in Jerusalem lived certain of the sons of Judah and of the sons of Benjamin. Of the sons of Judah: Athai the son of Uzzi'ah, son of Zechari'ah, son of Amari'ah, son of Shepha-ti'ah, son of Mahal'alel, of the sons of original list, some claim, now exists in two different recensions as the Chronicler has adapted it to differing contexts (cf. Bertholet, op. cit., p. 82). In I Chr. 9 the list is assigned to the time of the first return from Exile (cf. Neh. 7:5), while here it is by implication from the time of Nehemiah, after the city has been repopulated.

1. Judean Laymen (11:3-6)

3. Since vss. 25-36, dealing with towns instead of individuals, is a separate supplement with its own title (vss. 20, 25), the reference to the towns of Judah is irrelevant, but the LXX, Peshitta, and Vulg. include it as part of the title, doubtless considering the chapter as a whole. The M.T. connects in the cities of Judah with every one lived, but the LXX, Peshitta, and presumably the Vulg. show that the M.T. should be emended to "and everyone dwelt" (cf. Gotthard, Nehemia, p. 44). The province is Judea (cf. 1:3; 7:6; Ezra 2:1). The chiefs are the leaders of vs. 1. Since his property is awkward with in their cities, which follows, it is better to read "in their possessions," as in I Chr. 9:2. Such a concept of return to ancestral properties is largely unrealistic (cf. Ezra 2:1). Jahn (Esra [A und B] und Nehemja, p. 147) prefers "the sons of Israel" instead of Israel, but the latter agrees with I Chr. 9:2. The descendants of Solomon's servants (cf. Ezra 2:55), not in I Chr. 9:2, is probably from 7:57 (cf. Rothstein and Hänel, op. cit., p. 185; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 182). Batten expects also "the porters" and "the judges" (sic for "singers") mentioned in 11:19, 22-23, but these are absent in I Chr. 9:2.

Because the text of the list is incomplete and the figures may indicate not the total population but merely householders (cf. ibid., p. 186), it is impossible to use the statistics for computing the population of Jerusalem or for judging between the relative proportions of the classes within the city.

4a. As in I Chr. 9:3 and elsewhere (Ezra 1:5; 4:1; 10:9), Judah and Benjamin constitute the lay population of Judea. Some regard Benjamin with suspicion, believing it had no status in postexilic times, but there was such tribal consciousness as late as Roman times (cf. Rom. 11:1; Phil. 3:5; Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 642). After the reference to Benjamin, many MSS reserve an unusual space, possibly in recognition of the reference to "Ephraim and Manasseh," added in I Chr. 9:3. Because they are ignored in the rest of the chapter, the names are regarded by some with suspicion, as an addition to fit the list to a different context (cf. Curtis and Madsen, op. cit., p. 170). But they may have been original in the list, since the Chronicler thought that members of these tribes were adherents to Judah (cf. II Chr. 28:7; 30:11, 18; 34:9). It is suggested that they are omitted here because they would represent the Samaritans, rejected and hated in the time of Nehemiah (cf. 4:2-3; Ezra 4:1-2; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 184). There is other evidence of omission in the verse, for although a member of "the sons of Zerah" is mentioned in vs. 24 and in I Chr. 9:6, that family is not represented here. Similarly, of the four families mentioned in I Chr. 9:8, only one, the children of Benjamin, is listed (vs. 7).

4b. Athai'ah, abbreviated "Uthai" (cf. Ezra 8:14) in I Chr. 9:4, descends from Perez, a son of Judah and Tamar (Gen. 38:29). A descendant of Zerah, the twin of Perez, is mentioned in vs. 24, but his family has been dropped accidentally from the list. For 5 And Maaseiah the son of Baruch, the son of Col-ho'zeh, the son of Hazaiah, the son of Adaiah, the son of Joiarib, the son of Zechariah, the son of Shiloni.
6 All the sons of Perez that dwelt at Jerusalem were four hundred three score and eight valiant men.

7 And these are the sons of Benjamin:
Sallu the son of Meshullam, the son of Joed, the son of Pedaiah, the son of Kolai,ah, the son of Maaseiah, the son of Ithiel, the son of Jesai'ah.
8 And after him Gabba'î, Sallai, nine hundred twenty and eight.

Zechariah (cf. Ezra 5:1) I Chr. 9:4 has Ammihud. For Amariah I Chr. 9:4 has its abbreviation “Imri,” and also a corrupt doublet in the form “Omri.” Since “Zaccur” abbreviates Zechariah, “Zaccur the son of Imri” (cf. 3:2) seems relevant here and the present list must thus be several generations later than the time of Nehemiah.

Shephatiah was an ancestral leader in the time of Ezra (cf. 7:9; Ezra 2:4; 8:8), but I Chr. 9:4 omits Shephatiah, the son of Mahalalel and has instead “the son of Bani.” The total of the descendants of Perez (vs. 5), not found in I Chr. 9, is out of place and should precede vs. 5.

5. Maaseiah (cf. Ezra 10:18), corrupted as “Asaiah” in I Chr. 9:5, is descended from “Shelah,” third son of Judah, by the Canaanite Shua (Gen. 38:2-5), but only the Peshitta properly identifies Shelah. Shiloni of the M.T. and I Chr. 9:5 is the gentilic the Shilonite, “the man from Shiloh,” which would be inappropriate since Shiloh lay not in Judah but in Ephraim, north of Bethel (cf. Judg. 21:19). Zechariah is one of the “Shelannites” of Num. 26:20 and the word שְׁלֹה, the Shilonite, must be revocalized as “the Shelanite.” Baruch (בְּרֻכֵּה, cf. 3:20) is corrupted to “first born” בְּכֵן (3:20) in I Chr. 9:5, where the text is then deliberately abbreviated to “and his sons.” Colhozeh: Cf. 3:15.

6. While I Chr. 9:6 omits the total of the sons of Perez, it does give a greater total (690), which may represent all the Judeans in Jerusalem.

2. Benjaminite Laymen (11:7-9)

7. Cf. I Chr. 9:7. The only Benjaminitc chieftain listed is Sallu, a descendant of Jeshai'ah, whose relationship to Benjamin is uncertain. No Sallu is found among the Benjaminites in Gen. 46:21 or in the Chronicler’s catalogue of grandsons and great-grandsons (I Chr. 7:6-12). Meshullam: Cf. Ezra 8:16. Pedaiah: Cf. 3:25. Maaseiah: Cf. vs. 5; Ezra 10:18. Jeshai'ah: Cf. Ezra 8:7. Joed (“The Lord Is Witness”) and Ithiel (“God Is with Me”) are found only here but the latter is abbreviated as “Ittai” (I Chr. 11:31) and “Ittai” (II Sam. 22:29). Kolai,ah, known from pre-exilic times (Jer. 29:21), is found in I Esdras and the LXX of Ezra 10:23, where the M.T. has “Kelaiah.”

8. Cf. I Chr. 9:9a. The Hebrew text is corrupt and unintelligible. The words “his brothers” in the LXX show that יִשָּׂאֵה, and after him, should be emended to יִשָּׂא, “his brothers.” The intrusive letter י has apparently migrated from the following word, now the senseless בֹּל גבָּבָי, Gabbai, which must have been originally בֹּל, “the men of” (cf. Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 53). What follows should be בֹּל, “strength,” to form the common expression בֹּל，则 עִלֵּי הַדָּרֶךְ, “mighty men of valor,” as found, also with the numeral, in vs. 14. The name בֹּל, Sallai, could easily have been corrupted from בֹּל, “strength,” under the influence of “Sallu” in vs. 7 (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 183). The emended text would thus parallel that in vs. 14a. The total of Benjaminites for the 9 And Joel the son of Zichri was their overseer: and Judah the son of Senuah was second over the city.

10 Of the priests: Jedaiah the son of Joiarib, Jachin.

Single family is 928, but in I Chr. 9:9, where three additional families are included, the total is only 956.

9. Concluding the data on the laymen is a supplementary note without parallel in I Chr. 9, which indicates that two special officers were “over them.” “Them” by position might seem to refer to Benjamin alone, but over the city indicates broader responsibility. Since the other classes of citizens also had officials (cf. vs. 14b, 21-22), it is probable that these were selected by the several groups to represent their own interests in some sort of cabinet or council that worked with the governor in the administration of the city.

The title of the chief representative (paqidh) is the equivalent of amelpaqudu, known from cuneiform sources from late Assyrian times down at least into the Persian period. The Assyrian title has been rendered as “the prefect,” but “mayor” would serve as well (Sidney Smith, Babylonian Historical Texts, pp. 14-15, rev. 1.16). Thus in the seventh year of Artaxerxes a beL-ittannu was the paqudu official of the city of Nippur (C. E. Keiser, Letters and Contracts from Ereh [New Haven: Yale University Press, 1918], No. 169, l. 14). The Hebrew word, meaning “appointed,” is reflected in the Vulg. (praepositus). The LXX, supported by such passages as II Kings 25:19, interprets it as overseer (Greek episkopos). The lay representative was Joel the son of Zichri (cf. Ezra 10:43), whose name abbreviates Zechariah. His assistant was Judah (cf. Ezra 3:9) the descendant of Hassenuah (cf. 3:3; Ezra 2:35). In I Chr. 9:7 Hassenuah is the remote ancestor of the Benjaminite Sallu. His title is second (mishneh), “second in charge.” It is unnecessary to limit his authority to “the second city,” the mishneh quarter of Jerusalem (cf. 3:6; Simons, Jerusalem in the O.T., p. 291, n. 2) since this title too has its parallel in cuneiform sources, where as amelyShanû it is used from Assyrian to Hellenistic times for the “second officer,” “assistant,” or “substitute.”

3. PRIESTS (11:10-14)

Of the four priestly families in Ezra 2:36-39 (=Neh. 7:39-42) only that of Harim is not represented here. It is unlikely that the family had been secularized and therefore not required to go to Jerusalem (cf. Kittel, op. cit., III, 399), since it is well attested in postexilic times (cf. 10:5; Ezra 10:31). The omission is perhaps due to loss of text, as in the case of the laymen (cf. vs. 4). The silence regarding the Aaronite priests who returned with Ezra has been seen as evidence that the list was prepared before Ezra’s return (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 185).

10-11. In I Chr. 9:10 the first three names of vs. 10 are given in sequence without evidence of genealogical relationship. The names before Seraiah, the last pre-exilic high priest (cf. Ezra 7:1), are part of the genealogy of the family of the high priest, as in the LXXI. The chief Jedaiah is “of the house of Jeshua,” the high priest contemporary with Zerubbabel (7:39; cf. Ezra 2:36). Joiarib and Jachin have been regarded as intrusive from I Chr. 24:7, 17 (cf. Hölscher, Esra und Nehemia, p. 553). Because the Hasmonean clan was of the Joiarib family (I Macc. 2:1), it is argued that the name was interpolated as late as the second century B.C., no earlier than the time of Jonathan the Maccabean (161-143 B.C.; ibid., p. 499). The Peshitta omits Jachin.

Joiarib (cf. Ezra 8:16) may have been substituted for an earlier “Joiakim” the son of Jeshua (cf. 12:10; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 184). This is graphically possible and is supported by the statement that Jedaiah was of the house of Jeshua (7:39; cf. Ezra 2:36). Jachin (יַחַי) then may be a corruption of “son of” (יִהוּ). Thus Jedaiah the son of “Joiakim” was a brother of Eliashib, the contemporary of Nehemiah (3:1). If this reconstruction is correct, the genealogy is again defective, lacking the names Jeshua

774
11 Seraiah the son of Hilkiah, the son of Meshullam, the son of Zadok, the son of Meraioth, the son of Ahitub, was the ruler of the house of God.
12 And their brethren that did the work of the house were eight hundred twenty and two: and Adai'ah the son of Jeroham, the son of Pelaliah, the son of Amzi, the son of Zechariah, the son of Pashur, the son of Malchiah.
13 And his brethren, chief of the fathers, two hundred forty and two: and Amashai the son of Azareel, the son of Ahasai, the son of Meshillemoth, the son of Immer, and Jozadak (12:10; cf. Ezra 2:36). It is that of the high priest, with but a few differences. Seraiah's father was not Hilkiah (vs. 11) but "Azariah" (cf. Ezra 7:1; I Chr. 6:14); but in I Chr. 9:11 Seraiah is not mentioned and "Azariah" is the son of Hilkiah. Furthermore, Meraioth (cf. Ezra 7:3-4; I Chr. 6:6-7), here as in I Chr. 9:11, is intruded as the son of Ahitub, who elsewhere appears as the great-grandson of Meraioth (Ezra 7:2-3). Meshullam (cf. Ezra 8:16) is abbreviated "Shallum" in Ezra 7:2; I Chr. 6:13.

Ruler (יוֹנָה), lit., "the one in front" or "the conspicuous one," was a title sometimes borne by kings but later given to such minor officers as the attendant of the temple treasurer (I Chr. 26:24). Frequently applied to the high priest (Jer. 20:1; I Chr. 9:11; II Chr. 31:13; Dan. 11:22), it was not his alone, for there were several priests with the same title. It has been compared with the later title (προστάτης) applied to the high priest in his civil capacity (cf. Ecclus. 45:24; Josephus Antiquities XII. 4. 2; Hugo Graetz, "Beiträge zur Sach- und Worterklärung des Buches Daniel," Monatschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judenthums, XX [1871], 395-400), or with that given to Simon Maccabee as the high priest, general, and leader (héгоunemos) of the Jews (I Macc. 12:42; cf. Montgomery, Daniel, p. 379). A more modern parallel is the Arabic imam, a title applied to both temporal and spiritual leaders, but especially to the latter (A. A. Bevan, A Short Commentary on the Book of Daniel [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1892], p. 156, n. 1).

12-13a. Adai'ah (cf. Ezra 10:29) led the family of Pashhur (7:41; cf. Ezra 2:38) and his genealogy is traced to Malchijah the father of Pashhur. Jeroham ("May He Be Compassionate"), which abbreviates such a name as "Jeremiah!" ("God Has Mercy"), is favored by the Chronicler (I Chr. 8:27; 9:8; 12:7; 27:22; II Chr. 25:1). Pelaliah ("The Lord Has Intervened") is found only here, and Amzi, abbreviating "Amaziah" ("The Lord Has Been Mighty"), appears only here as priest. In I Chr. 9:12 the genealogy is incomplete, lacking Pelaliah, Amzi, and Zechariah. Since heads of fathers' houses applies to Adai'ah alone, the plural form is incorrect. Furthermore, since it is a lay title it is surprising as applied to priests (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 270; Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 83), and is perhaps introduced from I Chr. 9:13, displacing some other designation not now recoverable (cf. Keil, Chronik, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 573; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

13b. Cf. I Chr. 9:12. Amashai (עמאשא), the name of the leader of the family of Immer (cf. Ezra 2:37), is an un-Hebraic monstrosity, produced by combining two variant spellings, עַמָּשַׁי (cf. LXX and Peshitta) and עש. The name abbreviates "Amasiah" ("The Lord Has Carried"; cf. II Chr. 17:16; Noth, Personennamen, p. 178). The name "Maasai" in I Chr. 9:12, which looks like an abbreviation of "Maaseiah" (cf. Ezra 10:18), is merely due to the incorrect transposition of the first two letters of "Amasai." Azarel (cf. Ezra 10:41) is Adiel ("My Witness Is God") in I Chr. 9:12. Ahzai is omitted in the LXX, and in I Chr. 9:12 appears as "Jahzerah," which may 14 And their brethren, mighty men of valor, a hundred twenty and eight: and their overseer was Zabdiel, the son of one of the great men.
15 Also of the Levites: Shemaiah the son of Hashub, the son of Azrikam, the son of Hashabiah, the son of Bunni; be a corruption of “Jahzeiah” (cf. Ezra 10:15). Meshillemoth, perhaps to be vocalized Meshallēmōth (ibid., p. 250, No. 913), abbreviates such a name as Meshelemiah (I Chr. 9:21). The name is a postexilic introduction of such Akkadian names as Mushallim-Shamash, etc. (ibid., p. 145). The “Meshullam” in I Chr. 9:12 is apparently a doublet.

14a. Since the reference here is to the leader alone, not his ancestors, their brethren must be emended to “his kinsmen,” as in the LXX. Mighty men of valor, scarcely a priestly title (cf. Exeg. on vs. 8), was perhaps inserted in the original list through carelessness, for it is found also in I Chr. 9:13, where it has been interpreted as “very able men.”

Here, as in vss. 12-13, a total is given for each priestly family, following the genealogy of its leader; but these are lacking in I Chr. 9:10-13, where a single total is given for the whole priestly class. Figures in Neh. 11:12-14 total 1,192 but that in I Chr. 9:13 is 1,760.

In a note without parallel in I Chr. 9, Zabdiel (“Gift of God”) is listed as the overseer (cf. vs. 9) of the priests, as Joel was for laymen. The distinction between ruler (vs. 11) and overseer (vs. 14) is not clear but, since there was a tendency to differentiate between the sacred and the secular functions of the clergy (vs. 16), the ruler may have governed internal, sacred affairs, while the overseer controlled the more secular aspects of the priestly community.

Haggedolim, meaning the great men, is ridiculous as a personal name. Possibly the word is a corruption of a personal name of similar appearance, such as “Giddel” (Ezra 2:47), but the prefixed article would still be difficult. Since “high priest” in Hebrew is great priest (cf. 3:1), the original text may have been “the son of the high priest” (Rudolph, loc. cit.). But the great men may have been thought of here as the succession of high priests in the sense of the house of the high priest. The genealogy of Zabdiel is not given but he may have been a collateral descendant of the high priest.

4. Levites (11:15-18)

Despite the divergences, the lists of Levites (here and in I Chr. 9:14-16) must originally have been identical. Some LXX MSS (AB+) reduce the bulk of the M.T. by half, and it is suggested that the Greek texts show “how these genealogical records have grown even in late times” (Batten, op. cit., p. 271). But little genealogical data is actually missing in the LXX, for the omissions are chiefly of parenthetic remarks and notices of official standing (cf. vss. 16, 17, 19, 20, 21). The major Greek lack is the ancestry of Shammua (vss. 17-18a), which was lost through carelessness and carried with it the essential introduction to the numeral in vs. 18. The missing Greek text is restored in the LXX and by the corretor of the LXX.

Of the four Levite leaders in I Chr. 9, three are found here and the fourth, Berechiah (I Chr. 9:16), is omitted apparently because that group dwelt not in Jerusalem but “in the villages of the Netophathites.”

15. Shemaiah (cf. Ezra 8:19) was the descendant of Merari (I Chr. 9:14), the youngest son of Levi (Gen. 46:11; Exod. 6:16) and the eponymous ancestor of the largest Levite clan (cf. Num. 3:36, 40, 44). Merari (I Chr. 9:14) is preferable to Bunni (cf. 9:4; Bertheau, Esra, Nechemia und Ester, p. 320). The father of Hashhub (cf. 3:11) was Azrikam (“My Help Has Arisen”; cf. Noth, Personennamen, pp. 129-30, 176). Hashabiah (cf. Ezra 8:19) is among the sons of Merari in I Chr. 6:45 (cf. Ezra 8:19).
16 And Shabbethai and Jozabad, of the chief of the Levites, had the oversight of the outward business of the house of God.

17 And Mattaniah the son of Micha, the son of Zabdi, the son of Asaph, was the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer: and Bakbukiah the second among his brethren, and Abda the son of Sham'mua, the son of Galal, the son of Jeduthun.

Hashabi'ah, son of Buni; 16 and Shabbathai and Jozabad, of the chief of the Levites, who were over the outside work of the house of God; 17 and Mattani'ah the son of Mica, son of Zabdi, son of Asaph, who was the leader to begin the thanksgiving in prayer, and Bakbukiah, the second among his brethren; and Abda the son of Sham'mua, son of Galal, son of Jeduthun.

16. In this portion of the list the parenthetic material, found usually at the end of each group (cf. vss. 9, 14), is interspersed between the various families. Shabbethai (cf. Ezra 10:15) and Jozabad (cf. Ezra 8:33), prominent in the time of Ezra (Neh. 8:7), apparently belong to the family of vs. 15. Their presence in the list is regarded as positive evidence for dating the list in the time of Nehemiah (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 185). Outside work is explained as the performance of menial secular tasks (Batten, loc. cit.) but outside probably means merely in contradistinction to the cultic activities of the priests, "perhaps the maintenance of temple buildings, protecting the income and public traffic, principally" (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 186). The Levite Jozabad received the treasure brought to the temple by Ezra (8:33). The LXXAB* omits this note of office.

17. Mattaniah (cf. Ezra 10:26), the second Levite leader, was the descendant of Asaph, the psalmist and musician (cf. Ezra 2:41). Zabdi (צָבְדִי), which abbreviates "Zabdiel" (vs. 14), appears here in the LXXL and in I Chr. 9:15 as the similar name "Zichri" (זִכְרִי; cf. vs. 9) and some prefer that reading (Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 53; Gotthard, Nehemia, p. 45). The title of Mattaniah, lit., "head of the beginning; thanksgiving for the prayer," is senselessly corrupt. In 12:8 he is described as "in charge of the songs of thanksgiving." The LXXL and Vulg. indicate that instead of ἀρχηγὸς, "the beginning," the text should have the quite similar בְּנֵה, "the praise." Moreover, what is rendered the thanksgiving is not a noun but the verb "let him praise." The title should therefore be, lit., "The leader of the song of praise, Let him praise," of the prayer. Thus "Mattaniah was the leader of the Thank-Hymn who, like his ancestor Asaph [I Chr. 16:7] had to lead the prayer 'hodu l Yahweh'" (Rudolph, loc. cit.). Bakbukiah, whose name is the full form of "Bakbuk" (Ezra 2:51), was apparently of the same family as Mattaniah. His title second (cf. vs. 9) signifies that he assisted Mattaniah.

Abda (cf. I Kings 4:6) headed the third Levite family. The name may be an abbreviation of the form "Obadiah" (cf. Ezra 8:9), which appears here in the LXXL and in I Chr. 9:16. But Abda is found as a name frequently in the late Assyrian and Neo-Babylonian business documents. Sham'mua (Num. 13:4; II Sam. 5:14) abbreviates such a name as "Shemaiah," which appears here in the LXXL and in I Chr. 9:16 and is favored by some (cf. Gotthard, op. cit., p. 44). A similar name, Sa-mu-u-a, is found in the cuneiform documents of the times of Nebuchadrezzar (J. N. Strassmaier, Inschriften von Nabuchodonosor, König von Babylon [Leipzig: E. Pfeiffer, 1889], No. 310, l. 2) and of Artaxerxes (H. C. Hilprecht and A. T. Clay, Business Documents of Murašin Sons of Nippur Dated in the Reign of Artaxerxes I [Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1898], No. 15, l. 20). His father Galal, whose name may be identical with that abbreviated "Gilalai" in 12:36, has a name also found in Achaemenid business documents (R. C. Thompson, Cuneiform Texts from Babylonian Tablets in the British Museum [London: The Trustees, 1906], Part XXII, Pl. XXXII, No. 174, l. 29; J. B. Nies and C. E. Keiser, Historical, Religious and Economic Texts and Antiquities [New Haven: Yale University Press, 1920], No. 111, ll. 3, 6; Arthur Ungnad, Neubabylonische Kontrakte und Sonstige Urkunden [Leipzig: 1907], No. 164, l. 22). Jeduthun, like Asaph, belonged to the Levite singers, but he has been regarded as "a shadowy figure: originally a musical tonality or mode . . . transformed into a person and . . . identified with Ethan (cf. I Chr. 15:17, 19) as the eponym of one of the three guilds of 18 All the Levites in the holy city were two hundred fourscore and four.

19 Moreover the porters, Akkub, Talmon, and their brethren that kept the gates, were a hundred seventy and two.

20 ¶ And the residue of Israel, of the priests, and the Levites, were in all the cities of Judah, every one in his inheritance.

21 But the Nethinim dwelt in Ophel: and Ziha and Gispa were over the Nethinim.

22 The overseer also of the Levites at Jerusalem was Uzzi the son of Bani, the son of Hashabiah, the son of Mattaniah, the son of Micha. Of the sons of Asaph, the singers were over the business of the house of God.

5. SUPPLEMENTS (11:19-24)

19. As in I Chr. 9, the listing of Levite leaders is followed immediately by that of the gatekeepers, but the passage here presents but little of the abundant data regarding the gatekeepers found in Chronicles. In the separate listing of the gatekeepers, with their own total, has been seen evidence that the list was not created by the Chronicler, who grouped both the singers and gatekeepers with the Levites (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 185); but Torrey (Composition, pp. 22-23) regards such an argument as invalid.

Of the six gatekeepers in Ezra 2:42, only Akkub and Talmon are here listed. Presumably, unless there is a simple omission in the list, the families of Shallum and Ahiman dwelt outside Jerusalem. Since the list here is that of individuals (cf. vs. 3a) rather than ancestors, if this portion is genuine, the leaders of both families by coincidence must have borne the names of their ancestors. The total (172) is less than that in I Chr. 9:22 (212), but there the families of Shallum and Ahiman are also named.

20. This verse, practically a repetition of vs. 3b, is not found in the major Greek MSS but is supplied in the LXX. It seems to have been connected originally with vs. 25 as an introduction to the list of towns (vss. 25-36). The verses intervening between vs. 20 and vs. 25 are supplementary. In his inheritance (cf. vs. 3) may imply that exiles returned to their ancestral property which, in at least some cases, was unrealistic (cf. vs. 3).

21. The conclusion of vs. 20 suggested the Nethinim (cf. Ezra 2:43), who also dwelt in a special place (cf. 3:26) and are usually listed after the Levites. For Ophel see 3:26. Although the title “overseer” is not used, Ziha (cf. Ezra 2:43) and Gishpa are declared leaders of the Nethinim. Gishpa, found only here, is probably a corruption of “Hasupha” (Ezra 2:43; Batten, op. cit., p. 272). The Nethinim are not mentioned in I Chr. 9 nor in the LXXAB and the Peshitta omits reference to their leaders. The verse is clearly supplemental.

22-23. Also additional are vss. 22-23, inserted by someone who missed a reference to an overseer (vs. 9) of the Levites, as such leaders were named for other groups (cf. vss. 9, 14, 21). Since the overseer here is Uzzi (cf. “Uzziiah,” Ezra 10:21), the great 23 For it was the king's commandment concerning them, that a certain portion should be for the singers, due for every day.

24 And Pethahiah the son of Mesheza-beel, of the children of Zerah the son of Judah, was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people.

25 And for the villages, with their fields, some of the children of Judah dwelt at Kirjath-arba, and in the villages thereof, and at work of the house of God. 23 For there was a command from the king concerning them, and a settled provision for the singers, as every day required. 24 And Pethahiah the son of Meshez'abel, of the sons of Zerah the son of Judah, was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people.

25 And as for the villages, with their fields, some of the people of Judah lived in grandson of Mattaniah the son of Mica (vs. 17), the supplement must reflect a substantially later time (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 187). The business of the temple suggests its secular affairs, but the literal translation work does not imply that. The Vulg. interprets it as "the ministry," which closely approximates the meaning of the word in some contexts (cf. vs. 12; 10:33). Over is also a doubtful translation for a Hebrew word meaning "before," and the LXX and Peshitta which render it literally make nonsense. Probably the word (τιμήτηρ) is related to the word for "guide" or "leader" in vs. 11, and the phrase should be "for the guidance of the work." The Levites and singers did the work (13:10) and the Levites guided the service of worship (cf. 8:7; 9-11; 9:4-5).

A command from the king is usually considered a reference to David who, according to the Chronicler, instituted the temple ritual (cf. 12:24; I Chr. 25). But since the Persian kings were interested in the local cults (cf. Ezra 6:9-10), the expression could refer to the Persian ruler (Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 91; Rudolph, loc. cit.). The word rendered portion or settled provision ("sure covenant" in 9:38) refers to a synonym in 12:47. The Vulg. (ordo) and some minor Greek MSS (A. E. Brooke, N. McLean, and H. St. John Thackeray, The Old Testament in Greek [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1935], Vol. II, Part IV, p. 656), which have "arrangement," interpret it to imply royal regulation of the cult through specific orders for the daily work of the singers.

24. Perhaps the reference to the king in vs. 23 is responsible for the supplement here, which scarcely belongs in a list of residents of Jerusalem since at the king's hand implies residence abroad, at the Persian court. Pethahiah (cf. Ezra 10:23) son of Meshez'abel (cf. 3:4) was apparently the ambassador who mediated between the Judean and the Persian court. He was a Judean, seemingly of the nobility, a descendant of Zerah, the twin of "Perez" (cf. vs. 4; Gen. 38:30; Num. 26:20). Omission of the family of Zerah in the list of Judeans (vss. 4-6) may be accidental but, since this verse is supplemental, the family may not yet have returned to Judea when that list was compiled.

C. TOWNS SETTLED OUTSIDE OF JERUSALEM (11:25-36)

25-36. After the list of residents of Jerusalem, the editor completes the picture by appending a list of towns outside of Jerusalem settled by the Jews (vss. 25-35). The settlements, relatively few, are quite scattered in four areas: the south (the Negeb); the hill country (Shephelah); the mountains just north and west of Jerusalem; and a small group far to the west in the coastal plain. There is a surprising silence regarding many places mentioned elsewhere in Ezra-Nehemiah: Tekoa (3:5); Beth-haccherem (3:14); Beth-zur (3:16); Keilah (3:17); Bethlehem and Netophah (7:26); Kiriaht-jearim (7:29); Gibeon, Mizpah, and Meronoth (3:7); Chephirah and Beeroth (7:29); Jericho (7:36); and Gilgah (12:29 KJV).

The scattered character of the settlements leads many to consider the list as artificial and unhistorical. From Ezra 9 ff. some assume that the settlements were clustered around Jerusalem, arguing that it would be suicide for the tiny community to overextend itself as described in vss. 25-36 (Julius Wellhausen, Israelitische und jüdische Geschichte [3rd ed.; Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1897], p. 160). Hence the list is Dibon, and in the villages thereof, and at Jekabzeel, and in the villages thereof, Kir'ith-ar'ba and its villages, and in Dibon and its villages, and in Jekab'zeel and its usually regarded as the work of the Chronicler, reflecting his motives, wording, and style (Torrey, Composition, pp. 42-43; Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 186; Bertholet, Esva und Nehemia, p. 84; Siegfried, Esva, Nehemia und Esther, p. 120), and some conclude that in it “there is nothing . . . that may be used confidently for the history of Nehemiah’s time” (Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 830).

Others, while rejecting the list for the time of Nehemiah, consider it a genuine list of historical value for either pre-exilic or Maccabean times. The criterion is the number of settlements in the south, which was strongly populated in pre-exilic times, overrun by Edomites during the Exile and early postexilic times, and not regained for the Jews until 164 B.C., when the Edomites were defeated and Hebron was recovered (I Macc. 5:65). Thus it is possible for the list to reflect the extent of Judah before the Exile (Stade, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, II, 111; Kugler, Von Moses bis Paulus, pp. 299-300; Rudolf Smend, Lehrbuch der alttestamentlichen Religionsgeschichte [Leipzig: J. C. B. Mohr, 1893], p. 540, n. 1), possibly during the time of Josiah (640-608 B.C.; Albrecht Alt, “Judas Gaue unter Josia,” Palästinajahrbuch, XXI [1925], pp. 110 ff.), when the coastal plain was acquired by Judah, and Bethel too was taken over (II Kings 23:15). The use of archaic Kiriath-arba (vs. 25) for Hebron is better explained also by an earlier date. As a Maccabean product, which is much less likely, it would have to be “a very late insertion” into the book of Nehemiah (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 190).

The list has been more recently defended as a genuine post-exilic document, not from the time of Nehemiah but earlier, before there was any extensive return. The omission of towns mentioned in chs. 3 and 7 has been explained by the fact that “this part of the province was virtually uninhabited when the exiles began to return after 538 B.C.E.” (W. F. Albright, “The Biblical Period,” in Louis Finkelstein, ed., The Jews, Their History, Culture, and Religion [New York: Harper & Bros., 1949], I, 52-53), for the Chaldean invasion left Jewish settlers only in the Negeb and in the district north of Jerusalem, which at the time of the fall of the city (586 B.C.) was under the control of the Babylonian governor of Samaria (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [2nd ed.; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946], p. 247; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 189). The far-flung settlements in the list have also been regarded (Abel, Géographie, II, 121) not as returned Exile settlements, but as those of people who did not go into captivity, “the people of the land, rebellious against the new community and living in good relationship with the foreigners residing in Judea [i.e., in Edomite-Arabic and Ashdoth districts].” Such a situation is reflected in 13:23-24. Adduced also is the close relationship between the Judean clans (Perez, Shelah) and the semi-Edomite Zerah (cf. vs. 24), for Jeduthun (vs. 17) was of Edomite ancestry since Ethan belonged to the Edomite clan of Zerah (I Kings 4:31) and was not recognized until the Zerah clan became Judean (Gen. 38:30; Num. 26:20; Josh. 7:1, 18, 24; cf. Cook, “First Esdras,” in Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, I, 12).

I. JUDEAN SETTLEMENTS (11:25-30)

25a. Originally vs. 25a must have joined vs. 20 to form the title. And for, and as for do not translate the Hebrew, which is, lit., “and to” (נָא) but it is preferable to read “and these are,” since an easy scribal error could account for the loss of the letter which made the original נא, “these,” read נא, “to,” before the Hebrew article (נ) of the next word (cf. Gotthard, Nehemia, p. 45). The Hebrew term נַעַר, translated villages, means “enclosure,” and their fields refers to surrounding farm and pasture lands. Villages is criticized because some places mentioned were large cities, but “cities” would be equally wrong since most of them were relatively small, especially in the postexilic period. A compromise term such as “settlement” would be preferable.
26 And at Jeshua, and at Moladah, and at Beth-pelet, 27 And at Hazar-shual, and at Beer-sheba, and in the villages thereof, 28 And at Ziklag, and at Mekonah, and in the villages thereof.

25b. The cities of Judah listed begin in the south with Hebron and proceed southward roughly in clockwise fashion back toward Hebron. Kiriath-arba is perhaps properly identified with Hebron in Judg. 1:10 but Hülshner ("Esra und Nehemia", p. 652) is not persuaded that the equation is correct. Hebron (El-Khalil) is at the crossroads of the southern highlands, about nineteen miles south and somewhat west of Jerusalem. The ancient site is identified with the Deir el Arba’in, crowning the ridge El Rumeidah overlooking Hebron from the southeast (Garstang, Foundations of Bible History: Joshua-Judges, pp. 170, 209-10, 383-84). Its villages, lit., “her daughters,” refers to tiny settlements dependent upon and perhaps founded by a larger, neighboring mother city. Dibon, not to be confused with Dibon of Moab (Num. 21:30), is perhaps the Dimonah of Josh. 15:22 (Paul Haupt, “Über den Halbvolkal u im Assyrischen,” Zeitschrift für Assyriologie und verwandte Gebiete, II [1887], 268, n. 2; Gotthard, loc. cit.; Bertholet, op. cit., p. 85; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 187), located at El Qebab east of Tell el-Milh (Abel, op. cit., II, 89). The M.T. Jekabzeel, unsupported by the versions, is difficult. Many Hebrew MSS agree with the Peshitta, Vulg., and the LXX in reading “Kabzeel” (cf. Josh. 15:21a; II Sam. 23:20), usually located at Khirbet Höra, northwest of Khirbet Sa’wi (cf. Jeshua, vs. 26) and northeast of Beer-sheba (ibid.).

26. Jeshua, only here, has been regarded as the postexilic name of “Shema” of Josh. 15:26 (W. F. Albright, “Egypt and the Early History of the Negeb,” Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society, IV [1924], 152), identified with Khirbet Sa’wi, about four miles north-northwest of El Meshash (cf. vs. 27) and about three miles northwest of Tell el-Milh (C. R. Conder and H. H. Kitchener, The Survey of Western Palestine: Judea [London: Palestine Exploration Fund, 1883], III, 409-10). Moladah, near the southern border of Judah (Josh. 15:26), has been identified by Abel (op. cit., II, 991-92) with Tell el-Milh, a deserted site about ten miles southwest of Arad (cf. Wright and Filson, Westminster Atlas, p. 110), but Albright (“Egypt and the Early History of the Negeb,” pp. 152-54) objects and identifies it with Roman Malatha at Khirbet Quseifeh, about four miles from Arad. Beth-pelet (Josh. 15:27c), once identified with Tell el-Fâr‘ah, has been located at Tell el-Milh by Albright, “because the order of towns within their groups in this passage of Nehemiah is remarkably exact” (ibid., p. 153; “Progress in Palestinian Archaeology During the Year 1928,” Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 33 [1929], p. 7). But Abel (op. cit., II, 89) identifies it with Khirbet el-Meshash (cf. vs. 27).

27. Hazar-shual (“Enclosure of the Jackal”) is located by Albright (“Egypt and the Early History of the Negeb,” pp. 155-54) at Khirbet el-Meshash, about three and one-half miles west of el-Milh, but Abel (op. cit., II, 51, 89) places it at Khirbet Watân, east of Beer-sheba and west of Horma. Beer-sheba, usually identified with the modern site (Bir es-seba`) about twenty-eight miles southwest of Hebron (Abel, op. cit., II, 89; Alois Musil, Arabia Petraea [Vienna: Alfred Hölder, 1907-8], II, 165-69; Albrecht Alt, “Beiträge zur historischen Geographie und Topographie des Negeb,” Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society, XV [1935], 320 ff.; cf. Walther Zimmerli, Geschichte und Tradition von Beersheba im Alten Testament [Giessen: A. Töpelmann, 1932]), may anciently have been at Tell es-Seba`, about four miles east of the modern city (so Abel, op. cit., I, 307; but cf. II, 89, where he identifies it with Horma; Wright and Filson, op. cit., p. 108).

29 And at En-rimmon, and at Zareah, and at Jarmuth, 30 Zanoah, Adullam, and in their villages, at Lachish, and the fields thereof, at Azekah, and in the villages thereof. And they dwelt from Beer-sheba unto the valley of Hinnom.

31 The children also of Benjamin from Geba dwelt at Michmas, and at Aija, and Bethel, and in their villages, in Meco'nah and its villages, 29 in En-rim'mon, in Zorah, in Jarmuth, 30 Zano'ah, Adullam, and their villages, Lachish and its fields, and Az'e'kah and its villages. So they encamped from Beer-sheba to the valley of Hinnom. 31 The people of Benjamin also lived from Geba onward, at Michmas, certainly identified. Albright ("Egypt and the Early History of the Negeb," pp. 160-61) made a "rather precarious" suggestion to emend to "Meronah" and identify it with Khirbet Marrân, and Batten (op. cit., p. 273) would emend to "Madmannah" (Josh. 15:31), which has been identified with Umm Deimneh in the hills south of 'Anâb (Albright, loc. cit.; "Researches of the School in Western Judea," Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 15 [1924], p. 6).

Beginning with Zorah the list proceeds southward, roughly clockwise. All the Judean towns were between Beer-sheba—always the southern extremity of Jewish Palestine (cf. I Sam. 3:20; I Kings 4:25; etc.)—and the Valley of Hinnom (cf. 2:13), which was the northern boundary of Judah (cf. Josh. 15:8).

29b. Zorah (Josh. 15:33), modern Sar'ah, lay about twenty-two miles west of Jerusalem (Abel, op. cit., II, 85; Wright and Filson, op. cit., p. 112, Rudolph, op. cit., p. 188). Garstang (op. cit., pp. 335, 404) finds it at Sur'ah, crowning a ridge overlooking the Valley of Sorek (Wadi es-Sur'ah; Judg. 16:4), about fifteen miles west of Jerusalem (cf. W. F. Albright, "From Jerusalem to Gaza and Back," Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 17 [1925], pp. 4-5). Jarmuth (Khirbet Yarmûk; cf. Josh. 15:35), near the Valley of Elah (Wadi es-Sant), overlooks Tell Zakariyeh (cf. vs. 30) and the coastal plain (Abel, op. cit., II, 90; Garstang, op. cit., p. 386; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

30. Zanoah (Josh. 15:34; Khirbet Zânu' or Zânûh) lay one mile northeast of Jarmuth (vs. 29) and almost two miles south of Beth-shemesh ('Ain Shems; Albright, "To Engedi and Masada," p. 11; Abel, op. cit., II, 90, 489; Wright and Filson, loc. cit.; Rudolph, loc. cit.). Adullam (Josh. 15:35; Khirbet 'Id-el-mâ) lay about nine and one-half miles northeast of Beit Jibrin in the Valley of Elah "on the most direct route from Jerusalem to Lachish" (Abel, op. cit., II, 85, 90, 239; Garstang, op. cit., p. 176; Albright, "Researches of the School in Western Judea," pp. 3-4)). Lachish (Josh. 15:39) lay at Tell ed-Duweir, a few miles southwest of Beit Jibrin and near modern el-Qubeibeh (cf. G. L. Harding, Guide to Lachish: Tell ed-Duweir [Jerusalem: Commercial Press, 1943], pp. 11, 15-16). Some, however, still prefer to identify Lachish with Tell el-Haşi, west of Tell ed-Duweir, as was formerly done (Anton Jirku, "Lag das alte Lakiš auf dem Tell ed-Duweir" Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, LVII [1939], 152-53; Rudolph, loc. cit.), even though the excavator of Tell el-Haşi was not certain of its identification (C. M. Watson, Fifty Years' Work in the Holy Land [London: Palestine Exploration Fund, 1915], p. 106). Azekah (Josh. 15:35; Tell es-Zakariyeh) lay not far west of Jarmuth (cf. vs. 29b; Garstang, op. cit., p. 360).

2. BENJAMINITE SETTLEMENTS (11:31-36)

The settlements in Benjamin were located in part in the mountains north and northwest of Jerusalem and in part as a small cluster in the far west in the coastal 32 And at Anathoth, Nob, Ananiah, Ai'ja, Bethel and its villages, 32 An'athoth, Nob, Anani'ah, 33 Hazor, Ramah, Gittaim, 33 Hazor, Ramah, Gitt'aim, 34 Hadid, Zeboim, Neballat, 34 Hadid, Zebo'im, Nebal'lat. 35 Lod, and Ono, the valley of craftsmen. 36 And certain divisions of the Levites in Judah were joined to Benjamin.

plain (cf. 7:37; Ezra 2:33). The mountain settlements north and northwest of Jerusalem, in old Benjaminite territory, began with Geba (vs. 31) and moved in an irregular circuit counterclockwise, bending northeast to Michmash, northwest to Ai'ja, westward to Bethel, far southeast to Anathoth, southwest to Nob, southeast to Ananiah, northwest to Hazor, and northward to Ramah, which lay almost directly west of the starting point Geba.

31. Read, "And some of the sons of Benjamin," parallel to vs. 25, for from or "some of" which belongs there is wrongly placed before Geba (Gotthard, op. cit., p. 31; Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 274; Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 53; Rudolph, loc. cit.); Geba: cf. "Gaba," Ezra 2:26; Michmash: cf. Ezra 2:27; Ai'ja is but the Aramaic equivalent of Ai (Ezra 2:28); Bethel: cf. Ezra 2:28.

32. Anathoth: cf. Ezra 2:23 (Neh. 7:27); Nob is the "Nebo" of Ezra 2:29 (Neh. 7:33; cf. Batten, loc. cit.). Ananiah is best identified with the Bethany of the N.T. (el-'Azariyeh; Albright, "New Identifications of Ancient Towns," pp. 9-10; Abel, op. cit., II, 243).

33ab. Hazor is found only here in reference to Benjamin. Since Khirbet Hazzûr, formerly identified with it (ibid., II, 345; Wright and Filson, op. cit., p. 109; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 189), has proved to be a late site, Roman and later, Alt ("Die Ausflüge: Hazor," Palästinajahrbuch, XXIV [1928], 12-13; cf. W. F. Albright, "The Jordan Valley in the Bronze Age," Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research, VI [1924-25], 21) conjectures its earlier site to be on a mountain west of Khirbet Hazzûr, perhaps on El bursch or Nebi Samwil, and Albright locates it provisionally at El-Mughár just southeast of Khirbet Hazzûr. For Ramah see Ezra 2:26. Because of the difficulty of identifying some sites, it is impossible to observe any regular plan of listing the coastal sites.

33c-35. With Gittaim (cf. II Sam. 4:3) the Benjaminite list leaps to the coastal plain. Gittaim has been located at the ruined group called Khirbet el-Kelch and Nebi Zakaria, lying northwest of Berfilia (Crusaders' Porphilia) and southeast of Hadid (cf. Ezra 2:33; Albrecht Alt, "Gittaim," Palästinajahrbuch, XXXV [1939], 100-4). Albright (reviewing Abel's Géographie de la Palestine, Journal of Biblical Literature, LVIII [1939], 179) identifies it with the Qdtm of Shishak's list (No. 25) and places it between Beth-horon of Ephraim and Ajalon of Dan. For Hadid (el-Haditheh), Lod (Lydda), and Ono (Kefr 'Anâ) see Ezra 2:33. Zeboim, possibly the alû Sabuma of the Amarna letters (J. A. Knudtzon, Die El-Amarna-Tafeln [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1915], II, 1328-29, No. 274, I. 16), could be Khirbet Sabieh, north of Lydda (Abel, op. cit., II, 28, 452). Neballat, probably Beit Nabala, northeast of Lydda (Siegfried, Esra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 120; Abel, op. cit., II, 397; Wright and Filson, op. cit., p. 111; Rudolph, loc. cit.), may have been named for a Nabu-uballit who was "presumably a powerful Assyrian Governor of Samaria at the beginning of the 7th century B.C." (W. F. Albright, "Excavations and Results at Tell el-Fül (Gibeath of Saul)," Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research, IV [1922-23], 106, n. 15; "The Date and Personality of the Chronicler," Journal of Biblical Literature, XL [1921], 111, n. 17).

The valley of craftsmen (cf. I Chr. 4:14) possibly lay in the richly wooded region about Lod or Ono (Rudolph, loc. cit.). Perhaps it is to be identified with the Sarafand el-Kharab, in a valley formed by a tributary of the Nahr Rûbin (Abel, op. cit., II, 405). The Ethiopic and Peshitta versions attest an and before the last name which has been lost because it was a single letter identical with the last letter of the name Ono (Gotthard, op. cit., p. 45; Guthe and Batten, loc. cit.; et al.).
Now these are the priests and the Levites that went up with Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Jeshua: Seraiah, Jeremiah, Ezra, Amariah, Malluch, Hattush.

These are the priests and the Levites who came up with Zerubbabel the son of She-alti-el, and Jeshua: Sera'imah, Jeremiah, Ezra, Amariah, Malluch, Hattush.

XIII. Clerical Genealogies (12:1-26)

Chapter 12 is a composite work recording clerical genealogies of the postexilic period (vss. 1-26), an account of the dedication of the city walls (vss. 27-43), and finally a statement from the Chronicler's viewpoint regarding the ideal status of the cultus in the postexilic period (vss. 44-47). The genealogies list the individuals or representatives of priests and Levites in various periods, from the return under Darius II to the time of the high priest Jaddua.

A. Priests (12:1-7)

The first list purported to be the priests who returned with Zerubbabel. As such, it should parallel 7:39-42, but instead of the four families of ch. 7, there are twenty-two here. It is argued that the author had no information regarding priests of the time of the high priest Joshua (Hölscher, Esra und Nehemia, p. 553), and it has been thought unlikely that all families were developing independent lines for the future in the time of Joshua (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 191). Others, however, contend that after their arrival in Palestine there may have been a subdivision of families with one group retaining the old family name while the others assumed the names of their contemporary family leaders (cf. Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 84; Abraham Kuenen, Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur biblischen Wissenschaft [tr. Karl Budde; Leipzig: J. C. B. Mohr, 1894], p. 379). There seems to have been some concern about re-establishing the status of the nine priestly families that had lost their privileges (7:61-65). Some prefer to see in the list a record not of the time of Zerubbabel but of Joiakim (cf. vss. 12-21).

With several additions and omissions, but with the names otherwise in the identical order, the same list of priests is found in 10:2-8, which presumably comes from a time after Nehemiah. The unusual "and" in the midst of the list, before Joiarib (vs. 19), marks all that follows as of secondary origin (Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 173). Since the Maccabees were descended from Joiarib (1 Macc. 2:1), who appears as a correction of the name Joiakim (cf. 11:10), the addition may be as late as Maccabean times (Hölscher, op. cit., p. 553; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

12:1. Since the title "the Levites" is in vs. 8, it is possible that only the priests was original in vs. 1 (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 275). However, if the full title were used here, it could be that after the lengthy matter of the priests was finished the need for another title was felt in vs. 8. In the LXXL Jeshua is identified as high priest through the insertion of his genealogy (Ezra 3:2). Ezra (cf. vs. 13) abbreviates Azariah (cf. Ezra 7:1) as in 10:2.

2. Amariah: Cf. Ezra 7:3. The LXX, Vulg., and Peshitta versions support the reading Malluch, which abbreviates Malchiah (cf. Ezra 10:25). Hattush (cf. Ezra 8:2) is omitted in 12:14 and in all major Greek MSS, but its presence in 10:4 points to an accidental loss in vs. 14 (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 190). Since the family of Passhur existed in the community (cf. 10:3; 11:12b), its absence in vss. 1b-7, 12-21 apparently indicates loss of text here (ibid.).

12:1-30. A Census of Priests, Levites, and Singers.—By the use of various categories and classifications the Chronicler may well have made full use of all the lists of names and families that had come down to him, from the earliest returning exiles under Zerubbabel (cf. Ezra 2:1-2). At a time when mixed marriages were under the ban, especially for the priests and Levites, such genealogies were obviously important.
3. Shechaniah (cf. Ezra 8:3) is Shebaniah in three Hebrew MSS and the Vulg. here and in the lists in 10:4; 12:14, but the M.T. here is supported by the LXX in 12:14 and by the LXX and Peshitta versions here. By the transposition of letters the name שָׁבָנַיָּא ("Harim"; 7:42; 10:5; Ezra 2:32) has been corrupted to שָׁבָנַיָּא (Rehum; cf. Ezra 2:2). As the Vulg. and Peshitta versions show, Meremoth (cf. 10:5; Ezra 8:33) is preferable to Meraioth (cf. Ezra 7:3).

4. Because Iddo (Ezra 5:1) appears in the written tradition (Kethîbh) of 12:16 as "Adaiah" (cf. Ezra 10:29) and that is found here in the LXX, it is conjectured that the name here should be Obadiah (cf. Ezra 8:9; Gotthard, loc. cit.), but in 12:16 the oral tradition (Qere) also had Iddo. Ginnethoi is a corruption of "Ginnethon" (cf. 10:6). The correct name is given in about thirty-four Hebrew MSS and the Vulg., and in 10:6; 12:16.

5. Mijamin (cf. Ezra 10:25) contracts the "Miniamin" of vs. 17, 41 (cf. II Chr. 30:15), which appears in Babylonian records as ממי-יניא-א-מסינ (A. T. Clay, Business Documents of Murashû Sons of Nippur Dated in the Reign of Darius II [Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1904], No. 81, 11, 12, 23; No. 84, 11, 13, 21; etc.), and ממי-יניא-א-inati (Hilprecht and Clay, Business Documents of Murashû Sons of Nippur in Reign of Artaxerxes I, No. 14, l. 11). Maadiah is the Moadiah of 12:17. "Maziah" (cf. I Chr. 24:18) is found for it here in the LXX and in the M.T. of 10:8, and that familiar priestly name (cf. 10:8; I Chr. 24:18) is favored here by some (Gotthard, loc. cit.; Bertholet, loc. cit.; et al.).

6. In the parallel list (10:2-8) the names after Shemaiah (cf. Ezra 8:13, 16) are omitted. With and Joiarib begins a new section, apparently added later. Since Joiarib appears to "correct" an original "Joiaim" (cf. 11:10) and Joiarib was a Maccabean ancestor (I Macc. 2:1), the addition may be Maccabean (Hölscher, op. cit., p. 553; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 191).

7. As the LXX and Vulg. show, Sallu (cf. 11:7) is preferable to the Sallai of vs. 20. Amok ("Deep") is perhaps a metaphorical "Inscrutable" or "Wise." The name appears among Babylonian names as אמוק (A. T. Clay, Babylonian Business Transactions of the First Millennium B.C. [New York: Private Printing, 1912], Vol. I, No. 32, l. 14). Since the element appears in such names as אמוקס (Georges Contenau, Contrats néobabyloniens [Paris: P. Geuthner, 1927], Vol. I, No. 2, l. 2) and אמוקס (A. W. King, Babylonian Boundary Stones in the British Museum [London: British Museum, 1912], Pl. XXII, col. 2, l. 12), the full name was perhaps "Amoqiah" or "Amoqel." Because Jedaijah (cf. Ezra 2:36) occurs twice (cf. vs. 6), it was conjectured that in one instance another name must be displaced by it. The LXX suggests "Hodaviah" (cf. Ezra 2:40), otherwise unknown as a priestly name (Bertholet, op. cit., p. 85), and others suggest for Jedaijah (יהדיה) the name "Adaiah" (יהדיה; Guth and Batten, loc. cit.; Bertheau, Ezra, Necchemia und Ester, p. 327), believed to be represented by the Ethiopic version (Gotthard, loc. cit.). But Rudolph (op. cit., p. 190) disapproves of such substitution and argues that a common name could be repeated.

The antecedent of their brethren is not clear. If it refers to the chiefs, then priests and brothers are identical and the conjunction is needless (cf. ibid.). The words and of their brethren could have been copied mechanically and needlessly from 11:12-14 (ibid.; Batten, op. cit., p. 276). Since the Levites are normally so designated, it should refer to them. Possibly vs. 7b should follow vs. 9, where their brethren would refer to

785
Moreover the Levites: Jeshua, Binnui, Kadmiel, Sherebiah, Judah, and Mattaniah, which was over the thanksgiving, he and his brethren.

Also Bakbukiah and Unni, their brethren, were over against them in the watches.

¶ And Jeshua begat Joiakim, Joiakim the son of Mattaniah, Mattaniah the son of Micaiah, Micaiah the son of Miniamin, Miniamin the son of Iozadak, who went into captivity. Here the list, without a title, begins with Jeshua (cf. Ezra 2:2), the first name of the Levites listed in vs. 8-9, forming a good connection between vs. 10 and the previous pericope (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.).

B. Levites (12:8-9)

As usual the Levites follow the priests. The list is regarded as highly artificial, expanding a nucleus of three ancestral names (7:43-44; Ezra 2:40) by adding those of contemporaries of Nehemiah and Ezra (ibid.). The identity and order of the Levites is essentially that of other lists (7:43; 8:7; 9:4-5; 10:9; 12:24-25).

8-9. As always, except for 12:24, Jeshua (Ezra 2:2; 3:2) the son of Azaniah (cf. 10:9) heads the list of Levites. As in 10:9, Binnui the son of Henadad is listed second. The usual confusion between Binnui and Bani (cf. 7:15; Ezra 2:10) is found here, for the name appears as "Bani" in the other lists (cf. 8:7; 9:4-5; and possibly 12:24). In 7:43 Kadmiel (cf. Ezra 2:40) is listed second, but he is third elsewhere, except in 8:7, where the name is omitted.

Sherebiah (cf. Ezra 8:18), not found in 7:43, appears to have been not of the time of Zerubbabel but from the time of Nehemiah (10:18) and Ezra (Ezra 8:18, 24; Neh. 8:7; 9:4-5). The name is regularly in later lists, but not always fourth. Some deny that Judah (cf. Ezra 3:9) was a Levite name (ibid.) and it is possible that Judah is a corruption of Hodiah (יהודה), as in 8:7; 9:5; 10:10, 13 (Bertheau, loc. cit.; Siegfried, Esra, Nehemias und Esther, p. 120; Gotthard, loc. cit.; et al.) or Hodaviah (יהודה; cf. Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:48; Rudolph, loc. cit.). But Judah is also in Ezra 3:9; 10:23 and the Vulg. and Peshitta here support the M.T.

Mattaniah and his brethren led the singing of the thanksgiving hymn (11:17). The Vulg., "they and their brethren," indicates that all Levites were responsible. Rudolph (ibid.) thinks of an antiphonal choir of many men. Bakbukiah (cf. 11:17) and Unni (1 Chr. 15:18, 20) are associated in some activity contrasting with that of the Levites. They are with the gatekeepers in vs. 25. Some read instead of Unni a verb "and they used to answer" (Bertheau, op. cit., p. 328; Bertholet, loc. cit.; Guthe and Batten, loc. cit.) or "and they answered" (Edouard Reuss, Chronique ecclésiastique de Jérusalem [Paris: Sandoz & Fischbacher, 1878], p. 254, n. 2), and omit and Bakbukiah as a gloss from 11:17. But since the name is attested in the LXX, the emendation to a verb is impossible (Rudolph, loc. cit.). Some change Unni to 'Abdi for Obadiah (vs. 25) and Abda (11:17) wherever Unni is found in this list (Van Hoonacker, Nouvelles études sur la restauration, p. 253). The word is the common abbreviation either of Ananiah (cf. 8:4) or of Ananiah (3:23); cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.). In 1 Chr. 15:18, 20, it refers to a Levite in the time of David.

Stood opposite them may refer to antiphonal singing or to the changes of orders for different occasions (cf. Batten, loc. cit.) The verse concludes with "according to functions," meaning "according to the Levitical divisions for service." It is interpreted as "according to their offices" (ASV), in the service, or "in the execution of their official duties" (Amer. Trans.).

C. Postexilic High Priests (12:10-11)

In I Chr. 6:1-14 the list of high priests concludes with Jehozadak, who went into captivity. Here the list, without a title, begins with Jeshua (cf. Ezra 2:2), the first also begat Eliashib, and Eliashib begat Joiada,

11 And Joiada begat Jonathan, and Jonathan begat Jaddua.

12 And in the days of Joiakim were priests, the chief of the fathers: of Seraiah, Meraiah; of Jeremiah, Hananiah; father of Joi'akim, Joi'akim the father of Eli'ashib, Eli'ashib the father of Joi'ada, 11 Joi'ada the father of Jonathan, and Jonathan the father of Jaddu-a.

12 And in the days of Joi'akim were priests, heads of fathers' houses: of Sera'iah, 13 Of Ezra, Meshullam; of Amariah, Jehohanan; 14 Of Melicu, Jonathan; of Shebaniah, Joseph;
15 Of Harim, Adna; of Meraioth, Helkai;
16 Of Iddo, Zechariah; of Ginnethon, Meshullam; 17 Of Abijah, Zichri; of Miniamin, of Moadiah, Piltai;
18 Of Bilghah, Shammua; of Shemaiah, Jehonathan;
19 And of Joiarib, Mattenai; of Jedaiah, Uzzi; 20 Of Sallai, Kallai; of Amok, Eber;
21 Of Hilhia, Hashabiah; of Jedaiah, Nethaneel.

Mera'iah; of Jeremiah, Hanani'ah; 13 of Ezra, Meshul'lam; of Amariah, Jeho-ha'nan; 14 of Mal'luchi, Jonathan; of Sheba-ni'ah, Joseph; 15 of Harim, Adna; of Mera'i-oth, Hel'kai; 16 of Iddo, Zechari'ah; of Gin'nethon, Meshul'lam; 17 of Abi'jah, Zichri; of Min'i'amin, of Moadi'ah, Pil'tai; 18 of Bilghah, Sham'mu-a; of Shema'i'ah, Jehon'a-than; 19 of Joi'arib, Matte'ni; of Jeda'i'ah, Uzzi; 20 of Sal'lai, Kal'la'i; of Amok, Eber; 21 of Hilk'i'ah, Hashabi'ah; of Jeda'i'ah, Nathan'el.

13-16. For Ezra the Peshitta has “Azariah,” as in 10:2. Meshullam: Cf. Ezra 8:16. Amariah: Cf. vs. 2; 10:3; Ezra 7:3. The Peshitta contracts Jehohanan (cf. Ezra 10:28) to “Johanan” (cf. Ezra 8:12). Malluchi is “Malluch” (cf. vs. 2), to which the first letter of the name Jonathan has been attached as a dittograph (Rudolph, loc. cit.). Jonathan: Cf. Ezra 8:6; 10:15. Shebaniah (cf. 10:4), also read by the Vulg., should be “Shechaniah,” as in vs. 3, as about seventeen Hebrew MSS, the LXX, and Peshitta show. Joseph: Cf. Ezra 10:42. Harim: Cf. 10:5; “Rehum” in 12:3. Adna: Cf. Ezra 10:30. The LXX and Peshitta show that Meraioth (cf. Ezra 7:3) should be “Meremoth,” as in vs. 3; 10:5. Helkai abbreviates “Hilkiah” (cf. 8:4). The LXX and Vulg. support the written tradition of the M.T., “Adaiah” (cf. Ezra 10:29), but it is preferable to read Iddo with the oral tradition, the Peshitta, and vs. 4. Zechariah (cf. Ezra 5:1) might be the prophet (ibid., p. 198), but it is unnecessary to assume that Zechariah's father bore the name of his ancestor, for “son” may mean “descendant” (Ezra 5:1). Ginnethon (cf. 10:6) is preferable to “Ginnethoi” (vs. 4). Meshullam: Cf. Ezra 8:16.

17-18. Abijah: Cf. vs. 4; 10:7. Zichri: Cf. 11:9. Miniamin is the full form of “Mijamin” (vs. 5; 10:7) read by two Hebrew MSS here. The name of his descendant is lost. Moadiah, only here, is “Maadiah” in vs. 5, and “Mazziah” in 10:8. The former, supported here by five Hebrew MSS and the LXX, seems preferable. Piltai, which is also found in the Aramaic papyri (Cowley, op. cit., No. 40, l. 1), abbreviates “Phaltiel” (“God Has Rescued”; II Sam. 3:15), which also appears as Phalti (I Sam. 25:44), or “Pelatiah” (“The Lord Has Rescued”; Ezek. 11:1, 13). Bilghah (cf. vs. 5) is preferable to “Bilgai” (10:8). Shammua: Cf. 11:17. Shemaiah: Cf. vs. 6; 10:8. Jehonathan (cf. Ezra 10:28) appears in the versions as “Jonathan.”

19-21. As in vs. 6, the remainder of the list, omitted in 10:2-8, is introduced by and in the M.T. For Joiarib (vs. 6) the Peshitta has “Joia'da” (vs. 10). Mattenai: Cf. Ezra 10:33, 37. Jedai'ah: Cf. vs. 6. Uzzi: Cf. 11:22; Ezra 7:4. For Sallai (vs. 20) read “Sallu” with vs. 7 and the LXX; Kallai, only here, abbreviates a full name that can no longer be fully ascertained but may be “Kelai'ah” (cf. 10:10; Ezra 10:23). Amok: Cf. vs. 7. For Eber (Gen. 10:21; I Chr. 5:13; 8:12, 12) supported by “Heber” in the Vulg., it is proposed to read “Ebed” (cf. Ezra 8:6), as in the Peshitta, LXX, and several Hebrew MSS. Hilkiah: Cf. vs. 7; also “Helkai,” vs. 15. Hashabiah: Cf. Ezra 8:19, 24. Jedai'ah (cf. vs. 7) is rendered “Hoduiah” by the LXX, and it is proposed to read here “Adaiah” (אדיה) as in vs. 7 (Gotthard, loc. cit.) but that is unnecessary. Nethaneel: Cf. Ezra 10:22.

788
22 ¶ The Levites in the days of Eliashib, Joiada, and Johanan, and Jaddua, were recorded chief of the fathers; also the priests, to the reign of Darius the Persian.

23 The sons of Levi, the chief of the fathers, were written in the book of the

E. Source of the Genealogical Lists (12:22-23)

After the priests (vss. 12-21), a list of the Levites of the same period is expected but that is not given until vss. 24-25, separated from the former list by an interpolated passage concerning the registration of genealogies.

22. The words, the Levites, out of place here, were apparently part of the original heading of the list in vss. 24-25. But they have also been conjectured to be a marginal gloss to the sons of Levi in vs. 23 that has migrated to vs. 22 (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 194). The primary concern in this verse, which appears to be a supplement to the preceding list, is the priestly families. Although the M.T. has the indefinite chief of the fathers, the definite form the heads of fathers’ houses is regarded as essential and is supported by several Hebrew MSS and the Peshitta (cf. Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 54; Gotthard, loc. cit.). It is necessary if the conjunction also is retained before the priests. Then two groups would be involved, as in the double list in vss. 12-21. Thus the heads of fathers’ houses would be a clerical rather than lay designation, as in 11:13. But some, appealing to a single MS, omit also to make a single group, “the heads of the families of the priests” (Winckler, Altorientalische Forschungen, Reihe 2, Bd. II, p. 221; Rudolph, loc. cit.). Then the article is unnecessary before fathers’ houses since the priests makes the whole expression definite (Kautzsch, Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, sec. 127a,d; cf. Isa. 10:12; 21:17).

Although the Vulg. and LXX read “in the reign of Darius,” neither “in” nor until properly renders the Hebrew preposition יָבִע, which is usually “upon,” or in late Hebrew, under Aramaic influence, to. Since sixteen Hebrew MSS have יָבִע, until, instead of יָבִע, “upon,” it is usual to read the former and regard the latter as a scribal error (Bertheau, Ezra, Nehemias und Esther, pp. 330-31; Guthe and Batten, loc. cit.; Gotthard, loc. cit.). More probable is the suggestion that the skipping eyes of a copyist moved from יָבִע, “upon,” in the expression in the book of the Chronicles (vs. 23) to a later similar preposition, thus dropping the whole phrase (Rudolph, loc. cit.). Vs. 22 should thus be read: “In the days of Eliashib, Joiada, and Johanan, and Jaddua, the chiefs of the fathers and the priests were written in the book of Chronicles during the reign of Darius the Persian.”

Because the Persian suggests that the Persian period was past, and because Josephus associated Jaddua with Alexander the Great (cf. vs. 11), Darius is usually identified with Darius III, “Codomarus” (336-332 B.C.; cf. Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 121; Bertheau, Ezra und Nehemias, p. 85; Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 674; Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 819; et al.). But since the Persian could be written even earlier, during the Persian period (cf. Ezra 1:1; cf. R. D. Wilson, “Titles of the Persian Kings,” Festschrift Eduard Sachau [Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1915], p. 193), as Herodotus does (History II. 110, 158), Darius could as well be Darius II, “Ochus” (423-404 B.C.).

The days of Eliashib, etc., must all fall within the reign of Darius the Persian. It is conceivable that Eliashib could have continued under Darius II from the reign of Artaxerxes I, and Johanan was deposed in favor of Jaddua toward the end of the reign of Darius II (cf. vs. 23). But if Darius is Darius II, only the very beginning of Jaddua’s high priesthood could be involved. It is argued that Jaddua is missing in vs. 25 because, although he is listed among the high priests, the list of Levites had not yet been recorded (Rudolph, loc. cit.). But Jaddua is difficult in vs. 22 and it seems to be a later addition to the list, which already was terminated by and Johanan.

23. In contrast to vs. 22, this verse is concerned with the Levites alone, and while it too is an interpolation it now furnishes a preface to the list of Levites which follows.
24 And the chief of the Levites: Hashabiah, Sherebiah, and Jeshua the son of Kadmiel, with their brethren over against them, to praise and to give thanks, according to the commandment of David the man of God, ward over against ward.

The book of the Chronicles, bearing the actual title of the canonical books of Chronicles, was not that work but another source. Torrey regards it as part of the Chronicler's "imaginary library" and does not consider it seriously. He contends, "There is not the least internal evidence that he had a written source before him in compiling these lists" (Ezra Studies, p. 141, n. 5). But not all take such a negative attitude. Wellhausen considered it as one of the Chronicler's postexilic sources (cf. Friedrich Bleek, Einleitung in das Alte Testament [4th ed.; Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1878], p. 268; Stade, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, II, 153, n. 1), and Meyer (Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 104) regarded it as the Chronicler's sole source for the postexilic period. Some think that it differs from the "book of the genealogy" (7:5) in the fact that it contained historical data as well as lists of clerical personnel (cf. Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 277; Bertholet, loc. cit.), and thus may have been the official temple chronicle for the postexilic period (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 193-94). Until the days of Johanan the son of Eliashib means roughly, as in vs. 22, to the end of the reign of Darius II. Since Bagoas set aside Johanan for the murder of his brother (cf. vs. 11), the high priest must have been deposed sometime between 408 B.C., when he was still in office according to the papyri (Cowley, op. cit., No. 30, 1. 18) and 405 B.C., when Darius II died (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 193).

F. Levites Under Joiakim (12:24-26)

This list, expected in vs. 22, should consist of names from the time of Joiakim and it is usually so regarded (ibid., p. 194), but Siegfried (op. cit., p. 122) believes that it is extended to cover the period of Johanan also, and wonders at the omission of Jaddua (cf. vs. 22).

24. The names given are not of individual leaders but are common Levite names, apparently representing the individuals. Since Jeshua usually heads the lists of Levites (cf. vs. 8), the name Hashabiah (cf. Ezra 8:19) in first place, followed by Sherebiah (cf. 8:7; 9:4; 10:12), is surprising. These men must not be confused with men of those names who accompanied Ezra (8:18-19), since they could not also have been in the time of Joiakim. Jeshua only here is called the son of Kadmiel, but this is erroneous, as the Peshitta and LXX show, for Kadmiel usually appears independently (cf. 7:48; 9:4-5; 10:9; Ezra 2:40). Comparison of lists indicates that the word son of (12) is another name, either "Bani" (12; cf. 8:7; 9:4) or "Binnui" (12; cf. vs. 8; 10:9). The latter is preferable and is supported by the erroneous "his sons" (12) of the LXX, which differs from "Binnui (12) only in the transposition of two letters (Bertholet, loc. cit.; Guthe and Batten, loc. cit.; Rudolph, loc. cit.). With their brethren implies other Levites, but it is difficult to see, in conformity with the title, how they too could be family heads. The LXX has "his brothers," referring to Kadmiel.

One of the Levite duties involved the singing of praise and thanks (cf. vs. 8; 11:17). This occurred principally in connection with giving burnt offerings (I Chr. 23:30). It is clear from the versions and Ezra 3:11 (cf. I Chr. 16:4; 23:30) that the text should be and to give thanks. As in vs. 9, the position of the singers is described, and in the characteristic terminology of the Chronicler (I Chr. 25:8; 26:16) the organization of the Levites is described as "watch next to watch" (ASV) or watch corresponding to watch (cf. vs. 9). The watches were perhaps the courses by which the Levites were organized, corresponding to watch. 25 Mattani'ah, Bakbuki'ah, Obadi'ah, Meshul'lam, Talmon, and Akkub were gatekeepers standing guard at the storehouses of the gates. 26 These were in the days of Joia'kim the son of Jeshua son of Jo'zadak, and in the days of Nehemia'ah the governor and of Ezra the priest the scribe.
25 Mattaniah, and Bakbukiah, Obadiah, Meshullam, Talmon, Akkub, were porters keeping the ward at the thresholds of the gates.

26 These were in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua, the son of Jozadak, and in the days of Nehemiah the governor, and of Ezra the priest, the scribe.

although the words might mean the arrangements of positions for antiphonal singing (Batten, loc. cit.). The Chronicler attributes Levitical organization to the commandment of David (cf. I Chr. 25; II Chr. 8:14). The title man of God, applied elsewhere to Moses (cf. Ezra 8:2), is given to David, as in II Chr. 8:14. The Peshitta has “prophet of the Lord,” usage interpreted as indicating that David’s “authority in the regulation of the temple service was not royal but prophetic” (ibid.).

25. The LXXBAX omits the six names here given, which are understood to be gatekeepers, but at least Mattaniah (vs. 8) and Bakbukiah (vs. 9) are associated with singers in vs. 8-9: 11:17. Obadiah (cf. Ezra 8:9) is the full name of “Abda” (11:17) who, as a descendant of Jeduthun, could also have been a musician. But he could have been a gatekeeper, for it was the family of Obed-Edom who guarded the house of the stores (I Chr. 26:15). Some propose to insert מֶשְׁנָלֵם, “the singers,” after Obadiah (Jahn, Ezra [A und B] und Nehemja, p. 162); it is possible that the word was lost due to graphic similarity to the name Meshullam, or may be concealed in that name itself (Rudolph, loc. cit.), for, although Shallum is associated with gatekeepers (I Chr. 9:17; Ezra 2:42) and the name abbreviates Meshullam, this Meshullam does not appear to be related to the Shullam of I Chr. 9:17, who may have been contemporary with the Chronicler (cf. I Chr. 9:18a; ibid., p. 195). The Peshitta here has “Shallum,” which is favored by some (Gotthard, loc. cit.).

“Shallum,” Talman, and Akkub are family names (cf. 2:42), not those of individuals, which vs. 24 leads one to expect. It is conjectured that a copyist erroneously put the names, familiar to him, in the text (Guthe and Batten, op. cit., p. 71; Van Hoonacker, Le sacerdoce lévique, pp. 64 ff.). The list expresses the Chronicler’s view that the doorkeepers and singers are Levites, but a somewhat later list treats the gatekeepers as a separate class (11:19).

For “watching gates” of the M.T. some read “were the ones watching in the gates” (cf. 11:19), but usually the words are inverted to read were gatekeepers standing guard, which prevents “keeping” from being separated from its object “watch” (Keil, Chronik, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 583; Guthe and Batten, op. cit., p. 54; Bertholet, op. cit., pp. 85-86; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 195). Thresholds of the gates preserves a reading thresholds (sippe) for the difficult Hebrew 'asu'ppe, as in the Peshitta, Targ., and I Chr. 26:15. A “keeper of the threshold” was an important temple official (cf. Jer. 35:4), possibly a priest (II Kings 12:9) but more probably a Levite (cf. II Chr. 34:9; Jahn, loc. cit.; Batten, op. cit., p. 278). But it is clear from I Chr. 26:15, 17, which mentions Levites posted over the South Gate and the “House of 'Asuppim,” that the Hebrew word is not threshold but storehouses, to be identified with the Akkadian bit a-su-up-pu used in that sense frequently in cuneiform documents of the Neo-Babylonian and Persian periods (Bezold, Babylonisch-Assyrisches Glossar, p. 52, col. 2).

26. Vss. 24-25 have a subscript, by the final editor who transmitted the lists, which assigns the preceding list to the time of Joiakim. Vs. 26b contains a synchronism intended to connect the preceding genealogies with the narrative that follows. In the present disordered text of Ezra-Nehemiah, such synchronism is understandable, for if Nehemiah was contemporary with Eliashib the son of Joiakim and therefore possibly with Joiakim too, then Ezra, who was believed contemporary with Nehemiah, would likewise have been in the time of Joiakim. But the synchronism is historically invalid since Nehemiah may not have been in Judea under Joakim the father of the Eliashib who was his contemporary (3:1, 20), and Ezra came to Palestine later than Nehemiah, under Artaxerxes II (cf. vs. 11).
27 And at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem they sought the Levites out of all their places, to bring them to Jerusalem, to keep the dedication with gladness, both with thanksgivings, and with singing, with cymbals, psalteries, and with harps.

XIV. Dedication of the Walls of Jerusalem (12:27-43)

Through dedication secular products are made holy and placed under divine protection. The ancient Hebrews did not confine such dedication to distinctly religious edifices, for apparently even private houses were so dedicated (cf. Deut. 20:5; O. S. Rankin, The Origins of the Festival of Hanukkah [Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1950], pp. 30-31). Such rites were thus apparently recognized as the final act of building, just as the sacrifice of first fruits was the final essential act of the agricultural operation. Thus it is natural to suppose that when the walls of the "holy city" (cf. 11:1) were rebuilt, they would be dedicated to ward off possible catastrophe and put them under the protection of God. Since such dedication would be a practical as well as a religious concern, it is strange to learn that "there is nothing in this story of the dedication of the walls that deserves to be taken seriously. The necessity of such a ceremony would of course be keenly felt by the Chronicler; it is not so likely it would have occurred to Nehemiah" (Torrey, Composition, pp. 43-44).

Because the narrative is in the first person, it is usually assumed to have been originally part of Nehemiah's record, but others consider the entire passage (12:27-13:13) as the work of the Chronicler, with "nothing whatever to indicate a written source." The Nehemiah of this section has been called simply "Ezra [i.e., the Chronicler] under another name," attempts to isolate even a nucleus of what might be genuine narrative have been ridiculed as "a curious specimen of literary criticism," and it is assumed that "there is no use for analysis here anywhere." All is the work of the Chronicler, false and fanciful (Torrey, Ezra Studies, pp. 248-49). Use of the first person subject is rejected as a criterion for assigning material to Nehemiah since "there is no linguistic or stylistic difference between the sections written in the first person and the others [usually attributed to the Chronicler]" (Kapelrud, Question of Authorship in the Ezra-Narrative, p. 95; cf. Mowinckel, Ezra den Skriftlærde, pp. 49-61).

The hand of the Chronicler is recognized throughout the narrative, even by those rejecting the extreme view of Torrey, but it is regarded as an editorial rather than a creative hand, thoroughly working over a plausible and probable basic source, attributable to Nehemiah (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 279). In attempts at recovering the original narrative the use of the first person pronoun is still regarded as a promising clue. Thus Ryssel (Die Heilige Schrift des Alten Testaments, ed. Emil Kautzsch [Leipzig: J. C. Mohr, 1894], p. 934) suggested that Nehemiah wrote vs. 31-32, 37-40 and the Chronicler vs. 27-30, 33-36, 41-43. Bertholet (op. cit., p. 86) attributes vs. 27-29, 31-32, 37-40 to Nehemiah and vs. 33-36, 41-43 to the Chronicler. Rudolph (loc. cit.) in general agrees with Bertholet, but except for the first three words of vs. 27, which he believes to be Nehemiah's, he assigns vs. 27-29 to the Chronicler. It is impossible here to recover with certainty any true text of Nehemiah and the problem is complicated by the fact that, no matter what authorship, the description of the ritual of dedication would have to employ such cultic terminology as the Chronicler was disposed to use. Although the actual words of Nehemiah may be lost, the narrative preserves something of the order of events in the ceremony of dedication: the assembling of the Levites and musicians (vs. 27-29); purification rites (vs. 30); ritual circumambulation (vs. 31-39); and sacrificial celebration (vs. 40-43).
NEHEMIAH 12:27

A. ASSEMBLING THE LEVITES AND MUSICIANS (12:27-29)

These verses are usually attributed to the Chronicler, who is especially interested in the Levites and musicians, but Bertholet (loc. cit.) assigns them to the Nehemiah narrative. For a service stressing songs of thanksgiving (vs. 27) and instrumental music (vv. 27, 36), it would be necessary to bring to Jerusalem the Levite musicians who lived outside of the city (cf. vs. 29).

27. The celebration was a "dedication" (Hanukkah) service, like that of the rededication of the temple in Maccabean times (1 Macc. 4:52-59) which is still celebrated (Rankin, op. cit.). The words And at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem have been regarded as Nehemiah's (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 198), but it is likely that he would have assumed the name of the city (Batten, loc. cit.). At the dedication scarcely dates the event which has been claimed to have occurred three months (Bertholet, op. cit., p. 87) or even a dozen years (Rawlinson, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 158) after the completion of the walls. More probably the walls were dedicated shortly after they were finished on October 2, 445 B.C. (cf. 6:15; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 195, n. 2).

Gladness can modify either dedication or thanksgivings. Many follow the LXXL in reading with gladness, but others retain the M.T. and render "keep the dedication and the joyous festival" (cf. 8:12; ibid., p. 196). As the versions show, "and" before with thanksgivings in the M.T. should be deleted (ibid.; Gotthard, loc. cit.). Since singing is implied in the thanksgivings, the word shîr means "music," and the names of the instruments refer to it (e.g., "music of cymbals," etc.). It is then unnecessary to insert with before the instruments, as in Ezr 3:10 (ibid.; Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 122). The instruments are mentioned in the service of dedication (cf. I Macc. 4:54; I Chr. 15:16; 16:5; etc.). Cymbals: Cf. Ezr 3:10. The following two instruments usually associated were used at feasts (Isa. 5:12) and religious services (Pss. 33:2; 43:4), always on joyous occasions (Gen. 31:27; Isa. 24:8) and never for mourning (cf. Ps. 137:2; Job 30:31). Both were stringed but little is known of their exact type.

That rendered psalteries (nêbhel) was known to the Greeks as a Phoenician instrument, especially from Sidon (Athenaeus Deipnosophistae IV. 175; cf. Eusebius Preparation for the Gospel I. 10. 27). Although the earlier model had but ten strings (Ps. 33:2), that of Josephus' day had twelve, played with the fingers (Antiquities VII. 12. 3; Ovid The Art of Love III. 327). As such, it was a type of harp. Church Fathers (Augustine, Eusebius, Hilary) indicate that it had a resonant chamber above, covering the ends of the strings, and Jerome, who also mentions the resonance chamber, describes it as having the shape of a delta. Like the portable Assyrian harps of similar type (cf. S. R. Driver, The Books of Joel and Amos [2nd ed.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1915; "Cambridge Bible"], p. 255), the nêbhel could be played while walking (cf. I Sam. 10:5; II Sam. 6:5).

To judge from the greater number of references to it (forty-four times to twenty-seven), the second portable stringed instrument, the instrument of David (I Sam. 16; 23), was more popular than the harp. Used often for secular purposes, it was apparently the favorite instrument of the harlot (I sa. 23:16). The same Church Fathers describe the kinnôr as having a drum-shaped sound chamber below, with its belly turned downward. Such description, together with the constant Greek translation of the Hebrew word as kîthara, suggests that the instrument was a lyre. Like the lyre, its strings were struck with a plectrum (Josephus Antiquities VII. 12. 3). Jewish coins show the kinnôr with three, five, or six strings (cf. Benzinger, Hebräische Archäologie, p. 273, Figs. 128-30), and in the Talmud it is said to have seven strings (Samuel Krauss, Talmudische Archäologie [Leipzig: G. Fock, 1910-1912], III, 85), but Josephus (Marcus, Josephus, V, 528, note c) declares it had ten, a number apparently derived from Pss. 33:2; 144:9, taking nêbhel there in apposition to kinnôr. It is assumed that the musicians were Levites, many of whom dwelt outside the city in Judah and Benjamin (cf. 11:3, 20, 36). In all their places refers to their scattered abodes mentioned in vss. 28-29.
28 And the sons of the singers gathered themselves together, both out of the plain country round about Jerusalem, and from the villages of Netophathites; 29 Also from the house of Gilgal, and out of the fields of Geba and Azmaveth: for the singers had builded them villages round about Jerusalem. 30 And the priests and the Levites purified themselves, and purified the people, and the gates, and the wall. 31 Then I brought up the princes of Judah upon the wall, and appointed two bals, harps, and lyres. 28 And the sons of the singers gathered together from the circuit round Jerusalem and from the villages of the Netophathites; 29 also from Beth-gilgal and from the region of Geba and Azmaveth; for the singers had built for themselves villages round about Jerusalem. 30 And the priests and the Levites purified themselves; and they purified the people and the gates and the wall. 31 Then I brought up the princes of 28-29. In 3:22 the plain country is "the vicinity" of Jerusalem, but since round about here would then be unnecessary, and the place is contrasted with the villages around Jerusalem (vs. 29), the plain country perhaps means "the plains of the Jordan" (Amer. Trans.), as elsewhere (Gen. 13:10-11; 19:17, 25). This is supported if the Beth-gilgal is the Gilgal of Josh. 15:7. Geba (11:31; Ezra 2:26) and Azmaveth (Ezra 2:24) lay north of Jerusalem, while Netophah (Ezra 2:22) was about fifteen miles southwest of the city. By the villages of the Netophathites (I Chr. 9:16) is meant the "daughter" settlements (cf. 11:25) about Netophah.

B. Purification (12:30)

30. An indispensable part of the ritual was the preliminary purification of the structures and of participants in the ceremony. Those who had been occupied with secular affairs were regarded as ritually unclean and unfit to participate in the ceremony. Priests were always purified before ceremonies (cf. Ezra 6:20), and laymen too had to be "pure" before joining in cultic ritual (cf. I Sam. 21:5). The mode of purification may have been fasting (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 199), but it is probable that sacrifice also was involved and perhaps sprinkling with blood (cf. Exod. 12:22; Lev. 14:4-7) or with holy water (Num. 19:9, 17-18, 21). Although the phraseology is the Chronicler's, the verse in substance reflects a probable historical situation and may well have been part of Nehemiah's narrative (cf. ibid., p. 197).

C. Circumambulation (12:31-42)

Part of the ritual of dedication was a procession about the walls of Jerusalem. The formal organization of the parading groups and the dual direction of their movement indicate that the purpose of the procession was not mere inspection or simple progress to a destination, but an actual ritual act, such as is found elsewhere. Thus the site of the cathedral of Armagh was consecrated by a sunwise procession led around it by St. Patrick, and Scattery Island was hallowed by St. Senan through a similar procession; and the Roman Catholic Church still employs circumambulation in the consecration of 31-40. Nehemiah in Action Once More.—Here at long last the modern reader rejoices to find himself, after so much colorless third-person narrative from the later times and different concerns of the Chronicler, once more back in the midst of the vivid firsthand brevities of Nehemiah's own memoirs, perhaps from his notes for the double procession in celebration of the completion of the city walls. He is as careful as the Chronicler himself to be sure that his ecclesiastical officials have the proper priestly antecedents; his notes for the routes are as specific as were those of his first tour of inspection by night around the walls of Jerusalem (cf. 2:12-16) or the report on the assignment of sections of the wall and the gates to various groups for the rebuilding (cf. ch. 3). Nehemiah was a master of organization, whether of a co-operative enterprise or a complicated celebration. Such a ceremony of recognition and dedication should never be regarded as a means whereby the "secular" is made "holy." (Cf. Exeg. on 13:9.) great companies of them that gave thanks, whereof one went on the right hand upon the wall toward the dung gate:

32 And after they went Hoshai'ah, and half of the princes of Judah, 33 And Azariah, Ezra, and Meshullam,
34 Judah, and Benjamin, and Shemaiah, and Jeremiah, Judah upon the wall, and appointed two great companies which gave thanks and went in procession. One went to the right upon the wall to the Dung Gate; 32 and after they went Hoshai'ah and half of the princes of Judah, 33 and Azari'ah, Ezra, MeshuHlam, 34 Judah, Benjamin, She-

Each of the two groups involved moved in a different direction, covering approximately half of the circumference of the wall. The groups appear to have been identical in form, symmetrically arranged. In each a choir (vss. 31, 38a) was followed by a high secular official leading half of the lay leaders (vss. 32, 38b; cf. vs. 40), followed by a group of seven priests (vss. 33-34, 41) and they by eight Levites (vss. 35-36a, 42). The symmetrical structure is disturbed by a later intrusion of Ezra the scribe into the first group (vs. 36).

1. THE ASSEMBLY (12:31a)
31a. The place of assembly was in the southwest corner of the city, near the Valley Gate (cf. 2:13), which is not mentioned in the procession (cf. Bertholet, loc. cit.). That was apparently a center of activity in the time of Nehemiah (cf. 2:11, 13). Because of the preposition used (בַּפֶּה), some suggest that the starting point was higher than the city wall, but it need not mean “above” the wall and can mean upon it (Gen. 1:7: I Sam. 17:39; Jonah 4:6) or even “beside” it (cf. II Chr. 26:19; Rudolph, op. cit., p 196; Brown, Driver, Briggs, Lexicon, p. 799, s.v. בַּפֶּה). The princes were the community leaders (cf. 11:1; Ezra 9:1). Brought up could mean brought to Jerusalem (cf. Ezra 1:3), but since the rulers resided there (11:1) it means brought up to the top of the broad city wall to join the priests and Levites who apparently had purified the structures (vs. 30). The width of the wall is unspecified but adequate for a procession. Even at rustic Gibeath the wall was eight to ten feet thick and fourteen feet at Gezer. An Egyptian wall at Tell el Far‘ah was twenty-two feet thick, and at Jericho houses could be built upon the wall (Josh. 2:15). The procession moved upon the wall.
Nehemiah first divided the group into two equal sections, each of which was to go in an opposite direction until they met in the temple area, in the northeastern part of the city, to conclude the services. For I . . . appointed the LXX has “they appointed,” presuming that the princes, or possibly the “priests,” gave the orders. Companies renders a word elsewhere translated “thanksgiving” (תודְּהָה; cf. vs. 27), but it here means a praise-singing choir (cf. Jer. 30:19), and the Vulg. has “two great choirs.”

2. THE COUNTERCLOCKWISE COMPANY (12:31b-37)
31b. Went in procession interprets a unique and corrupt Hebrew word (חָלְכוֹת). The arbitrary “and they went” of the LXXI., Peshitta, and Vulg. is clearly wrong, for vs. 38 indicates that but one choir is involved. Better than the emendation “the one going” (Smend, Die Listen, p. 11, n. 13) or “and the one choir goes” (Kautsch, Heilige Schrift des A.T., p. 934), is “and the one went” (וַיַּחַלְכֵהוּ), which is easily corrupted to the present M.T. (Kosters, Wiederherstellung Israels, p. 50; Batten, op. cit., p. 281; Rudolph, loc. cit.). The first group moved to the right, following Nehemiah’s former route (cf. 2:13-15).
32-34. After progress to the Dung Gate (vs. 31; cf. 2:13), the procession is interrupted by a list of the members of the first company. After the choir came Hoshai’ah ("The Lord Has Saved"), a leader of half of the laymen, who is otherwise unknown. Since he 35 And certain of the priests' sons with trumpets; namely, Zechariah the son of Jonathan, the son of Shemaiah, the son of Mattaniah, the son of Michaiah, the son of Zaccur, the son of Asaph:

36 And his brethren, Shemaiah, and Azarel, Milalai, Gilalai, Maai, Nethaneel, and Judah, Hanani, with the musical instruments of David the man of God, and Ezra the scribe before them.

holds a prominent position, corresponding to Nehemiah in the other group (vss. 38b, 40), he was doubtless, like the Zedekiah of 10:1, a person of considerable importance.

The names, presumably interpolated by the Chronicler, could refer in vs. 33 to either the princes or the priests. It is probable that, as in vs. 41, the priests followed the laymen, and except for Judah and Benjamin all the names are found elsewhere for priests. It is clear from vs. 41 that there were seven priests in each group. Azariah (cf. Ezra 7:1) is Ezra (cf. 8:9; Ezra 7:1), not the eminent scribe and priest but another of the same name (cf. vss. 1, 13). Meshullam: Cf. Ezra 8:16. Shemaiah: Cf. 10:8. Jeremiah: Cf. vs. 1. Judah and Benjamin, regarded as impossible names for priests, are considered by some as evidence for the worthlessness of the list (Bertholet, loc. cit.). But Benjamin is perhaps a corruption of "Miniamin" (cf. vss. 5, 17), which the LXX has here, a change that could easily occur in the presence of Judah (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 197). Although Judah appears as a Levite (vs. 56), the name is nowhere used of a priest.

35. The priests' sons are not an additional group but some of the priests just named, for son may be used in an occupational sense (cf. 3:31), and it is the priests who use the trumpets in vs. 41. They were not the Levites, for the trumpets were the priests' instruments (cf. Ezra 8:10). The conjunction should be omitted before the priests' sons, as in the Arabic version, and inserted before the name of Zechariah, which introduces the list of Levites, as in the Ethiopic version (Gotthard, Nehemia, p. 46; Rudolph, loc. cit.; Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 54; et al.).

Zechariah (cf. Ezra 8:3), leader of the Levites, is traced to his ancestor Asaph (cf. Ezra 2:41). According to the genealogy, Zechariah lived several generations after the Mattaniah of 11:17 and I Chr. 9:15, which would be possible if 11:17 referred to the first return—the view of the editor of I Chr. 9 but not of the Chronicler (Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 185, 197). But the words son of Micaiah, son of Zaccur may have been an addition to identify Mattaniah with the one in 11:17. For Micaiah the Peshitta and Arabic versions have "Micah" (cf. 11:17; I Chr. 9:15). Some prefer "Zichri" for Zaccur as in I Chr. 9:15 (Guthe and Batten, loc. cit.). For Jonathan the LXXB has "Johanan."

36. Shemaiah: Cf. Ezra 8:13. Azarel (cf. Ezra 10:41) is "Azriel" in the LXX, but "Uziel" in the LXXAB (cf. I Chr. 25:4, 18). Milalai could abbreviate "Millaliam" ("The Lord Has Spoken"), but it is probably a corrupt dittograph of Gilalai and should be omitted, as in the LXX and Arabic versions (cf. Gotthard, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 197). Such omission leaves a company of eight Levites, as in vs. 42. Gilalai, like "Galal" (11:17) may abbreviate a name "Tortoise" (Noth, Personennamen, p. 230 and n. 12). Maai, also found as "Mei," so sharply abbreviates a full name that the original cannot be recovered. Nethanel (cf. Ezra 10:22) is a Levite name in II Chr. 35:9. Hanani (cf. 1:2; Ezra 10:20) is the name of a musician in David's service (I Chr. 25:4, 25).

Musical instruments, "instruments of song," indicate those used in accompanying singing, in contrast to the priests' clarions (vs. 35; Ezra 3:10). They are associated with king David (cf. Amos 6:5), again called the man of God (cf. vs. 24). Ezra the scribe (cf. Ezra 7:6, 11; etc.) intrudes into the narrative, since he and Nehemiah were not contemporary (Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 200; Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 123; Browne, Early Judaism, p. 178; et al.). Inasmuch as the Chronicler knew 37 And at the fountain gate, which was over against them, they went up by the stairs of the city of David, at the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the water gate eastward.

38 And the other company of them that gave thanks went over against them, and I after them, and the half of the people upon the wall, from beyond the tower of the furnaces even unto the broad wall; of no incident in which they were contemporary, the addition, which now destroys the symmetry of the companies, is later than the time of the Chronicler. Before them ambiguously can refer to either the Levites, the priests, the laymen, or the whole company. The editor who made the insertion doubtless meant that Ezra led the whole group, but there is no equivalent leader in the second company.

37. The route of the first company, begun in vs. 51, is now resumed. The verse begins quite abruptly, apparently damaged by the intrusion of vss. 33-36, so that at least a verb to introduce the verse has been lost. Such a loss could easily occur if וַיַּעַל, “and they ascended” (Gotthard, loc. cit.), or וַיַּעֲלָם, “and they passed over” (Rudolph, loc. cit.), had been before וַיַּעַל, at. With a verb the preposition וַיַּעַל could be either “toward” (2:7; 4:6; 6:17) or “unto” (Gen. 49:13; Josh. 2:7; 18:13; etc.), but it is preferable to read, “and they went over to the Fountain Gate” (cf. 2:14; 3:15).

Which was over against them, lit., “and opposite them,” is associated in the M.T. with what precedes, according to the verse accent, and some prefer such a translation even though unable to identify what was opposite (Gotthard, loc. cit.). But it is equally possible to translate straight before them (cf. Josh. 6:5; Amos 4:3; Jer. 31:39) for over against them. Then, disregarding the Hebrew verse accent, the sentence begins, [And] straight before them (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.). Went up might suggest that somewhere the first group descended from the wall, crossed the city of David (cf. 3:15), and did not again ascend until in the vicinity of David’s palace (cf. Siegfried, loc. cit.; Ryle, Ezra and Nehemia, p. 302; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 197, 199). More probably there was no descent but the company on the wall went up with its natural ascent (Batten, op. cit., p. 282).

Fountain Gate: Cf. 2:14; 3:15. The stairs and the city of David: Cf. 3:15. It is argued that the house of David was not the palace of Solomon (2:25) but David’s own palace (II Sam. 5:11) in the city of David. It has been suggested that the old building still survived (Hermann Gute, “Ausgrabungen bei Jerusalem,” Zeitschrift des deutschen Palastina-vereins, V [1882], 332), but, though the actual building may have been destroyed, its site may have been shown in later times (Bertholet, op. cit., p. 88). Ignorance of specific topography prevents a certain translation of the Hebrew preposition rendered above. That interpretation is possible (cf. Exod. 28:27; Jer. 35:4), but the word may also mean “near” the palace (cf. II Chr. 26:19) or “by” the palace (cf. vs. 38). Ascent of the wall may mean “where the wall ascends,” since the ascending wall may have been higher than the palace site (ibid., p. 87), but the word יָסָלַב, at the ascent, may be vocalized as “on the stairs” (cf. Ezra 7:9), possibly referring to the stairway of 3:19. To the east again describes the Water Gate (3:26), apparently differentiating it from another gate to the west.

3. The Clockwise Company (12:38-42)

38. The starting point of the second company (cf. vs. 31) was apparently also in the vicinity of the Valley Gate. The M.T. indicates that they moved “to the fore,” which is rendered over against them and interpreted as “to the opposite side” in the Vulg. (cf. Guteh and Batten, loc. cit.). But מָסַע, “to the fore,” is obviously a scribal error for 39 And from above the gate of Ephraim, and above the old gate, and above the fish gate, and the tower of Hananeel, and the tower of Meah, even unto the sheep gate: and they stood still in the prison gate.

40 So stood the two companies of them that gave thanks in the house of God, and I, and the half of the rulers with me:

Broad Wall, 39 and above the Gate of Ephraim, and by the Old Gate, and by the Fish Gate and the Tower of Hanan'eel and the Tower of the Hundred, to the Sheep Gate; and they came to a halt at the Gate of the Guard. 40 So both companies of those who gave thanks stood in the house of God, and I and half of the officials with me;

In Rosy Retrospect.—Here once again the Chronicler’s familiar editorial hand appears, concentrating on the liturgy and choral assignments for the service of thanksgiving, and eager to impress on his contemporaries his very questionable assumption that the support of the elaborate temple ritual, as it was in his own day, had been continuous ever since the earliest returning groups of exiles under Zerubbabel and Nehemiah. Here within ten verses we can sense the different perspectives and valuations of the ceremonialist who idealized history as he looked back upon it through the eyes of his own special interest; and on the other hand, of the man of action who made history against heavy odds in a day of small things. But both Nehemiah and the Chronicler plainly agreed upon one point, and both contributed greatly to it (vs. 43b).
41 And the priests; Eliakim, Maaseiah, Miniamin, Michaiah, Elioenai, Zechariah, and Hananiah, with trumpets;
42 And Maaseiah, and Shemaiah, and Eleazar, and Uzzi, and Jehohanan, and Malchijah, and Elam, and Ezer. And the singers sang loud, with Zezra their overseer.
43 And they offered great sacrifices that day and rejoiced; for God had made them rejoice with great joy: the women also rejoiced: so that the joy of Jerusalem was heard even afar off.

officials and that the text has been lost with the intrusion of the list of names that follows (Guthe and Batten, op. cit., p. 55; Batten, op. cit., p. 283). The present text has Nehemiah's party as observers (Siegfried, loc. cit.) but nothing is said of Hoshiaiah and the other officials (cf. vs. 32). It is suggested that all of the secular leaders had gathered in the Gate of the Guard (vs. 39) to watch the ceremony (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 198).

41-42. Inserted into the narrative, apparently by the Chronicler, is another list representing the clergy in the second company. The list is intrusive and inappropriate here, after reference to the joining of the two groups, and would fit better after vs. 38a (Batten, loc. cit.). Those listed in vs. 41 are the priests, parallel to those in vs. 35-35a, while those in vs. 42 are the Levites, parallel to those in vs. 35b-36a.

Like the priests’ sons of vs. 35, these priests had trumpets. In the list of Levites in vs. 42 the use of and before each name (KJV) shows that it is of different origin. It is suggested that the names in the list are each representative of a division of Levites rather than of individuals (Bertheau, loc. cit.). Although the office of the men is not indicated, they too, like those in vs. 36, were probably musicians. Maaseiah: Cf. vs. 41. Shemaiah: Cf. 11:15. Eleazar: Cf. Ezra 7:5; 8:33. Uzzi: Cf. 11:22. Jehohanan (cf. Ezra 10:28) is a musician only here. Malchijah: Cf. 8:4; Ezra 10:25. Elam (cf. Ezra 2:7) is otherwise a secular name. Ezer: Cf. 3:19.

Jezrahiah (“The Lord Shines Forth”) was the leader (cf. 11:9) of the Levites, just as Zechariah led in the first company (vs. 35). Since the LXXomits reference to him, the name has been called “a bald interpolation by the Chronicler” (Batten, loc. cit.). Instead of their leader, the M.T. has “the leader.” The mention of music when the two companies met in the temple court has been regarded as authentic but Rudolph (op. cit., p. 199) regards the music of vs. 42 as the Chronicler’s contribution.

D. SACRIFICE AND CELEBRATION (12:43)

43. This verse is the climax of the dedication (vss. 27-42). Although something of this nature must have been included in Nehemiah’s account, the present text is from the Chronicler, whose interests are readily apparent (cf. Ezra 3:13; 6:22, II Chr. 20:27). That day is the day of dedication (cf. vs. 27). The great sacrifices were slaughter offerings followed by an offering meal of celebration, which united the Judean community. Women and children joined in the celebration (cf. 8:2-3). So great is the stress on joy that it is found in five separate references in the Hebrew text. The LXX, Ethiopic, and Peshitta versions have “joy in Jerusalem” instead of joy of Jerusalem. The noise of celebration was heard afar off (cf. Ezra 3:18).
44 ¶ And at that time were some appointed over the chambers for the treasures, for the offerings, for the firstfruits, and for the tithes, to gather into them out of the fields of the cities the portions of the law for the priests and Levites: for Judah rejoiced for the priests and for the Levites that waited.

44 On that day men were appointed over the chambers for the stores, the contributions, the first fruits, and the tithes, to gather into them the portions required by the law for the priests and for the Levites according to the fields of the towns; for Judah rejoiced over the priests and the

XV. The Ideal Community (12:44-13:3)

Form and content both indicate that this section is from someone especially interested in the regulation of the cult, and the prominence of singers and gatekeepers suggests that it was the Chronicler. Here the author portrays an ideal community with respect to the cultus, which might serve as a model for his own day (cf. Kosters, Wiederherstellung Israels, p. 94). Thus the Chronicler asserts that the cultic relationships at the time of Ezra and Nehemiah were exemplary, comparing favorably with those of the days of Hezekiah (II Chr. 51:4 ff.; cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 201). Reference to Zerubbabel (vs. 47) indicates that the author thought the ideal situation for the cult was normal for the postexilic period, even prior to Ezra and Nehemiah.

It is likely that this section was placed here to prepare the reader for the portrayal of faults and negligence in cult matters detailed in ch. 13 (ibid.). The author thereby suggests that the behavior as recorded in ch. 13 was not normal but a temporary lapse from the ideal circumstances portrayed in vs. 44-47. These verses seem to depend upon 13:9, 11, 13 (cf. Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, p. 97, n. 2), but Batten (loc. cit.) suggests relationship with 10:28-39.

44 On that day (cf. vs. 45): The phrase may be indeterminate, meaning simply "afterward" or "later" (P. A. Munch, The Expression Bajjóm Hahú [Oslo: J. Dybwad, 1936], p. 8). Chambers were temple cells (3:30) where the stores were kept (cf. 10:38-39; Ezra 8:29). For the treasures means for the stores (cf. I Chr. 26:20, 26). The offerings, often called "heave offerings," were the contributions of 10:39; Ezra 8:25. First fruits (cf. 10:37) and tithes (10:37-38) were significant parts of clerical support fixed by law (cf. 13:5). Since reference to the law is omitted in the LXX AB and Ethiopic versions, it is proposed to delete it from the text (cf. Gotthard, Nehemia, p. 46). The Vulg., instead of רוחב, law, has the graphically similar רוחב, "thanksgiving," which is accepted by the Amer. Trans., and agrees in substance with the conclusion of the verse.

The word יָשֵׂנָה, according to the fields, appears as יָשֵׂנָה, "for the chiefs," in several Hebrew MSS and the versions—a reading which could be expected after similar references to priests and Levites (cf. 9:38). Such interpretation is preferred by those who believed that "general officers were delegated to make collections for the whole country instead of intrusting the task to the local officials" (Batten, op. cit., p. 284). But such a reading is usually rejected as complete nonsense (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 200). Those favoring according to the fields believe that collections were made in a predetermined geographical sequence (e.g., Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 89; Siegfried, op. cit., p. 125). This view is also highly impractical and unlikely (Batten, loc. cit.). The best solution is suggested by the LXXI, which has out of the fields (Gotthard, loc. cit.). Evidently the original preposition מ, "from," has been displaced by ל, "for" or "according to," which occurs with greater frequency before nouns in this verse.

The fields were the arable lands around the cities. Storehouses were filled because the people were pleased with the clergy. Therefore read rejoiced over the priests rather than rejoiced for the priests. The expression seems to reflect such a construction as "to rejoice over" (cf. I Chr. 29:9). That waited, lit., "those standing," describing the action of the clerics, is usually regarded as an elliptical expression signifying "standing before the Lord" (cf. Deut. 10:8; II Chr. 29:11; Siegfried, loc. cit.; Rudolph, loc. cit.) or "standing before God" (Gotthard, loc. cit.) in priestly service. A similar result is obtained 45 And both the singers and the porters kept the ward of their God, and the ward of the purification, according to the commandment of David, and of Solomon his son.

46 For in the days of David and Asaph of old there were chief of the singers, and songs of praise and thanksgiving unto God.

47 And all Israel in the days of Zerubbabel, and in the days of Nehemiah, gave the portions of the singers and the porters, every day his portion: and they sanctified holy things unto the Levites; and the Levites sanctified them unto the children of Aaron.

by emending the M.T. from הַמַּסֵּרִים, “those standing,” to the graphically very similar הָסְרִים, “those serving” (Ehrlich, Randglossen, VII, 210). Who ministered satisfactorily interprets the meaning.

45. The expression kept the ward or “kept the charge,” lit., “watched the watch,” is generally used of cultic service (cf. Num. 3:10) but almost always of the work of the Levites (Benzinger, Hebräische Archäologie, p. 407, n. 1; Siegfried, loc. cit.); performed the service interprets it properly. In keeping with his interest, the Chronicler mentions especially the service of purification, which was particularly the Levite’s task (cf. I Chr. 23:27 ff.). Since it was a priestly function, the reference to the singers and the gatekeepers is probably a clumsy interpolation by one stressing that what is said of the Levites was valid also for the singers and gatekeepers, who were also Levites. As usual, the Chronicler attributes regulation of the temple service to David (I Chr. 23:1–26:32) and Solomon (II Chr. 8:14). About twenty-six Hebrew MSS and the versions place and before Solomon.

46. Reference to David and the singers in vs. 45 suggests this “historical” note, which concerns the institution of the singers, a special interest of the Chronicler. Of old (כָּפָר), rendered “from the beginning” in the Vulg. and “originally” in the LXX, is a superfluous and awkward intrusion if meant to be parallel to in the days of David, and some would omit the words from the M.T. (Gotthard, loc. cit.). Others regard them as a corruption of the Hebrew text and read instead קָפָר, of old, קָפָר, “were appointed,” rendering, “For in the days of David and Asaph the chiefs of the singers were appointed” (cf. I Chr. 16:7; 25:1 ff.; cf. Bertholet, loc. cit.). While such emendation clears the first part of the verse, its end must be construed in the sense and there were songs of praise and thanksgiving.

Association of David and Asaph has been criticized, and it is proposed to read “Solomon” for Asaph, as in vs. 45. But they are associated also in II Chr. 29:30; 35:15. Since one Hebrew MS, the LXX, Peshitta, Ethiopic, and Arabic versions omit and before Asaph, it probably should be dropped from the M.T. (Gotthard, loc. cit.; Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 55). Rudolph (loc. cit.) emends קָפָר, of old, קָפָר, “their leaders,” and further drastically alters the text to read, “For in the days of David, Asaph was the chief of the singers and their leader in the songs of praise and thanksgiving songs unto God.”

47. Here the Chronicler returns to the delineation of the ideal cult in the time of Nehemiah. By linking Nehemiah with Zerubbabel, as though the latter’s immediate successor, he stresses the continuity of the ideal cultic community throughout the postexilic period. For every day his portion see 11:23. The subject of sanctified or “hallowed” is presumably all Israel (cf. 10:37). The verb means set apart, in the sense of presentation to God at the temple so that thereafter all profane use was forbidden (cf. Lev. 27:9). To illustrate the proper relationship between members of the clergy the
On that day they read in the book of Moses in the audience of the people; and therein was found written, that the Ammonite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of God for ever; author indicates that the Levites gave part of their tithe to the priests (cf. 10:38). Sons of Aaron are priests in contrast to the Levites (cf. 10:38).

2 Because they met not the children of Israel with bread and with water, but hired Balaam against them, that he should curse them: howbeit our God turned the curse into a blessing.

13:1-3. Since 13:4 ff. concerns Nehemiah (see Exeg., ad loc.), vss. 1-3 might be expected to be part of his work, but the lack of reference to him in vss. 1-3, and the fact that the shift from third person to first begins in vs. 4, preclude any connection with Nehemiah's memoirs. These verses have been linked with Ezra's fight against mixed marriages (Ezra 9:1-10:44; Markwart, Fundamente Geschichte, p. 36; Geissler, Literarischen Beziehungen, p. 45), and it has been suggested that the verses belong in Ezra 10, between vs. 9, the assembling at Jerusalem, and vs. 10, the beginning of Ezra's condemnation of the guilty (W. Robertson Smith, The Old Testament in the Jewish Church [2nd ed.; New York: D. Appleton, 1892], p. 427, n. 2). But since the results of Ezra's activity are given in Ezra 9:2, there is no place for vs. 3 in the Ezra narrative (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 202; cf. Mitchell, "Wall of Jerusalem," p. 97). Some see in the passage a somewhat abbreviated account of Deut. 23:3-5 (Batten, op. cit., p. 287; Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien, I, p. 131). But vss. 1-3 are the Chronicler's work, a continuation of 12:44-47 with the same motive, to indicate that cultic laws were rigidly observed in the postexilic period, and that the incidents about to be detailed were unusual, temporary departures from the norm, condemned by the community (Jahn, Ezra [A und B] und Nehemja, p. 167; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

1. On that day is indefinite (12:44). They read supposes an assembly like that in ch. 8, which Rudolph (ibid., pp. 71, 143) insists occurred during the interval between Nehemiah's two administrations. But it is argued that Ezra's assembly must have been later, for the situation of vs. 3 could scarcely have occurred after Ezra's exclusion of foreigners (Batten, op. cit., p. 288). As the work of the Chronicler, however, no historical setting is needed, apart from the Chronicler's assumption that the passage in Deut. 23:3-5 was read at some public assembly. The book of Moses is the Pentateuch (8:1). The citation of Deut. 23:3-5 has the inexactitude of a quotation from memory. The Ammonite (Ezra 9:1) was the people led by Tobiah, Nehemiah's enemy (vss. 4-8; 2:10). The Moabite was the people adjacent to Ammon, to the south. The incident of vs. 2 occurred during the Exodus (Num. 20:14-23:20; cf. Deut. 23:3-5) but in neither Num. 20:14-23:20 nor in Deut. 2:19 ff. is there a reference to Ammonite antagonism to justify linking Ammon with Moab, the real offender, in the condemnation in Deut. 23:3-5 and here. But it is probable that there was an ancient tradition linking Ammon with Moab against Israel during the Exodus (cf. Num. 22:5; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 203, and reference cited there).

2. Balaam was brought from abroad by Moab to curse Israel (Num. 22:5; Deut. 23:4). Since it is less likely that he came from Mesopotamia (Deut. 23:4) than from 13:1-3. Strict Racialism.—It is easier for us to be tolerant of the Chronicler's liturgical mictuleousness than of his rigid racialism, having seen what horrors racial pride and prejudice, whether positively in Nazi Germany or negatively in anti-Semitism throughout the world, can let loose on all mankind. For the Chronicler, the Ammonites and the Moabites of his own day must go on paying forever (vs. 1) for the attitudes of their fathers toward the Hebrews when 3 Now it came to pass, when they had heard the law, that they separated from Israel all the mixed multitude.

4 And before this, Eliashib the priest, having the oversight of the chamber of the house of our God, was allied unto Tobiah:

"the river of the land of the children of Ammon," as the Peshitta, Vulg., and Samaritan versions of Num. 22:5 declare (Gray, Numbers, pp. 315, 325-26), the present antipathy against Ammon is better understood. For the efficacy of a curse (Num. 22:6) see Exeg. on vs. 25; 10:29. Use of the singular verb hired, referring to Balak, instead of "they hired," referring to Moab and Ammon, as in Deut. 23:4 and here in the LXX, Vulg., and Peshitta versions, indicates that the Chronicler had the narrative of Numbers in mind. Our God was the agent who turned the curse and thereby not only negatively averted the catastrophe of an effective malediction but positively turned the curse into a blessing to advance the fortune of Israel.

3. The law reflects Deut. 23:3, which excludes Moabites and Ammonites from "the assembly of the Lord." The abbreviated form here is even stronger, for reference to "the tenth generation" is omitted and the exclusion was extended to all those of foreign descent. The word rendered mixed multitude, "alien mixture" (American Jewish Translation), or those of foreign descent means "mixture" and is well attested as such in Syriac, Targumic Aramaic, and Neo-Hebrew. Its root means "to enter," in the sense of "intrusion," for the noun here used elsewhere indicates "a heterogeneous body attached to a people," used of those associated not only with Israel (Exod. 12:38 [E]) but also with Egyptians (Jer. 25:20) and with Chaldeans (Jer. 50:37; Brown, Driver, Briggs, Lexicon, p. 786, s.v. גָּהַל 1).

The extent of the "separation" from the community is much debated, due to the ambiguous nature of the word "assembly" (qāhāl) in Deut. 23:3, for it can be used in a general sense, even of Gentiles (Ezra 2:64; cf. Gen. 35:11), and of Israel it may be used of the entire community (8:2, 17; Ezra 10:8) or, more narrowly, in the sense of the cultic services of the group (cf. 5:13; II Chr. 20:5; 30:25). Hence some interpret "separation" as banishment from the community (cf. Ezra 10:15-44; Rawlinson, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 154), while others think merely of exclusion from the privileges of the temple and the cult ceremonies.

XVI. NEHEMIAH’S REFORMS (13:4-31)

Some (e.g., Torrey, Ezra Studies, p. 227) consider that the work of Nehemiah was concluded with the completion of the city walls. Whether or not he considered his work finished, Nehemiah had to return to the Persian court at the appointed time (2:6), possibly after some extension of his original leave. After twelve years (445-433 B.C.) as governor of Judea (2:1; 5:14), in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes I (433-432 B.C.), Nehemiah returned to the Persian king. But according to vs. 6, he sought permission to return to Jerusalem and this chapter largely purports to be further episodes in Nehemiah’s activity in Palestine, presumably during a second administration. Some the latter first entered Canaan, without ever being able to discharge the account. It seems not to have occurred to the Chronicler’s racial exclusiveness that the God who, as he himself points out, could and did turn Balaam’s hired curses upon Israel into ultimate blessing, might be concerned to turn Israel’s own unforgiving bitterness toward its neighbors into something a little more neighborly, and more conducive to the peace and prosperity not only of Palestine then, but of the Near East and of the whole world in a later century. But these are perspectives easier for the centuries than for the years and the generations to see, easier for other countries and peoples to understand than for those whose racial memories and emotions are most involved.

4-31. Nehemiah as Reforming Zealot.—It is Nehemiah himself, with the frank forthrightness of his vivid memoirs, who makes it plain content that, like the later visit of Arsames, an official of Egypt, "to the king" (Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, No. 30, ll. 4-5, 30). Nehemiah's trip to Persia was but temporary and routine and that he retained his governorship meanwhile (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 203). Probably, however, he left Jerusalem with finality and was later induced to seek further leave for another visit to Jerusalem when he learned of difficulties there. Vs. 6 presupposes that originally his narrative gave some information detailing what had caused his return to Judea, and it has been suggested that vss. 1-5 reflect the situation that brought him back (cf. Batten, op. cit., pp. 46-47), but this seems unlikely (cf. vss. 1-8).

The date of his arrival in Jerusalem for the second time cannot be determined with certainty. From vss. 4-9 it appears that there was a considerable lapse of time since his leaving and that his return did not accord with any set time but was a surprise to the leaders. After some time, lit., "the end of days," which dates the beginning of the second administration, is ambiguous and indefinite (cf. vs. 6). Rudolph (op. cit., pp. 65-71, 203), who holds that Ezra's activity occurred during the absence of Nehemiah, suggests that since the journey would take about six months (cf. Ezra 8:31 ff.) and the work of Ezra took about a year, Nehemiah's return was ca. 430 b.c. But if Ezra followed Nehemiah and was not active under Artaxerxes II, such computation is impossible.

Torrey argues that there was no return by Nehemiah and that ch. 13 is unhistorical, the Chronicler's fiction. Although he recognizes that vss. 15-27 show less evidence of the Chronicler's style, he contends that the evidence of the Chronicler's authorship of 11:1-13:31 is conclusive. He insists that "there is nothing in the text to justify the assumption that an older narrative was worked over, or that any paragraph or verse came from another source than the [Chronicler's] active brain" (Composition, pp. 44, 48-49). He holds that in 12:27-13:31 Nehemiah "is simply Ezra (i.e., the Chronicler) under another name" (Ezra Studies, p. 248). His extreme conception of ch. 13 has not prevailed among scholars. Although there is general agreement that vss. 1-3 are the Chronicler's work, there is a strong tendency to regard the remainder as basically Nehemiah's document. While the style and linguistic peculiarities of the Chronicler as editor are recognized here and there in the chapter, it is usually concluded that the striking "vividness and concreteness of the narrative" and other characteristics, which are "entirely in the manner of Nehemiah," lead one to believe that "the kernel" of vss. 4-51 is "part of Nehemiah's Memoirs (though retouched by the Chronicler)" (Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 837).

Obviously the Chronicler as editor has given but a small part of Nehemiah's narrative of his second administration. Nothing is said of what induced Nehemiah to return and that which is given is very incomplete.

A. EXPULSION OF TOBIAH (13:4-9)

Despite Torrey's argument (Composition, pp. 44-45, 48-49), the narrative of Nehemiah's expulsion of Tobiah probably derives from Nehemiah's narrative rather than from the hand of the Chronicler, who wrote vss. 1-3. Here the first person pronoun is resumed in the narrative.

As long as Nehemiah was at Jerusalem, his foe Tobiah (2:10) merely corresponded freely with friends within the city (6:17-19), but when Nehemiah left for Persia Tobiah used his influence to obtain quarters within the protection of the temple precincts, where he might stay when in Jerusalem, or at least where he might deposit some property for safekeeping. With the apparently unexpected return of Nehemiah an awkward situation was uncovered, since Ammonites were excluded by law from the Jewish community (cf. vs. 3; Deut. 23:3).

Jesus' cleansing of the temple (Matt. 21:12-13; Mark 11:15-16; Luke 19:45-46; John 2:18-22), sometimes compared with this incident, is but a superficial parallel. A closer one exists in Egypt, in the time of Cambyses, when a protest was made that foreigners had settled in the temple of Neith. At the king's orders the huts of the foreigners were torn down, their goods cast out, and the foreigners were kept out of the temple compound (Brugsch, History of Egypt, II, 304-6; Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire, p. 91; Bertholet, Esra und Nehemia, p. 91).
NEHEMIAH 13:4

4. Before this does not mean “and formerly” (Rudolph, loc. cit.) and is not a reference to the past in general, as in vs. 5 (Batten, op. cit., p. 289), but refers to some specific incident, perhaps to something in Nehemiah’s narrative that has now been lost by the Chronicler’s omission. It could have been some reference to Nehemiah’s trip to Persia and his return (Bertheau, Erw, Nechemia und Estor, p. 346; Siegfried, Esra, Nehemia un Estor, p. 126). But Torrey (Composition, p. 44) insists that the acceptance of this view “is to shut the eyes to what is obvious, and moreover, to get into trouble at once.” He regards the words as the Chronicler’s attempt at making a smooth connection between vss. 1-3 and the narrative which follows (cf. Bertholet, op. cit., p. 90; Rudolph, loc. cit.).

Although Eliashib the priest is usually identified with the high priest (8:1, 20-21; 12:10, 22; cf. Bertheau, loc. cit.; Batten, op. cit., p. 288; Jahn, op. cit., p. 168; et al.), the identification has been denied by some (Levi Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volkes Jisrael [Leipzig: Carl Wilferodt, 1863] I, 146), and others argue that Eliashib had been deposed from the high priesthood, reduced to the status of simple priest (Winckler, Alterorientalische Forschungen, Reihe 2, Bd. II, pp. 235-36), or that he had not yet become high priest (Jahn, loc. cit.). It would be unusual for the high priest to do the limited work of superintending temple cells, a task more appropriate for a minor official. Furthermore, it would be strange for one who favored Nehemiah and helped in his work to turn suddenly to support his foes.

The word indicating that Eliashib was connected with Tobiah means “near of kin” in Ruth 2:20, but is literally just “near to.” It is usually understood to signify close relationship (Brown, Driver, Briggs, op. cit., p. 898, s.v. ביב I, c; Wilhelm Gesenius and F. H. W. Buhl, Hebräisches und aramäisches Handwörterbuch über das Alte Testament [Leipzig: F. C. W. Vogel, 1921], s.v. ביב; Ryle, Ezra and Nehemia, p. 309; Siegfried, loc. cit.; et al.) but the degree of relationship cannot be determined. In 6:18 Tobiah’s relationships by marriage are recalled, but nothing is said of Eliashib, who would certainly have been mentioned if it were possible to connect him with the family of the high priest. Some argue that since Tobiah was related by marriage to Sanballat (13:28), it is not likely that he was also so related to the high priest (cf. Batten, loc. cit.). Connected with is therefore thought to signify merely close friendship, such as can be indicated by the ambiguous was allied unto. However, political marriages with those high in authority were common (cf. vs. 26). Josephus so characterizes the relationship of the relative of the high priest with Sanballat (cf. vs. 28). Such a relationship could have had the intended result of affecting the high priest’s attitude toward Nehemiah.

Was appointed over is, lit., “was given with respect to.” The classical form requires ח, over, instead of the M.T. צ, “with respect to” (cf. Gen. 41:41). Since some priests occupied temple cells (cf. Ezra 10:6), the LXX has here “Eliashib the priest dwelt [οἰκὸν] in the treasury.” Both the LXX and Vulg. render the Hebrew as “the treasury,” but the chamber is familiar from Ezra 8:29; 10:6; etc. Usually the word בושם is revocalized from the chamber to the chambers of (cf. Ewald, History of Israel, V. 160, n. 1).

that strict conformity to the rigid legalism of the religion of the law, as Ezra proclaimed it and as the Chronicler eulogized it, was by no means as complete in reoccupied Jerusalem as the latter’s account implies. And it is a very human man of action who stands forth clearer than ever in this concluding section of his own memoirs. It is evident that he returned to Jerusalem as governor for a second visit, twelve years after his first leave of absence from the Persian court. Apparently he found the economic situation in and around Jerusalem one of scarcity and difficulty, in which the earlier pledges of regular tithes for the support of the costly temple ritual had not all been fully kept up. The Exeg. makes the illuminating suggestion that not only ch. 13 avowedly, but possibly ch. 5 as well, may come from or be based upon Nehemiah’s own written account of this second visit, in a time of economic scarcity leading to ceremonial laxity.

k In any case Nehemiah found certain abuses
5 And he had prepared for him a great chamber, where aforetime they laid the meat offerings, the frankincense, and the vessels, and the tithes of the corn, the new wine, and the oil, which was commanded to be given to the Levites, and the singers, and the porters; and the offerings of the priests.

5. Because of its great concern for cultic matters, this verse is usually regarded as being much edited by the Chronicler (cf. Jahn, loc. cit.). It is loosely joined with vs. 4 by a verb introducing the apodosis to the names standing absolutely there (cf. II Kings 25:22; cf. Kautsch, Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, sec. 111h; Bertholet, op. cit., p. 90; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 204). Since the verb of the M.T. would usually signify "and he made," the Peshitta has "he built a great building for himself there." Some have thought of actual construction, the combining of several cells into a single large room by removing internal walls (Siegfried, loc. cit.; Bertholet, loc. cit.), but more plausible is the translation prepared in the sense of "provided" (Gesenius and Buhl, Handwörterbuch, s.v. נֵבֶע I, 1, e-t; cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.). For the ambiguous M.T. הָּשַׁבָּה the LXXΒκ and Vulg. incorrectly read "for himself," when the proper interpretation is "for him," for Tobiah. It had been hallowed by the storage of ingredients for temple offerings and the contributions for the support of the clergy (II Chr. 31:11 ff.). Since regular arrangements are indicated (cf. 12:47), it is better to read "they were in the habit of putting" for they laid or they had ... put (cf. Siegfried, loc. cit.).

The items mentioned are ingredients rather than the offerings themselves. Meat offerings: Better, cereal offering (cf. 10:33; Ezra 9:4-5). Frankincense was incense made by crushing the resin of plants (Boswellia carteri and Frereana) from Hadramaut and Somaliland (cf. Immanuel Löw, Die Flora der Juden [Leipzig: R. Löwit, 1928], I, 312-14). It was put upon the flour offering (Lev. 2:15), or as part of a mixture (Exod. 30:34-38) was burned on the altar of incense (Exod. 30:1-10) or in censers (Lev. 10:1; Num. 16:17-18). Prophets rejected the use of incense as useless and idolatrous (Jer. 6:20, 48:35; cf. Lev. 10:1; II Chr. 34:25). No altar of incense is mentioned in the oldest account of the temple (I Kings 6:1-8:66) or in Ezekiel. The earliest biblical reference to frankincense is in Jer. 6:20, but it is found regularly in the postexilic cultus.

The vessels were probably not the temple treasures (Ezra 1:7; 8:25-28, 30, 33) but ordinary equipment for the service (Siegfried, op. cit., pp. 126-27)—not only containers but also paraphernalia of all kinds (cf. 10:39; Ezra 1:7, 10-11). For the tithes see Exeg. on 10:37-39. Since commandment (הָּשַׁבָּה) means "legal obligation" only with difficulty, and that concept is usually expressed by mishpāt in Hebrew (cf. Deut. 18:3; Ezra 3:4; 7:10), the Vulg. has instead "portions" (נָהָתי), which is easily obtained from the M.T. with but slight emendation (Batten, op. cit., pp. 288-89; Gotthard, Text des Nehemia, p. 46; Rudolph, loc. cit.; et al.). The words after oil have been regarded as the Chronicler's interpretation (cf. Jahn, loc. cit.; Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien I, p. 150, et al.).

The literal rendering, offering of the priests, is here misleading since that involved was given for the priests. Such offering (טְרוֹמָה; 10:37, 39; 12:44; Ezra 8:25) was not limited to the "tithe of the tithes" of the Levites (10:37 ff.; Bertholet, op. cit., p. 91; Siegfried, op. cit., p. 127) but included the contributions to the priests as well (cf.

I was very angry, and I threw all the household furniture of Tobiah out of the chamber (vs. 8). He was equally strict and firm in enforcing the payment of the tithes that had been promised for the support of the temple services

806
6 But in all this time was not I at Jerusalem: for in the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes king of Babylon came I unto the king, and after certain days obtained I leave of the king:

7 And I came to Jerusalem, and understood of the evil that Eliashib did for Tobiah, in preparing him a chamber in the courts of the house of God.

Ezra 8:25). The material, not mentioned again in vs. 9, is apparently an amplification by a later hand to bring the story up to date (Batten, op. cit., p. 289). Since the editor did not include the singers and gatekeepers among the Levites, Rudolph (op. cit., pp. 204-5) insists that he was not the Chronicler.

6. Interrupting the narrative, this verse is obviously an addition strategically placed after the description of the circumstances and before Nehemiah's reaction to them, to excuse Nehemiah from blame for the situation over which he had no control. He should not be held accountable for the deterioration of the cult during his absence. The excuse parallels that in the Aramaic papyri releasing the absent Arsames from blame for the persecution of the Egyptian Jews (Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, No. 30, II. 4, 30; No. 31, II. 4, 29).

Since Nehemiah usually has simply "the king" (cf. 2:1; 5:14) the king of Babylon (cf. Ezra 6:22) is regarded as evidence of an editorial hand (Mowinckel, Ezra den Skriftlaerde, pp. 59 ff.; Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 559, note b; Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III, 648-69; Sellin, Geschichte, II, 158; Jahn, op. cit., pp. 168-69; Noth, loc. cit.; Batten, loc. cit.). But the title is historically accurate and defensible, for the Persian king was also king of Babylon. Rudolph (op. cit., p. 203), who declares "There is not the least basis for ascribing the exculpatory remark to an editor," assumes here that the name and title were added to Nehemiah's remark by the later editor of the chapter.

For the literal in all this time, render while this was taking place, referring to the events of vss. 4-5. Artaxerxes' thirty-second year (433-432 b.c.) marked the end of Nehemiah's twelve years of administration (5:14). Unless he was still governor after his departure, it is inconsistent to declare that in the same year he was in Jerusalem, finishing his twelfth year (5:14), and in Persia asking permission to return to Jerusalem (vs. 6). His original leave must have been short, much less than twelve years (Jahn, op. cit., p. 169; Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 835; Browne, Early Judaism, p. 157), but perhaps extended as required. Torrey (Composition, p. 45) considers that the date of vs. 6 is derived from 5:14, but others hold the reverse to be true (Jahn, loc. cit.; Pfeiffer, loc. cit.). The thirty-second year is usually regarded as the time of Nehemiah's second visit to Jerusalem but Rudolph computes the date of his return as 430 b.c. (cf. above).

7. Beginning abruptly, without explaining what induced the return or describing incidents involved in that return (cf. 2:1-11), this verse follows naturally from vs. 6 but does not join smoothly to vs. 5, which it partially repeats. Discovered is less accurate than understood or "observed" in rendering the Hebrew bthin, which means not so much "to see" as "to understand fully all the implications of a situation."

The evil, a superfluous addition (Jahn, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 204), was the pollution of the temple cells (vs. 5) by Tobiah, who was forbidden by law to be there because he was an Ammonite (cf. vs. 1). Reference to the house of Tobiah in vs. 8

(vss. 10-14), and in requiring conformity by non-Jews with the strict requirements of the law concerning sabbath observance (vss. 15-22). But his zeal as a crusading reformer is most clearly shown in his own account of his treatment of his fellow Jews who had married foreign wives, and whose children did not always speak the language of the Jews (vs. 24). I con-
8 And it grieved me sore: therefore I cast forth all the household stuff of Tobiah out of the chamber. 9 Then I commanded, and they cleansed the chambers: and thither brought I again the vessels of the house of God, with the meat offering and the frankincense.

leads some to see in preparing (cf. vs. 5) a setting up of an apartment in the temple area where Tobiah could stay when in Jerusalem (Siegfried, loc. cit.; Bertheau, Esra, Nechemia und Ester, p. 348; et al.). But others think only of a place for storage of Tobiah's property. It is unlikely that any building was involved (cf. vs. 5). Chamber is spelled as in 3:80; 12:44 (נשא) rather than as in vss. 4-5; 10:37; Ezra 8:29 (נשא). The temple chambers apparently opened upon one of the broad spaces which surrounded the house of God (cf. 6:10; 8:16; Ezra 1:4).

8. Usually for it grieved me (2:10), here, lit., "it was evil to me," the Hebrew has "it appeared evil in my eyes" (cf. Gen. 21:11-12). While I was very angry is in keeping with Nehemiah's volatile personality (cf. vs. 25), the idea would be expressed otherwise in Hebrew (cf. 5:6). But anger is expressed in the violence of Nehemiah's action, for the verb threw . . . out is also used of slinging stones. Household furniture is, lit., "the utensils of the house." Some insist that general household goods are meant (cf. vs. 7), while others believe that it was just the equipment used in the celebration of the offering meal (Bertholet, loc. cit.; Rudolph, loc. cit.). The latter, however, implies for the Ammonite Tobias a greater participation in the Jewish cultus than seems probable. He may have taken advantage of the holy character of the site to store some of his property in the chamber and thereby gained the added protection that the temple afforded. Jahn (loc. cit.) omits the "house of Tobiah" everywhere as an interpolation, and suggests that it was Eliashib himself who appropriated the chamber and misused it.

9. The word commanded indicates the extent of Nehemiah's authority during his second administration, and the fact that the priests did as ordered, without protest or complaint, indicates their subservience. The Chronicler would scarcely have presented matters thus.

The cleansing was a ritual act to decontaminate the space polluted by Tobiah and to restore it to its holy condition (cf. II Chr. 29:15-16, 18; 34:3, 5, 8). Hebrew practice involved washing and scouring (cf. Lev. 6:27-28); sprinkling blood in a symbolical manner (cf. Ezek. 45:18-19), and sacrificing (Lev. 15:1-33). Purification of a Babylonian temple involved sprinkling with water, beating drums, the use of censer and torch, the smearing of the doors with cedar resin, the slaughtering of a ram, and the recitation of exorcisms (cf. A. Sachs, "Temple Program for the New Year's Festival at Babylon," in J. B. Pritchard, ed., Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1950], p. 333, ll. 335-70; cf. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture III-IV, pp. 747-48). As in Babylonia, where not only the temple but the whole vicinity was contaminated and had to be purified, the chambers nearby also were cleansed (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.). However, because the singular noun is used everywhere else, chambers is incorrectly emended to "the chamber" here, as in the LXXL, Peshitta, and the Arabic versions.

After the purge, the temple implements and stores (cf. vs. 5) were replaced. Cereal tended with them and cursed them and beat some of them and pulled out their hair (vs. 25a).

We recognize at once in such impetuous physical and spiritual violence the sincere but pitiless Puritan reformer in every generation, race, and religion. We can see likewise that these characteristics—what Pfeiffer calls "his rabid intolerance, his despotic methods and overbearing tactlessness" 2—were the defects of Nehemiah's best qualities: his passionate zeal

8 Intro. to O.T., p. 837.
10 ¶ And I perceived that the portions of the Levites had not been given to them: for the Levites and the singers, that did the work, were fled every one to his field.

10 I also found out that the portions of the Levites had not been given to them; so that the Levites and the singers, who did offering and frankincense have been regarded as insertions from vs. 5 (Jahn, loc. cit.), but possibly the lack here of specification of the gifts may be evidence of abbreviation of the account (Rudolph, loc. cit.).

B. RESTORATION OF LEVITICAL SUPPORT (13:10-14)

Tobiah acquired a temple chamber presumably because the storeroom, which customarily held material for the support of the clergy, was either empty or seriously depleted. The incident with Tobiah (vs. 7-9) was thus indirectly responsible for the discovery of two major failures of the cult: failure of the people to pay their tithes and, as a direct result, the desertion of the temple by the Levites. Such problems gave additional challenge to Nehemiah, whose previous administration was concerned largely with secular matters. The centrality of the cultic concern of the chapter has naturally led some to believe that the Chronicler has composed all of it, but the whole tenor suggests the practical interests and the vigorous and efficient methods of Nehemiah as encountered elsewhere in his memoirs. Some touches by the Chronicler, expected in any material dealing with the cult, are clearly observable here (cf. vs. 10, 13).

10. I perceived, representing a different verb (דנ) from that in vs. 7, means to learn by inquiry (cf. Siegfried, loc. cit.). Through investigation Nehemiah found out that the temple stores were exhausted because the portions [for] the Levites had not been given (10:37-39). In the portions (cf. II Chr. 31:4), Torrey (loc. cit.) sees the influence of the Chronicler, since the plural form is found elsewhere in the Bible only in 12:44, 47.

Although priests had other sources of support (Num. 18:8 ff.), the Levites were entirely dependent upon tithes for their living (vs. 12). Like Malachi (3:10), Nehemiah expected the people to bring in their tithes to the temple storehouse. It is presumed that the Levites regularly collected their portions from the time of Zerubbabel (cf. 12:47), but despite the supposed organization for collecting the tithes (cf. 12:44) it is evident that there was considerable laxity during the Persian period in the presentation of gifts to the temple (cf. Mal. 3:8 ff.).

With the cessation of their support, the Levites stopped doing their tasks and fled, leaving the temple "forsaken" (vs. 11). Each to his field indicates a return to the farm areas from which Nehemiah had brought them (12:28-29), where they might till their own fields or hire themselves to others to earn sustenance. Deut. 18:1-2 indicates that Levites could not own property. His field indicates that the Levitical cities of the Priestly Code (Num. 35; Josh. 21) were priestly postulates without historical validity (cf. Jahn, op. cit., pp. 169-70; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 205, n. 2). The Levites are to be understood in the narrowest sense for, except by the Chronicler (cf. I Chr. 23:3-5), the singers and "gatekeepers" are regarded as distinct groups (7:44-45; Ezra 2:41-42). The singers here is a gloss introduced apparently because they are described as living outside the city (cf. 12:28-29). The gatekeepers, usually associated with them, are not mentioned.

and his contagious power to turn high resolutions into action.

What is almost as difficult for Christian eyes and hearts to accept as Nehemiah's "last word" is the prayer three times offered in this chapter (literally the seven final words of the book that bears his name down the generations): Remember me, O my God, for good! (vs. 31b). The merits which, in the quid-pro quo letter and spirit of all legalistic religion, he pleads before the final judgment of God, are not his incalculable services to the city, the nation, and the religion of his passionate loyalty, as one of the great men of action and faith in their long history. Rather he pleads his uncompromising insistence as governor on "the letter of the law." The Christian inevitably reads these vivid memoirs in the revealing light of one of the pro-
11 Then contended I with the rulers, and said, Why is the house of God forsaken? And I gathered them together, and set them in their place.

12 Then brought all Judah the tithe of the corn and the new wine and the oil unto the treasuries.

13 And I made treasurers over the treasuries, Shelemiah the priest, and Zadok the scribe, and of the Levites, Pedaiah: and next to them was Hanan the son of Zaccur, the son of Mattaniah: for they were counted faithful, and their office was to distribute unto their brethren.

11. As usual, Nehemiah complained to the rulers whom he held responsible for negligence in the administration of the law (cf. 5:7). As so often in Ezra-Nehemiah, the temple is called the house of God (cf. 6:10; 8:16; 11:16, 22; 12:40; etc.). Nehemiah’s concern over temple affairs has been regarded as evidence of the Chronicler’s authorship here (cf. vs. 9), but it is as possible to claim that “Nehemiah was the last layman to interfere effectively with the priestly constitution, by virtue of the powers invested in him by the Persian crown” (W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible [New York: Fleming H. Revell, 1932], p. 175). As before (12:27 ff.), Nehemiah gathered ... together the dispersed clergy and re-established them in their stations in the temple, even before there was public support. It was apparently presumed that it was the Levite’s obligation to serve, just as it was the layman’s to contribute (cf. Rudolph, loc. cit.).

12. With the temple again in operation, the laymen resumed paying their tithe (vs. 5) for the support of the clergy. Only vegetable tithe is mentioned (vs. 5) and nothing is said of a tithe of livestock (cf. II Chr. 31:6). The treasuries were the temple cells or storerooms (vs. 5; 10:37-38). Evidence for Nehemiah’s fiscal reforms has been adduced from some Early Iron III seal impressions on jar handles from Judea bearing the Aramaic name “Judah,” written as in Ezra 5:1, 8; 7:14 (Albright, Archaeology of Palestine, pp. 173-74; “Notes on Early Hebrew and Aramaic Epigraphy,” Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society, VI [1926], 93-102).

13. “The style of this verse marks it sufficiently as belonging to [the Chronicler], even without ‘the Levites’ and the usual enumeration of temple officials” (Torrey, Composition, p. 46). Although the Chronicler’s hand is apparent, there is nothing improbable about Nehemiah’s establishment of such an organization. According to the Chronicler, the neglect of the tithe occurred despite the fact that officials had been appointed to superintend the tithe (cf. 12:44). Nehemiah here makes specific appointments for the same task.

I made treasurers, based upon a very doubtful Hebrew word, derives its meaning by assuming that the verb is denominative from the noun “treasure” (cf. König, Historisch-comparative Syntax, sec. 338v; Kautzsch, Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, sec. 53g.n; Bertheau, op. cit., p. 349). Instead of the M.T. הַמְשָׁרָה, rendered I made treasurers, about foundest of the parables of Jesus: the story of the Pharisee and the publican in the temple (Luke 18:9-14). By the light of the teaching and most of all by the life and death and resurrection of Jesus, the N.T. writers had been led to a quite different conception of the status of man in the presence of God. It is put with beautiful simplicity in Tit. 3:4-5: “When the goodness and loving kindness of God our Savior appeared, he saved us, not because of deeds done by us in righteousness, but in virtue of his own mercy.” Before that “everlasting mercy” Nehemiah’s very human limitations as they appear in this chapter and his historic achievements and the rare personal qualities that made them possible, will not escape recognition.
14 Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds that I have done for the house of my God, and for the offices thereof.

15 ¶ In those days saw I in Judah some treading winepresses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses; as also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the sabbath day: and I testified against them in the day wherein they sold victuals.

distribute to their brethren. 14 Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds that I have done for the house of my God and for his service.

15 In those days I saw in Judah men treading wine presses on the sabbath, and bringing in heaps of grain and loading them on asses; and also wine, grapes, figs, and all kinds of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the sabbath day; and I warned them on the day when they twenty Hebrew MSS spell the word as רש, which could be an easy error for הרש, I appointed, especially when it is similar to הרש, treasuries, which follows (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 206). Thus it is preferable to emend the M.T. to read with the LXX and Peshitta versions, I appointed or “I commanded.” The men appointed were not over the rooms but over the distribution of the produce (cf. Acts 6:1-3), the portions of the Levites (cf. vs. 10). Because not all temple employees could be trusted with the gifts to the temple (cf. II Kings 12:4 ff.), faithfulness was a desirable trait in the appointment. By faithful is meant “reliable” or “trustworthy” (cf. 7:2; I Cor. 4:2).

Because the names are not unusual, and paternity is not indicated, it is impossible to identify the appointees with others of the same name elsewhere. Since Zadok is the scribe (cf. Ezra 7:6), he was probably a professional “secretary” (Schaeider, Esra der Schreiber, p. 41; Bertholet, loc. cit.; Siegfried, op. cit., p. 128; et al.), possibly one of a group of Levites (cf. II Chr. 34:13). The Levite Pedaiah can scarcely be identical with Pedaiah in 3:25. Despite his full genealogy, Hanan cannot be identified with certainty. It is conjectured that he was a Levite, a descendant of Mattaniah, leader of the musicians (cf. 11:17, 22; 12:8), and hence represented the singers (Bertheau, op. cit., pp. 349-50). Next to them, lit., “at their hand” (cf. 3:4), which is interpreted by the words as their assistant, is rendered “and with them” by the Peshitta, thus indicating no subordination.

14. Characteristically the narrative is interrupted by a direct appeal to God (cf. 4:4-5; 5:19; 6:14; 13:22, 29, 31). Remember me is written with reference to the divine record book wherein God as a scribe was believed to keep records (Exod. 32:32-33), recording the good deeds of the righteous for credit in the final judgment (cf. Mal. 3:16; Isa. 66:6; Dan. 7:10). Such credits were not final but for just cause could be expunged from the record. The good deeds here are specified as what Nehemiah had done for the house of my God, the re-establishment of the cult through the renewal of support for the Levites. And for his service, lacking in the LXX, has been regarded as the Chronicler’s gloss to the text (Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 293), but both the Vulg. and Peshitta include it. Since the suffix is ambiguous in the M.T., the text can be rendered either and for his service, with reference to God, or “its services” (Amer. Trans.), concerning the temple. Since the noun is plural, the latter is preferable.

C. Sabbath Reforms (13:15-22)

Like Amos (8:5), Jeremiah (17:21-27), and Ezekiel (20:13; 22:8; 23:38), Nehemiah found people impatient with the delay caused by the required sabbath observance (cf. 9:14; 10:1). 15. In those days (cf. 12:44) may signify merely the beginning of a new episode. On a journey or series of journeys during his second administration, Nehemiah noticed farmers working during the sabbath. Since several different crops seem to be involved, Nehemiah’s observations apparently extended over a period of months before he acted. Treading grapes with bare feet, their clothes stained by splashing juice (Isa. 63:2-3), people of all ages shouted and sang (Isa. 16:10; Jer. 48:33; Dalman, Arbeit und Sitte, IV, 811.
16 There dwelt men of Tyre also therein, which brought fish, and all manner of ware, and sold on the sabbath unto the children of Judah, and in Jerusalem. sold food. 16 Men of Tyre also, who lived in the city, brought in fish and all kinds of wares and sold them on the sabbath to the 369-71, Figs. 97-98. Wine presses were rectangular, oval, or circular floors hewn from the rock. Some had a receptacle for clearing and gathering the juice, or a duct that led the juice to a lower basin for clearing before it was put in jars (Jer. 48:11) or skins (Job 32:19; ibid., IV, 356-63, Figs. 95-96, 99-111; J. G. Duncan, Digging Up Biblical History [New York: The Macmillan Co., 1891], II, 54, and plates facing pp. 29, 36). Since grapes for wine were harvested during the seventh month (Tishri=September-October; Jubilees 7:1; Dalman, op. cit., IV, 339-40), and the grain was harvested earlier, during the second or third months (Iyyar or Sivan=April-May or May-June; ibid., III, 1-6), the word rendered sheaves, lit., heaps, must be the product in another form. It is unlikely that it was straw (Ryle, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 314) and quite probable that the heaps of grain were sacked, threshed grain of the harvest (J. G. Wetzstein, "Die syrische Dreschtafel," Zeitschrift für Ethnologie V [1873], 279, n. 2). The loading of the grain on asses has been regarded as supplementary, a description of part of the harvest process, the bringing in of the grain (cf. Deut. 26:2). But it could also describe the bringing of such produce to the market at Jerusalem (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 205).

And also introduces other produce put on asses for marketing. The lack of "and" before grapes has suggested the reading "wine of grapes" (Batten, op. cit., p. 298), but it is probable that during the grape harvest the grapes would be fresh, although some suggest that both the figs and grapes were dried (Siegfried, op. cit., p. 129; cf. Dalman, op. cit., IV, 349-54). Elsewhere, however, another word (simmûqîm) is used for grapes dried as raisins (I Sam. 25:18).

I warned, lit., "I bore witness," is the verb used of the prophets in 9:26. The necessary object, now lacking in the M.T. but supplied as them or against them, is apparently concealed in the corrupt text rendered in the day (דוהי). One Hebrew MS and the Peshitta, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions have against them, which was probably original (Gotthard, Text des Nehemia, p. 46; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 206). Instead of the M.T., "their selling" (when they sold), the LXXABBR has the noun "their sale" (Siegfried, loc. cit.), and some, following the LXXL and other Greek and Ethiopic MSS, emend to "when they were selling" (יוֹסֵמֶר; Bertholet, op. cit., p. 92; Jahn, Ezra [A und B] und Nehemja, p. 171; Batten, loc. cit.). But since the Peshitta has "that they should not sell," it seems preferable to emend the M.T. by prefixing the preposition min of negative consequence (cf. Ezra 2:62; Kautzsch, Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, sec. 119x, y), which could easily be omitted by a scribe, to read "that they should not sell" (יוֹסֵמֶר; Ehrlich, Randglossen, p. 211 under vs. 16; Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 55; Rudolph, loc. cit.). No word corresponding to food or victuals is found in the M.T. or the LXX, Vulg., or Ethiopic versions and it should be omitted (Jahn, loc. cit.; Gotthard, loc. cit.; Siegfried, loc. cit.; et al.). The original text thus must have been, "I bore witness against them that they should not sell." In this context "bear witness" signifies "warn."

16. Because the men of Tyre (cf. Ezra 8:7) are lacking in the LXXBA, Peshitta, and Arabic versions, and are not mentioned again in the narrative, some would omit them here (Gotthard, loc. cit.; Siegfried, loc. cit.; Batten, op. cit., p. 295). Hölscher emends הָלְלוּיָם, "the Tyrians," to הָלְלוּיָם, "the fishermen" (Ezra und Nehemja, p. 560; Winckler, Alltiorientalische Forschungen, Reihe 2, Bd. III, pp. 486-87), but it is unlikely that fishermen lived so far inland, and the word as emended cannot mean "fish merchants" (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 207). The people of Judah, if genuine, indicates foreigners, and there is no good reason for rejecting Tyrians here, for they were the outstanding tradesmen of the ancient world (Ezek. 27) and these may have been agents of the great mercantile houses of Phoenicia (ibid.). They were doubtless but visitors to Jerusalem, for the 17 Then I contended with the nobles of Judah, and said unto them, What evil thing is this that ye do, and profane the sabbath day?

18 Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city? yet ye bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the sabbath.

19 And it came to pass, that when the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark before the sabbath, I commanded that the gates should be shut, and charged that they should not be opened till after the sabbath: and some of my servants set I at the gates, that there should no burden be brought in on the sabbath day.

people of Judah, and in Jerusalem. 17 Then I remonstrated with the nobles of Judah and said to them, “What is this evil thing which you are doing, profaning the sabbath day? 18 Did not your fathers act in this way, and did not our God bring all this evil on us and on this city? Yet you bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the sabbath.”

19 When it began to be dark at the gates of Jerusalem before the sabbath, I commanded that the doors should be shut and gave orders that they should not be opened until after the sabbath. And I set some of my servants over the gates, that no burden might be brought in on the sabbath day.

verb 227, lived, can also mean merely “to abide,” apparently for the duration of the market period (Bertheau, op. cit., p. 351).

17. As usual (cf. vs. 11; 5:7), Nehemiah first protested to the secular officials. The LXXBA indicates that the original reading was “the sons of Judah.” The nobles (cf. 11:1) may have been a later addition (Jahn, loc. cit.; Batten, op. cit., pp. 296, 298-99). For contended cf. vs. 11. The sabbath infractions were regarded as an evil thing (cf. Josh. 22:15). Profaning the sabbath day, a late expression with priestly overtones, is found elsewhere only in Exod. 31:14 (P); Isa. 56:2; 6; and in Ezekiel.

18. Batten (ibid., p. 296) claims that this verse “is couched in the hackneyed terms of which [Nehemiah] is free,” and that in many ways it suggests Ezra 9:14; 10:10, 14. He therefore regards it as the work of the Chronicler, a “conventional prophetic utterance” replacing Nehemiah’s own originally more forceful utterance. Rudolph (loc. cit.), however, insists that it is Nehemiah’s own, attesting his excellent knowledge of the prophets (Jer. 17:19-27; Ezek. 20:12 ff.; cf. Bertheau, loc. cit.).

All this evil comprehensively includes the sufferings of the Jews in the recent generations, including the destruction of Jerusalem, the Exile, and the trials of the postexilic period of reconstruction. The evil was brought by God when his people deserved it (cf. 9:26-27; Ezra 5:12; 9:13), and, as in Jer. 17:21 ff., the fathers of the earlier generations were held responsible for the disaster and distress. Thus implies that it was just such profanation of the sabbath as Nehemiah condemned that brought on the destruction and Exile. Jahn (op. cit., p. 172) holds that the Chronicler believed national misfortune was due to sabbath infractions. Historically, however, it was general disobedience and unfaithfulness that were stressed in the pre-exilic period as being responsible for the disasters. And upon this city is a clumsy, superfluous addition (Jahn, loc. cit.; Rudolph, loc. cit.). You bring more wrath is, lit., “you causing to add wrath” (cf. Ezra 10:10).

19. When the gates were completed, Nehemiah ordered them closed at night (7:3), but with peace came laxity and the heavy doors were not shut. Now Nehemiah asserts his political authority to close the gates during the sabbath. When it began to be dark presumes the development of a Hebrew verb from a root related to the Arabic “be black,” which resulted in the noun “shadow.” But the versions make no reference to darkness or evening. The Vulg. has “when the gates . . . were at rest,” and the LXXL could mean the same (cf. ibid.). It is suggested that the M.T. טל is corrupted from an original טל, “they ceased” (Jahn, loc. cit.), but it is preferable to see here the Babylonian שלד, in the sense of “to rest,” “be idle,” “be not in use” (Bezold, Babylonisch-Assyrisches Glossar, p. 237, col. 1). A parallel Babylonian text has “Idle lies [ṣa-lil] the ferry; idle is the quay; all the sailors are idle” (K. L. Tallqvist, Die assyrische Besch-
20 So the merchants and sellers of all kinds of ware lodged without Jerusalem once or twice.

21 Then I testified against them, and said unto them, Why lodge ye about the wall? if ye do so again, I will lay hands on you. From that time forth came they no more on the sabbath.

22 And I commanded the Levites, that they should cleanse themselves, and that they should come and keep the gates, to wörungs serie Maqlá [London: Harrison & Sons, 1894], pp. 92-93, ll. 8-9). Gates here refers to the centers of social and business activity adjacent to the gates. At sundown on Friday evening the usual bustling activity ceased and the gates were to be closed. I commanded indicates the governor's authority (cf. vs. 9; Ezra 2:63). Since another word (תַּחַל) is used, meaning "door leaves," it is better to render doors rather than gates. Till after the sabbath means until after sundown on Saturday. Nehemiah posted some of his private servants (cf. 4:16, 23; 6:10, 16) to see that his orders were obeyed. This was temporary police duty until a permanent service was established (cf. Torrey, Composition, pp. 46-47). Since none could enter closed gates, such posting of guards has been regarded as a superfluous precaution (Winckler, op. cit., Reh 2, Bd. III, p. 487), but the guards were doubtless intended to guarantee that no one reopened the gates or smuggled in merchandise during the sabbath (Keil, Chronik, Esra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 595; Bertheau, op. cit., pp. 351-52; Rudolph, loc. cit.; Batten, op. cit., p. 297).

20-21. Instead of returning home, those who brought produce to Jerusalem on the sabbath and found the gates closed settled down outside the walls to wait out the sabbath. Lodged need not mean "spent the night" but can be simply "encamped" (ibid., p. 299). As a result, the market was moved outside the walls and merchants waited for buyers who would smuggle their goods into the city (Brown, Early Judaism, p. 158). The camping did not violate the law, but the spirit of the law was violated by an impatient wishing for the sabbath to pass quickly. This irritated Nehemiah as it had angered Amos (8:5-6). The LXX, which interprets with "and they all lodged and engaged in business outside of Jerusalem," gives a clue to the more severe measures of Nehemiah, after the merchants had acted thus once or twice, a matter of several weeks.

Warned them: Cf. vs. 15. If you do so again (cf. I Kings 18:34) is, lit., "if you repeat" (Amer. Trans.). The expression "stretch forth the hand" is elsewhere used of giving charity (cf. Prov. 31:20), but the Hebrew text, "against you," indicates violence (cf. vs. 25). The interpretation "I shall arrest you" (Amer. Trans.) is less likely than I will lay hands on you (cf. vs. 25), for instead of the M.T., "a hand," the LXX, Ethiopic, and Arabic versions have "my hand."

22a. The verse is widely recognized as an addition by the Chronicler who did not want the Levites ignored (Jahn, loc. cit.; Batten, op. cit., pp. 297-98). But it is unlikely that the Chronicler would assign to secular tasks the Levites who otherwise work only in the temple (cf. Rudolph, op. cit., p. 208).

According to 7:1-2, the Levites were put in charge of the city gates as they already were of the temple gates. It is possible that Nehemiah's servants functioned beside the Levites or other gatekeepers who were not trusted to follow Nehemiah's orders. It is probable, however, that the Levites ultimately released the "servants" for their normal duties by returning to posts that they had abandoned (cf. vs. 10). The functions of the Levites at the gates cannot be determined exactly. Some regard them as supplementing the regular gatekeepers (Keil, op. cit., p. 596). Responsible for this view is the former translation, "that they should come in to the watches," which has been considered both linguistically impossible and factually improbable (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 207). The verb sanctify the sabbath day. Remember me, O my God, concerning this also, and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy.

23 ¶ In those days also saw I Jews that had married wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab:

24 And their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language, but according to the language of each people.

"guarding" (ovenant, enservation, etc.) is parallel to come (lit., "coming," ovenant) and the text can be interpreted, "that they should come and take their places as watchers" (ibid., p. 206). The Levites, as replacements for the "servants," perform divine service in the city gates in the protection of the sabbath (Rawlinson, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 153; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 208).

A religious aspect is definitely found in connection with the Levites' work at the gates, for they are expected to purify themselves. Such a demand for lustration has been regarded as surprising. It is held that only those Levites are involved who were secular gatekeepers on Friday, and had therefore to be purified before joining in the cultic ceremonies of the sabbath, or that the Levites visited the gates to proclaim to the regular gatekeepers the arrival of the sabbath, possibly to pronounce a formula or perform a cultic rite in the gate to usher in the sabbath. It seems probable, however, that even guarding the gates of the holy city during the sabbath was divine service enough to require proper purification before it was undertaken (Rudolph, loc. cit.).

22b. The pericope closes with the usual plea for remembrance (cf. vs. 14). Spare me suggests a similar use of the verb in Joel 2:17 (cf. Akkadian ḫāṣū). Salvation here depends not on Nehemiah's deeds (cf. vs. 14) but on God's, on his steadfast love.

D. Mixed Marriage Reforms (13:23-29)

23. In those days may be a general reference of time (cf. vs. 15), but the words have been linked with the foregoing as a secondary result of Nehemiah's tours of observation in Judea (cf. Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 131). The Jews are specifically those who married foreign women. Had married is, lit., "had made to dwell" (cf. Ezra 10:2). The mixed couples seem to have been found principally on the margins of Judea in the vicinity of the people mentioned. Ashdod: Cf. 4:7. Ammon (cf. vs. 1; 2:10; Ezra 9:1) and Moab (cf. vs. 1; Ezra 9:1) have been regarded as additions to the text by the writer of vss. 1-3, possibly on the basis of Deut. 23:3-5 (Batten, op. cit., p. 299; Browne, op. cit., p. 159; Hōlscher, Esra und Nehemia, p. 561; et al.), but each people (vs. 24), if genuine, indicates that more than Ashdod (cf. 4:7) is involved (Rudolph, loc. cit.). Curiously, the Samaritans (cf. vs. 28) are not mentioned here.

24. Reference to the linguistic ability of the children indicates that the mixed marriages were not a recent threat but a problem of long standing. Those who place Ezra before Nehemiah must admit either that the children were born before Ezra's reforms or that Ezra's work failed and that the couples again came together, ignoring the popular acceptance of the law banning such marriages (ibid.). Half of the children used a foreign tongue and did not understand Jewish speech. On the basis of the Arabic version some assume that half refers to a mixed language, a patois or gibberish, half Jewish and half foreign (Rawlinson, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 144; Rudolph, op. cit., pp. 208-9, n. 1), but this view, denied by the reference to inability to use Jewish speech, is now usually repudiated. Since no trace of the language of Ashdod of that time survives, its exact nature cannot be determined. Some insist that the ancient Philistine language was still spoken (H. H. Schaeder, Iranische Beiträge I [Halle: M. Niemeyer, 1930], p. 29; G. R. Driver, "The Modern Study of the Hebrew Language," in A. S. Peake, ed., The 25 And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, nor for yourselves.

People and the Book [Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1925], p. 74). Because Ashdod and its environs had long been an Assyrian province (cf. 4:7), some would emend the M.T. תָּשַׁדְוִדֶה, “Ashdodite,” to the graphically similar תָּשָׁדְוִיד, “Assyrian” (Winckler, op. cit., Reihe 2, Bd. III, p. 488; Jahn, loc. cit.). Since the Ashdodites accepted the Semitic god Dagon (cf. Judg. 16:23) and other Semitic elements, some regard it likely that by the time of Nehemiah the tongue of Ashdod may have been Semitic, either a corrupt form of Hebrew (Bertheau, op. cit., p. 354; Siegfried, loc. cit.; Kautzsch, Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, sec. 2a) or, more probably, Nabataean, the Aramaic-Arabic dialect that prevailed in southern Palestine at that time (cf. 2:19; cf. A. Neubauer, “On Some Newly-Discovered Temanite and Nabataean Inscriptions,” Studia Biblica [Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1885], p. 280; Otto Eissfeldt, Philister und Phönizier [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1936; “Der Alte Orient”], pp. 33, 96-37; Batten, op. cit., pp. 299-300).

Not all children spoke “Ashdodite,” for they would likely use their mothers’ speech and therefore the language of each people. Often the words according to the language of each people have been regarded as a clumsy addition intended to define what precedes. But Ehrlich (Randglossen, p. 212) emends the M.T. to “the language of their people,” and regards it as epexegetical to “Jewish.” The word rendered the language of Judah or the Jews’ language is, lit., “Jewish,” an expression found in the Bible elsewhere only in II Kings 18:26, 28; Isa. 36:11, 13; II Chr. 32:18. It is used here of the language in which the Hebrew portions of Ezra, Nehemiah, Malachi, and some other postexilic Hebrew works were written (cf. Batten, loc. cit.; Bertheau, op. cit., p. 355). Josephus extended the term to include “Aramaic,” which was also widely used by the Jews in postexilic times (Kautzsch, Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, sec. 2c; cf. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II, 165, n. 5).

25. There is considerable contrast between Ezra’s reaction and that of Nehemiah to the same problem of mixed marriages. Ezra turned his disappointment and fury upon himself (Ezra 9:3), while Nehemiah reacted violently against the offenders (cf. Batten, op. cit., p. 46). Contended with: Cf. vss. 11, 17. Since the Hebrew verb rendered cursed means “to be slight” or “to be trifling,” and its Akkadian equivalent means “to despise” or “to dishonor,” it seems best to translate, “I treated them with contempt” or “I vilified them.”

Those who consider violence unworthy of Nehemiah object to the statement that he beat some offenders, claiming either that he only permitted others to do so (Rawlinson, Ezra and Nehemiah, p. 153, n. 2) or that the words are a later addition by a fanatical Jew (Jahn, op. cit., p. 173), much as the Peshitta expanded it to “I killed some of them and buried them.” The Peshitta, מָשְׂרָכָה, “I buried,” is due to a transposition of letters of מָשְׂרָךְ, which is, I ... pulled out their hair. Ezra pulled out his own hair (Ezra 9:3). Usually the beard was plucked (Isa. 50:6), for loss of the beard was a disgrace (cf. II Sam. 10:4). To claim that all hair was pulled out (Batten, op. cit., p. 300) is extreme, for it is unlikely that Ezra was made bald (Ezra 9:3) and in Arabic and Neo-Hebrew the verb means simply “to pluck hair.”

Since the first person is not used in vs. 25b, and vss. 26-29 seem to some not to be an oath, it is proposed to read, “I adjured them” rather than made them swear (cf. Bertheau, loc. cit.; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 208). It is possible, however, that the trace of such an oath is to be found in 10:28 ff. Although it is specified that Hebrew daughters are not to be given to foreign men (cf. Deut. 7:3), Nehemiah actually found the reverse. Or for 26 Did not Solomon king of Israel sin by these things? yet among many nations was there no king like him, who was beloved of his God, and God made him king over all Israel: nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin.

27 Shall we then hearken unto you to do all this great evil, to transgress against our God in marrying strange wives?

28 And one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib the high priest, was son-in-law to Sanballat the Horonite: therefore I chased him from me.

yourselves has been called a scribal addition because the words, not in the LXX, destroy the parallelism (Jahn, loc. cit., p. 173). But since Nehemiah dealt with actual offenders, that statement has also been called “the most appropriate part of the oath” (Batten, op. cit., p. 301).

26. It is argued that even Solomon could not contract foreign marriages without sinning. These things are the multiple foreign marriages, presumably largely diplomatic, political marriages, and their consequences (cf. I Kings 11:1-8). No king like him: Cf. I Kings 3:12. Beloved by his God was suggested by II Sam. 12:24b-25, for Jedidiah is “Beloved of the Lord.” Cause to sin is rendered in the LXX by “turned aside,” under the influence of I Kings 11:3-4.

Although Nehemiah may have regarded Solomon as a “horrible example” (Bertholet, Ezra und Nehemlia, p. 93; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 209), vs. 26-27 lack the directness of his approach, and the references to the fathers and their sins suggest that the verses may be a homily or midrash by the Chronicler indicating that he shared the Deuteronomic view that censured Solomon (cf. I Kings 1:9-13). But in reproducing the passages in Kings the Chronicler is silent regarding the foreign marriages (I Kings 3:1; 11:1-8), and it is strange that he should expound the subject here.

27. The first verb may be rendered either as a rhetorical question, Shall we then listen to you? as in Ezra 9:14, with a negative answer expected, or “Shall we obey?” The LXX, introducing the expected negative, has “so we will not listen to you,” which Batten prefers, with “listen to” understood as “tolerate.” The Vulg. and Arabic, also introducing a negative, have “shall we also be disobedient?”

The passage is connected with vs. 26, for a contrast is drawn between mighty, God-favored Solomon, who nevertheless could not escape sinning, and Nehemiah’s weak contemporaries, who believed that they could contract such foreign unions with impunity. The passage has been translated, “Is it then heard concerning you that you yourselves do exactly the same great evil?” (Rudolph, op. cit., p. 208.) Great, absent in the LXX, has been omitted by Jahn as an “unnecessary heightening” of the idea. Transgress: Cf. 1:8; Ezra 9:2; 10:2, 10. The nature of the evil is reflected in the rendering “to break faith” (Amer. Trans.), which follows the Peshitta, and in the LXX, “to break covenant” (Ezra 9:2). By marrying is a gloss inserted in imitation of Ezra 10:2, 10.

28. Only one important case of mixed marriage is detailed by Nehemiah, apparently because it involved a relative of his enemy Sanballat (cf. 2:10; 4:1, 3; 6:1) and a member of a high priestly family. The culprit was one of the sons of Jehoiada (cf. 12:10-11, 22; II Kings 1:4; etc.) who was a son of Eliashib (3:1). Since high priest could indicate either person, it cannot be determined whether Eliashib was still alive and functioning (Bertholet, op. cit., p. 356) or merely part of the genealogy. The offender could not be Jonathan, the successor of Jehoiada. Josephus, who apparently records the same marriage (Antiquities XI. 7. 2), gives the identity as Manasseh the brother of Jaddua, the successor of Jonathan (cf. 12:11), and he calls Sanballat’s daughter “Nikaso,” which may be a Hellenized form of a Semitic name, possibly the Aramaic “Nikesa” (“Sacrifice” [?]; Marcus, op. cit., VI, 461, note e). He declares that Sanballat arranged the match for political reasons. But Josephus dates the event about a century later than the time of Nehemiah, in the reign of Darius III (335-330 B.C.) and Alexander the Great (ca. 332 B.C.). Aside from the faulty chronology there is nothing implausible in his narrative.

Confronted by such similar narratives with such a wide chronological divergence, scholars differ greatly in their interpretation of the relationships between them. Some hold that they are separate, unrelated incidents with but fortuitous similarities (H. Petermann, “Samaria,” in J. J. Herzog, ed., Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1860], XIII, 366-67; Spak, Der Bericht des Josephus über Alexander den Grossen). Yet it is rightly objected that “the view that there were two Sanballats, each governor of Samaria and each with a daughter who married a brother of a High Priest at Jerusalem, is a solution too desperate to be entertained” (Cowley, Aramaic Papyri, p. 110). Others favor the biblical narrative, and regard that in Josephus as an unhistorical midrash on Nehemiah (J. A. Montgomery, The Samaritans, the Earliest Jewish Sect [Philadelphia: J. C. Winston Co., 1907], pp. 67-68, n. 47; Browne, op. cit., pp. 206-7). Still others prefer Josephus’ account and regard the narrative in Nehemiah as the work of the Chronicler writing in the Hellenistic period. Torrey (Ezra Studies, p. 235, n. 35; p. 249, n. 52; p. 531; Composition, p. 48) argues that Nehemiah’s narrative is dependent upon that of Josephus, showing how the Chronicler believed that Nehemiah would have dealt with such a case as that of Manasseh. He insists that if the Chronicler’s narrative were earlier, Josephus would not have omitted reference to Nehemiah or the name of the high priest (Ezra Studies, pp. 330-31).

Many accept Josephus’ data but reject his chronology, regarding him as being “absolutely irresponsible in Persian history and chronology” (Montgomery, Samaritans, p. 68, cf. C. C. Torrey, “Medes and Persians,” Journal of the American Oriental Society, LXVI [1946], 1-15; Munk, Ezra ha sofer, pp. 67 ff.). It is claimed that late Jewish writers frequently permitted the period of Alexander to follow that of Nehemiah (cf. Karl Budde, Der Kanon des Alten Testaments [Giessen: J. Ricker, 1900], pp. 22-23, 32; Markwart, Fundamente Geschichte, p. 67; Siegfried, Ezra, Nehemia und Esther, p. 192), and it is suggested that Josephus too telescopes Jewish history. His claim that Sanballat was sent to Samaria by Darius (Antiquities XI. 7. 2) might be correct if Darius II was meant, but he confuses him with Darius III (338-331 B.C.), possibly because of the reference to Alexander the Great, and calls him “Darius, the last king,” thus putting events nearly one hundred years too late (Cowley, loc. cit.). He may also have confused the quite similar names of the high priests Jehoiada and “Jaddua” (Herzfeld, Geschichte des volkes Jisrael, I, 146).

Discrepancies in the narratives of Nehemiah and Josephus are best explained as the preserving of two versions of the same incident. Adolf Buchler (“La relation de Josphe concernant Alexandre le Grand,” Revue des Études Juives, XXXVI [1898], 1-26; cf. also Montgomery, Samaritans, pp. 68-69) considers the Manasses-Sanballat story in Josephus to be of Samaritan origin. The Jaddua-Alexander portion of Josephus’ narrative he regards as of Jewish origin.

Instead of the Horonite (cf. 2:10), Josephus calls Sanballat a “Cuthean” (cf. II Kings 17:24, 30), a person of the ancient city of Kutu, about twenty miles northeast of Babylon. By I chased him is meant banishment from Jerusalem (cf. Ezra 7:26). From me, lit., “from upon me,” indicates that Nehemiah was no longer responsible for the banished offender.

The Bible tells nothing more about the banished priest, but Josephus (Antiquities XI. 8. 2) understood the incident as the occasion for the final break with the Samaritans and the establishment of the Samaritan cult. He records that Manasseh refused to divorce his Samaritan wife and appealed to Sanballat, who made him the Samaritan high priest at Mount Gerizim, where the Samaritan temple was erected. Then to Manasseh’s side came many Jewish priests and laymen who also refused to divorce their foreign wives.
29 Remember them, O my God, because they have defiled the priesthood, and the covenant of the priesthood, and of the Levites.

30 Thus cleansed I them from all strangers, and appointed the wards of the priests and the Levites, every one in his business;

31 And for the wood offering, at times appointed, and for the firstfruits. Remember me, O my God, for good.

29. Again Nehemiah asks God to remember (cf. vss. 14, 22; 1:8) but instead of a pious plea the request is an imprecation, as in 6:14. Them seems to refer to priests, but since only one offender is mentioned, the plural suffix is thought to refer to the priests as a group (Bertheau, loc. cit.). Others see in it a reference to the schismatic Samaritan cult which, according to Josephus, included many other Jewish priests (Siegfried, loc. cit.). But the Bible does not mention that group.

Defiled (cf. Ezra 2:62) follows the Vulg. in verbalizing the plural noun “defilings” of the M.T. The Peshitta and the LXX have a singular noun. The LXX has “concerning rights of inheritance of the priesthood.” Because the Hebrew root (יָרֵד) can either mean “defile” (Isa. 59:3; Zeph. 3:1) or describe a close kinsman (גּוּר: cf. Lev. 25:25; Ruth 2:20), it is thought that the text means “they have sought kinship with the priesthood,” a charge leveled against the house of Sanballat (Batten, op. cit., p. 302; cf. Jahn, Ezra [4 und B] und Nehemja, p. 176). The covenant was apparently that in Mal. 2:4-9 (cf. Deut. 53:9), a covenant with all Levites, including the priests. It is thus a Deuteronomistic rather than priestly concept of the priesthood, for the latter considers the priests as “sons of Zadok” (Ezek. 44:15) or “sons of Aaron” (Lev. 8:1-36; 21:1). One Hebrew MS, the LXXI, Peshitta, Ethiopic, and Arabic versions indicate that the M.T. should be emended from the priesthood to “the priests.”

E. Recapitulation (13:30-31)

It is suggested that Nehemiah’s narrative closed with a series of short declarations, referring to the preceding detailed accounts (Bertheau, op. cit., p. 357). Thus vs. 30 may summarize the incidents of the chapter (with vs. 30a cf. vss. 23-29 and possibly vss. 4-9; with vs. 30b cf. vss. 10-13; Rudolph, op. cit., p. 210). But since Nehemiah always concludes a section with a plea (vs. 29), vs. 30a cannot continue vss. 23-28 and, without connection, it must be a gloss to vss. 25-28 (Hölscher, Ezra und Nehemia, p. 561, note c; Rudolph, loc. cit.; Batten, loc. cit.; Jahn, loc. cit.). Torrey (Composition, p. 48) sees the Chronicler’s hand in almost every word in the verse, and its priestly content is more in the interest of the Chronicler than of Nehemiah. Cleansed: Cf. 12:30; Ezra 6:20. Them possibly refers to the entire restored community (Bertheau, loc. cit.), but in the light of the foregoing narrative, it could mean the priests and Levites (Van Hoonacker, “Néhémie et Esdras,” p. 346; Bertholet, Ezra und Nehemia, pp. 93-94). For all strangers, which follows the Vulg. and Peshitta, the M.T. has everything foreign, which is supported by the LXX.

Establishment of the duties of the clergy in part reflects the restoration of the Levites (vss. 10-13). Instead of in his work, which follows the Vulg. and Peshitta, some prefer the LXXBL, “according to his work” (Guthe and Batten, Ezra and Nehemia, p. 55; Bertholet, loc. cit.; Jahn, loc. cit.).

31. First fruits has no counterpart in ch. 13, but arrangements for their collection are presumed to be Nehemiah’s work (10:35-38), as was the wood offering (10:34). Torrey (loc. cit.) remarks that the “noticeable expression” at appointed times is found elsewhere only in 10:14; Ezra 10:14, which he regards as the Chronicler’s work. The conclusion of the book, the characteristic plea for remembrance (cf. vss. 14, 22; 5:19) here suggests 5:19 with its abrupt concluding words for good (cf. Ezra 8:22).
The Book of

ESTHER

Introduction and Exegesis by Bernhard W. Anderson

Exposition by Arthur C. Lichtenberger
ESTHER

INTRODUCTION

I. The Story
II. Additions
III. Unity
IV. Purpose
V. The Festival of Purim
VI. Historicity
VII. Date
A. External Evidence
B. Internal Evidence

VIII. Authorship
IX. Sociological Significance
X. Religious Significance
XI. Literary Value
XII. Outline of Contents
XIII Selected Bibliography

Esther is unique among the books of the Old Testament. Not only is it set apart by being the only book which may be called a festal writing in the strict sense, but it contains no explicit religious or ethical teachings. In fact, superficially it seems to be indifferent to the theology and institutions of Judaism. And yet it is an extremely important book for understanding the ethos of Judaism. Last of the five festal scrolls (Megilloth) of the Hebrew Bible in point of arrangement and sequence of reading in the synagogue, it is actually first in the hearts of the Jewish people, among whom it is known universally as the Scroll (Megillah).

I. The Story

Purporting to be a chapter from the history of the Dispersion, the story of Esther relates intrigues of Persian court life at Susa which had far-reaching repercussions throughout the empire of Xerxes. On the deposition of Queen Vashti, Esther—not known to be a Jewess and kin of Mordecai—was chosen from all of the beautiful maidens of the empire to become the new queen. In her favored position she used her charms upon the king—though not without personal risk—to frustrate the plot of the grand vizier Haman, who out of hatred for Mordecai had determined to exterminate all Jews of the empire on a single day, the thirteenth of Adar. On account of her intervention, as well as of a series of singular coincidences, the king ordered the execution of Haman on the very gallows prepared for Mordecai, and elevated the Jew to the rank of grand vizier. In this capacity Mordecai sent out a new royal edict which counteracted Haman’s previous though irrevocable decree, and allowed the Jews to slaughter their enemies on the very day Haman had determined by “lot” for their destruction. The day after the carnage (fourteenth of Adar) the Jews of the provinces celebrated triumphantly. The Susa Jews, however, did not celebrate until the next day (fifteenth of Adar), since Esther had asked for an additional day of slaughtering in the capital. To commemorate Jewish deliverance, the feast of Purim (“lots”) was instituted as an annual two-day festival on the authority of letters sent out by Mordecai and Esther.

II. Additions

The Septuagint contains several major additions and various minor deviations from the Hebrew version of the story, making the standard Greek text slightly over one hundred verses longer than the Hebrew text. Moreover, even when the Septuagint parallels the Masoretic Text closely, there seems to be a striking literary independence even to the modification of important details of the plot. These facts raise the question as to whether the Hebrew story is an abbreviated version of an original story preserved more accurately in the Greek, or whether the standard Septuagint is a free translation or paraphrase of the story now found in the Hebrew Bible. The latter view seems to represent the prevailing opinion of scholars. According to this view, the deviations and additions of the Septuagint were made in the interests of rectifying the religious shortcomings of the story and enlivening the terse original with rhetorical language and fanciful embellishment. The fact that most of these additions were found in the Septuagint at an early period—perhaps in the late second century B.C. when the Septuagint "letter of Purim" allegedly was brought into Egypt, and certainly in the first century A.D. when it was followed largely by Josephus — indicates the great popularity which the expanded story enjoyed at an early date. Similar extravagant embellishments are found in the Talmud, the First and Second Targums (Aramaic paraphrases), and the numerous Midrashim (homiletical stories) based on Esther.

The major Septuagint additions are now included in the Apocrypha, although confusingly severed from their proper contexts by the influence of the Vulgate. In making his Latin translation, Jerome faithfully reproduced the Hebrew, but not wishing to ignore the Septuagint, he appended the additions with explanatory notes to indicate their proper place in the narrative. These chapters (10:4-16:24 Vulg.) were declared canonical by several church councils, from that of Carthage (397) to that of Trent (1546). Luther, however, transferred these seven chapters from the canonical books to the Apocrypha, where they now appear as "The Additions to the Book of Esther."

III. Unity

Most scholars agree that the Hebrew text is singularly well preserved, with the exception of a few corrupt or difficult passages (see Exeg. on 1:22; 2:19; 7:4). In regard to the integrity of the book, however, there is no such consensus. Since 1783, when J. D. Michaelis called attention to peculiarities of the passage 9:20-10:5, many critics have pronounced this concluding section spurious, either wholly or in part. The arguments adduced are twofold: (a) linguistic and stylistic differences which allegedly are peculiar to this section; and (b) inconsistencies and contradictions — specifically (i) the distinction between country and city Jews is ignored (9:19), with the result that both days of Purim are made binding on all Jews, and (ii) the details of the recapitulation in 9:24-25 are said to be out of harmony with the earlier narrative. The presence of the passage is variously explained: either it was drawn from an earlier Purim source and put at the conclusion of the book by the author of Esther, or it was added subsequently by a later editor who sought to justify the different Purim custom of his day.

Although this theory seemingly has won the favor of a majority of scholars, the arguments which sustain it are indecisive. A careful literary analysis will reveal that the author's characteristic style is found throughout the book, so-called differences in the latter section resulting naturally from a change of subject matter. The second argument, concerning the dates of the observance of Purim, rests on a misunderstanding of the real purpose of the book of Esther and the relation between the situation in 9:19 and the festal arrangement of 9:20-32 (see below). On closer consideration other alleged inconsistencies disappear, as will be shown in the Exegesis.

Admittedly, the emphasis upon Purim is confined to 9:20-32; yet it is anticipated by the earlier incident of casting a pūr or "lot" (3:7). But even the latter passage has been attacked on the grounds that it awkwardly severs the context and gives a secondary etymology of Purim which Josephus supposedly did not find in the Greek version of the story. However, not only is the etymology probably correct (see below), but the incident of casting lots is so organically related to the narrative as a whole that it cannot be removed without the most drastic textual surgery. It is introduced at the natural point in the development of the plot, and no more awkwardly than the episode described in 2:19-23, which is likewise indispensable in the plot.

Clearly 3:7 demands the retention of the concluding section, where the feast is named explicitly for the first time and regulated in accordance with the events of the story. Thus the structure of the book, in which the end is anticipated at the beginning, reveals its unity. The Septuagint, which contains practically all of 9:20-10:3, gives some support to this conclusion.

IV. Purpose

The governing purpose of the book is to explain and justify the celebration of a festival for which there is no basis in the Law, by appealing to "history" to furnish the reason for its origin and institution. Esther is a festal legend which attempts both to explain the origin of Purim and to authorize its continued celebration. Even those who regard the concluding section as a later addition usually agree on this point.

If the book is a unity the purpose was not merely to justify but also to regulate the annual observance of Purim. Outside the book the earliest reference to Purim apparently is found in II Macc. 15:36, where the day after "Nicanor's Day" (thirteenth of Adar) is called the "Day of Mordecai" (fourteenth of Adar). If this refers to Purim, it seems to indicate that one day only was observed among the Jews to whom II Maccabees was addressed. Likewise, in Esther there is a parenthetical passage (9:19) which implies that at the time of the author.

8 See the colophon at end of LXX.
8 Antiquities XI. 6.
Purim was observed only on the fourteenth of Adar by rural Jews. The author's purpose was to reconcile divergent customs in the celebration of the festival and to legalize "these two days" (9:27) on the Jewish calendar. Accordingly, he provided an explanation of the origin of the custom of keeping two different days—an explanation which gave equal prestige to both the provincial date and the Susa date; and further, he recorded how, after the first spontaneous and unordered celebration on the two different dates, letters were sent out by Mordecai and Esther on the basis of which the Jews "confirmed" and "accepted as a tradition" the unification of Jewish custom throughout the empire.

Eventually this calendar regulation came to be more than a paper law. According to the witness of Josephus (ca. a.d. 90), both days of Purim were observed by Jews. By the time of the Mishnah (ca. a.d. 200) the two days were definitely legalized in the Jewish calendar, although Talmudic scholars engaged in lengthy discussions as to the precise difference between a walled city and an unwalled village (cf. 9:19). This tradition has been preserved throughout the centuries. Today the celebration of Purim is largely if not exclusively confined to the fourteenth of Adar (February-March) among the great majority of Jews. However, in Jerusalem, which is clearly a walled city, both days of Purim are observed, and in eastern Europe even "Shushan Purim" is something of a holiday, especially for the children. Despite this variation in custom, both days are regarded, at least in a traditional sense, as official dates in the Jewish calendar.

V. The Festival of Purim

Little if anything can be said confidently about the ultimate origin and character of Purim. Scholars have variously attempted to explain it as a Babylonian New Year feast or a Persian celebration in honor of the dead, which was appropriated by the Jews of the Dispersion just as ancient Canaanite agricultural festivals were adopted by the Hebrews and nationalized. The shortcoming of these theories is indicated by the theory of R. H. Pfeiffer, who maintains that the author invented both the festival and its name. The success of this "brilliant hoax," says R. H. Pfeiffer, was due to the fact that the publication of Esther was carefully timed to express and reinforce the patriotic emotions of the Maccabean period. It remains probable that the feast of Purim ultimately was of non-Jewish origin. The very fact that the author felt it necessary in 8:7 and 9:24 to explain the word purû'um ("lot") by what he considered its Hebrew equivalent suggests that the word, and therefore the festival it describes, are of foreign origin. This is confirmed by cuneiform evidence. W. F. Albright states that beginning as early as the nineteenth century B.C. the word purû'um (later pûru) appears in Assyrian texts of different periods in the sense of "lot," "die," followed by a verb meaning "to throw," "to cause to fall."

It seems likely, then, that Jews of the Dispersion came to observe a non-Jewish festival, just as many modern Jews have observed Christmas as a secular holiday. However, in the Jewish tradition the festival was nationalized by being made a memorial of deliverance from enemies and a channel through which Jewish patriotic fervor could be expressed. Eventually Purim was popularized in Palestine, although certain passages in the Talmud (Megillah 7a; Y. Megillah 1) suggest that at first Palestinian Jews were opposed to observing it.

From the first the Jewish festival was convivial and "secular" in character. As described in 9:19, 22, the feast was and still is a time of feasting and drinking. Besides the giving of dainties to one another and charity to the poor, other customs were added in the course of time, such as the reading of the scroll of Esther in the synagogue, the fast of the thirteenth of Adar, masquerading, hanging Haman in effigy, noisemaking with rattlers, Purim plays, and so forth. Purim has never been known as a religious holy day. Indeed, its popularity may be accounted for in part by the fact that it is the only worldly holiday in the Jewish calendar for the expression of the lighthearted side of life.

VI. Historicity

Superficially, the book of Esther appears to be sober history. As though it were a continuation of the historical books, it begins with the conventional formula "and it came to pass" (v1), and ends, after the manner of the books of Kings and Chronicles, by appealing to a source in which the reader may verify the facts (10:2).

The impression of historicity is strengthened further by a profusion of precise dates and Persian names, and many accurate allusions to Persian customs and court life. Because of these pretensions to veracity, as well as the great popularity of Purim, Jewish authorities hastily declared the book canonical. Since then its historicity has been accepted by all ancient and many modern Jews and Christians.

Several difficulties arise if the book is regarded as a literal chapter of Jewish history during the reign of Xerxes I (485-465 B.C.). According to the Greek historian Herodotus, who lived in the period mentioned in the book of Esther, Xerxes' queen was neither Vashti nor Esther, but a Persian general's daughter named Amestris. It phonetically is impossible to identify this name with that of Esther despite the apparent similarity. Moreover, as yet we have no extrabiblical evidence of a general Jewish persecution during Xerxes' reign. Strangely, there is not a single explicit reference to the most memorable event in Xerxes' reign—his unsuccessful invasion of Greece, which according to the chronology of Esther would have taken place in approximately the four-year interval between the deposition of Vashti and the coronation of Esther. The book, however, implies that the king spent this time in Susa seeking a queen!

Some scholars have attempted to overcome these difficulties by arguing, on the basis of the Septuagint, that the events took place during the reign of Artaxerxes II (404-358 B.C.), whose queen's name, Stateira, is alleged to be roughly the same as Hebrew Vashti. According to this view, the book describes a threatened persecution of Jews which was occasioned by their traitorous opposition to the imperial cult of the goddess Anahita. Their deliverance from danger, it is claimed, was the occasion for the institution of Purim—a memorial to the triumph of Jewish monotheism. Aside from the questionable accuracy of the Septuagint reading, "Artaxerxes," this theory obviously labors under the further difficulty that the book nowhere intimates that the proposed Jewish massacre was to be a religious persecution.

At the other extreme, many scholars have explained the story as a faded myth which was attached to the festival of Purim or its prototype. In its pure form the myth supposedly described the rivalry between the chief gods of Elam and Babylon, the triumph of the latter signaling the political ascendancy of Babylonia over its hostile neighbor. The name Mordecai is said to be derived from Marduk, the chief god of the Babylonian pantheon. Esther allegedly is the equivalent of Ishtar, the chief Babylonian goddess who likewise carried the title "bride" (cf. 2:7, "Hadassah"). As in the parallel case of Mordecai and Esther, Marduk and Ishtar were cousins in Babylonian mythology. Arrayed against these deities were the gods of Elam, the capital of which, Susa, is the scene of the story. Haman is identified with Humman, the chief Elamite god; and Vashti suggests the name of an Elamite goddess. According to this view, Jews of the Dispersion became familiar with the festival celebrating the triumph of the Babylonian pantheon, and in the course of time emptied the mythology of its pagan, polytheistic content.

Other scholars, denying both the historical and mythological interpretation, maintain that the book is fiction, pure and simple. That a wealthy and impressionable king should depose his Persian wife and choose an unknown Jewess out of a bevy of beautiful maidens, that he should first issue a decree for a Jewish massacre on a day fixed eleven months away and subsequently issue a contradictory edict allowing Jews to butcher his own subjects at will, that the cunning of a woman should bring about the downfall of an Amalekite grand vizier and the elevation of a Jew to a position next in rank to the king—these features, it is argued, are designed to tickle Jewish fancy, but hardly to accord with the facts of real life. Like Judith, which likewise gives an air of historicity with its profusion of dates and names, Esther is said to belong in a class of pseudohistorical romances, of which there are many examples in the literature of late Judaism.

All these views must be evaluated in the light of the revolutionary announcement of an undated cuneiform text in which there is reference to a certain Mordecai (Mardukā), who was a high official at the court of Susa during the reign of Xerxes I, and even before the third year of his reign (cf. 11:9 LXX), probably under Darius I. Ungnad asserts that this text from Barsippa is our first and only extrabiblical reference to the Mordecai of the Esther story. If this is true, the discovery definitely administers a coup de grâce to any mythological interpretation of the book. Plainly the author intends the names Mordecai and Esther (even if they are theophoroi) to refer to human, not divine, beings; and his story concerns the historical vicissitudes of a people, not an Olympic battle of the gods.

11 A. Ungnad, "Keliinschriftliche Beiträge zum Buch Ezra und Esther," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, LVIII (1940-41), 240-44, also in the same journal, LIX (1942-43), 219.
ESTHER

The question remains, however, as to whether Esther is pure fiction or whether it contains some historical elements. Patently the book is filled with chronological inaccuracies, exaggerations, strange coincidences, inconsistencies, and other fanciful details which make the story "too good to be true." Moreover, the portrait of the weak, sensual, and capricious king is a traditional distortion of the Xerxes known to modern historians. Thus Hoschander's treatment of the book as an accurate historical account, even to the smallest detail, is obviously far-fetched, for this scholar ignores the literary features which make the story artificial at so many points. However, Ungnad's observations serve timely warning against any dogmatic judgment that the book is only "a tissue of improbabilities and impossibilities." Though embellished with the author's imagination and literary genius, the story may well preserve genuine reminiscences of Xerxes' court, and may rest upon the historical fact of a deliverance from persecution experienced by Jews of the Dispersion. In this case, Esther should be classed as a "historical novel," a novel—like those of Scott—in which a nucleus of historical truth has been embellished imaginatively. Historians and archaeologists have already confirmed the fact that the author possessed an amazingly accurate knowledge of Persian palaces and manners. Further light on this dark period of Jewish history may reveal that the author's claim for the historicity of his story is not totally erroneous.

VII. Date

The question of date must be considered in terms of two types of evidence.

A. External Evidence.—Not a single pre-Christian writer refers specifically to Esther, and it is not quoted once in the New Testament. The first evidence for the existence of the book is the Septuagint version. Josephus quotes freely from the Septuagint Esther, and implicitly includes Esther among twenty-two books long held sacred. Clearly the Septuagint Esther is pre-Christian, but the exact date of this translation (second century B.C.) is a moot question. More decisive, perhaps, is the negative witness of the Wisdom of Ben Sirach (ca. 180 B.C.), which many scholars use to establish the earliest possible date of the Hebrew story. Ben Sirach's failure to mention Mordecai or Esther in his "Hymn of the Fathers" (Ecclus. 44-49) seems to imply that the book was not in existence, or at least not yet known in Palestine in the early second century B.C. However, an argument from silence is notably precarious, especially in view of the fact that the great name of Ezra is also lacking in Ben Sirach's list.

B. Internal Evidence.—There is not a single statement in the book which gives unambiguous witness as to date. The glorious reign of Xerxes is spoken of in the past tense in such a way as to suggest the lapse of a long period of time (1:1, 13-14, 4:11; 8:8; 10.2). That the author lived considerably later than the time of which he wrote is indicated by his vague knowledge of the chronology of the Persian period (see Exeg. on 2:6). Moreover, the description of the Jews as a people "scattered abroad and dispersed" (3:8) indicates that the Dispersion is a long-accomplished fact. This evidence suggests that the book—on the most conservative view—was written sometime late in the Persian period (538-335 B.C.). Whether this date is pushed down farther into the Hellenistic period, early or Maccabean, depends upon other considerations with respect to content. The spirit of the book points to a time when intense bitterness and hatred for Gentiles were engendered by an aggressive threat to Jewish life and culture.

These considerations have produced two schools of thought. A great many scholars, following the lead of Spinoza, believe that the historical background of the book is the intense patriotism of the Maccabean revolution which had been precipitated by Antiochus Epiphanes' attempt to superimpose Hellenistic culture upon Palestine (168-165 B.C.). Haman may be none other than Antiochus IV in disguise, whose policy it was, like Haman's (cf. 8:9), to eliminate all unassimilable elements in his domain (I Macc. 1:41-50). Haman's edict of destruction (3:12-15) may be a veiled allusion to Antiochus' determination to exterminate the Jews and repopulate their land with Hellenists (I Macc. 3:34-36). Moreover, the description of the Jews in 3:8 suggests the Dispersion of the Greek period (cf. Matt. 23:15), and the references to mass conversions to Judaism (8:17; 9:27) call to mind the coercive proselytizing of the Greek period when the Jews reversed Antiochus' policy of removing the marks of circumcision. Accordingly, many scholars date the book sometime after the deliverance from Antiochus' persecutions under the leadership of Judas Maccabaeus (165 B.C.)—more precisely ca. 125 B.C., i.e., during the decadent era of John Hyrcanus, when the religious passion of the first stirrings decades of the revolution had weakened into a more worldly attitude.

13 For a persuasive presentation of this position see Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., pp. 740-42.

13 Op. cit
15 Against Apion I. 8.
Tempting as this hypothesis is, there are certain facts which make it impossible to exclude dogmatically the possibility of an earlier date. In the story the Jews fight not for their religion (as in Daniel) but for their lives; in no passage is Jerusalem or any of Palestine alluded to even implicitly: and the narrative indicates that Jewish hope lies not in patriotic exclusivism, but in winning the foreign administration to favor the Jews. These facts resist any easy dating in the Maccabean period. Thus a number of important scholars (e.g., Streane, Gunkel, Eissfeldt) argue plausibly that the book was written at the very last of the Persian period (fourth century B.C.) and that it reflects the historical situation of the Jewish dispersion. Evidence for this is found in the Persian loan words scattered throughout the book, and the author's uncanny knowledge of Persian royal palaces and customs. Ben Sirach's apparent ignorance of Esther is accounted for by the supposition that both the book and the festival of Purim originated in the eastern Dispersion, and did not become familiar to Palestinian Jews until the Maccabean period, when they were adopted as appropriate vehicles for the expression of an awakened patriotism.

Until we know more about Jewish history in the eastern Dispersion from the fourth to the second centuries B.C., this question must remain unsettled.

VIII. Authorship

On account of a misunderstanding of 9:20, 32, a number of ancient and modern commentators have supposed that Mordecai was the author of Esther. Actually the author is completely unknown. If a Maccabean dating is followed, he may have been a Palestinian Jew who resided in or near Jerusalem and who acquired his acquaintance with Persian customs and architecture through archaeological learning or extensive traveling in the East. On the basis of a Persian dating he was probably a Persian Jew who lived in Susa or thereabouts shortly before the final overthrow of the empire.

IX. Sociological Significance

"Typical in many regards of the perennial fate of the Jews, and recalled even more vividly by their daily experience than by the annual reading of the Megillah at Purim," 17 the book of Esther is the symbol of a sanguinary history of persecution. Haman is the prototype of a succession of leaders who have sought to blot out the memory of the Jew from the earth, and his edict of destruction, counteracted in the story but too often a dreadful fact in real life, has found expression in repeated pogroms of which the so-called civilized twentieth century displays the most horrible examples.

The issues dramatized in Esther are of pressing relevance today. Being an expression of the life of the Jewish people, the book provides the basis for a realistic discussion of anti-Semitism. Haman's accusation was made on the basis of the unassimilable characteristics of the Jews (3:8)—rooted no doubt in their religion and maintained by a tenacious devotion to the ties of blood and kin. To be sure, Esther and Mordecai rose to power through the violation of the Jewish prohibition against marriage with uncircumcised Gentiles, a thing which troubled the Septuagint and later Jewish commentators. This, however, is merely a necessity of the plot, and must not be construed as advocating cultural assimilation.\18 The author intends to show that their action, though governed by expediency, was taken in the interests of preserving the cultural and racial integrity of the widely dispersed Jewish people (cf. 10:3). It is this characteristic devotion to blood and culture which so often has led to the accusation that the Jews are in some sense "a nation within a nation." One of the most significant features of modern Jewish life is the repudiation, even on the part of liberal Jews, of a policy of total assimilation, and the appearance of a heightened group consciousness. As in Esther, so also in the case of contemporary Jews, this ethnocentricism (symbolized by "Zionism") is rooted in their cultural-religious background and is reinforced by the hostility of which they have been the unfortunate victims.

The book provides at least one explanation of the existence of anti-Semitism. Contrary to the Septuagint, the Hebrew text does not suggest that there had been a long-standing hatred between Jew and Gentile, "hostile always and now" (13:7 LXX). Haman's speech in ch. 3 gives no inkling of a general hostility to the Jews. Rather, at the beginning of the book the Jews have only one "hater" in Haman, who, because of enmity to a single Jew, whips up anti-Semitism by calling attention to peculiar customs and appealing to popular desire for plunder. In ch. 9, however, the situation is different: there is a universal Jewish hatred, and the Jews, fully prepared and poised for attack, are ready to take vengeance on their "enemies" (cf. 8:15). Thus the book seems to claim that anti-Semitism did not arise out of a perennial conflict between Jew and Gentile (cf. Mordecai's dream in LXX), but was created by 18 Contrary to A. E. Morris, "The Purpose of the Book of Esther," Expository Times, XLII (1930-31), 124-28, who believes that the author's purpose was to break down Jewish exclusiveness by advocating a policy of compromise and intermarriage.

Haman’s measures so effectively that it could not be quenched even though Haman was executed and was succeeded by a pro-Jewish administration. Admittedly anti-Semitism is occasioned by the fact of unassimilable differences, but invariably it has been awakened by those who would exploit those differences in the interests of their ambitions for power, or by those who fashion a Jewish stereotype (cf. Shylock, Fagin) out of their antipathy for a single obnoxious Jew.

Also, the book describes in most realistic terms the natural reaction to unjust oppression. It is futile to try to justify the story of Esther by arguing that the original prototype contained no vindictive elements (so Torrey), for the Hebrew book of Esther is a fact. Equally futile is the attempt to tone down the element of revenge by making Jewish action purely defensive (see Exeg. on 8:13). Even if the book were only fiction, as many scholars contend, the situation would not be altered substantially, for Christian ethics makes no fine distinction between the imagination of the heart and the overt act of vindictive slaughter. The book is “down to earth,” in that it vividly describes the natural vindictiveness generated under persecution (cf. also III Maccabees). The story can be matched with many tales inspired by the hatred which seethed under Nazi oppression.

The rabbis hesitated to admit to the canon a book which might be interpreted as showing contempt for Gentiles. However, the popularity of Esther increased in proportion to the persecution suffered, until in the course of time it became, as it still is, the book most beloved and well known by the Jews. Its immense popularity invited many extravagant embellishments of the story (see the fanciful additions in the two Targums), and much artistic skill was devoted to the production of beautifully adorned texts and cases. As the story was read in the synagogue at the close of the thirteenth of Adar, it became customary for the congregation to participate in the dramatic events by repeating after the reader the passages describing the victory of Jews over their enemies, while at the mention of Haman’s name, the people—particularly children—hissed, shook their fists, stamped, and went through various actions indicating that Haman’s name should be blotted out. These and other evidences of the popular prestige of the book of Esther must be evaluated in the light of the history of a persecuted people for whom the annual dramatization of Haman’s downfall has been a refuge and a hope.

X. Religious Significance

Because only a minimum recognition is given to religion (4:16), and the name of God is not mentioned once explicitly, Esther is an anomaly among the books of the Old Testament. This fact, together with its vindictive spirit and the institution of a festival for which there is no provision in the Law, made it one of the several books whose canonization was opposed by leading rabbis. Even after it was admitted to the Jewish canon (probably at the Council of Jamnia, A.D. 90), the discussion about its inspiration seems to have continued (cf. Talmud, Megillah 7a). In Christian circles, likewise, there was a period of uncertainty as to its canonical status, although its recognition as a part of the Christian Bible was finally secured in A.D. 397 by the action of the Council of Carthage.

The reason for the author’s apparent indifference to Judaism, which clearly is not accidental but deliberate, is a debatable matter. Some scholars argue that the author, coarse and worldly in spirit, had a rather cynical attitude toward religion when it claimed to be anything more than conventional forms. Trusting primarily in political intrigue and the power of the sword rather than in divine intervention, he deliberately went out of his way to avoid any religious reference, and even treated the sacred institutions and prohibitions of the Law with bold sarcasm. The author, says Pfeiffer, “appears to have made no demands on God and to have expected that God would make none of him.”

However, to say that God and Judaism have no place in the book is an extreme judgment. Since the book is a festal legend for Purim, it does not articulate one man’s faith but professes to express the mentality of the whole Jewish people. And the Jewish people, even at the height of their worldly power in the Maccabean period, were always a profoundly religious people. In view of this fact it is strange that the author deliberately goes out of his way to avoid the mention of prayer or God even when the context demands it, as, for instance, in 4:14 where “place” is commonly regarded as a substitute for “God.” He seems almost to be afraid of using even the formal and conventional religious terminology. The reason is probably to be found in the heathen origin and “secular” character of the Purim festival at which Esther was read. From the earliest days Purim was a time of noisy merrymaking, even to the point of the excess recommended in the Talmud, “Drink wine until you are no longer able to distinguish between ‘Blessed be Mordecai’ and ‘Cursed be Haman’” (Megillah 7b). Says an old proverb, “On Purim anything is allowed,” even to the transgression of priestly law. It seems plausible that because of the danger of blasphemy in connection with a festival

10 Intro. to O.T., p. 748.
when considerable license was allowed, the author deliberately avoided religious references which in any way would lead to the profaning of the sanctities of Judaism. If this is true, he was actually governed not by a sarcastic religious indifference but by profound reverence.

In any case, the Jews have always found in the story the expression of real religious sentiment. Every development of the plot, though seemingly the result of pure coincidence, has been regarded as the expression of divine guidance and deliverance. as the Septuagint and the Targums interpret. To the Jew the book teaches the indestructibility of Israel, "the eternal miracle of Jewish survival." In spirit it is not alien to the interpretation of the "election of Israel," which found expression extravagantly in the late patriotic and apocalyptic writings of Judaism. Indeed, the Septuagint interpretation of Mordecai's dream (10:4-13) brings out the religious conviction on which the book rests: two lots were cast, one for the chosen nation, the other for the wicked nations who sought to destroy it; but God intervened to save his inheritance, "the nation of the upright." So the story is implicitly religious to the Jew, even though it is couched in nonreligious language and deals with natural rather than supernatural circumstances. As S. Goldman states, it proclaims the faith of the psalmist, "Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep" (Ps. 121:4).

Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that as we pass to Esther from other books of the Old Testament, "we fall as if from heaven to earth," as Heinrich Ewald once put it. Amos and Hosea do not speak here, for there is no note of divine judgment against the rebellious house of Israel. The suffering servant of Second Isaiah is not here, for there is no suggestion that Israel's sufferings will bring the nations to see the salvation of God. One looks in vain for any trace of the spirit of the classical prophets who had refused to identify the purpose of God with the national interests of Israel.

Indeed, it may be said that because of the immense popularity of the book among Jews and the vehement disapproval which a discerning Christianity has manifested, Esther may be regarded as a clue to the fundamental cleavage between historic Judaism and prophetic Christianity, a cleavage which is sharply drawn in the pages of the New Testament, even though the book is not quoted once. The famous medieval Jewish philosopher, Maimonides (d. 1204), asserted that when all the rest of the Old Testament canon passed away in the days of the coming of the Messiah, Esther and the Law would remain. The rabbis of the Talmud sometimes put Esther not merely on par with but above the Law and the Prophets, reasoning perhaps that if the Jews as a people were to disappear, the Law and the prophetic commentary upon it would vanish likewise. These high claims bear witness to the inextricable connection between Judaism and the Jewish people. Luther, on the other hand, said in his Table Talk: "I am so hostile to the book [II Maccabees] and to Esther that I wish they did not exist at all; for they Judaize too much and have much heathen perverseness." The fact is that in so far as Esther links the community of Israel, and implicitly the purpose of God, with race and culture, it is at radical variance with New Testament Christianity where the distinctions of class, race, and culture are obliterated in the "New Israel," and where the purpose of God is not identified with any ethnic group or cultural expression (cf. Col. 3:11).

In one sense the inclusion of Esther in the canon was an accident, resulting chiefly from the popularity of Purim; but from another point of view its canonicity is defensible. Modern objections to Esther are too often based on a purely moralistic evaluation. Weighed in the balance of modern social ideals, the book is found sadly wanting. But if this standard is used, many passages in the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings also must be declared "non-canonical." The Bible, however, does not claim in the first instance to be a book of lessons designed to make men morally better. Rather, its literature is the interpretative record of the history of a people who under God wrestled with the question of the meaning and destiny of their communal life. Esther is the literary deposit of this community in one of its perilous hours of history. To be sure, its understanding of the basis of community and its implicit interpretation of its history do not reflect the prophetic view which was accepted as normative by Christianity. Yet it is in line with much of the literature of Judaism in which the prophetic view was either weakened or distorted and, in a sense, carries the premises of Judaism to their logical conclusion.

Moreover, from the perspective of the New Testament this book has an indispensable place in the record of the providential working of God in Israel's history. Postexilic Judaism did not go the way of II Isaiah; instead, it followed Ezekiel and Ezra into an increasing provincialism and self-consciousness. But the tragic realities of history in this period were such that, humanly speaking, this was inevitable. In a time of foreign domination and aggressive cul-

20 The History of Israel (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1869), I, 197.

The characters, which are clearly drawn, are really types rather than unique individuals. The king is the typical impulsive and impressionable Oriental despot; Haman is the typical "enemy of the Jews," drunk with pride and power; Esther is the beautiful but artful woman (cf. Judith) who knows how to use her charms bewitchingly; and Mordecai is the shrewd leader of the Jews who knows how to seize the opportune moment. Unlike Shakespeare, the author is not concerned with either the feelings or the psychological motivation of his characters. Thus the reader is left to wonder why Vashti refused to come at the king's summons, why Mordecai refused to bow to Haman, or why the king left the banquet hall when the full meaning of the plot dawned upon him. Usually these are necessities of the plot, carefully timed to produce the proper stage effect. The author is not too concerned over inconsistencies, or the seemingly awkward introduction of episodes which are indispensable (3:8, 2:19-23). The action moves inexorably and dramatically toward the realization of his purpose: the justification of the two-day Purim festival.

Various literary techniques are employed in order to achieve the greatest vividness and power of expression. The most subtle and ingenious of these is the construction of the plot upon the ancient blood feud between Amalek and Israel, which "Haman, the Agagite" and "Mordecai, the Jew" inherit (see Exeg. on 3:1). Moreover, the author is a master in the use of contrast and dramatic irony. Probably there is no finer example of irony than chs. 6-7, the account of Haman's humiliation and fall. Indeed, the writer delights to show how the tables were turned completely. The once-proud and ambitious Haman falls into his own trap and is reduced to a position of begging for his life at the queen's feet. Likewise the "unlucky thirteenth" turns out to be unlucky for the opponent of the Jews and, in terror, "many from the peoples of the country declared themselves Jews," i.e., proselytes. There is humor in Esther, but it is the kind which is appreciated only by the victor.

Several literary themes, familiar in folk literature in general, are woven together against the background of a possibly historical persecution of the Jews in the Persian period. The main literary motif—a woman whose beauty captures the heart of the enemy and thereby saves her people from destruction—is found also in other Jewish folk stories (especially Judith). Moreover, Jewish fancy delighted in the story of a Jew who, as courtier of the king, won favor for his people (cf. the story about Zerubbabel in the court of Darius I related in

---

831
THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

I Esdras). Furthermore, the theme of a ruler who at first planned to destroy the Jews, but later became their best friend, appears also in III Maccabees and is repeated in Josephus' Against Apion in a version which describes the king's paramour interceding for the Jews. And finally, it has long been recognized that the "gathering of the maidens" is reminiscent of a theme from the Arabian Nights, according to which the king takes a different girl each night until eventually Scheherazade finds favor in his eyes.

Quite apart from one's conclusions as to critical or religious questions involved, undoubtedly this book is a work of considerable literary value. Its dramatic possibilities are indicated in such a play as Racine's Esther.

XII. Outline of Contents

I. Affairs in the court of Susa (1:1-2:23)
   A. The wealth and glory of Ahasuerus (1:1-9)
   B. Dethronement of Vashti (1:10-22)
   C. The search for a new queen (2:1-4)
   D. Mordecai and Esther (2:5-7)
   E. Esther chosen queen (2:8-18)
   F. Attempt on the king's life (2:19-23)

II. The feud between the house of Amalek and the house of Benjamin (3:1-9:18)
   A. The feud between Haman and Mordecai (3:1-6)
   B. Haman's plot (3:7-15)
   C. Mordecai's plan (4:1-17)
   D. Esther's audience (5:1-8)
   E. Pride goes before the fall (5:9-14)
   F. An unrewarded service (6:1-5)

G. Haman's humiliation (6:6-14)
H. Haman's downfall (7:1-10)
J. Mordecai's advancement (8:1-2)
K. Esther's petition (8:3-8)
L. A new decree (8:9-14)
M. Popular reaction (8:15-17)
N. The day of vengeance (9:1-10)
O. "Shushan Purim" (9:11-15)
P. Origin of the two different days of Purim (9:16-19)

III. Regulations for the annual observance of Purim (9:20-10:3)
   A. Mordecai legalizes both Purim dates (9:20-28)
   B. Esther adds her authorization (9:29-32)
   C. The greatness of Mordecai (10:1-3)

XIII. Selected Bibliography

ESTHER

TEXT, EXEGESIS, AND EXPOSITION

It has been said frequently that Esther is a remarkable book but that it has no religious significance. Some interpreters have judged it even more harshly, saying with Heinrich Ewald that "its story . . . knows nothing of high and pure truths." If that is so, then there is little reason to expound the book; the Christian preacher or teacher might better turn his attention to other parts of the Bible, as Luther did. He did not hesitate to say that he wished the book did not exist. But Esther is in the O.T. canon, and we find when we accept it for what it is that its presence in the Bible is neither puzzling nor embarrassing. We do not need to pass over it hurriedly or apologize for it. If Esther is important for an understanding of the ethos of Judaism (see Intro., p. 823), then it is important for an understanding of the community of the new Israel.

The Book of Esther and Purim.—To begin with, one who interprets Esther should be familiar with the festival of Purim, its significance.
ESTHER

In the LXX (11:2–12:6) the story opens with Mordecai’s genealogy, a description of a dream which he had in the second year of “Artaxerxes,” and an account of his being made a member of the royal court because of his discovery of a plot against the king’s life.

and its history. A full account of it is given in The Jewish Encyclopedia, in the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, and in The Jewish Festivals by Hayyim Schauss. Purim is a celebration of deliverance. In contrast to Hanukkah, another festival of deliverance in which the achievement of religious liberty is celebrated and the preservation of Israel remembered, Purim commemorates the preservation of the Jewish people. The book of Esther provides the story: a colony of Jewish people living in Persia is threatened with destruction, but the massacre is averted. The story of Esther is a symbol, as Purim is a symbol, of the deliverance of the Jews. The nation, the people, are spared. This is not an isolated event, but is typical of Israel’s history; as the people have been persecuted time and again, so they have often been delivered. Whatever the origin of Purim, and here there can be only conjecture, the festival has one clear meaning: it is a constant reminder year after year that though persecution may come to the Jews, deliverance is certain.

As has been pointed out in the Intro. (p. 825), there is nothing solemn about the Purim observance. From the earliest times it has been a joyous festival, with much eating and drinking, plays by mummers, masquerades, and revelry. An essential part of the celebration, however, is the reading of the book of Esther, for that is the classic account of the triumph of the Jewish people over those who would destroy them; it is a distillation of intense nationalism, the will of the Jews to survive as a distinct people. That is why some rabbis have taught that though all the prophetic books may be forgotten Esther will always be remembered, Purim will always be observed.

Purim, then, is the symbolic name for deliverance, and it was inevitable that many lesser Purims should be patterned after the original festival to celebrate in the same way occasions when families or communities had been spared suffering or persecution. Many such special Purims are described in the Jewish Encyclopedia. This is the story of one of the best-known local observances: the governor of Egypt in 1524 arrested and imprisoned twelve Jewish citizens of Cairo, with the intention of forcing them to pay him a large sum of money. One of the twelve was the chief rabbi, David ibn Abi Zimra. The governor intended also to kill every Jew in the city. But on the day scheduled for the massacre he was stabbed by one of his subordinates and the Jews were delivered. In commemoration of this, the “Purim of Cairo” is celebrated each year.

Special Purims are observed not only by communities but by families. Schauss tells of such a festival observed by the family of Rabbi Abraham Danzig. On a certain day in 1804 there was an explosion of gunpowder in Vilna. Many houses were demolished and thirty-one people killed. But although Rabbi Danzig’s house was destroyed and he and all his family were seriously injured, they survived. This deliverance, the rabbi ordered, was to be remembered each year with a fast and a Purim feast at which prayers and psalms were chanted.

In all these observances—the Purim observed annually by all Jews, the special community and family Purims—the meaning of the story of Esther becomes quite evident.

The Book of Esther has always been for Jews an allegory depicting the Jewish life and Jewish lot among the nations. It is a book in which not just one period is depicted, but all periods; it is a book that remains forever new because Jewish enemies will not allow it to grow old. It is a book that breathes of love for Jews, of the tie that unites the Jews, the Jew of the masses to the one who has attained kingly honors.

This is what the writer of Esther had to say, this is what it means to the people whose life it depicts. We cannot answer the question “What does it mean to Christians?” without understanding this; we cannot answer the question “What value does it have for Christians?” without appreciating what it means to Jews. Its essential meaning has been put concisely in one phrase, “The indestructibility of Israel.” When Esther was written, the indestructibility of Israel was a religious idea; Israel would be preserved because this was God’s plan. This is not explicitly stated in Esther; there is no mention

10 Cincinnati: Union American Hebrew Congregations, 1938
11 All are required to read Esther on Purim, women as well as men. Children are prepared for the reading as they become old enough. The book can be read privately or in the synagogue; the requirement can be fulfilled by hearing the book read.

10 Ibid., p. 254.
Now it came to pass in the days of Ahasuerus, (this is Ahasuerus which reigned from India even unto Ethiopia, over one hundred and seven and twenty provinces.)

In the days of Ahasuerus, the Ahasuerus who reigned from India to Ethiopia over one hundred and twenty-seven prov-

I. Affairs in the Court of Susa (1:1–2:23)

A. The Wealth and Glory of Ahasuerus (1:1-9)

1:1. Ahasuerus: It is clear from a study of Persian monuments that the Hebrew 'Ahashwêrôsh (cf. Ezra 4:6) is an attempt to represent the Persian Khshayâdîsâ, from there of God's purpose, but it seems to be implicit throughout. "The divinest element in the book is perhaps to be found in the profound sense of the indestructibility of Israel, and the duty of an Israelite to maintain the cause of his people at whatever risk... It was this probably that caused its final inclusion in the O.T. canon."

Whether the book is fact or fiction is not crucial to our understanding of the story's significance (cf. Intro., pp. 825-27). The parable of the sower conveys a truth about the call of God's kingdom which does not depend upon the historical existence of the sower described. When Jesus told this story he may have had a particular farmer in mind, he may have been describing a sower he knew, or he may have been picturing the process of sowing. It does not matter; that is not essential to the story. The truth which the parable tells is illuminated by the description of a familiar sight: "Listen! A sower went out to sow" (Mark 4:3). We read Esther as we read the parables. Jews have been persecuted, there has been a Haman; Jews have been delivered, there have been a Mordecai and an Esther—if not with these names then with other names—men who foment anti-Semitism, Jews whose loyalty to Israel is without limit.

If Esther is a "historical novel" with a large element of imagination, that imagination nevertheless has to do with a particular people as illustrated in a particular time. Concerned with the one central truth, "the indestructibility of Israel," its historical reference has been indicated in the Intro. and here. The temptation of many preachers has been to allegorize the story into farfetched and unnatural references. So great a preacher as Jonathan Edwards, troubled perhaps by the lack of explicit religious teaching in the book, proceeded to supply it. "It appears to me very probable, that this book of Esther is an history that is a shadow of gospel things and times... The great feast that Ahasuerus made, is the gospel feast..."

Vashti, the queen, is the church, or God's people." Upon Vashti's refusal to appear before the king, Ahasuerus repudiates her, "So we find the rejection of the Jews and calling of the Gentiles compared to God's repudiating his ancient church, and taking another better than she... Mordecai is the gospel ministry." But Edwards read into the book, and so took out of it, meanings which were never originally there. It is true that the chief figures of the book, Ahasuerus, Vashti, Haman, Mordecai, and Esther may be taken as types (Vashti disappears from the story after ch. 1), but certainly as types to be found in Jewish history and not to be identified with persons and events of the gospel story.

Because Esther is written as a continuous story and, as the Intro. has pointed out (see p. 825), does not include sentences which carry in themselves a specific religious content, it is hardly possible in the Expos. to follow the regular pattern of The Interpreter's Bible, which is to list homiletic suggestions under particular texts. It would seem more useful to treat the book in relation to the several characters which make up its drama, and to think of those qualities of good and evil which these characters reveal. Consequently, the Expos. follows this method, and the verse references are those in which the name of each character first appears. It is necessary, however, that the whole story should first be read and held in mind in order that as the characters are considered they shall be seen in the light of the relationships which show their motivations and their meanings. The last two suggested topics, "Nationalism" and "Christianity and Judaism," cover the book as a whole.

1:1. Ahasuerus.—Although Ahasuerus is used not very successfully to set the historical scene, he is also a type: a ruler antagonistic to the Jews, who is won over and becomes their friend and protector. At first Ahasuerus gives the order "to destroy, to kill, and to cause to perish, all Jews" (8:13). Later he countermands

2 Ibid.
2 That in those days, when the king Ahasuerus sat on the throne of his kingdom, which was in Shushan the palace, 3 in the third year of his reign, he made a feast unto all his princes and his servants; the power of Persia and Media, the nobles and princes of the provinces, being before him:

which was derived the Greek name Xerxes. Unquestionably this refers to Xerxes I (485-465 B.C.), who inherited from his father, Darius I, a world empire extending from India to Ethiopia. In one of his inscriptions discovered at Persepolis (quoted in Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1946], pp. 199-200), Xerxes proclaims himself as “the great king, the king of kings, the king of the land of many tribes, the king on this wide, far-stretching earth,” and lists the nations over which he ruled, including “the Indus land” and “the Cushites” (Ethiopians). This is the king who is conspicuous in history for his gigantic but abortive campaign against Greece, immortalized by Herodotus (History VII:1-5).

One hundred and twenty-seven provinces: The Persian Empire was divided into satrapies (twenty, according to Herodotus ibid. III: 80), which apparently were subdivided into provinces administered by governors (cf. 3:12).

2. When King Ahasuerus sat: The Hebrew יהוה occasions some difficulty because the verb has the force of a preterit, and does not express duration. Some scholars, connecting the phrase with the words in the third year of his reign (vs. 3), find here an allusion to the postponement of the king's accession until he could establish himself securely against all rivals. So the Talmud (Megillah 11b) interprets "when he was established." Others, calling attention to the fact that the Medo-Persian Empire had several capitals in which the king held court in rotation, interpret: "when he took up residence in Susa." Elsewhere, however, the author gives no indication that the king held court in any city other than Susa, even though the events of the book cover a period of several years. The difficulty is partially relieved by the consideration that the temporal phrase in vs. 3a is intended to date the banquet, not necessarily the beginning of the king's reign in Susa.

Susa, capital of ancient Elam, was rebuilt as a royal citadel by Darius I and used as a residence until Persepolis became the main capital. Xerxes likewise had his main residence at Persepolis, although apparently he spent his winters in Susa (see especially A. T. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948], chs. xii-xiii, xx).

3-4. There is no reason to suppose that this lavish banquet (lit., "a drinking") was either Xerxes' coronation feast held in the third year of his reign (see on vs. 2) or an assembly of satraps to make arrangements for the attack on Greece (Herodotus op. cit. VII: 8). This is the author's exaggerated way of emphasizing Xerxes' glory and wealth. The sheer extravagance of Persian wine banquets, at which as many as fifteen thousand guests are said to have been entertained at once, made a deep impression upon the imagination of ancient writers (cf. Olmstead, op. cit., pp. 182-83).

The power of Persia and Media, i.e., the army. There is no textual support for the reading army chiefs (RSV). Judith 1:16 likewise speaks of a king feasting his entire this order, the Jews that were in every city were “to stand for their life, to destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish, all the power of the people and province that would assault them, both little ones and women, and to take the spoil of them for a prey” (8:11). Not only were the Jews allowed to defend themselves, they “should be ready against that day to avenge themselves on their enemies” (8:18). Ahasuerus, then, is the potential enemy and destroyer of the Jews, who becomes their benefactor. This is his role in the book. Therefore all moralizing about his character is without point. He has been described as “a mere puppet worked by those 4 When he showed the riches of his glorious kingdom and the honor of his excellent majesty many days, even a hundred and fourscore days.

5 And when these days were expired, the king made a feast unto all the people that were present in Shushan the palace, both unto great and small, seven days, in the court of the garden of the king's palace:

6 Where were white, green, and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble: the beds were of gold and silver, upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black marble.

7 And they gave them drink in vessels of gold, (the vessels being diverse one from another,) and royal wine in abundance, according to the state of the king.

8 And the drinking was according to the law; none did compel: for so the king had appointed to all the officers of his house, that they should do according to every man's pleasure.

9 Also Vashti the queen made a feast for the women in the royal house which belonged to king Ahasuerus.

army for 120 days. Perhaps the reference is to the king's elite bodyguard, the famous Ten Thousand Immortals (ibid. VII. 83), which included detachments of Persians and Medes. The latter peoples, coming from the same racial stock, jointly established the Medo-Persian Empire, but since the time of Cyrus (549 B.C.) the Persians held the hegemony. This may explain the mention of Persia, first in this passage.

5-7. At the close of the six-month banquet for the army and dignitaries, a seven-day banquet was given for all the male citizens (cf. vs. 9) who had gathered at the citadel. Further evidences are given of the dazzling wealth of Xerxes, including the costly marble pillars and mosaic pavement, remains of which archaeologists have found (cf. Olmstead, op. cit., pp. 170-71).

8. Drinking was according to the law: If דְּנָח יִנְח means none did compel, we must suppose that the usual rule of Persian carousals, according to which drinking was enforced or perhaps directed by a toastmaster, was in this case suspended. Perhaps, however, the meaning is that, with wine flowing freely, no one restricted the amount consumed (cf. LXX). In other words, the drinks were "on the house."

9. Simultaneously Queen Vashti gave a seven-day feast for women only. Since Persian custom did not demand that men and women eat separately (cf. 5:6; 7:1), it is possible that the narrator had in mind the necessity of dividing the guests because who successively gain his ear . . .; helplessly weak." Yet Haman did not gain his ear and persuade him to send out the order for the massacre because Ahasuerus was "a mere puppet," but because of the necessities of the plot. Again, the king did not change his mind and tell the Jews to defend themselves because he was "helplessly weak," but because that action is part of the story. Esther is to save her people threatened with annihilation by the king, and Ahasuerus is that king. He granted Haman's

836
10 ¶ On the seventh day, when the heart of the king was merry with wine, he commanded Mehuman, Biztha, Harbona, Bigtha, and Abagtha, Zethar, and Carkas, the seven chamberlains that served in the presence of Ahasuerus the king, 11 To bring Vashti the queen before the king with the crown royal, to show the people and the princes her beauty: for she was fair to look on.

12 But the queen Vashti refused to come at the king's commandment by his chamberlains: therefore was the king very wroth, and his anger burned in him.

13 ¶ Then the king said to the wise men, which knew the times, (for so was the king's manner toward all that knew law and judgment:

14 And the next unto him was Carshena, Shethar, Admatha, Tarshish, Meres, Marsena, and Memucan, the seven princes of Persia and Media, which saw the king's face, and which sat at the first in the kingdom, 15 What shall we do unto the queen Vashti according to law, because she hath not performed the commandment of the king Ahasuerus by the chamberlains?

of the great number. Xerxes' queen, however, was not Vashti, but an imperious and superstitious woman named Amestris (Herodotus op. cit. VII. 61; IX. 108-112; see Intro., p. 826).

B. DETHRONEMENT OF VASHTI (1:10-22)

10-12. Why did Vashti refuse to come before the inebriated king so that he might display his greatest wealth, his beautiful queen? Jewish commentators early puzzled over this question, and with typical rabbinical ingenuity deduced from the text that the king had commanded her to appear at his banquet naked, i.e., with only the royal crown on her head (so II Targum). Actually the author does not reveal the psychological motivation for her refusal. Vashti's insolence is a literary excuse for her deposition and the subsequent elevation of Esther.

13-15. "The learned men who knew the laws" is an improvement over wise men, which knew the times (i.e., astrologers; cf. I Chr. 12:32), and demands only a slight textual change (that is, instead of seven princes of Persia and Media—doubtless the famous Council of Seven (ibid. III. 81. 84; Ezra 7:14). As the highest ranking men in the kingdom, they saw the king's face, i.e., had access to him at all times except when he was in the harem. The names here and in vs. 10 are Persian.
16 And Memucan answered before the king and the princes, Vashti the queen hath not done wrong to the king only, but also to all the princes, and to all the people that are in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus.

17 For this deed of the queen shall come abroad unto all women, so that they shall despise their husbands in their eyes, when it shall be reported, The king Ahasuerus commanded Vashti the queen to be brought in before him, but she came not.

18 Likewise shall the ladies of Persia and Media say this day unto all the king’s princes, which have heard of the deed of the queen. Thus shall there arise too much contempt and wrath.

19 If it please the king, let there go a royal commandment from him, and let it be written among the laws of the Persians and the Medes, that it be not altered, That Vashti come no more before king Ahasuerus; and let the king give her royal estate unto another that is better than she.

20 And when the king’s decree, which he shall make, shall be published throughout all his empire, (for it is great,) all the wives shall give to their husbands honor, both to great and small.

21 And the saying pleased the king and the princes: and the king did according to the word of Memucan:

16-18. As in the similar case of Cambyses (ibid. III. 31), the seven were quick to suggest a legal sanction for the king’s intention. Vashti’s punishment, they point out, is demanded not merely by the king’s personal grudge, but by public policy. If other wives of lesser rank follow the example of the defiant queen, the empire will be thrown into anarchy.

19-20. It is proposed that the king act decisively by making the decree concerning Vashti irrevocable, despite any later change of mood (cf. 3:1). Here in a whimsical vein the author introduces the theme of the unalterable character of Persian law (cf. Dan 6:8, 12, 15) in preparation for the crucial passage 8:8.

21-22. To every province in its own script: An exaggeration which emphasizes the thoroughness with which the king dealt with domestic insubordination throughout his empire. Persian kings used Aramaic for royal decrees, and regularly employed three official languages in their inscriptions, viz., Elamite, Akkadian, and Persian (e.g., Darius’ famous inscription on Mount Behistun).
ESTHER

22 For he sent letters into all the king’s provinces, into every province according to the writing thereof, and to every people after their language, that every man should bear rule in his own house, and that it should be published according to the language of every people.

2 After these things, when the wrath of king Ahasuerus was appeased, he remembered Vashti, and what she had done, and what was decreed against her.

2 Then said the king’s servants that ministered unto him, Let there be fair young virgins sought for the king:

3 And let the king appoint officers in all the provinces of his kingdom, that they may gather together all the fair young virgins unto Shushan the palace, to the house of the women, unto the custody of Hege the king’s chamberlain, keeper of the women; and let their things for purification be given them.

4 And let the maiden which pleaseth the king be queen instead of Vashti. And the thing pleased the king; and he did so.

Speak according to the language of his people: A difficult phrase. Ancient Jewish commentators took it to mean that in the case of a mixed marriage the husband should compel his wife to speak his tongue. Paul Haupt has suggested that the phrase has the idiomatic meaning of speaking clearly in the mother tongue, i.e., “talk plain English to her,” as we would say. The clause was omitted by the LXX—evidently an early witness to the obscurity of the Hebrew original. In any case, the notion that a king would take thorough measures to ensure that every man be lord in his own house is obviously a fanciful feature.

C. THE SEARCH FOR A NEW QUEEN (2:1-4)

2:1. Remembered Vashti: The author subtly suggests that the king desired to reinstate Vashti now that he was in a calmer mood, but was helpless because he had issued an irrevocable decree. The LXX says she was “no longer” remembered, which destroys the point. Since Vashti has been introduced only to show how her place was taken by Esther, the author feels no need of telling the reader what happened to her.

2-4. Here the author ignores the Persian custom which stipulated that the king could marry only a Persian (according to the Avesta and Herodotus op. cit. III. 84). The theme of a king choosing a queen out of the most beautiful maidsens of his kingdom appears in folk literature all over the world.

exhibited (1:11), surely that is how the king, and therefore other men of that day, thought of their wives. Again, whatever Vashti’s motives for refusing to obey the king, such a course was possible in actual life as well as in fiction.

The events of this story therefore present us with a comparison and a contrast with our own day. We do not from our point in history pass judgments on people like Ahasuerus and Vashti. We say rather: this is what people thought and did some two thousand years ago. When we do that, it is profitable for us to look also at ourselves. Do we manipulate people? Do we use them for our own pleasure and advantage? The answer can be found only in an examination of our twentieth-century ways. For the very subtlety of our contemporary devices for handling people can convince us that without doubt we do believe in the dignity of persons and the equality of men and women. But do we?
5 ¶ Now in Shushan the palace there was a certain Jew, whose name was Mordecai, the son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite; 6 Who had been carried away from Jerusalem with the captivity which had been carried away with Jeconiah king of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away.

D. MORDECAI AND ESTHER (2:5-7)

5. The son of Jair: Probably not Mordecai's immediate ancestors, as some scholars hold, but his remote ancestors (so Josephus, Targ., and Midrash), following the Jewish practice of omitting intermediate links in a genealogy. Both Shimei and Kish are well-known members of the tribe of Benjamin, the former appearing as the enemy of David (II Sam. 16:5-13; I Kings 2:8, 56-46) and the latter being the famous father of Saul (I Sam. 9:1; 14:51). Mordecai is not a direct descendant of Saul (in which case Saul would certainly be mentioned), but comes from another line stemming from Kish.

6. Had been carried away: A reference to the deportation of 597 B.C. Thus by implication Mordecai is described as a leader of the Jews, for it was only the cream of the population which Nebuchadrezzar carried away with Jehoiachin (II Kings 24:14-17). This statement, however, presents a chronological problem. If Mordecai was no more than a lad in 597, he would have been well over one hundred years of age at the time of Xerxes' accession (485), and Esther must have been about seventy when she captivated the king with her virgin charms. Some commentators attempt to evade the difficulty either by assuming that the relative pronoun who refers to Kish (who would then be the father of Mordecai, not of Saul), or that carried away means only that he had sprung from an exiled family, i.e., that he lived in captivity because of the Exile. Both interpretations violate the natural meaning of the Hebrew. Probably the author, being

2.5. Mordecai.—Mordecai is the friend at court. Now in Shushan the palace there was a certain Jew, whose name was Mordecai (2:5). It was his influence which brought Esther to the attention of the king, and he was the ultimate cause, therefore, of the delivery of his people. Purim at one time was called also "Mordecai's Day." There is a story like the Mordecai story in I Esdras 3-4. Darius the king gave a feast for all the princes of Media and Persia. After the guests had departed, the king went to his bedchamber and slept, but he was restless and soon awoke. Then three young men of his bodyguard wrote, each of them, a sentence. The first wrote, "Wine is the strongest." The second wrote, "The king is strongest." The third wrote, "Women are strongest." When the king read the sentences in the morning, he called the young men, and each in turn declared and defended what he had written. Zerubbabel, who had written "Women are strongest," pleased the king most by his argument, and Darius promised him whatever he should ask. Zerubbabel wanted but one thing: permission to rebuild the temple in Jerusalem, and this the king granted at once—permission and much assistance. Zerubbabel in this story replaces Nehemiah, who had gained permission from King Artaxerxes I to build a wall around Jerusalem. But the very multiplication of stories about the accomplishments of Jews who were in the favor of foreign rulers indicates that this was a favorite theme.

If Mordecai is presented as an unselfish man who was motivated only by devotion to his people, he ceases to be a real person. Human motives are rarely unmixed. It should be remembered that the book ends not with praise for Esther, but with an account of Mordecai's greatness. "And all the acts of his power and of his might, and the declaration of the greatness of Mordecai, whereunto the king advanced him, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia? For Mordecai the Jew was next unto king Ahasuerus, and great among the Jews, and accepted of the multitude of his brethren, seeking the wealth of his people, and speaking peace to all his seed" (10:2-3). It is not necessary to think that such an outcome was uppermost in Mordecai's mind when he sent Esther to the king. If the thought occurred to him, why is it neces-
7 And he brought up Hadassah, that is, Esther, his uncle's daughter: for she had neither father nor mother, and the maid was fair and beautiful; whom Mordecai, when her father and mother were dead, took for his own daughter.

7 He had brought up Hadassah, that is Esther, the daughter of his uncle, for she had neither father nor mother; the maiden was beautiful and lovely, and when her father and her mother died, Mordecai ignorant of the chronology of the period, assumed that Nebuchadrezzar's reign was followed immediately by that of Xerxes. A similar telescoping of history is found in other writings of Judaism (cf. Ezra 4:6; Dan. 1:21; 5:30; 6:1; Tob. 14:15; et passim). According to Ezra 2:2 and Neh. 7:7 a certain Mordecai was among the exiles who had been carried away by Nebuchadrezzar. Perhaps the author intended to identify the two (so Targ.). Mordecai is a non-Hebraic name such as would have been given to a Jew of the Dispersion, though its original theophorous meaning probably had been forgotten (see Intro., p. 826).

7. Hadassah: Perhaps a Hebrew maiden name ("Myrtle") which was superseded by the royal name, Esther, at her coronation. Some scholars, however, attempt to connect Hadassah with an Assyrian word meaning "bride." Esther is variously derived from the Persian stara ("star") or from the name of the Babylonian goddess Ishtar.

The daughter of his uncle: I.e., Mordecai's cousin—not his niece, as is often claimed (see Vulg.). The blood kinship and filial relationship between Mordecai and Esther are important in the story.

Mandatory to suppose that this was the ultimate reason for his actions?

Mordecai is a patriot, devoted to his people. Many a patriot since his day has been rewarded for his wisdom and his zeal. To say after the event that his behavior was carefully calculated, a result of his desire for the reward, is to indulge in the sin of distraction. Mordecai's appeal to Esther (4:13-14) is the honest plea of a man who was one with his people. He was not thinking of himself but of his countrymen when he "rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth with ashes, and went out into the midst of the city, and cried with a loud and a bitter cry" (4:1). May we not believe that his cry was addressed to God? The author does not say so, but it is difficult to believe that a Jew could do all this, could cry out for deliverance, and think only of what man could do. The people were God's people, and Mordecai the patriot was God's man.

There is no explanation given of Mordecai's refusal to prostrate himself before Haman. The king had given the command that all should bow down and reverence Haman, and when Mordecai refused and was questioned about his refusal, he would not listen (3:2-4). If Haman and Mordecai typify the feud between Amalekite and Israelite (see Exeg. on 3:1-6), we may find the explanation there. But we meet in this incident, as elsewhere in the book, a difficulty. How much did Mordecai's behavior contribute to Haman's attitude? The separatism of Mordecai and the Jewish community was given by Haman as the reason for his intended persecution. But without such separatism the Jews would not have survived as a people in exile. So the very element, "the indestructibility of Israel," which is the central theme of Esther, while it preserves the Jews in persecution, seems by the manner in which it is lived out to be a factor in the rise of persecution. This is not to say that an excuse for anti-Semitism is to be found in such separatism. It is rather to state the fact that a people which is separatist and unassimilable, whatever its motive for remaining apart, presents a sociological problem. The tension created may in a democratic society be lessened, but the tension remains; in a totalitarian state the tension cannot be tolerated, and the separatist group is liquidated.

7. Esther.—The central figure of the book, of course, is Esther. She is beautiful and courageous, she is cunning and resourceful. We are not told what Esther thought of the plan to make her queen in place of Vashti; it appears that she went to the king's house voluntarily (2:8), but the implication is that this was the first step and a necessary one in Mordecai's plans. At any rate, if the plot is going to develop as it does, Esther must be queen. So Mordecai is the knowing one who makes the necessary arrangements. Esther may have been reluctant to become the bride of a Gentile, but once she accepted her mission she played her part heroically.

Upon Esther depended the deliverance of her people. There is no threat to the Jews when 8 So it came to pass, when the king's commandment and his decree was heard, and when many maidens were gathered together unto Shushan the palace, to the custody of Hegai, that Esther was brought also unto the king's house, to the custody of Hegai, keeper of the women.

9 And the maiden pleased him, and she obtained kindness of him; and he speedily gave her her things for purification, with such things as belonged to her, and seven maidens, which were meet to be given her, out of the king's house: and he preferred her and her maids unto the best place of the house of the women.

10 Esther had not showed her people nor her kindred: for Mordecai had charged her that she should not show it.

E. Esther Chosen Queen (2:8-18)

8. Was taken: By implication, voluntarily. I Targum reads into this the meaning "taken forcibly," and II Targum explains that Mordecai hid Esther when the king's officers searched the land. Likewise, the LXX (14:3-19) introduces a prayer by Esther in which she vows that she married an uncircumcised Gentile only under compulsion. The obvious meaning of the Hebrew verb was offensive to the stricter elements of Judaism.

9. Like Daniel (Dan. 1:5), Esther is provided with delicacies (lit., her portion). According to additions in the LXX and II Targum, she refuses them. But the Hebrew story does not give the slightest evidence that Esther remained faithful to the dietary laws of Judaism, as did Daniel and his friends and Judith.

10. Here there is nothing of the martyr spirit of Daniel or the strict devotion of Judith, both of whom displayed their Judaism at all costs. The author seems to commend Esther's cleverness in hiding her Jewish identity, knowing that as a Jewess she would have little if any chance of becoming queen of Persia. It is useless to ask how such secrecy could have been maintained, for this is one of the requirements of the plot.

Mordecai [emphatic position] had charged her: Cf. 2:20. Why did Mordecai give this counsel, which clearly involved disobedience of the laws of Judaism, at a time when the Jewish people were not yet threatened? Jewish commentators have had trouble with this passage, as is indicated by this interpretation of a Midrash: "He thought to himself: How is it possible that this righteous maiden should be married to a non-Israelite?"

Esther becomes queen. Haman has not yet been promoted, Mordecai has not offended him, there is no indication that the king will order the slaughter of the Jews in his provinces. But nevertheless, all this "is to come." The book does not tell us that Esther is providentially chosen, nor that God knows she is destined to deliver the Jews. However, we may discern in Esther's character and actions a providential element, a willingness to accept the role God has given her and to do her best.

When Mordecai's instructions she makes known neither "her people nor her kindred" (2:10). Why does he then send the seven chosen maids from the king's palace, and advanced her and her maids to the best place in the harem. Esther had not made known her people or kindred, for Mordecai had charged her not to make it known.
11 And Mordecai walked every day before the court of the women's house, to know how Esther did, and what should become of her.

12 ¶ Now when every maid's turn was come to go in to king Ahasuerus, after that she had been twelve months, according to the manner of the women, (for so were the days of their purifications accomplished, to wit, six months with oil of myrrh, and six months with sweet odors, and with other things for the purifying of the women.)

13 Then thus came every maiden unto the king; whatsoever she desired was given her to go with her out of the house of the women unto the king's house.

14 In the evening she went, and on the morrow she returned into the second house of the women, to the custody of Shaashgaz, the king's chamberlain, which kept the concubines: she came in unto the king no more, except the king delighted in her, and that she were called by name.

It must be because some great calamity is going to befall Israel who will be delivered through her.” (Quoted by S. Goldman, “Esther” in The Five Megilloth, ed. A. Cohen [Hindhead, Surrey: Soncino Press, 1946], p. 204.)

It is only in the context of the drama as a whole, in which Esther's elevation became the only hope for an imperiled people, that one could claim that the end justified the means. If the story is true to life at this stage in the development, it would not be farfetched to suspect that Mordecai's shrewdness was motivated by his ambition for political advancement in the court at Susa, to realize which he was willing to use his cousin. Some commentators, however, stress the beautiful spirit of filial devotion which Esther manifested.

11. Only the eunuchs could enter the harem (vs. 3; 1:10; 4:5; etc.), but Mordecai could find out about Esther through them. It seems strange that Mordecai, who was known to be a Jew, could show such solicitude for Esther without Persian officials suspecting her Jewish extraction.

14. The second harem: After the marriage was consummated, the girl, with the status of a concubine, returned to another division of the harem where she remained a virtual widow unless the king happened to have a fancy for her (cf. the Arabian Nights, cannot do this because it would mean death for her. “Whosoever, whether man or woman, shall come unto the king into the inner court, who is not called, there is one law of his to put him to death” (4:11). Esther's reluctance to go to the king without his bidding may seem unheroic and selfish, but it is the reaction which almost anyone would have at first in a similar situation. Esther's behavior is the "heroism of the unheroic," and is therefore the more appealing. She loved her people, but she was afraid to face death and looked for a way out. Then she realized on second thought that for this she was queen; she must take the risk of death. The second thought, it is true, came from Mordecai; it was his urging which induced Esther to go to the king (4:13-14). But our second thoughts are often prompted in us by others, by circumstances, by pressures from outside. Do they not often come from our waiting upon God? "Among mortals second thoughts are the wisest." The important point here is not that it was through Mordecai's urging that Esther went to the king, but that Esther was able to see her duty and respond to it. "So will 15 Now when the turn of Esther, the daughter of Abihail the uncle of Mordecai, who had taken her for his daughter, was come to go in unto the king, she required nothing but what Hegai the king's chamberlain, the keeper of the women, appointed. And Esther obtained favor in the sight of all them that looked upon her.

16 So Esther was taken unto king Ahasuerus into his house royal in the tenth month, which is the month Tebeth, in the seventh year of his reign.

17 And the king loved Esther above all the women, and she obtained grace and favor in his sight more than all the virgins; so that he set the royal crown upon her head, and made her queen instead of Vashti.

18 Then the king made a great feast unto all his princes and his servants, even Esther's feast; and he made a release to the provinces, and gave gifts, according to the state of the king.

where Shehriyar had a new wife each evening, but did not allow her to come to him a second time).

15. She asked for nothing: Not because of her modesty necessarily, or because of her indifference to being chosen queen, but because her unexcelled beauty made extra make-up superfluous. Esther shrewdly trusted the judgment of Hegai, who knew the royal taste.

16. Seventh year, i.e., four years after the deposition of Vashti (cf. 1:3). Why was the king without a queen for this long period of time? Those who defend the historicity of the book claim that during most of the interval (Xerxes' sixth and seventh years) the king was occupied with the Greek campaign. If Xerxes started home from his ignominious defeat in 479 B.C. he could have reached Susa in time to marry Esther in his seventh year, but this would not have left much time for many virgins to have had their turn before Esther. Apparently the author implies that this entire period was necessary for the abating of the king's wrath, the issuing of the royal edict, the gathering of the virgins in the harem, Esther's year of beauty treatment, and the extensive testing of other virgins before Esther was chosen.

18. A release (lit., "a causing to rest"): This amnesty has been variously interpreted as a remission of taxes (I Targum, RSV), a release from work, i.e., a holiday (Syriac, Elsewhere in the book of Esther seems deliberate (see Intro., pp. 829-30). The interpolation here in the LXX of a prayer by Mordecai and a prayer by Esther brings into the story that which every devout Jew would expect to find there. And it is unlikely that a Jew at the time when Esther was written would have said, "If I perish, I perish," without thinking of God.

In this connection Esther's words in answer to Mordecai should also be taken into consideration: "Go, gather together all the Jews that are present in Shushan, and fast ye for me" (4:16). A modern Western man who went on a hunger 19 And when the virgins were gathered together the second time, then Mordecai sat in the king's gate.

20 Esther had not yet showed her kindred nor her people, as Mordecai had charged her: for Esther did the commandment of Mordecai, like as when she was brought up with him.

Vulg., Amer. Trans., RSV mg.), a release of prisoners (cf. I Macc. 10:38; Matt. 27:15), or a release from military service, i.e., a furlough (cf. Eccl. 8:8; Herodotus op. cit. III. 67). As in the case of the royal birthday (ibid. IX. 110), the king distributed gifts to the Persians on the occasion of Esther's coronation banquet.

F. ATTEMPT ON THE KING'S LIFE (2:19-23)

This passage interrupts the flow of the narrative in order to introduce an episode which later plays an important part in the plot. The LXX awkwardly repeats the incident at the beginning of the apocryphal book (12:1-5), and makes it the explanation of Mordecai's political prominence in Susa and Haman's hatred of him.

19. When the virgins were gathered together the second time: It is strange that there should have been a second gathering of virgins when vss. 16-17 imply that the levy of maidens had already accomplished its purpose. The text at this point is completely unintelligible. The LXX omits the troublesome words—perhaps an evidence of the early obscurity of the Hebrew.

Mordecai sat: The KJV takes this to be the apodosis of the previous temporal clause of vs. 19a. Actually, as a number of commentators point out, the words seem to be a second temporal clause, in which case they should be translated, Mordecai was sitting at the king's gate (RSV). If this is true, the clause should be followed by a dash to indicate that all of vs. 20 is a parenthesis (so the American Jewish Translation).

20. This parenthetical verse explains why Mordecai was still occupying a subordinate position at the king's gate, despite Esther's elevation, viz., Esther had not been allowed to disclose her Jewish identity and her kinship with Mordecai (cf. 8:1, where the strike as a form of protest against the government might do so with no thought of God, and his act would carry no religious implications. But our world is not Esther's; then, fasting in time of stress or penitence meant fasting and prayer. Esther not only asks all the Jews in the city to fast, she and her attendants will fast also (4:16). To what purpose? Not to make herself more attractive to the king! Fasting for three days would have quite the opposite effect. This must mean that Esther recognized her need for God's help. This is her preparation for her perilous task: all her people in the city and those about her would join her in a Godward act. What she had to do, she could not do in her own strength.

As with the other figures in the book, there is one central point in the characterization of Esther: here is a woman who gives herself, her beauty, her shrewdness for the sake of her people; she will risk death for them. As the story is told, Esther emerges as a real person; therefore her motives are mixed, but in the end she accomplishes the work given her to do. It is beside the point, then, to examine every detail of her life and to moralize about her behavior. This is usually unprofitable anyway. We lift a person out of his time and then judge him by his acts as they appear in the light of our standards; our estimate of him would be different if we used as our criteria the standards of his day and the practice of ours.

It is easy to condemn Esther and Mordecai for their thirst for vengeance; their slaughter of the Persians went far beyond necessary measures of defense. There is no doubt of that. There is in the book a spirit of revenge. But it is not necessary for us either to attempt to explain away that spirit, to say it is not there, or to defend it, any more than it is necessary for us to condemn the actions of Esther. We do not approve of what she did to the inhabitants of Shushan or praise her for it. But the story of retaliation which is told in the closing chapters of the book is the story of what happens or may happen when the tension between 21 In those days, while Mordecai sat in the king's gate, two of the king's chamberlains, Bigthan and Teresh, of those which kept the door, were wroth, and sought to lay hand on the king Ahasuerus.

22 And the thing was known to Mordecai, who told it unto Esther the queen; and Esther certified the king thereof in Mordecai's name.

23 And when inquisition was made of the matter, it was found out; therefore they were both hanged on a tree: and it was written in the book of the chronicles before the king.

disclosure of this information changed Mordecai's position). The notion that Mordecai was an "idler" at the king's gate (Paton) is less probable than the view that he had some official capacity, along with other courtiers (3:2-3), in the king's service (so also LXX 12:5). According to a cuneiform text translated by A. Ungnad (see Intro., p. 820), a certain Mordecai was among the Persian dignitaries who received payment of money, evidently for official service at Susa.

21. The expression in those days refers to vs. 19, in continuation of the sentence interrupted by the long parenthesis.

Who guarded the threshold: A reference to the bodyguards who protected the king's private apartment (cf. ibid. III. 77, 118) and thus had easy access to the king. As a matter of fact, Xerxes was finally assassinated in such a court conspiracy. If the story presupposes that Mordecai was already in the king's service, his overhearing the plot becomes more credible.

22. In the name of Mordecai, but without disclosing that he was related to her (cf. 8:1).

23. Before the king, i.e., in the presence of the king, and therefore at his direction.

The Book of the Chronicles: Lit., "the book of the acts of the days," i.e., the royal chronicles (cf. Ezra 4:15). Herodotus records (ibid. VIII. 90) how Xerxes ordered his scribes to write in a diary the names of his captains who performed worthy exploits, in order that they might be rewarded and enrolled among "the king's benefactors" (cf. ibid. VIII. 85). In the Hebrew story there is no other reason for the king's inadvertent failure to reward one who had saved his life than the requirement of the plot. The incident proves decisive in the sequel (6:1-11).

two racial groups is strained to the breaking point. The book of Esther is not, after all, fiction. The particular events related there may never have taken place; Esther, Mordecai, Haman may be creations of the author, but the story he tells is all too true. The numbers of those slain are greatly exaggerated, but the pattern is familiar. The writer was describing, perhaps better than he knew, how racial and cultural antagonisms arise, how they are fed, how they break out into violence. This was not the author's intended story. He wrote it as a simple tale of persecution that is averted and turned against the persecutor. But for us there is much more to it than that: so long as racial antagonisms exist, this book will shed light on their nature and origin.

In its original purpose, however, Esther is the story of the Jews protecting themselves against their persecutors. It is the story of a people who are delivered. Is God their deliverer? If the book may be taken as a symbol of the struggle of the Jews throughout history, then, although God is not mentioned in the book, God no doubt is their savior. Mordecai and Esther are his instruments. The community of Jews is saved. This is the message of the book. Nothing is said or implied as to Israel's mission; it is the story of the preservation of the people as a nation which is told in Esther and celebrated in the feast of Purim. Esther is above all others the book of Jewish nationalism; Purim is the great national day. It is significant that Esther's Hebrew name, Hadassah (2:7), is 3 After these things did king Ahasuerus promote Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, and advanced him, and set his seat above all the princes that were with him.

2 And all the king's servants, that were in the king's gate, bowed, and reverenced Haman: for the king had so commanded concerning him. But Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence.

II. The Feud Between the House of Amalek and the House of Benjamin (3:1-9:19)

A. The Feud Between Haman and Mordecai (3:1-6)

3:1. Agagite: Josephus (Antiquities XI. 6. 5) interpreted this to mean "Amalekite," implying that Haman was a descendant of the Amalekite king of Saul's time—the only Agag mentioned in the O.T. (I Sam. 15:8). This interpretation, found also in the Talmud and the Targ., is adopted by many modern Jewish and Christian scholars. Thus the author constructs his plot upon a traditional blood feud—the most ancient and bitter in Israel's history—which is inherited by Mordecai, a descendant of an ancient Benjaminite line (2:5), and Haman, of the seed of King Agag. This fierce feud, which began when the Israelites were attacked by the Amalekites in the wilderness, is recalled by two ancient passages embedded in the book of Exodus (17:14, 16), the burden of which is that the Lord declares eternal war against Amalek until his memory is blotted out. Baalam's oracle (ca. 1000 b.c.) promises that Israel's king shall be "higher than Agag" (Num. 24:7), and Amalek is emphatically cursed in the Law (Deut. 25:17-19). According to the narrative of I Sam. 15, Saul received from Samuel the divine commission to fulfill the curse against the Amalekites, but because in his leniency with Agag he was not willing utterly to destroy them, his kingdom was taken from him and Samuel himself had to hew "Agag in pieces before the Lord" (I Sam. 15:33). From this perspective the book of Esther may be regarded as the inexorable working out of the divine curse against Amalek, remnants of which persisted even after their alleged total destruction in the days of Hezekiah (I Chr. 4:43). This explains why Haman is regarded as "the enemy of the Jews" (vs. 10). The LXX reading "Macedonian" for "Agagite" in 9:24 (cf. also 16:10 LXX) merely brings out the same idea to readers for whom the Greek power, ever since the infamous tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes, was a symbol of hostility to the Jews. In the present verse the LXX "Bougaeani" (Βοῦγαεαν, cf. 9:10; 12:6 LXX) is obscure. If it is not corrupt (Vulg. follows M.T. here and in 9:24), it is possibly another synonym of reproach.

Set his seat above all the princes: He was made grand vizier, a position second only to that of the king (cf. 10:3; Gen. 41:39-45).

2-4. The reason for Mordecai's insolence is given in vs. 4: He had told them that he was a Jew. But why should the fact of being a Jew make it impossible to participate in the name of the women's Zionist organization of the United States. Originally called the Daughters of Zion, Hadassah is the largest Jewish women's organization in the United States and in the world. Hadassah—Esther—is a symbol of the loyalty and devotion every Jew owes to his people.

3:1. Haman. Haman is in our terminology an anti-Semite. He is promoted by Ahasuerus to the position of grand vizier (3:1), and he is deeply offended when Mordecai "bowed not, nor did him reverence" (3:2). This may be symbolic of the feud between the Israelites and the Amalekites (see Exeg. on 3:1-6), but Haman by extension has become the Jew-hater, a universal figure. It is not a personal feud between Haman and Mordecai that is related in Esther and remembered on Purim; anti-Semitism is not the hatred of one Gentile for one Jew. To Haman, Mordecai is typical of all the Persian court ceremony, when prostration before superiors was a universal custom in the ancient Orient (cf. I Sam. 24:8; II Sam. 14:4; I Kings 1:16; et passim)? According to an old interpretation, Haman claimed divine honors for himself (so 13:14 LXX; I Targum gratuitously adds that he wore an idol on his clothing). But this can hardly be the intended meaning, since Mordecai later could not have become grand vizier without giving Xerxes the honors he refused Haman, and on other points he displayed no religious scruples when adherence to the principles of Judaism was inexpedient. Observing that the king had given orders of a special kind to enforce prostration before Haman, some scholars have concluded that Haman was of low origin—an upstart before whom those of the established aristocracy were loath to bow. This likewise reads meaning into the text. Actually, a traditional antipathy flares up between “Mordecai the Jew” and “Haman the Agagite” when each knows who the other is, and thus provides the literary reason for Haman’s plot to liquidate the Jews. II Targum suggests in connection with vs. 3 that no self-respecting Benjaminite could bow before the seed of the ancient enemy of the Jews.
3 Then the king’s servants, which were in the king’s gate, said unto Mordecai, Why transgrest thou the king’s commandment? 4 Now it came to pass, when they spake daily unto him, and he hearkened not unto them, that they told Haman, to see whether Mordecai’s matters would stand: for he had told them that he was a Jew. 5 And when Haman saw that Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence, then was Haman full of wrath. 6 And he thought scorn to lay hands on Mordecai alone; for they had showed him the people of Mordecai: wherefore Haman sought to destroy all the Jews that were throughout the whole kingdom of Ahasuerus, even the people of Mordecai.

5-6. The reason for Haman’s self-restraint is given in the words for they had showed him the people of Mordecai (RSV obscures this connection by its sentence division). As a hereditary enemy of the Jews, Haman’s vengeance falls not merely upon one man but upon the entire community of which he is a part. His vengeance is postponed not because of his tolerance or the desire to maintain the dignity of his office but because literary considerations of the plot demand it.

Jewish people; he is different, he does not conform. This is the way all Jews are: “And Haman said unto King Ahasuerus, There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of thy kingdom; and their laws are diverse from all people; neither keep they the king’s laws” (3:8). Minority groups are always subject to suspicion. In the early years of the twentieth century many Protestants living in the Middle West believed that every time a boy was born into a Roman Catholic family a rifle was stored in the basement of the local church for his use against the Protestants when the time should come. It was widely believed in China that Christians took children to their orphanages and hospitals and there made medicine out of their eyes. Examples of such suspicions are numerous. Wherever a minority group is sufficiently different from the people around it, it is suspect. Then if there is an individual or a group who make these rumors articulate, multiply them, spread them, persecution follows. This was Haman’s method: “If it please the king, let it be written that they may be destroyed” (3:9).

Anti-Semitism is a modern term. It appeared first apparently in Germany about 1875, and was used in a pamphlet written by the founder of an anti-Semitic league, Wilhelm Marr. It is 7 ¶ In the first month, that is, the month Nisan, in the twelfth year of king Ahasuerus, they cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman from day to day, and from month to month, to the twelfth month, that is, the month Adar.

8 ¶ And Haman said unto king Ahasuerus, There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of thy kingdom; and their laws are diverse from all people; neither keep they the king's laws: therefore it is not for the king's profit to suffer them.

7 In the first month, which is the month of Nisan, in the twelfth year of King Ahasuerus, they cast Pur, that is the lot, before Haman day after day; and they cast it month after month till the twelfth month, which is the month of Adar. 8 Then Haman said to King Ahasuerus, “There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the peoples in all the provinces of your kingdom; their laws are different from those of every other people, and they do not keep the king's laws, so that it is not

B. HAMAN'S PLOT (3:7-15)

7. Pur: This non-Hebraic word is explained by the Hebrew בְּרִית, lot. The correctness of the Hebrew synonym is now attested by a number of Assyrian texts in which puru has the meaning of lot, “die,” and is employed in connection with a verb, “to throw,” “to cause to fall” (see Intro., p. 825). In the Hebrew story Haman resorts to the lot in order to ascertain the propitious day for his proposed pogrom. This passage anticipates the conclusion of the book which describes the institution of Purim (i.e., “lots”). On the question of the genuineness of the verse see Intro., p. 824.

From day to day: Does this mean that the lot was cast each day successively, and that the process went on for some eleven months? Probably not, in view of the fact that in vs. 12 the scribes draft the edict in the thirteenth of the first month, evidently a short time after the casting of lots in the same month. Either the priests who manipulated the lot tried all of the days in a single act of divination, or first they tried the days, until the thirteenth was determined, and then the months until the twelfth was appointed. Perhaps Haman is described as carrying on the divination in the first month of Nisan (March-April) because, according to Babylonian religion, the gods came together at the New Year to seal the fate of men for the coming year; therefore any oracle obtained in that month would be peculiarly effective (so Gunkel).

“Till the lot fell on the thirteenth day of”: These words which are lacking in the M.T. (but cf. vs. 13; 8:12; 9:1), should perhaps be restored according to the LXX. The omission was due to the fact that a scribe inadvertently passed over a whole clause (haplography).

8. Scattered abroad and dispersed: A clear reference to the Dispersion which began with the Exile and reached its peak in the Greek and Roman periods.

Their laws are different: An allusion to the barrier of the law, which even in the Dispersion protected the Jew from cultural and racial assimilation. While Jews admit that this part of Haman's charge is true, they rightly argue that it does not necessarily make them unloyal subjects (see Jer. 29:7). Significantly, Haman does not mention Mordecai's disobedience of a royal decree (vss. 2-3), for Mordecai is only a single example of a general Jewish disloyalty to the king. So his antipathy for Mordecai finds expression in a political pogrom directed against all "traitorous" Jews, ostensibly in the interests of public welfare (on the sociological implications of this passage see Intro., pp. 828-29).

only in the twentieth century that the demonic power of anti-Semitism has been fully understood and used with complete logic as a political tool. But persecutions of the Jews antedate Christianity, and hostility to them is an ancient phenomenon. Some scholars believe that Esther is a concealed description of anti-Jewish move-
9. Ten thousand talents of silver: Undoubtedly the narrator intends to suggest that the "estate of Haman" (8:1) was worth this fantastic figure (about $18,000,000)—not that Haman hoped to reap that much money for the royal treasury by confiscating the property of prosperous Jews, for vs. 13 implies that those who were to carry out the massacre would get the plunder. Although individuals did amass great fortunes during the Persian period, this figure—estimated at easily two thirds of the annual revenue of the Persian Empire—is obviously an exaggeration.

10. The giving of his signet ring (cf. Gen. 41:42) in modern terms would be the same as granting permission to affix the royal signature to official documents. Thus the "enemy of the Jews" was given unlimited power and, as events later showed, the king remained blissfully ignorant about the "certain people" (vs. 8) condemned to destruction by his own edict.

11. The money is given to you: Does the author intend to say that the king refused this handsome bribe as a grandiose gesture of his immense royal wealth (cf. Herodotus History VII. 27-29, where Xerxes turns down a fabulously private fortune)? Or is this an example of Oriental court politeness, which implies that the king really expected that it would "seem good" to Haman to pay the money (cf. the bargaining described in Gen. 23:7-18)? The latter interpretation probably represents the intention of the author, for according to 4:7 Mordecai's information indicates that acceptance of the bribe was part of the deal (cf. also 7:4, "For we are sold").

The people: Significantly, the Jews were not mentioned by name in the interview between Haman and the king (cf. vs. 8, "a certain people"). In view of the king's subsequent honoring of Mordecai the Jew (ch. 6), it would seem as if the author suggests that the careless and indifferent king was kept in the dark as to the people consigned to destruction. If so, this caricature of Xerxes as an impressionable monarch who, on the slenderest evidence presented by his crafty vizier, lightheartedly allowed the liquidation of one of the (unnamed) peoples of his empire, serves to exaggerate the fact of the unjust and wanton treatment of the Jews. The Xerxes of the book of Esther is a weakling who is completely dominated by his eunuchs and court officials. This is not the "historical" Xerxes (see Intro., p. 827).

rumors about the Jews. He may be a man possessing little but a burning hatred of Jewish people, gathering about that fire of enmity those who will persecute and destroy. He may be a man of position who knows what a weapon anti-Semitism is and uses it for his own gain.

But whoever he may be, his fate will be the fate of Haman. This is what the story of Esther tells about Haman, the enemy of the Jews, the fate which he had prepared for Mordecai is his.
"So they hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai" (7:10). This is the every province, and to the rulers of every people of every province according to the writing thereof, and to every people after their language: in the name of king Ahas-uerus it was written, and sealed with the king's ring.
13 And the letters were sent by posts into all the king's provinces, to destroy, to kill, and to cause to perish, all Jews, both young and old, little children and women, in one day, even upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month Adar, and to take the spoil of them for a prey.
14 The copy of the writing for a commandment to be given in every province was published unto all people, that they should be ready against that day.
15 The posts went out, being hastened by the king's commandment, and the decree was given in Shushan the palace. And the king and Haman sat down to drink; but the city Shushan was perplexed.

13. Couriers (lit., "runners")· An allusion to the famous Persian postal system first introduced by Cyrus (ibid., V. 14. VIII. 98; Xenophon Cyropaedia VIII. 6. 17-18).
It was similar to the pony express of American history. To destroy, to slay, and to annihilate: While there is no extrabiblical evidence of the wholesale slaughter of Jews dering Xerxes' reign, Haman's decree has literally been put into effect many times, from the persecutions of Antiochus IV to the Nazi ovens at Buchenwald. To plunder their goods: An inducement to the people to engage in indiscriminate slaughter of men, women, and children.

(After vs. 13 the LXX [13:1-7] interpolates an imaginary copy of "Artaxerxes'" anti-Jewish decree.)

14. The massacre did not begin at once, but was set for a day exactly eleven months from the issuing of the edict. The postponement is a literary device, conveniently based on Haman's casting lots. The author needs to allow a sufficient interval for the frustration of Haman's plot and the turning of the tables (cf. 9.1). There is no thought of allowing time for the Jews to escape (where could they flee from the vast Persian Empire?) or increasing Jewish suffering through prolonging the suspense.

15. The king and Haman sat down to drink: An effective piece of literary contrast (cf. III Macc. 5:3). It is an example of a Nero fiddling while Rome burns.

The city of Susa was perplexed: I.e., thrown into consternation over the ominous developments which had taken place in the citadel. Far from being animated by any anti-Semitism, the peace-loving citizens of Susa, though predominantly Gentile, mirrored Jewish feelings of dismay over such an outrageous and arbitrary edict (cf. 8:15).

851
4 When Mordecai perceived all that was done, Mordecai rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth with ashes, and went out into the midst of the city, and cried with a loud and a bitter cry;

2 And came even before the king's gate: for none might enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth.

3 And in every province, whithersoever the king's commandment and his decree came, there was great mourning among the Jews, and fasting, and weeping, and wailing; and many lay in sackcloth and ashes.

C. Mordecai's Plans (4:1-17)

4:1. Rent his clothes: The ancestral custom of mourning included tearing the garment, putting on haircloth (Hebrew, saq), covering the head with ashes or dust, fasting and wailing. In these rites (cf. vs. 16) the author comes as close to the practical religion of Judaism as he does anywhere. In Judith 4:9-12 the rites are employed to implore God's intervention on behalf of the Jews. This thought may be in the background of the author's mind here, although Mordecai's actions are motivated also by his attempt to arouse the curiosity of Esther in the palace.

2. Mordecai could go only as far as the open square of the city which was in front of the king's gate (vs. 6), because he was in a state of mourning and therefore ceremonially unclean.

thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy" (Ps. 137:5-6). The people learned how to "sing the Lorp's song in a strange land" (Ps. 137:4). They were not contaminated by the paganism of their environment. When, after the Exile, they returned to Jerusalem, they were no less exclusive.

They had been compelled to magnify their particularisms if Babylon was not to absorb them, and they had done this with such notable success that then, as now, they maintained their unconquerable distinctness. Moreover, the new community on Zion was able to maintain itself only by vehement exclusiveness, so that in the end the survival of Israel would hardly have been possible without fierce nationalism, uncompromising racial prejudice, and bigoted devotion to religious peculiarities.6

It was this spirit which preserved for us the religion of Israel. And although in Esther we have only the nationalism, the means by which the faith was kept intact, we value the book for its characterization of a people determined to preserve their heritage at whatever cost.

However, it is this very thing in the book,

"the fiery heart of Jewish nationalism," which presents the chief difficulty for the Christian expositor. Julian Morgenstern has described the effect of separatism on the mission of the Jews and its formative influence on Christianity:

This feeling of peoplehood, this consciousness of uniqueness and separateness in the world, narrowed, but at the same time deepened, the application of the principle of universalism in Judaism. It held Judaism back from a world-wide proselytizing program of absolute universalism, and thus actually called Christianity into being, as its daughter-religion, and gave to it its mission to become the proselytizing religion of the western world, transcending all differences of peoplehood and nationhood.7

This, it appears, was the divine mission of the Jews. But what of the persistence and continuance of Jewish nationalism? The separatism which was so necessary for the Jews in the Exile and in the postexilic period has persisted; they resist assimilation today. This resistance is met frequently with hostility, and the hostility strengthens the resistance. Since Esther is regarded by Jewish scholars as presenting "the war that Jews must carry on from time to time, 7 In an address given at The Hebrew Union College, 1943, published by the College in pamphlet form under the title, Nation, People, Religion—What Are We?

4 When Esther's maids and her eunuchs came and told her, the queen was deeply distressed; she sent garments to clothe Mor'decai, so that he might take off his sackcloth, but he would not accept them. Then Esther called for Hathach, one of the king's eunuchs, who had been appointed to attend her, and ordered him to go to Mor'decai to learn what this was and why it was. Hathach went out to Mor'decai in the open square of the city in front of the king's gate, and Mor'decai told him all that had happened to him, and the exact sum of money that Haman had promised to pay into the king's treasuries for the destruction of the Jews. Mor'decai also gave him a copy of the written decree issued in Susa for their destruction, that he might show it to Esther and explain it to her and charge her to go to the king to make supplication to him and entreat him for her people. And Hathach went and told Esther what Mor'decai had said. Then Esther spoke to Hathach and gave him a message for Mor'decai.

4. Sent garments: So Mor'decai could resume his accustomed place in the city gate (cf. vs. 2). According to Talmudic Judaism, one should not make a public show of his personal bereavement and thus inflict his sufferings upon others. Mor'decai's refusal to accept the clothing was an evidence to Esther that his actions were caused not by a personal sorrow, but by an unusually dire public calamity.

7. The exact sum of money: A reference to Haman's bribe. This allusion loses its point if 3:11 does not imply that the king intended to accept the money. Of course it might be assumed that Mor'decai was misinformed: however, since it is repeatedly implied that he had access to an inside source of information, the most natural interpretation is that acceptance of the blood money was part of the transaction.

against the enemies that seek to destroy them."
the book does provide "the basis for a realistic discussion of anti-Semitism" (see Intro., p. 828). Both Jew and Christian can combat anti-Semitism most effectively when they understand its historical elements.
It is true that the form which anti-Semitism takes "has practically nothing to do with the Jews at all," the charges made against them have "absolutely no foundation of fact whatever in any action of any Jew or group of Jews now or in the past." The charges that Jews control the press and government, hold financial power in many countries, and are leagued together in a plot to take over the world, are the creation of those who would destroy the Jews. Anti-Semitism is a manifestation of demonic power, and its most violent and destructive outbreak has come in the twentieth century of the Christian Era in a country which had known the Christian message for a thousand years!

11 All the king's servants, and the people of the king's provinces, do know, that whoever, whether man or woman, shall come unto the king into the inner court, who is not called, there is one law of his to put him to death, except such to whom the king shall hold out the golden sceptre, that he may live: but I have not been called to come in unto the king these thirty days.

12 And they told to Mordecai Esther's words.

13 Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther, Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews.

14 For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth Mordecai, saying, 11 "All the king's servants and the people of the king's provinces know that if any man or woman goes to the king inside the inner court without being called, there is but one law; all alike are to be put to death, except the one to whom the king holds out the golden scepter that he may live. And I have not been called to come in to the king these thirty days." 12 And they told Mor'deaux what Esther had said. 13 Then Mor'dexal told them to return answer to Esther, "Think not that in the king's palace you will escape any more than all the other Jews. 14 For if you keep silence at such a time as this, relief and deliverance will rise for the Jews from another quarter, but you and your father's

11. It is true that Persian kings were surrounded by ceremonial customs which protected them from unnecessary annoyance or attempted assassination; but according to Herodotus and Xenophon any subject could ask for an interview and, if his credentials were proper, be summoned. Was the queen ignorant of this aspect of Persian court etiquette? Undoubtedly the author here introduces a fanciful feature by which he intends to magnify the later heroism of Esther. A Jewish scholar observes with realistic candor that initially Esther was more concerned about her own safety than about the welfare of her people (Jacob Hoschander, The Book of Esther in the Light of History [Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning, 1928], p. 192).

These thirty days: Perhaps this implies that Esther had lost favor with the moody king, thus making a request to be announced out of the question, or an uninvited appearance extremely hazardous.

13. Mordecai rebukes Esther's thought of personal safety by appealing to her enlightened self-interest in these terms: "You have nothing to lose, but perhaps everything to gain." Going to the king may involve the risk of death, but keeping silent will mean certain death for all Jews, the queen and her family included.

14. From another place: The meaning of this phrase is one of the most debated issues in the study of Esther. According to the oldest view, represented by Lucian's LXX, Josephus, and the Targ., place (דניבן) is a substitute for the name of God, following the practice in late Judaism of avoiding direct mention of the sacred Name (cf. "mercy" in I Macc. 16:3 or "heaven" in the Matthean phrase, "the kingdom of heaven"). While many modern scholars accept this interpretation, others believe that the reference is to political help which will come from another quarter, i.e., abroad (e.g., from Rome in the Maccabean period; cf. I Macc. 8:17; 12:1). The issue hinges upon one's view as to the reason for the author's deliberate avoidance of religious terminology in passages where the context seemingly demands it (see Intro., p. 829). However, even though the latter view is adopted, it by no means precludes the possibility that the author had in mind some providential working through a human agency.

You and your father's house will perish: According to the traditional view, this would be divine judgment upon Esther for the neglect of her opportunity and responsibility.

Who knows whether you have not come . . .?: Having formulated his initial argument in terms of Esther's best interests, Mordecai here suggests that she has a higher vocation. This is only a "perhaps," but the possibility is reticently suggested that whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?

15 ¶ Then Esther bade them return Mordecai this answer,

16 Go, gather together all the Jews that are present in Shushan, and fast ye for me, and neither eat nor drink three days, night or day: I also and my maidens will fast likewise; and so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law: and if I perish, I perish.

17 So Mordecai went his way, and did according to all that Esther had commanded him.

Now it came to pass on the third day, that Esther put on her royal apparel, and stood in the inner court of the king's house, over against the king's house: and house will perish. And who knows whether you have not come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" 15 Then Esther told them to reply to Mor'decai, 16 "Go, gather all the Jews to be found in Susa, and hold a fast on my behalf, and neither eat nor drink for three days, night or day. I and my maids will also fast as you do. Then I will go to the king, though it is against the law; and if I perish, I perish." 17 Mor'decai then went away and did everything as Esther had ordered him.

On the third day Esther put on her royal robes and stood in the inner court

Providence has exalted Esther to the kingdom (better with the American Jewish Translation, "to royal estate") in order that she might be the savior of her people in a critical time.

16. Fast on my behalf: Since fasting was usually accompanied by prayer (II Sam. 12:16; Dan. 9:3; Jonah 3:5-9, et passim), these words seem to carry the force of intercessory prayer, i.e., "pray for me." This is another instance in which the author studiously avoids religious terminology even when the context demands it.

I and my maids will also fast: Here Esther proposes to engage in a purely religious act, for she needs not only moral but spiritual support in her dangerous enterprise. Her religious act, which in this instance is not a mere sign of mourning, seems to suggest that she has understood Mordecai's words in vs. 14 to have a religious meaning.

If I perish, I perish: This climactic utterance has been variously estimated. According to the Jewish commentator Solomon Goldman, it is "a simple, but sublime and courageous statement of resignation to God's will" ("Esther," p. 218). On the other hand, L. B. Paton describes it as "a despairing expression of resignation to the inevitable," and adds: "No religious enthusiasm lights up Esther's resolve. She goes, as one would submit to an operation, because there is a chance of escaping death in that way." (A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Esther [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1908; "International Critical Commentary"], p. 226.) Both views oversimplify the case by failing to consider the ambiguous mixture of self-consideration and altruistic devotion to her people which finally motivated Esther to risk her life.

(Here the LXX interpolates a prayer by Mordecai [13:8-18] and a prayer by Esther [14:1-19].)

D. Esther's Audience (5:1-8)

5:1. Stood in the inner court: Since the author is concerned with plot rather than character, he does not pause to describe Esther's emotions in this situation. The LXX, Quite apart from organized and directed anti-Semitic movements, there remains the question of Jewish nationalism and its consequences. Does the creation of the state of Israel make the Christian apologetic for the Jew more difficult? Will it in time make Jewish citizens of other states hyphenates? There is the possibility that Israel may become a thoroughly secular Jewish state. What then would become of the spiritual mission of the Jews?

When the Christian considers such issues as these, he faces a responsibility which is most serious, for here is disclosed "the fundamental cleavage between historic Judaism and prothe king sat upon his royal throne in the royal house, over against the gate of the house.

2 And it was so, when the king saw Esther the queen standing in the court, that she obtained favor in his sight: and the king held out to Esther the golden sceptre that was in his hand. So Esther drew near, and touched the top of the sceptre.

3 Then said the king unto her, What wilt thou, queen Esther? and what is thy request? it shall be even given thee to the half of the kingdom.

4 And Esther answered, If it seem good unto the king, let the king and Haman come this day unto the banquet that I have prepared for him.

5 Then the king said, Cause Haman to make haste, that he may do as Esther hath said. So the king and Haman came to the banquet that Esther had prepared.

6 ¶ And the king said unto Esther at the banquet of wine, What is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee: and what is thy request? even to the half of the kingdom it shall be performed.

7 Then answered Esther, and said, My petition and my request is;

8 If I have found favor in the sight of the king, and if it please the king to grant my petition, and to perform my request, let the king and Haman come to the banquet that I shall prepare for them, and I will do to-morrow as the king hath said.

of the king's palace, opposite the king's hall. The king was sitting on his royal throne inside the palace opposite the entrance to the palace; 2 and when the king saw Queen Esther standing in the court, she found favor in his sight and he held out to Esther the golden scepter that was in his hand. Then Esther approached and touched the top of the scepter. 3 And the king said to her, "What is it, Queen Esther? What is your request? It shall be given to you, even to the half of my kingdom." 4 And Esther said, "If it please the king, let the king and Haman come this day to a dinner that I have prepared for the king." 5 Then said the king, "Bring Haman quickly, that we may do as Esther desires." So the king and Haman came to the dinner that Esther had prepared. 6 And as they were drinking wine, the king said to Esther, "What is your petition? It shall be granted you. And what is your request? Even to the half of my kingdom, it shall be fulfilled." 7 But Esther said, "My petition and my request is: 8 If I have found favor in the sight of the king, and if it please the king to grant my petition and fulfil my request, let the king and Haman come tomorrowd to the dinner which I will prepare for them, and tomorrow I will do as the king has said."

4 Gk: Heb lacks tomorrow

However, expands vs. 1-2 at length, vividly describing Esther's feelings and appearance as she went before the king.

King's hall: The multipillared apadana or audience chamber, like the one archaeologists have discovered at Persepolis (see Olmstead's description of Xerxes' apadana, and the king giving audience in the chamber: History of Persian Empire, pp. 280-83).

2. The king found Esther's beauty irresistible, just as Holofernes was bewitched by Judith's charms. The versions (LXX, O.L., Lucian) interpret that it was God who changed the attitude of the king.

4-8. Why does Esther postpone, not merely once but twice, taking advantage of the king's benevolent mood? The rabbis were troubled over this in view of the fact that Esther was gambling with the lives of many Jews who were depending upon her. Again literary considerations have dictated the postponement. This not only builds up a situation of suspense, but allows an interval of time during which important developments take place.

Prophetic Christianity' (see Intro., p. 830). That cleavage cannot be ignored or denied, and yet out of that cleavage has come, often from Christian communities, violent anti-Jewish out-
Then went Haman forth that day joyful and with a glad heart: but when Haman saw Mordecai in the king's gate, that he stood not up, nor moved for him, he was full of indignation against Mordecai.

Nevertheless Haman refrained himself: and when he came home, he sent and called for his friends, and Zeresh his wife.

And Haman told them of the glory of his riches, and the multitude of his children, and all the things wherein the king had promoted him, and how he had advanced him above the princes and servants of the king.

Haman said moreover, Yea, Esther the queen did let no man come in with the king unto the banquet that she had prepared but myself; and to-morrow am I invited unto her also with the king.

Yet all this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king's gate.

Then said Zeresh his wife and all his friends unto him, Let a gallows be made of fifty cubits high, and to-morrow speak thou unto the king that Mordecai may be hanged thereon: then go thou in merrily with the king unto the banquet. And the thing pleased Haman; and he caused the gallows to be made.

E. PRIDE GOES BEFORE THE FALL (5:9-14)

9. Esther invited Haman to the wine banquets to inflate his pride, and thus to heighten the contrast between his rise and his fall. Mordecai, still unobsequious before his ancient enemy, had evidently heard from inside sources that Esther was favorably received by the king, for he had removed his sackcloth (cf. 4:2) and was sitting in his accustomed place in the king's gate.

11-12. The splendor of his riches included a large family of sons, which was regarded as an evidence of honor to either a Persian or a Jew. The author introduces this scene of Haman's boasting in order to accentuate the later scene of his humiliation.

14. Fifty cubits high, i.e., eighty-three feet. The exorbitant height of the gallows (lit., “tree”) should not be taken too seriously. The author suggests that the one who has dared offend the vanity of the grand vizier must be executed in a spectacular manner as a warning to all.

He had the gallows made, so confident was he that the king, who had already granted the total massacre of the Jews, would approve this also. Here the author has Christianity and Judaism.—The issues presented by the book of Esther center for the Christian in the relation of Judaism to Christianity. The Christian position is this: The historic mission of Judaism has been carried out, and its fulfillment is found in the Christian church. Do the Jewish people still have the 6 On that night the king could not sleep; and he gave orders to bring the book of memorable deeds, the chronicles, and they were read before the king. 2 And it was found written how Mor'decai had told about Bigthana and Teresh, two of the king's eunuchs, who guarded the threshold, and who had sought to lay hands upon King Ahasu-e'rus. 3 And the king said, "What honor or dignity has been bestowed on Mor'decai for this?" The king's servants who attended him said, "Nothing has been done for him." 4 And the king said, "Who is in the court?" Now Haman had just entered the outer court of the king's palace to speak to the king about having Mor'decai hanged on the gallows that he had prepared for him. 5 So the king's servants told him, "Haman is there, standing in the court." And the king said, "Let him come in." 6 So Haman came in. And the king said unto him, What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honor? Now Haman thought in his heart, To whom would the king delight to do honor more than to myself?

cleverly created a situation of suspense. Haman still has the confidence of the king, and the king does not know Mor'decai's relation to Esther. Esther has postponed making her request to the zero hour, with the result that the fate of Mor'decai and the Jews hangs in the balance.

F. AN UNREWARDED SERVICE (6:1-5)

These verses describe a series of striking coincidences which are decisive in the development of the plot. Admittedly fact is sometimes stranger than fiction, but the perfect timing of these events makes this part of the story too good to be true. Jewish commentators have found here not the working of chance, but God's intervention to save Israel.

6:1. The king could not sleep: Since this is necessary in the plot, it is useless to speculate on the cause. The sleeplessness of kings, of course, is a favorite theme of literature (cf. Dan. 6:18; 1 Esdras 3:3; Shakespeare, King Henry IV, Part 2, Act III, scene 1). The versions (LXX, O.L., Lucian) and Targs. add that it was God who took away his sleep.

Book of records of the chronicles: I.e., the royal annals mentioned in 2:23.

Were read: Lit., "they were being read," i.e., the scribes kept on reading far into the night, with the hope that the reading would have a soporific effect upon the king.

4. A fine touch of irony! In view of vs. 1, Haman must have arrived extremely early in the morning. Thus by a concrete action detail the author describes Haman's eagerness which proved to be his undoing.

G. HAMAN'S HUMILIATION (6:6-14)

It is important to notice that the king is not at all suspicious of Haman at this point (see 7:5-10, where his eyes are first opened). Therefore it is wrong to construe
7 And Haman answered the king, For the man whom the king delighteth to honor, to honor more than me?" 7 And Haman said to the king, "For the man whom the king delights to honor, 8 let royal robes be brought, which the king has worn, and the horse which the king has ridden, and on whose head a royal crown is set; 9 and let the robes and the horse be handed over to one of the king's most noble princes; let him array the man whom the king delights to honor, and let him conduct the man on horseback through the open square of the city, proclaiming before him: 'Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delights to honor.'" 10 Then the king said to Haman, "Make haste, take the robes and the horse, as you have said, and do so to Mordecai the Jew who sits at the king's gate. Leave out nothing that you have mentioned." 11 So Haman took the robes and the horse, and he arrayed Mordecai and made him ride through the open square of the city, proclaiming, "Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delights to honor."

*Heb them

the following verses to mean that the king tries to draw Haman into a trap and impose upon him the first installment in his punishment. The passage is an excellent example of irony. In the same moment that Haman had intended to ask the king for vengeance, he is forced to honor his enemy, although the unsuspecting king remains ignorant of the fact that he deals a crushing blow to the pride of his grand vizier.

6. Mordecai's name is unmentioned because it is part of the author's literary scheme to have the conceited villain pronounce judgment upon himself with his own mouth. "It is a fine stroke of literary art by which Haman himself is made to decide what honours shall be paid to the man whom he has decided to hang" (Paton, op. cit., p. 247).

8. "The king's benefactor"—to use Herodotus' phrase (History VIII. 85)—is to be decorated with the highest marks of distinction in characteristically Oriental fashion (cf. Gen. 41:38-44).

On whose head: I.e., the horse's head. The reading his head (KJV) is unnecessary, since Assyrian reliefs picture horses wearing tall crownlike head ornaments.

10-11. Why did the king single out a Jew for these special honors when an anti-Jewish edict had already been sent out in his name? We must not suppose that the king had discarded Haman's sanguinary scheme as soon as he recalled Mordecai's meritorious act, for this would fail to explain the king's surprise on hearing Esther's request (7:7). Rather, it seems that the king, totally oblivious to what was going on under his very eyes, did not connect Mordecai the Jew with the unnamed people of 3:8 (cf. 3:11), even as he did not connect Mordecai with Esther at this stage. According to this interpretation, there is no inconsistency in the story.

"appointed mission of calling the attention of the rest of the world to the truth that God exists and has a purpose in history?" This was the calling and the privilege of the Hebrews;

* Ibid., pp 142-43.
12 Then Mordecai returned to the king's gate. But Haman hurried to his house, mourning and with his head covered. 13 And Haman told Zeresh his wife and all his friends every thing that had befallen him. Then said his wise men and Zeresh his wife unto him, If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt not prevail against him, but shalt surely fall before him. 14 And while they were yet talking with him, came the king's chamberlains, and hasted to bring Haman unto the banquet that Esther had prepared.

12. Although he had been recognized as “the king's benefactor,” Mordecai’s position had not changed in the court. Thus he returned to the king's gate. Only the later disclosure of his relation to Esther brought about his elevation to a higher rank (cf. 8:1).

His head covered: A sign of despair and wretchedness (cf. II Sam. 15:30; Jer. 14:3-4). With the exception of this faint suggestion, the author does not develop the emotional reactions of Haman or Mordecai (as does LXX), because as usual his interest centers in plot rather than character.

13. This scene, which contrasts Haman's despairing mood with the boasting spirit displayed at the previous family gathering (5:10-14), is introduced for the purpose of allowing Haman’s closest friends to predict his downfall. One of the author’s favorite literary techniques is that of repeating a situation in order to bring in some further feature of the plot (cf. 2:19(?); 5:9; 6:2; 7:1 ff.; 8:3 ff.; 9:12-13).

Wise men: The friends mentioned in this verse and in 5:10, 14. Goldman suggestively points out that this time the friends are called wise men with deliberate irony: they are wise after the event. Previously they had incited him to take vengeance upon the Jew. “Now, conveniently forgetting that Haman’s humiliation was largely the fault of their suggestion, they heap coals on his head and, perhaps deriving some malicious satisfaction from his miserable predicament, warn him that this is the beginning of [the] end.” (“Esther,” p. 226.) With real wisdom his friends and wife see that this is no mere temporary reversal, for Haman has already begun to fall even though he still has the king’s favor and an anti-Jewish edict is in effect. Probably the author implies that they have in mind the realization that Haman’s doom is foreordained because of the ancient curse against Amalek which still possesses deadly power (see Exeg. on 3:1). An Agagite has no chance against a Benjaminite. Jewish writers delighted to place upon the lips of a source found in both the O.T. and the N.T. Much contemporary Christian preaching touches only lightly on the preparation, on the heritage of the religion of Moses and the prophets. In a survey of 1,845 sermons published between 1914 and 1942, only 55 by Christian ministers were found to have made any basic or illustrative use of the eighth-century prophets. This is indicative of a tendency in Christian preaching to use only the N.T. The N.T. is a new cove-

3 Then Esther the queen answered and said, If I have found favor in thy sight, O king, and if it please the king, let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request:

4 For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish. But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue, although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage.

5 ¶ Then the king Ahasuerus answered and said unto Esther the queen, Who is he, and where is he, that durst presume in his heart to do so?

6 And Esther said, The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman. Then Haman was afraid before the king and the queen.

Heathen such confessions of the inevitable triumph of the chosen people (Judith 5.20-21; III Macc. 3:8-10; 5:31; etc).

H. Haman's Downfall (7:1-10)

7:3. According to Goldman (ibid., p. 227), the words of Esther's request "have a specially poignant appeal to the Jew who is conscious of the interdependence of the fate of the individual Jew and the fate of the Jewish people," and are included in two of the most beautiful liturgies of the Jewish penitential prayers

4. We are sold: The verb "sell" (לכד), which in the book of Judges is used in the general sense of "deliver up to enemies," seems in this case to allude to Haman's bribe (see Exeg. on 3:11; 4:7).

Our affliction . . . loss to the king: Here Esther is contrasting the hypothetical situation of the enslavement of the Jews with the actual situation of their imminent destruction. However, the M.T. is very obscure, and a variety of translations and interpretations have been proposed. Perhaps the meaning is represented by the following paraphrase: Esther would have kept silent were it merely a case of Haman having "sold" the Jews into slavery, since in their loyalty to Xerxes they would have considered the king's gain derived from the success of his plot to be more important than their humiliation; but since it is a case of their being "sold" into total destruction (vs. 4a), Esther feels it her duty to intervene, even though this means that the king might suffer considerable financial loss. The RSV fails to take into consideration that vs. 4b§ actually is governed by the hypothetical clause, if we had been sold merely as slaves, of vs. 4bα. Therefore translate: "Since [in that case] the affliction were not to be compared . . . (cf. Amer. Trans. "would not have been"). The words loss to the king evidently refer to the loss of the ten thousand talents (3:9) which the royal treasury would suffer if Haman's plot were frustrated.

While this seems to be the best interpretation, some translators (cf. KJV) believe that יָצ should not be translated affliction, "calamity," but enemy, "adversary" (i.e., Haman; cf. יָצ שֶׁנִּי in vs. 6). So the American Jewish Translation reads, "For the adversary is not worthy that the king be endangered."

5. The king's question does not indicate that he has forgotten his previous grant to Haman, or that he is dull because of being intoxicated with wine (Hoschander). Rather, it shows that the king fails to see any connection between Esther and the unnamed people whose destruction he had allowed (3:13). The king is naively unaware of the plot which has developed in his own court and which he has abetted by his own actions.
7. The author introduces the king's dramatic exit for two reasons: (a) to suggest by an action the impact of Esther's words upon him, as he suddenly realized how his own vizier had duped him in a plot which threatened his queen; and (b) to allow time for the introduction of an incident which proved to be all that was necessary to incite the angry king to decisive action. Notice that in the dialogue of the preceding verses Esther had not revealed her Jewish identity, but had based her request on her position as queen. So in the present situation it is enough for the king to know that the lives of his queen and her people have been threatened.

8. Haman was falling on the couch: In the posture of a supplicant, he was doubtless "seizing the feet" (cf. 8:3; II Kings 4:27; Matt. 28:9) of the queen who was on the couch where she had been reclining in the customary Persian manner during the banquet. In this ludicrous episode the reader sees all three characters as they really are: Haman, actually an arrogant bully who turns into a whining coward when trapped; the king, capricious and impressionable, and weak despite his show of power; and Esther, victorious through the exercise of her feminine charms, but callous and indifferent as the once-proud heathen asks for mercy. Though Esther could have spoken a word in explanation of Haman's action, or even insisted that he be allowed to speak in self-defense, she looked on in cold silence.

They covered Haman's face: This is usually explained as a mark of capital punishment, corresponding to the ancient Greek and Roman practice of covering the face of a criminal before he was led away to execution. However, there is no evidence that this was a Persian custom. C. C. Torrey argues that the original read, "and Haman's face was covered" (which in Hebrew would be represented by יֵשָׁנָה instead of יָשָׁנָה—so Syriac; cf. I Targum), in which case it was Haman who covered his face as a sign of wretchedness and despair, as in 6:12. Some claim on the basis of the LXX that the text should be changed slightly to read, "his face became flushed" (וַיִּשָּׁנָה), i.e., with dismay and shame.

But it is also true that the O.T. is incomplete without the N.T. This is the basic Christian conviction: Christ is Lord, he is Lord of all men. He has "broken down the middle wall of partition" (Eph. 2:14). "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3:28). Christianity is a missionary religion, Judaism is not. This is the distinction between them in operational terms. The gospel is to be proclaimed, then, to Jews as well as to other non-Christians. There is, of course, always the danger that we shall preach 9 And Harbonah, one of the chamberlains, said before the king, Behold also the gallows fifty cubits high, which Haman had made for Mordecai, who had spoken good for the king, standeth in the house of Haman. Then the king said, Hang him thereon.

10 So they hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai. Then was the king's wrath pacified.

On that day did the king Ahasuerus give the house of Haman the Jews' enemy unto Esther the queen. And Mordecai came before the king; for Esther had told what he was unto her.

Moreover, the gallows... is standing: The word דא (Moreover) has the force of an additional accusation. Harbonah adds further insult to injury by suggesting that Haman had attempted to do away with one of "the king's benefactors" to whom Xerxes was indebted for his life. Knowing that the king had already determined evil against Haman (vs. 7), the eunuch's remark is carefully timed to suggest to the impressive villain a method by which the villain's punishment might be carried out with appropriate poetic justice.

The author is a master of irony. Unwittingly Haman had been digging his own grave (cf. Prov. 26:27). As Goldman observes, this is truly "measure for measure." The punishment meted out here is a foreshadowing of the measure-for-measure vengeance which the triumphant Jews were to inflict later upon their enemies.

J. Mordecai's Advancement (8:1-2)

8:1. The house of Haman: His estate (cf. 7:9). The state had the power to confiscate the property of condemned criminals.

Mordecai came before the king: He was raised to the rank of the small group of officials who had the right to "see the king's face" (1:14) without the necessity of awaiting ceremonial summons.

What he was to her: Previously Mordecai had risen on his own merits to the rank of royal benefactor, but immediately had retired to his former position in the king's ourselves and not Christ Jesus, that we shall think ourselves superior, racially superior. Anti-Semitic propaganda has come often from the Christian church. It is an evil found even within the church.

Anti-Semitism antedates Christianity and it is not suggested that it is a purely Christian phenomenon, but it is aided by false Christian teaching and it results in the appalling situation present in several countries where Christian churches are reluctant, or frankly refuse, to receive a Jewish convert. It is plain that where racial and physical conditions of church membership override the conversion of heart and will, the Christian religion has ceased to exist except in a vain form.¹

The Christian missionary motive and the problem involved in the Christian approach to the Jew are stated thus by A. E. Garvie:

God has no favourites individual or national; but His love impartially embraces all and He wills that all be saved. Even liberal Jews are opposed to Christian missions to the Jews, and among orthodox as well as liberal Jews alike the missionary motive for their own faith is lacking. As I was engaged in friendly talk on this matter with a Jewish scholar and saint I put the argument for missions thus: "If I possess a treasure I value above all, and if I know that others have as great need of it as I have, can you blame me if I want to share it?" He gave a sincere assent; that meant a permanent change of attitude in him as at a later meeting he confessed. This is the primary missionary motive.²

2 And the king took off his ring, which he had taken from Haman, and gave it unto Mordecai. And Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman.

3 ¶ And Esther spake yet again before the king, and fell down at his feet, and besought him with tears to put away the mischief of Haman the Agagite, and his device that he had devised against the Jews.

4 Then the king held out the golden sceptre toward Esther. So Esther arose, and stood before the king.

5 And said, If it please the king, and if I have found favor in his sight, and the thing seem right before the king, and I be pleasing in his eyes, let it be written to reverse the letters devised by Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, which he wrote to destroy the Jews which are in all the king's provinces:

6 For how can I endure to see the evil that shall come unto my people? or how can I endure to see the destruction of my kindred?

7 ¶ Then the king Ahasuerus said unto Esther the queen and to Mordecai the Jew, Behold, I have given Esther the house of Haman, and him they have hanged upon the gallows, because he laid his hand upon the Jews.

he was to her; 2 and the king took off his signet ring, which he had taken from Haman, and gave it to Mordecai. And Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman.

3 Then Esther spoke again to the king; she fell at his feet and besought him with tears to avert the evil design of Haman the Agagite and the plot which he had devised against the Jews. 4 And the king held out the golden scepter to Esther, 5 and Esther rose and stood before the king. And she said, "If it please the king, and if I have found favor in his sight, and if the thing seem right before the king, and I be pleasing in his eyes, let an order be written to revoke the letters devised by Haman the Agagite, the son of Hammeda'tha, which he wrote to destroy the Jews who are in all the provinces of the king. 6 For how can I endure to see the calamity that is coming to my people? Or how can I endure to see the destruction of my kindred?" 7 Then King Ahasu-e'rus said to Queen Esther and to Mor'decai the Jew, "Behold, I have given Esther the house of Haman, and they have hanged him on the gallows, because he

K. Esther's Petition (8:3-8)

4. Again the author resorts to his favorite literary device of repeating a previous scene (see Exeg. on 6:13), viz., Esther's audience with the king (5:1-4), in order to deal with the fate of the Jews in the empire. Usually commentators assume that in this case Esther took her life in hand a second time by going to the king unsummoned, but in view of the fact that the scepter was extended after her impassioned plea in behalf of her people, this can hardly be the meaning intended. Moreover, Mordecai at this time had constant access to the king, and the cousins surely could have arranged a summons without Esther's having to resort to unnecessary personal risk. Probably the extension of the scepter was merely an indication that the king, moved to sympathy because of her emotional plea, desired her to rise from the posture of a supplicant and continue her speech. It is unnecessary to assume that the author limits the king's use of the scepter to one function, viz., granting immunity from the stringent Persian law (cf. 4:11; 5:2).

7. Said to Queen Esther and to Mordecai: Although Mordecai is not mentioned in the above verses, we may assume that he was in the throne room too. To be sure, some 8 Write ye also for the Jews, as it liketh you, in the king's name, and seal it with the king's ring: for the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may no man reverse.

9 Then were the king's scribes called at that time in the third month, that is, the month Sivan, on the three and twentieth day thereof; and it was written according to all that Mordecai commanded unto the Jews, and to the lieutenants, and to the provosts of the provinces which are from India unto Ethiopia, a hundred twenty and seven provinces, unto every province according to the writing thereof, and unto every people after their language, and to the Jews according to their writing, and according to their language.

10 And he wrote in the king Ahasuerus' name, and sealed it with the king's ring, and sent letters by posts on horseback, and riders on mules, camels, and young dromedaries:

11 Wherein the king granted the Jews which were in every city to gather themselves together, and to stand for their life, to destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish, all the power of the people and province that would assault them, both little ones and women, and to take the spoil of them for a prey.

versions (LXX, O.L., Syriac) omit the phrase and to Mordecai the Jew, but the plurals in vs. 8 make it unsafe to change the text at this point. In his speech the king does not imply that he has done all that can be reasonably expected and that Esther should be satisfied, but merely emphasizes that his past actions show his predisposition in favor of the Jews.

8. The king rejects Esther's appeal that the letters be annulled (vs. 5) because the story presupposes that Persian law is unalterable (cf. 1:19) once it is sealed with the king's signet. However, within the limits of Persian law he permits the previous decree to be neutralized in effect. There is no extrabiblical evidence that Persian decrees were irretractable. Undoubtedly this is a fictitious detail (cf. Dan. 6:8, 12, 15) which is introduced to justify the subsequent day of massacre (cf. 9:1-10).

L. A NEW DEGREE (8:9-14)

10. This time the couriers (3:13, 15) went out in unusual haste because they were furnished with superior horses from the royal stables. The KJV misunderstands the difficult words in the M.T.

11. Defend their lives (RSV), lit., stand for their life (KJV): Valiant efforts have been made, especially by those who have an apologetic interest in Esther, to show that this verse means only that the Jews were given the right of self-defense. It is argued that whereas the previous decree had implied that the Jews must submit quietly to massacre (3:13), this decree gave only the right of organized resistance which any people would claim. Probably the author does intend to say that the Gentiles would make the first move, since they had the authorization of a prior irrevocable edict.
12 Upon one day in all the provinces of king Ahasuerus, namely, upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month of Adar.

13 The copy of the writing for a commandment to be given in every province was published unto all people, and that the Jews should be ready against that day to avenge themselves on their enemies.

14 So the posts that rode upon mules and camels went out, being hastened and pressed on by the king's commandment. And the decree was given at Shushan the palace.

15 ¶ And Mordecai went out from the presence of the king in royal apparel of blue and white, and with a great crown of gold, and with a garment of fine linen and purple: and the city of Shushan rejoiced and was glad.

16 The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honor.

17 And in every province, and in every city, whithersoever the king's commandment and his decree came, the Jews had joy and gladness, a feast and a good day. And many of the people of the land became to plunder their goods, upon one day throughout all the provinces of King Ahasuerus, on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month of Adar. A copy of what was written was to be issued as a decree in every province, and by proclamation to all peoples, and the Jews were to be ready on that day to avenge themselves upon their enemies. So the couriers, mounted on their swift horses that were used in the king's service, rode out in haste, urged by the king's command; and the decree was issued in Susa the capital.

15 Then Mor'decai went out from the presence of the king in royal robes of blue and white, with a great golden crown and a mantle of fine linen and purple, while the city of Susa shouted and rejoiced. The Jews had light and gladness and joy and honor. And in every province and in every city, wherever the king's command and his edict came, there was gladness and joy among the Jews, a feast and a holiday. And many from the peoples of the country.

However, the language of the decree indicates that the Jews were to take vengeance (cf. vs. 13) on their enemies not only by slaying any armed force of any people or province that might attack them, but also by slaughtering defenseless children and women and plundering their property. The phrase with their children and women clearly does not refer to enemy action against Jewish women and children, even though the English translation might suggest it. According to Hebrew grammar, these words are also objects of the infinitives to destroy, to slay, and to annihilate, and thus refer to legalized Jewish action. This is truly measure-for-measure retaliation, patterned after the sanguinary terms of Haman's original decree, and recalling the ancient ban (hêrem) vowed against all "Amalekites" (cf. I Sam. 15:3). Indeed, the language used is strikingly similar to that of Haman's decree, indicating that the terms of the original anti-Jewish edict were to be put into reverse application. Of course it is fantastic that a Persian king would allow a Jewish minority to take the law in its hands and massacre his subjects at will.

(After vs. 12, the LXX interpolates twenty-four verses [16:1-24] purporting to be a copy of the new decree of "Artaxerxes.")

M. Popular Reaction (8:15-17)

15. The city of Susa shouted and rejoiced: This is a description of the ovation which greeted the new grand vizier as he went forth from the palace, pompously robed in the royal colors. In contrast to the perplexity which was the popular reaction to Haman's first act in office (3:15), Mordecai's statesmanship—evidenced in the pro-Jewish edict—was hailed enthusiastically. Here the author projects his own sentiments into the predominantly Gentile city.

17. Many . . . became Jews, i.e., proselytes (cf. 9:27). So much had Jewish prestige risen since the execution of Haman that it actually was dangerous not to bear the mark of circumcision!
Jews; for the fear of the Jews fell upon them.

9 Now in the twelfth month, that is, the month Adar, on the thirteenth day of the same, when the king's commandment and his decree drew near to be put in execution, in the day that the enemies of the Jews hoped to have power over them: (though it was turned to the contrary, that the Jews had rule over them that hated them,) 2 The Jews gathered themselves together in their cities throughout all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, to lay hand on such as sought their hurt: and no man could withstand them; for the fear of them fell upon all people.

3 And all the rulers of the provinces, and the lieutenants, and the deputies, and officers of the king, helped the Jews; because the fear of Mordecai fell upon them.

4 For Mordecai was great in the king's house, and his fame went out throughout all the provinces: for this man Mordecai waxed greater and greater.

5 Thus the Jews smote all their enemies with the stroke of the sword, and slaughter, declared themselves Jews, for the fear of the Jews had fallen upon them.

9 Now in the twelfth month, which is the month of Adar, on the thirteenth day of the same, when the king's command and edict were about to be executed, on the very day when the enemies of the Jews hoped to get the mastery over them, but which had been changed to a day when the Jews should get the mastery over their foes, the Jews gathered in their cities throughout all the provinces of King Ahasuerus to lay hands on such as sought their hurt. And no one could make a stand against them, for the fear of them had fallen upon all peoples. 3 All the princes of the provinces and the satraps and the governors and the royal officials also helped the Jews, for the fear of Mor'decai had fallen upon them. 4 For Mor'decai was great in the king's house, and his fame spread throughout all the provinces; for the man Mor'decai grew more and more powerful. 5 So the Jews smote all their enemies with the sword,

N. The Day of Vengeance (9:1-10)

9:1. The enemies of the Jews: Throughout this chapter it is assumed that there is a universal hatred of the Jews (vss. 2, 5, 16; cf. 8:11-13). No mention of this overt anti-Semitism had been made by Haman in his report to the king, in which he described "a certain people" as being eccentric, disobedient, and undesirable citizens (3:8). At that point the Jews had only one "hater"; here they have many "haters." Evidently it is the author's intention to show that Haman's policy had created anti-Semitism among peace-loving citizens by calling attention to differences and appealing to popular greed for plunder. Hence the mere execution of a "Hitler" could not eradicate a prejudice which in the intervening months had poisoned the bloodstream of the entire empire. The picture given here is that of two hostile, fully prepared parties poised and ready to fly at each other's throats, each claiming the authority of a royal edict.

Was turned to the contrary: The key verb in the story (cf. vs. 22). Just as the tables had been turned on Haman, so the thirteenth of Adar ironically proved to be the "unlucky thirteenth" for the Jews' enemies. In this sentence there is again a careful avoidance of reference to God.

2. No one could make a stand against them: Some commentators, following the Vulg., interpret the Hebrew to mean that when the time came the heathen, paralyzed with fear, did not make an attack and yet were destroyed despite their nonresistance. However, the context indicates (e.g., such as sought their hurt) that the author intends to say that the enemies were the aggressors who hoped to rule over the Jews (cf. vs. 1). But they could not withstand the superior power and morale of the Jews, and were found in the position of feebly supporting an obviously lost cause (cf. vs. 3; 8:17).

5. Did as they pleased to those who hated them: The Jews took the law into their own hands with the co-operation of officials throughout the empire (cf. vs. 3). Although from a technical standpoint the Jews did not engage in unprovoked aggression, their and destruction, and did what they would unto those that hated them.

6 And in Shushan the palace the Jews slew and destroyed five hundred men.

7 And Parshandatha, and Dalphon, and Aspatha,

8 And Poratha, and Adalia, and Aridatha,

9 And Parmashta, and Arisai, and Aridai, and Vajezatha,

10 The ten sons of Haman the son of Hammedatha, the enemy of the Jews, slew they; but on the spoil laid they not their hand.

11 On that day the number of those that were slain in Shushan the palace was brought before the king.

12 ¶ And the king said unto Esther the queen, The Jews have slain and destroyed five hundred men in Shushan the palace, and the ten sons of Haman; what have they done in the rest of the king’s provinces? now what is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee: or what is thy request further? and it shall be done.

13 Then said Esther, If it please the king, let it be granted to the Jews which are in Shushan to do to-morrow also according unto this day’s decree, and let Haman’s ten sons be hanged upon the gallows.

14 And the king commanded it so to be done: and the decree was given at Shushan; and they hanged Haman’s ten sons.

slaughter, and destroying them, and did as they pleased to those who hated them.

6 In Susa the capital itself the Jews slew and destroyed five hundred men, 7 and also slew Par-shan-da’tha and Dalphon and Aspa’tha 8 and Pora’tha and Ada’lia and Aride’a’tha 9 and Parmash’ta and Ar’isai and Ar’idai and Vaiza’tha, 10 the ten sons of Haman the son of Hammeda’tha, the enemy of the Jews; but they laid no hand on the plunder.

11 That very day the number of those slain in Susa the capital was reported to the king. 12 And the king said to Queen Esther, “In Susa the capital the Jews have slain five hundred men and also the ten sons of Haman. What then have they done in the rest of the king’s provinces! Now what is your petition? It shall be granted you. And what further is your request? It shall be fulfilled.” 13 And Esther said, “If it please the king, let the Jews who are in Susa be allowed tomorrow also to do according to this day’s edict. And let the ten sons of Haman be hanged on the gallows.” 14 So the king commanded this to be done; a decree was issued in Susa, and the ten sons action was hardly confined to mere self-defense. Gentile losses were heavy (cf. vs. 16), but not a single Jewish casualty is mentioned. Evidently the Gentile rout turned into a veritable massacre, for the king had allowed the Jews to act in the same measure as their enemies would have done. This is a case of “do unto others as they would have done unto you.”

10. The ten sons of Haman: So was the last remnant of Amalek blotted out. Although there is no previous mention of the sons’ having participated in Haman’s conspiracy, they too were hereditary enemies of the Jews and thus shared in their father’s guilt.

They laid no hand on the plunder in spite of the permission given in 8:11. This recurring statement (cf. vss. 15-16) is strange. Some conjecture that it means that the self-respecting Jews were not motivated by mercenary considerations (cf. Gen. 14:22-24). Is it possible that here as elsewhere the author has in mind the narrative of I Sam. 15 (especially vs. 19), where divine judgment fell upon Saul and his army because they laid hand on the spoil after conquering the Amalekites?

O. “SHUSHAN PURIM” (9:11-15)

13. Those who argue that the Jews were not governed by a spirit of revenge have difficulty in defending Esther’s request for a second day of slaughter, even though the Jews had already won an overwhelming victory, and her further desire that the dead bodies of Haman’s sons be impaled as an additional act of disgrace and revenge upon 15 For the Jews that were in Shushan gathered themselves together on the fourteenth day also of the month Adar, and slew three hundred men at Shushan; but on the prey they laid not their hand.
16 But the other Jews that were in the king’s provinces gathered themselves together, and stood for their lives, and had rest from their enemies, and slew of their foes seventy and five thousand, but they laid not their hands on the prey.
17 On the thirteenth day of the month Adar; and on the fourteenth day of the same rested they, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.
18 But the Jews that were at Shushan assembled together on the thirteenth day thereof, and on the fourteenth thereof, and on the fifteenth day of the same they rested, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.
19 Therefore the Jews of the villages, that dwelt in the unwalled towns, made the fourteenth day of the month Adar a day of gladness and feasting, and a good day, and of sending portions one to another.

of Haman were hanged. 15 The Jews who were in Susa gathered also on the fourteenth day of the month of Adar and they slew three hundred men in Susa; but they laid no hands on the plunder.
16 Now the other Jews who were in the king’s provinces also gathered to defend their lives, and got relief from their enemies, and slew seventy-five thousand of those who hated them; but they laid no hands on the plunder. 17 This was on the thirteenth day of the month of Adar, and on the fourteenth day they rested and made that a day of feasting and gladness. 18 But the Jews who were in Susa gathered on the thirteenth day and on the fourteenth, and rested on the fifteenth day, making that a day of feasting and gladness. 19 Therefore the Jews of the villages, who live in the open towns, hold the fourteenth day of the month of Adar as a day for gladness and feasting and holiday-making, and a day on which they send choice portions to one another.

the house of Agag (cf. I Sam. 31:10). Some argue that this action was necessary to prevent further anti-Jewish outbreaks. But of course all war atrocities are “necessary” in that they are intended to have a deterrent effect upon the enemy. Obviously these acts go far beyond mere self-defense. However, the real motive for the repetition of the massacre is literary. This is the author’s technique of introducing and explaining certain historical developments which help to justify the celebration of the feast of Purim on two days (see Exeg. below).

P. ORIGIN OF THE TWO DIFFERENT DAYS OF PURIM (9:16-19)

This section is not a continuation of the preceding narrative, but a summary of the events which have already been described. Vss. 16-17 supplement the description of events in the provinces (vss. 2-5); vs. 18 recapitulates the account of events in the city of Susa (vss. 14-15).

16. Seventy-five thousand: The LXX reduces the casualty list to 15,000, but the M.T. is supported by Josephus, Vulg., Syriac, and Targs. The massacre of 75,000 Gentiles is comparable to the report of I Macc. 11:47 that the Jews “did as they pleased” (cf. Esth. 9:5) and slew 100,000 in a single day.

19. The author explains why provincial Jews observed the fourteenth of Adar, in contrast to others who kept the Susa date (“Shushan Purim,” as it is known in the Jewish calendar today). This is probably a case of inventing history in order to account for divergent customs (see Exeg. on vs. 18). According to the context, the distinction is made between Jews of the provinces and Jews of the capital of Susa. However, the verse introduces a new distinction, viz., Jews of the villages, who live in the open towns and (implicitly) those living in walled cities. Thus some LXX codices expand the Susa class to include all city dwellers by the addition, “But those who dwell in the cities keep also the fifteenth of Adar as a joyous and good day by sending dainties to their neighbors.” In the course of time the implication of vs. 19 gave rise to elaborate Talmudic discussion as to the difference between an (unwalled) hamlet and a walled city. The 20 ¶ And Mordecai wrote these things, and sent letters unto all the Jews that were in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, both nigh and far,
21 To establish this among them, that they should keep the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and the fifteenth day of the same, yearly,
22 As the days wherein the Jews rested from their enemies, and the month which was turned unto them from sorrow to joy, and from mourning into a good day: that they should make them days of feasting and joy, and of sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor.
23 And the Jews undertook to do as they had begun, and as Mordecai had written unto them;
24 Because Haman the son of Hammedatha, the Agagite, the enemy of all the Jews, had devised against the Jews to destroy them, and had cast Pur, that is, the lot, to consume them, and to destroy them;

rabbis concluded that cities which had been walled since the days of Joshua were under obligation to observe “Shushan Purim.” Vs. 19 is of the nature of a parenthesis, and without it the connection between vs. 18 and 20 is excellent.

III. Regulations for the Annual Observance of Purim (9:20–10:3)

A. Mordecai Legalizes Both Purim Dates (9:20–28)

Up to this point the author has been concerned with explaining the “historical” origin of the custom of observing Purim on different dates. In the following passage he shows that Mordecai’s action, shortly after the first spontaneous celebration on the different dates in the provinces and Susa respectively, legalized both days in the Jewish calendar. The author goes out of his way to show that this arrangement, for which there is no basis in the Torah, was legalized by (a) Mordecai’s festal letter, (b) the Jews’ acceptance of Purim as a “tradition” (vss. 23, 27), and (c) the letter of confirmation sent out jointly by Esther and Mordecai.

20. The words these things refer to the substance of what has gone before in the Esther narrative, but should not be construed to mean that Mordecai was the author of the foregoing material (Rashi). Mordecai’s festal letter contained not only the authorization of an annual two-day festival, but also some account of the plot which was the background of the deliverance to be commemorated (cf. vss. 24-25).

22. Gifts to the poor: This feature did not accompany the original spontaneous celebration of Purim, according to vs. 19, but was made mandatory by Mordecai’s festal letter. Says Goldman, “It is a characteristically Jewish addition; a thought for the needy has to accompany every occasion of rejoicing” (“Esther,” p. 239).

23. This verse sums up the situation. To do as they had begun refers to the original spontaneous celebration of Jewish triumph on the two dates; as Mordecai had written to them refers to his authorization that (a) the festival be celebrated annually, and (b) that the Susa date and the provincial date should both be recognized as official festal days.

24. Probably this and vs. 25 should be understood as a direct continuation of vs. 23, giving an epitome of the Purim legend which Mordecai included in his festal letter (cf. these things of vs. 20). The LXX rightly understands the introductory particle ὥσπερ (for,
25 But when Esther came before the king, he commanded by letters that his wicked device, which he devised against the Jews, should return upon his own head, and that he and his sons should be hanged on the gallows.

26 Wherefore they called these days Purim after the name of Pur. Therefore for all the words of this letter, and of that which they had seen concerning this matter, and which had come unto them, crush and destroy them; 25 but when Esther came before the king, he gave orders in writing that his wicked plot which he had devised against the Jews should come upon his own head, and that he and his sons should be hanged on the gallows. 26 Therefore they called these days Purim, after the term Pur. And therefore, because of all that was written in this letter, and of what they had faced in this matter, and of what had because) as an indication that the substance of Mordecai's letter follows, and therefore renders "how that" (πῶς).

To crush . . . them: The Hebrew verb (hummām) seems to be a word play on Haman.

25. When Esther came before the king: This is one of the most troublesome clauses in the book. The difficulty arises out of the uncertainty as to the subject of the clause. Since the subject is feminine in the Hebrew (lit., "she came"), many translators (Vulg., Syriac, Targ., KJV, American Jewish Translation, and RSV) find in the feminine subject a reference to Esther. It would be fitting to introduce the heroine into the recapitulation of the plot, but since Esther is not mentioned in the context (she is last mentioned in 9.13) this translation is unnatural. Some modern translators (ERV, ASV, Amer. Trans.) treat the feminine as a neuter "it" or "this," i.e., the matter of Haman's conspiracy which came before the king at Esther's second banquet. This interpretation has the approval of many scholars. However, it rests upon a translation which is questionable ("This is hardly Hebrew," says the eminent Semitist, C. C. Torrey). Possibly the LXX, which offers still a third interpretation, might give a clue to the solution of the problem. In view of the facts that Haman is the subject in vs. 24 and that vs. 25 likewise deals with the king's judgment upon him, it is not surprising that the LXX reads, "when he [Haman] came before the king" (ὤπειραν οὖν τῷ βασιλείῳ Ἰούδας).

He gave orders in writing: An attempted translation of a peculiar word sequence in the M.T. (םש יָדָשְׁתָה עַל הבָּשָׁר). The king never did command in writing that Haman be hanged (cf. 7:9), although according to 9:14, he did in the case of Haman's sons. Of course, in a general sense the king gave written command through Mordecai that Haman's plot should return on his head posthumously in the promulgation of the edict of 8:8-13. But the words make such strange Hebrew that in all probability the text must be regarded as corrupt at this point. Interestingly, the LXX reads, "saying to hang Mordecai" (cf. 6:4), and thus alludes to the fact that Haman began to fall when he went before the king to ask for Mordecai's life.

He and his sons: Haman and his sons were not hanged at the same time. The seeming inaccuracy results from telescoping the account of Haman's plot into the brief compass of two verses.

26. They called these days Purim: This is the first explicit reference to the festival of Purim (a Hebrew plural form built on the loan word Pur; cf. 3:7; 9:24). The explanation and authorization of these two days (cf. vs. 27) has been the governing 27 The Jews ordained, and took upon them, and upon their seed, and upon all such as joined themselves unto them, so as it should not fail, that they would keep these two days according to their writing, and according to their appointed time every year;

28 And that these days should be remembered and kept throughout every generation, every family, every province, and every city; and that these days of Purim should not fail from among the Jews, nor the memorial of them perish from their seed.

29 Then Esther the queen, the daughter of Abihail, and Mordecai the Jew, wrote with all authority, to confirm this second letter of Purim.

30 And he sent the letters unto all the Jews, to the hundred twenty and seven provinces of the kingdom of Ahasuerus, with words of peace and truth, befallen them, 27 the Jews ordained and took it upon themselves and their descendants and all who joined them, that without fail they would keep these two days according to what was written and at the time appointed every year, 28 that these days should be remembered and kept throughout every generation, in every family, province, and city, and that these days of Purim should never fall into disuse among the Jews, nor should the commemoration of these days cease among their descendants.

29 Then Queen Esther, the daughter of Abi'hail, and Mor'decai the Jew gave full written authority, confirming this second letter about Purim. 30 Letters were sent to all the Jews, to the hundred and twenty-seven provinces of the kingdom of Ahasu-purpose of the book from the outset. This letter: Mordecai’s festal letter mentioned in vs. 23.

27. All who joined them: A reference to proselytes (cf. 8:17). Without fail (the same words as in 1:19), i.e., without any possibility of alteration or abrogation. Says a Midrash: “Even if all the Festivals should be annulled, Purim will never be annulled.” Throughout this section (vss. 26-28) the author displays an almost legal style in order to stress the fact that a two-day festival, for which there is no basis in the Torah and which originated among patriots rather than priests, is as legally binding upon Jews as the irrevocable laws of the Medes and Persians.

B. Esther Adds Her Authorization (9:29-32)

In this section the Hebrew text is not beyond suspicion. The question arises as to whether this new letter was sent out by Esther alone or by Esther and Mordecai jointly. In vs. 29 Esther and Mordecai are coauthors, but in vs. 30 the verb is masculine singular. Some critics omit all references to Mordecai and change the verb in vs. 30 to the feminine. But it is best to follow the M.T. (so LXX in vs. 30) in regarding this as a joint letter. There is no suggestion that this second letter was necessitated by the fact that the Jews had taken objection to the festal observance commanded by Mordecai in his previous letter. The twofold issuing of letters seems to be a further attempt to lend legal sanction to the observance of the two days of Purim.

29. This second letter about Purim: To what does second refer? Usually it is taken to refer to the joint letter which is described in vss. 29-31. But it would seem strange for Esther and Mordecai to write to confirm their own letter, and furthermore it is stated explicitly in vs. 31 that the purpose of the joint letter was to give additional confirmation to Mordecai’s previous festal letter. Since the word “second” is lacking in the LXX, the O.L., and the Syriac, it is possibly a gloss introduced by a scribe who thought that the reference was to “this second letter which follows.” If so, the phrase refers to “this letter” (บทנאה בתלמוד הדרע) mentioned in vs. 26. Torrey, however, argues (ibid., pp. 31-33) that the second letter of Purim is the present book of Esther, and that the first letter was the Aramaic prototype.
31 To confirm these days of Purim in their times appointed, according as Mordecai the Jew and Esther the queen had enjoined them, and as they had decreed for themselves and for their seed, the matters of the fastings and their cry.

32 And the decree of Esther confirmed these matters of Purim; and it was written in the book.

10 And the king Ahasuerus laid a tribute upon the land, and upon the isles of the sea.

2 And all the acts of his power and of his might, and the declaration of the greatness of Mordecai, whereunto the king advanced him, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia?

31. Mordecai ... enjoined: Does this refer to the content of the joint letter, or to the previous letter of Mordecai and the consequent action of the Jews (9:20-23)? The context seems to demand the latter interpretation. In this case the words and Queen Esther must be regarded as a gloss (so Gunkel, Haupt, Paton, et al.) since the previous letter was sent out by Mordecai alone.

With regard to their fasts and their lamenting: Many commentators believe on the basis of this phrase that the purpose of the joint letter was to introduce fasting as an essential part of the festival, and that this verse thus gave a legal precedent for the custom, which developed probably about the ninth century A.D., of observing the thirteenth of Adar as "Esther's Fast" (cf. 4:16). Probably, however, this is merely a reference to Mordecai's previous command (vs. 22) that the Jews annually observe the memorial of their sorrow and mourning (Torrey) —a command which they had already subscribed to as a result of his first letter (cf. vs. 27). The joint letter introduced nothing new: it was written for the sole purpose of ratifying the previous "letter of Purim" by linking Esther's prestige with that of Mordecai.

32. In writing: The word מַלִּים does not refer to the book of Esther, as earlier commentators believed, or to another Purim source used by the author of Esther. It is precisely the same word which is used for "letters" in vs. 30.

C. The Greatness of Mordecai (10:1-3)

10:1. The author ends, as he began, with a description of Xerxes' imperial wealth and power, which in this instance had been augmented by making Mordecai grand vizier and by following his statesmanlike policy. The object of Xerxes' tribute, then, is purely literary. It is needless to suppose that the king had to resort to additional taxation in order to compensate for the loss of Haman's bribe or to recover from his unsuccessful wars with Greece. Indeed, the author shows no knowledge of the empire-shaking events which took place in the coastlands of the Mediterranean during Xerxes' reign.

2. This prosaic statement, which is modeled after the recurring formulas of the books of Kings and Chronicles (e.g., I Kings 11:41; II Chr. 25:26), is very important, for it purports to validate the authenticity of the previous story by referring the reader to the archives in which the facts may be confirmed. Probably the archives were no more available than another text which an ancient author assured his readers could be found.
3 For Mordecai the Jew was next unto king Ahasuerus, and great among the Jews, and accepted of the multitude of his brethren, seeking the wealth of his people, and speaking peace to all his seed.

in the original, inscribed in gold, on a great pillar in the Indian Ocean (cited by E. J. Bickerman, “The Colophon of the Greek Book of Esther,” Journal of Biblical Literature, LXIII [1944], 352-53). Some scholars suppose that the Book of the Chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia refers to a Jewish book, in circulation at that time, which described the history and experiences of Jews during the Persian regime. However, the author doubtless alludes to the official Persian annals mentioned previously in 2:23 and 6:1, where the same phraseology is employed.

(After 10:3, the LXX has an addition of eleven verses [10:4-11:1], which gives the interpretation of Mordecai’s dream, concluding with a colophon which witnesses to the date and authenticity of the LXX “letter of Purim.”)
JOB
INTRODUCTION

I. Title and Place in the Canon
II. Subject and Literary Form
III. Oriental Background
   A. Edomitic Wisdom
   B. International Folklore
   C. Egyptian Pessimism
   D. Babylonian Skepticism
IV. Composition and Date
   A. Prologue and Epilogue
   B. Poetic Discussion
   C. Discourses of Elihu
   D. Discourses of Yahweh
V. Language and Poetic Structure
   A. Original Tongue

The book of Job is one of the most celebrated writings of the whole Bible and also one of the least known. Everyone who speaks of "the patience of Job" (Jas. 5:11) shows thereby that he has but a vague acquaintance with the poem (3:1-42:6), or probably none at all. More thoroughly informed laymen and even biblical students who have praised the book as a literary masterpiece, sometimes in immoderate terms, often apologize for its failure to solve the problem of innocent suffering. Yet was the poet's purpose to discover the secret of that mystery? Was it even to assert eternal Providence,

And justify the ways of God to men?

In order to answer these questions—and some others pertaining to the understanding of the book—the critic must ask, How and when was the document written? How was it preserved for the contemporary reader? What was the purpose of its publication? What is its place within the total environment of Scripture? What is its relevance for the modern Christian?

I. Title and Place in the Canon

Like Joshua, Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, Daniel, and Esther, the book of Job bears as its title the name of the hero, יִיְדֹב, a disyllabic word which has been "Hellenized" into Ἰωβ (see German Ḥeob) and Latinized into Job, a monosyllabic word which has passed into the English language.

In the Hebrew manuscripts the book is found among the Hagiographa or Holy Writings, usually after Psalms and Proverbs. In the Septuagint manuscripts, as well as in the Greek and Latin lists of biblical books, its place varies greatly, but Western tradition, under the influence of the Vulgate, lists Job at the head of the poetic books.

II. Subject and Literary Form

According to popular opinion, the book of Job is the story of a man's trials and restoration. But in point of fact, it is for the most part a collection of poems dealing with the meaning of life and religion. The book falls naturally into five parts: (a) a prologue in prose (1:1-2:13) introducing the hero and his sudden misfortunes, as well as three friends who come to comfort him; (b) a poetic discussion (3:1-31:40) which goes back and forth between these

---

1 "Magnificent and sublime as no other book of Scripture" (Luther); "Single and unparalleled in the sacred volume" (Lowth); "The greatest poem of ancient and modern times" (Tennyson); "A noble Book; all men's Book! . . . There is nothing written, I think, in the Bible or out of it, of equal literary merit" (Carlyle).

8 These were not considered part of canonical Scripture until the end of the first century A.D. (cf. article "The Canon of the Old Testament," Vol. I, p. 438). It is probably on account of this fact that the book of Job appears to have been practically unknown by Jesus and the early Christians (cf. I Cor. 15:19, the only passage of the N.T. which seems to be a quotation from the book [5:13 LXX]). Parallels of thought or terminology have been observed in about eighteen other passages of the N.T.
friends and the hero; (c) a poetic rebuke and advice offered by a fourth friend lutheran unmentioned and thereafter ignored (32:1-37:24); (d) a series of poetic challenges and questions addressed by Yahweh to Job, and the latter's repentance (38:1-42:6); (e) an epilogue in prose (42:7-17) which records the hero's rehabilitation and return to happiness.

The literary form of the book is not homogeneous. The prologue and the epilogue suggest the genre of patriarchal traditions, with its stylized patterns, its profound psychology under the cover of naiveté, and its folkloric use of hyperbole. The poetic parts, on the contrary, which constitute the bulk of the book (3:1-42:6), belong to the wisdom type of literature, with two significant differences: unlike Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and other books of their kind, the Joban poems deal with a single theme and represent discourses which are meant to be spoken by various characters. The word "dialogue" does not strictly apply to them, however, because the respective length of each piece excludes the conversational "give-and-take," the exchanges, interruptions, and other rhetorical devices which characterize, for instance, the Dialogues of Plato. For the same and other reasons one should consider the book not as a drama composed for theatrical production, but as a lyrical meditation with a dramatic persona, in some respects similar to the Song of Songs.

The subject as well as the literary form seems to be original with the poet of Job. However, he may have been influenced by sages of the ancient Near East and by international folklore.

6 "All general classifications fail to do justice to the overflowing abundance of its forms, moods, and thoughts: it is not exclusively lyric (W. W. Baudissin, Vorlekt, Boston, 1891), nor epic (J. F. Gemung, The Epic of the Israelite Saul (Boston, 1891), nor dramatic (B. Szold, Das Buch Hiob, p. xvi Baltimore, 1886; J. Ley, Neue Jahrh. f Philos und Pädagogik, Vol 154, pp. 120 f.), nor didactic or reflective (most of the critics), unless the poem is cut down to fit a particular category (as F. Baumgarten and E. G. Krauel are inclined to do). Even the more comprehensive characterizations, such as that of Friedrich Delitzsch (in Das Buch Hiob, p. 15. Leipzig, 1902), 'a poem with dramatic movement and essentially didactic tendency,' or better still that of J. G. von Herder (Fom Geist der Ebraischen Poetische, Vol I, p 148), 'an epoche of mankind, a theodicy of God,' fail to do justice to the scope and variety of the work. Robert H. Pfeiffer, The Old Testament (New York: Harper & Bros., 1941), p. 684. Used by permission.)

III. Oriental Background

The Old Testament is no longer studied in a cultural vacuum. Archaeological discoveries of the last hundred years have shown eloquently the debt which Israel owed to the religions and literatures of her neighbors. It is therefore imperative to ask whether foreign influences have had any effect at all as regards the origin and development of the book of Job. The question is the more legitimate since the wisdom literature of the Old Testament in general, and the book of Job in particular, display an international—or at least a nonspecifically Hebraic—spirit or outlook. A. Edomite Wisdom.—Since the action and the characters of the book are located in Edom (see Exeg. on 1:1; 2:11), it is quite possible that Israel received the story from the Edomites, those semimnomads who lived southeast of the Dead Sea and enjoyed a reputation for wisdom. It is also possible that the use of the divine name Eloah, which is common in the poetic discussion and extremely rare elsewhere in the Bible, indicates a familiarity with Teman in Edom.13 Quite remarkably the name Eloah is also used by Agur (see Prov. 30:5), an Arabian sage, whose language may have been Edomitic.12 These observations, however, are not sufficiently weighty for the modern historian to conjecture that "the author of the book was an Edomite."13

B. International Folklore.—The theme of the righteous man who suffers ignominy because he is being tested by rival deities or divine beings (see 1:6-12; 2:1-7a) probably belongs to the international folklore of the ancient East. The story of Hariscandra, for instance, appears in India under many different forms14 and rests upon very ancient traditions.15 According to one variant of the tale,16 the gods and goddesses were assembled with the seven Menus in the heaven of Indra. The question was asked whether a single human prince could be found who would be without stain or blemish. Most of the members of the divine assembly were of the opinion that there was none, but Vasishtha insisted that a certain Autschandra (Hariscandra) was perfect. Shiva Rutren ("the destroyer") offered to prove the contrary if the prince were delivered into his power. Vasishtha accepted the challenge, and it was agreed that, depending upon the issue of the wager, one would yield to the other all merits acquired in a long series of penance. Shiva Rutren thereupon submitted Autschandra to all sorts of trials, deprived him of his wealth, kingdom, wife, and only son, but the prince persisted in his virtue. The gods rewarded him with munificence and returned to him his previous estate. Shiva Rutren gave his own merits to Vasishtha, who passed them on to the hero.

Another form of the wager between heavenly beings—this time the archangels Gabriel and Michael—is found among the Suahelis.17 Thus it appears that the motif is common to several cultural groups. The biblical story, with its wager between Yahweh and the Satan," has undoubtedly a polytheistic flavor, and may have been partly inspired from a folkloric theme. But one essential difference far outweighs the similarity. The biblical writer ignores the value of merits among heavenly beings, and even denies it among mortals. His sole purpose is precisely to show that Job serves God for nought.

C. Egyptian Pessimism.—Much more pertinent are the parallels which have been discovered between Job and the Egyptian literature.18 The literary form which introduces and concludes a poetic dialogue with a prose narrative is most unusual for Israel but quite common in Egypt. For instance, The Complaints of the Eloquent Peasant19 is composed of nine discourses in a semipoetic form which are framed in a prologue and an epilogue in prose. Likewise, The Prophecy of Nefer-Rohu20 is prefaced and concluded by a narrative. There is little doubt that the poet of Job was acquainted with Egypt, perhaps even with the Egyptian language (see 5:14; 9:26; 21:12; 28:1 ff.; 29:18; 31:4, 6; 38:14, 17, 33, 36; 39:13 ff.; 40:15 ff.; 41:7 ff.). More decisive still is the comparison in form and content which has often been made between the poetic discussion of Job and the Egyptian Dialogue of the Man Weary of Life with His Soul.21 The beginning of the composition is lost, but it may be assumed from the poem itself that the Egyptian hero, like Job, fell sick and consequently endured all kinds of ill treatment: his friends and even his brothers departed from him, the good deeds which he had accomplished in the past were forgotten, and his neighbors robbed him. In his extremity he decided to die; but his soul, conceived as an independent being, vehemently opposed his death.

13 See especially Humbert, op. cit., pp. 73-106.
14 This work has been preserved in MSS of the Middle Kingdom (twentieth-eighteenth centuries B.C.); see translations and commentaries by Friedrich Vogelsang, Kommentar zu den Klagen des Bauern (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1913, "Untersuchungen zur Geschichte und Altertumskunde Aegyptens"); A. H. Gardiner, "The Eloquent Peasant," Journal of Egyptian Archaeology, IX (1923), 5-25, Adolf Erman, The Literature of the Ancient Egyptians (London: Methuen & Co., 1927), pp. 116-31; John A. Wilson, in Pritchard, op. cit., pp. 497-10 termination. Like Job, the Egyptian hero breathes out his lament:

879

To whom can I speak today? (One's) fellows are evil.

The friends of today do not love.

To whom can I speak today?

Hearts are rapacious:

Every man seizes his fellow's goods... Goodness is rejected everywhere... There are no righteous:

The land is left to those who do wrong...

To whom can I speak today?

I am laden with wretchedness

For lack of an intimate (friend).”

Apparently convinced by his soul that death is not desirable, the life-weary man returns to the consideration of the earthly situation, but the spectacle of human society throws him back to his previous resolve to commit suicide. Death is for him (Like) the recovery of a sick man,...

Like the odor of myrrh,

Like sitting under an awning on a breezy day,...

Like the odor of lotus blossoms,

Like sitting on the bank of drunkenness,...

Like the return of men to their houses from an expedition,...

Like the clearing of the sky,...

Like the longing of a man to see his house (again),

After he has spent many years in captivity."

Unlike the Semites in general or the Hebrews in particular, Job was at times attracted by the prospect of death (see 3:13-22; cf. 10:18, 19; 14:13; 17:13, 14), and this attitude suggests a distinctly Egyptian point of view. However, there is no direct literary influence from Egypt upon the biblical poem. For the Egyptians, the fact of apparently undeserved suffering presented a problem, to be sure; but their belief in retributive justice was safeguarded by their hope in a moral judgment after death. For the Hebrews, death presented a harassing question because they were unable, until the late post-exilic period, to postpone righteous retribution to a life beyond the grave."

It is probable that the Joban poet was acquainted with some manifestations of Egyptian pessimism, but it must be noted that he dealt with human life in a totally different mood, for his outlook was conditioned by an extraordinarily urgent faith in one God, creator and ruler of the universe. His anxiety was therefore derived more from his theology than from his observation of human misery. Moreover, as will be seen below, his purpose was not to discuss philosophically the inequities of existence.

D. Babylonian Skepticism.—For years many critics have turned to the Akkadian literature in an effort to discover possible sources of the book of Job. Over against a multitude of texts which uphold the idea that prosperity, good health, and long life are the product of virtue—and conversely, sickness, poverty, affliction, and premature death are punishment for sins, overt or concealed, sometimes unknown even to those who perpetrate them—a few documents reveal a skeptical trend of bold independence. One of these is known as The Poem of the Righteous Sufferer, often called the Babylonian Job. In its present form the document appears to be a psalm of thanksgiving. The hero has been healed of a mysterious disease, and he now praises the god who delivered him. There is no trace of a dialogue with visiting friends, but in the course of a long monologue several ideas parallel with those of Job may be recognized. At first the sufferer describes his condition:

... I am like a deaf man.

Although I was powerful, I am become a slave. By day, sighing, by night, weeping; Monthly lament; sorrow each year.

... If I look around me, [there is] evil, evil Oppression has increased upon me, I do not see my right.”

25 P 77

27 There is, however, the mention of some fellow (or fellows) who apparently spoke to the sufferer as Job's “comforter” did. “The fury of the companions has destroyed me” (Tablet I, obverse, l. 14); “in the assembly, he has cursed me” (ibid., l. 18); “at the mention of my prosperity, his mouth is a cavern” (ibid., l. 19).

28 Tablet I, ll. 11, 13, 20-21; Tablet II, ll. 2-5.
The supplications made to the god and goddess have received no answer:

I have cried to the god, but he did not show his face
I have invoked my goddess, but she did not lift up her head.23

Ritual practices have proved ineffective, and the hero is led to formulate his pessimism over life in general:

What perverse events in the world!
I look behind: distress pursues.25

He refuses to interpret his afflictions as a punishment for sin or ritual failure:

As if I had not set aside the libation for the god,
And had not, at meal-time, remembered my goddess,
Had not bowed my face, and had not [made] adoration.26

He recalls at length his past deeds of piety:

Whereas I, myself, thought only of prayer and supplication,
Supplication was my practice, sacrifice my rule.
The day of the worship of the god was the joy of my heart,
The day of the procession of the goddess was for me gain and riches. . .
I taught my country to guard the names of the god,
I instructed my people to honor the names of the goddess,
The praise of the king I made like to that of the god,
The fear of the palace I taught to the people,
Truly I knew that such things are pleasant to the god!27

Eventually the lamentor realizes that he did not know what was agreeable to the deity, and implies that his deeds of devotion were useless:

What seems good to oneself is worthless before the god,
And what is rejected by one's heart finds favor with the god.
Who will comprehend the will of the gods in the midst of the heavens?
The counsel of the god is full of obscurity; who will know it?28

How will mortals learn the way of the god?29

The reason for man's ignorance is apparently his mortal condition:

He who was alive in the evening is dead the next morning.

In a moment he is cast into grief; suddenly he is crushed down.
In an instant he sings and plays; in a twinkling of the eye he wails like a mourner.30

The constant prospect of death without warning may explain man's frailty and fickleness, his enslavement to the emotional insecurity of his condition:

Like day and night their will-power changes.
If they are hungry, they look like corpses;
Are they satiated? they rival their god!
In prosperity they talk of ascending to Heaven;
Are they in distress? they speak of descending to Irkalla.31

The text of the lines which follow has deteriorated, but the sufferer apparently returns to his lament and describes realistically his physical condition.32 The priests and incantators have failed to discover his "state of sickness," and worse still, the deities seem to be indifferent. Death is expected at any moment; the grave is open; the dying man's treasures are being divided among his survivors; the professional mourners begin their dirges; the hero's enemies rejoice. Suddenly hope springs up in the midst of distress.33 The mercy of Marduk is proclaimed; rituals of purification are performed. The hero is healed, and the poem ends with a hymn of praise.34

Thus the Babylonian poet, like Job, protests his innocence, describes his piety, charges the deity with indifference, thereby implying a doubt as to divine justice, confesses the general ignorance of man concerning the ways of the godhead, and is filled with deep pessimism concerning human destiny. However, while Job insists on his ethical righteousness, the Babylonian sufferer mentions only his ritual deeds. Since the Akkadian poem was well known before the Babylonian exile,35 it is possible that the biblical poet was acquainted with it, but no trace of literary dependence can be demonstrated. In any case, the originality of the Joban master cannot successfully be impugned.

Another cuneiform text has largely escaped the attention of the exeges of Job, although its similarities to the biblical book are most

23 Ibld., II. 4-5.
24 Ibld., II. 10-11.
25 Ibld., II. 12-14.
26 Ibld., II. 23-25, 29-33.
27 The word ḫa-ḫa-ham is derived from a root cognate of the Hebrew ḫéḵāh, "to be wise."
28 Ibld., II. 34-35; cf. Job 9:1-12, 15-8; etc.
29 Ibld., II. 39-41.
30 Ibld., II. 42-46.
31 Mention is made of "cleaved bones" and "bowels": cf. 50:17, 27a. At night the "pursuer" does not give the hero any respite: cf. 7:13; 9:18.
32 Ibld., II. 52-53.
33 Tablets II, reverse, III and IV.
34 Several copies of it were made during the seventh century B.C., and the existence of a philological commentary explaining the archaism of its language points to its relatively wide circulation. The exact date of its composition is uncertain, but it is considerably older than Job.

881
striking. It is an Acrostic Dialogue on Theodicy in which a sufferer discusses with his friend the problem of divine justice and the meaning of life. The poem consists of twenty-seven stanzas of eleven lines each, and the initial syllables within each stanza are identical. If they are read vertically, they form a sentence of twenty-seven syllabic signs, meaning “I, [Sha-ag-gal-ki-tu-na-am]-ub-bi-bi,” the incantator, worship the god and the king.” Thus the poet may have been aware of the boldness of his position, and may have tried to convince his readers of his orthodoxy; or else he may have passed through a skeptical phase, and at last overcome his doubts. Each of the interlocutors speaks alternatively, the sufferer in sts. i, iii, v, etc., and his friend in sts. ii, iv, vi, etc.

The hero asks for a learned companion who would listen to his complaint, for he wants to expose “the grief of his heart” and to receive “consolation.” The friend sympathizes:

Dreadful, my friend, is the grief of which thou speakest.
To the beloved of thy heart thou exposest an evil:
Thy proud mind thou hast caused to resemble that of a fool;
Thy bright face thou hast darkened.

But is not the fate of man in general a sad one?
(Men) are begotten, and immediately they walk on the path of death.
“The river Khubur thou wilt cross,” so (runs) the old saying!

And he implies that prosperity is the lot of the righteous:
Look at all men together, the people of the community (?).
The wealthy one, they praise him and . . . .
He who sees the face of the god is the owner of a threshold demon;
He who fears the goddess anxiously, abundance is heaped up (on him).

To this evocation of the traditional doctrine of individual retribution, the sufferer replies sarcastically:

A well, my friend, such is thy heart which collects all the . . . .
Splendor (?), the mass of the sea which goes (to) thy knowledge (?).
. . . I shall ask thee; understand my speech, Listen for a while, and hear my words:
Prosperity has ceased, neediness . . . .
My happiness has passed, . . . has come,
My strength has weakened, . . . has disappeared,
Want and despair have darkened. . . .

The answer of the comforter is poorly preserved, but he recommends prayer to the god, who “will grant pardon.” The sufferer replies that he has already practiced all the possible deeds of piety. The friend retorts, like the comforters of Job, by appealing to the observation of nature, “the palm-tree,” “the blameless wild-ass,” “the star” which becomes dark. Early death is a punishment for sin:

Has the lion committed a crime? The trap for him remains open!
The treasurer, the wealthy one, who has amassed power (?),
In the fire, before his fate comes, Malik will burn him.

And the friend appealingly concludes: “The way which these have traveled dost thou desire to go?” Like Eliphaz, the Babylonian comforter exhorts the sufferer to find reconciliation with his god: “The accomplishment of the god’s pleasure seek thou for ever!” The skeptic’s reply is touched with irony, and may be likened to that of Job upon a similar occasion:

A north wind is thy answer, a beautiful breeze for men!
Noble and precious is thy . . . advice!
Let me submit [a reply] to thee!

Experience, he avows, contradicts the orthodox theory of a relationship between affliction and crime:

They go the walk of happiness, those who do not seek the god!
They become poor and embittered, those who piously pray to the god[dess]!
. . . In the earliest bud I sought the will of the god, 19 LI. 23-30.

20 L. 44
50 LI. 62-64. "Malik" is probably the god Nergal.
21 L. 65
54 I.e., “since my childhood.”
With prostration and prayer I contemplated the goddess!
A feudal-burden (?) which gives no profit, I draw the yoke (?)!
The god allows me, instead of wealth, poverty!
Even the weak rises against me, the fool affronts me in the face (?)
They have taken away my ... and I am debased.\(^2\)

Thereupon the interlocutor, like the friends of Job, attacks more directly:

Truly, thou art possessor of intelligence! Thou hast concealed (?) unclean deeds!
Justice and truth thou hast rejected! The command of the god thou hast scorned. ... \(^6\)

The discussion continues back and forth, and no progress appears to be made until the last preserved stanza, when the sufferer, like Job, humbly implores the understanding of his friend:

Be merciful, my friend! Hear my complaint!
Come to my help, see my torment, and know!
A slave (?) wise and humble I am! ...
Help and protection, not for one instant, have I experienced!\(^5\)

He alludes to the humiliations which await him on the streets of his city, and in desperation turns to the deities, hostile as these may be:

Help might he give me, the god who rejected me!
Mercy might she grant me, the goddess who ...
The Shepherd, the Sun, might rise, like a god, he might ...

The next stanza is entirely broken, and the end of the document is unknown. The last expression of hope, dim as it is, suggests that the lamenter, like Job,\(^9\) expected an ultimate vindication.

The fact of similarity in form, theme, and ideas between the Acrostic Dialogue and the biblical poem cannot be denied, and the date of the Akkadian text\(^6\) allows the hypothesis of an influence upon Job.

Another document, A Pessimistic Dialogue Between Master and Servant,\(^8\) needs to be quoted in part, for although its mood is quite different from either that of the Acrostic Dialogue on Theodicy or that of Job it illustrates the religious skepticism and utter hopelessness which prevailed in some circles of Mesopotamia. The master summons his slave, expresses a desire, and receives the acquiescence of the slave who then praises the course of action contemplated. The master immediately changes his mind, and the slave in truly "servile" manner applies the same earnest spirit in defending with complete cynicism a course opposite to that previously outlined. Social ambition, pleasures of banqueting, traveling and escapism, building houses, political plotting, forgiving of enemies, love of women, banking, and all aspects of human existence are in turn extolled and condemned. Here is a strophe which deals with the futility of religion.

---O slave, hearken unto me!
---Yes, my lord, yes!
---Hasten, order me water for my hands!
Give it to me, and I will make sacrifice unto my god!
---Do it, my lord, do it!
The man who makes sacrifice unto his god,
Glad is his heart,
Loan upon loan he makes!
---Nay, O slave, a sacrifice unto my god
I will not make!
---Do it not, my lord, do it not!
Wouldst thou teach the god
To walk after thee like a dog?
He might require a ritual;
He might say, Do not inquire [an oracle];
Or he might demand something else from thee.\(^9\)

Concerning the vanity of benefaction, the slave declares:

Ascend to the ruins of the cities of old,
Behold the skulls of earlier and latter [men]:
Who is now an evil doer? Who is now a benefactor?\(^9\)

As the master finally asks, "Now then what is good?" the slave replies:

To break my neck and thy neck,
To fall into the river is good.
Who is tall enough to climb to heaven?
Who is broad enough to grasp the earth?

But the master retorts:

---Nay, O slave, I will slay thee,
And cause thee to go before me.

Thereupon the cynic has the last word:

---Would my lord live three days after me?\(^4\)

\(^4\) St. viii (ll. 61-68).
\(^9\) St. x (ll. 82-83).
\(^4\) St. xi (ll. 84-91).
IV. Composition and Date

Considerable discussion has been given to the way in which the book of Job, with its diverse parts of prose and poetry, came into being and received its final form. Was it written by a single poet, or by a school of wise men, editors, annotators, and copyists? An answer to this question is important for students who wish to place the book of its Sitz im Leben ("situation in life"), to learn the date, locale, and purpose of its composition, and to obtain some clues to the correct interpretation of its meaning.

Ever since the rise of modern criticism, especially with the study of the Hexateuchal or synoptic sources and the analysis of the prophetic sermons, biblical exegetes have suspected that the various prose and poetic parts of Job did not originate from the same hand. 46 The literary problems raised by Job, however, differ quite markedly from those of the Hexateuch or of the Gospels, for the prologue, epilogue, and poetic discourses are related to a single theme in such a way that none could have existed independently. If the book in its present form were proved to be a compilation, it would be a priori not an artificial collection of hitherto isolated and autonomous units, but an organic whole which grew through a process of internal development by the grafting of additions to a Grundschrift. The question must therefore be asked: Is the book a compendium, and if so, what is the fundamental document? In an attempt to discover the answer, the critic must analyze each section separately.

A. Prologue and Epilogue.—The prologue (1:1-2:13) and epilogue (42:7-17) appear to form a literary piece of homogeneous character, for each needs the other if the story is to make any sense at all. 47 To be sure, the account of Job's restoration may have been expanded by a later hand. 48 Under the audience's craving for concrete details of the hero's renewed happiness, but some account of his rehabilitation (42:7-11) was necessary even in the earliest form of the narrative.

Some scholars have cast doubt on the originality of the scenes at the heavenly court (1:6-12; 2:1-7a). They argue that one may easily remove the passages from the context without disrupting the smoothness of the action or obscuring its intelligibility. 49 According to this conjecture, the original narrative implied only that Yahweh himself had stricken the hero (cf. 42:11b), but a later editor refused to admit that God could be the direct author of evil and so introduced the figure of "the Satan" in order to clear the Deity of any immoral responsibility (see a somewhat similar process in II Sam. 24:1; I Chr. 21:1). If such an excision were made, however, the story would lose its raison d'être. The point of the whole prose narrative is that Job is not guilty of any offense, and this fact must be unambiguously stated: hence the presence of the scenes at the heavenly court. Moreover, the motif of a wager between Yahweh and a member of the divine assembly has a popular, picturesque, even humorous flavor which suggests a polytheistic background (see p. 879), and is quite incompatible with the monotheistic spirit and the reverent tone of biblical editors generally.

Most critics accept the unity of the prose story, but they are sharply divided on the question of its literary relationship to the poetic discussion. 50 A first group of scholars maintains that the poet himself wrote the prose story as it now exists in the prologue and epilogue, although he may have been inspired by some ancient oral

---

47 Nevertheless, some critics consider the prologue and epilogue as two separate pieces; Eduard König (Das Buch Hiob [Göttingen: C. Bertelsmann, 1929], pp. 3-9) rejects the originality of the former, but Kummer Fuller ("The Original Conclusion to the Book of Job," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XLII [1924], 116-36) and Louis Finkelstein (The Phrases of Hiob) rejects the originality of the latter, but Kummer Fuller ("The Original Conclusion to the Book of Job," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XLII [1924], 116-36) and Louis Finkelstein (The Phrases of Hiob) tradiotions, possibly of Edomite origin. A second round of critics believe that the prose narrative was added to the poem by some late redactor. A third group of exegetes consider the prologue and epilogue as an ancient Volksbuch or folk tale which existed in a written form long before the time of the poet who used it as a framework in order to introduce his theological meditation in dialogue form. A Ibid., pp. 45-88; article "Job" in T. K. Cheyne and J. Sutherland Black, eds., Encyclopaedia Biblica (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1901), II, col. 2469; Johannes Menhof, Einführung in das Alte Testament (Gent Verlansung der Kriegsgefangenenhilfe, n.d.), pp. 277-79; Carl Steuernagel, Lehrbuch der Einleitung in das Alte Dhorme, Le livre de Job, pp. lvi ff.; J. E. McFadden, An Introduction to the Old Testament (2nd ed.; New York,

A. C. Armstrong & Son, 1906), pp. 274-77; Eissfeldt, op. cit., pp. 513-18; Gustav Holscher, Das Buch Hiob (Rev.
ed.; Tubingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1932); J. H. Mowinckel, Handbuch und Altes Testament" (pp. 1-5. Buxtehudes (op. cit., pp.
24-26) belongs to this class of critics as far as his view of the prologue is concerned.

This hypothesis was already proposed by Richard Simon in 1685 and defended by Schultens in 1737, Hesse in 1798, de Wette in 1807, J. Louis Bredel in 1818, Knobel in 1849, S. Lee. In 1837, believing that the dialogue had been recorded from oral tradition by Moses, who then added the prologue and epilogue as necessary background to the understanding of the poetic discussion.
In recent times the conjecture of the anteriority of the poetic discussion over the prologue and epilogue has been given new attention: see Robert H. Pfeiffer, Le probledu livre de Job (Leipzig: Albert Kuhn, 1915), and Intro. to T O T., pp. 669-70; Kraeling (with serious qualifications), Book of the Ways of God, pp. 179-98; B. D.
Erdmann, Studies in Job (Leiden: Burgersdijk & Nier-man, 1959), pp. 17-20; W. B. Stevenson, The Poem of Job (London: British Academy, 1947), pp. 73 ff.

Julius Wellhausen (in a review of August Dillmann, Das Buch Hiob), Jahrbucher fur deutsche Theologie, XVI (1871), pp. 555-58; Karl Budde, Beitrag zur Kritik des Buches Hiob (Bonn: A. Marcus, 1876), pp. 29-62, and Das Buch Hiob (2nd ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1913; "Handkommentar zum Alten Testament"), p. xii-xxxiv; Maurice Vernes, "Bulletin critique des livres de Religion juive," Revue de l'Histoire des Religions, I (1889), 232-55; T. K, Cheyne, Job and Solomon (London: Kegan Paul, Trench & Co., 1887), pp. 66-70; Gustav Bickell, Das Buch Job (Wien: Carl Gerold's Sohn, 1894), pp. 7-8, Bernhard Duhm, Das Buch Hiob (Freiburg i. B.:
J. C. B. Mohr, 1897; "Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum Alten Testament"), pp. vii-xiii; Ludwig Laue, Die Composition des Buches Hiob (Halle J. Kruse, 1896), pp. 1-7, 118-45; D. B. Macdonald, "The Original Form of the Legend of Job," Journal of Biblical Literature, XIV (1895), 63-71, and "Some External Evidence on the Original Form of the Legend of Job," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures, XIV (1890), 137-44;
Lucien Gauthier, Introduction à l'ancien Testament Vols. Hób und Wesheit, p. 16, Adolphe Lods, "Recherches récentes," pp. 506-15, and Histoire de la littérature hébraïque, pp. 673 ff., Lindblom, op. cit., pp. 30 ff;
W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, An Introduction to the Books of the Old Testament (New York:
The Macmillan Co., 1894), pp. 171-74; also, accepting this view, is the same group with qualifications: S. R. Driver and G. B. Gray, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Job (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1921; "International Critical Commentary"), I, xxxiv ff,
This second argument, however, like the first, loses its strength when one observes that even in the prologue and epilogue Job (42:11) and his sons (1:4) live in houses, while in the poem he happens to refer to his tent (31:31)! In all probability the hero is pictured quite consistently throughout the book as a seminomad of Edom, living in a walled city during the winter season and migrating with his herds during the long months of spring, summer, and autumn.\(^4\)

(c) In the prologue and epilogue Job has lost all his children (1:19), but in the poem, according to some commentators, he still has sons (19:17). However, the expression “sons of my womb” means most probably “uterine brothers” (see Exeg., ad loc.); moreover, in the poem itself Bildad alludes to the death of the hero’s sons (8:4). This third argument, therefore, seems devoid of weight.

(d) In the prologue the suffering of Job is explained as the result of a trial (1:6-12; 2:1-7a), but in the poem not a single allusion is made to this explanation, even in a hypothetical way. Is it conceivable that the poet, if he were also responsible for the prologue, would fail to introduce some reference to the testing? But this matter also is open to question. For neither Job nor his friends know the story of the wager between Yahweh and “the Satan”; so the poet, utterly respectful of the human limitations of his characters, could not bring such a theme into their minds without committing a gross error in psychology. Thus the impact of the fourth argument is considerably weakened, or at any rate made inconclusive.

(2) There are nonetheless other considerations which strongly suggest a composite authorship:

(a) In the prologue and epilogue sacrifices—specifically burnt offerings—play an important part in the hero’s piety and in that of the three friends, as they did in all ancient Semitic religions (1:5; 42:8-9). It is obvious that the narrator unqualifiedly approves sacrificial worship, even when it is performed by foreigners. In the poem, on the contrary, sacrifices are conspicuously absent. To be sure, this is an argument e silentio, but it cannot be dismissed easily, for it would be strange indeed, if the poet were also the writer of the narrative, that neither the friends in their admonitions nor the hero in his defense should mention this elementary mode of approach to the Deity.

(b) In the prologue and epilogue Job is innocent of all possible crimes, explicit and implicit, personal and domestic, ethical and religious. He has the complete approval of God, not only before and during his trial (1:8; 2:3), but also afterward (42:7b, 8c, 10). The narrator presents his hero as the supreme model of faith (1:21, 22, 2.10). The poet, on the contrary, daringly portrays a blasphemer, a doubter, a frenzied rebel, a proud giant, a challenger of God, who in the end must cast himself down in utter humiliation and repent in dust and ashes (42:6).

(c) In the epilogue the narrator’s judgment is extremely and unexpectedly severe upon the friends (42:7-10), whereas in the discussion the poet displays toward them an attitude of objective fairness, and certainly does not place in their mouths any statement which justifies the divine wrath of the epilogue.

(d) More striking still is the fact that the atmosphere of the prologue and epilogue is that of a legendary idyl. Job is “the greatest of all the Orientals” (1:5b) and his wealth (1:5a; 42:12) as well as his old age and patriarchal death (42:16, 17), even the status of his daughters (1:4; 42:15b) and their beauty (42:15a) are truly fabulous. Furthermore, the dramatic description of the disasters, with the repeated motif, “And I alone have escaped to tell thee. While he was yet speaking . . .” (1:15b-16a, 16c-17a, 17c-18a), suggests a stylized element, a typical trait of the ancient folk tales. On the contrary, every aspect of the discussion is true to life in the raw, realistically told and realistically appraised. The impression of two literary hands—indeed, two literary worlds—imposes itself upon the reader. The prose narrative suggests to our imagination the haunting strains of a nursery tale, with its villain and its happy ending, whereas the poetic discussion has the ring of grim history.

(e) In the prologue and epilogue the narrator shows exceptionally polished craftsmanship and psychological penetration. He succeeds in creating sympathy for his hero while he as author remains the observer. On the contrary, in the discussion between Job and the friends, the poet is the hero, and yet is also able to portray the friends or to spell out “the voice from the whirlwind” with the creative imagination of an extraordinarily versatile and sensitive thinker. The narrator is a literary master; but the poet is greater still, for when he lends his words to Job even the casual student cannot but sense the voice of introspective authenticity. Both the narrator and the poet are consummate artists, but the former writes about somebody else while the latter writes about himself. The narrator is heir to centuries of storytelling at night before the campfire, and his literary personality was probably not that of an individual but rather that of a sociological entity—the folk creativity of the ages. The poet on the contrary is a man who has suffered the pangs and throes which he transmutes into verse. When he ascribes to Job laments, soliloquies, prayers, vituperations, protests, invectives, and sheer shouts of pain, the blood of his own heart is spilled before our very eyes, and his agony is laid so starkly bare that we almost aver our gaze. The narrator moves us, but the poet probes us. The former evokes, but the latter embarrasses; the former thrills, but the latter compels with the grip of existential communication.

\(^4\) Alois Musil has even located an Edomite locality called Chirbet el ‘Is, which may be the ancient Uz (Arabah Petraeae [Vienna: Alfred Holder, 1908], II, 537 and 339, note d).

In view of the above discussion we shall maintain that the prose narrative and the poem originated from two different men, and the first theory (see p. 884) is hereby rejected. But a question remains: Did the poem exist independently of the prose story (second theory), or did the poet borrow the narrative and adapt it as a framework for his poetic discussion (third theory)? An incontrovertible demonstration of either view appears to be impossible on the basis of the present evidence. However, the following points may be entered on the record.

(a) It is not probable that the poet began his work in medias res with the sentence, “And Job opened his mouth and cursed his day” (3:1). The so-called parallels from the book of Ruth or the Gospel of Mark are not relevant, for the action in these writings does not presuppose any previous information, whereas the soliloquy of Job is unintelligible without a preface. It requires a plot, a situation, a story. Of course the poet may have assumed that everybody knew that story, just as the prophet Ezekiel alluded to Job together with Daniel and Noah (Ezek. 14:14, 20) without taking time to be specific about them. But if that was the case, the Joban narrative must have existed already in such a fixed form—albeit oral—that the poet took it for granted as common literary property. Then the question whether it was the poet or one of his admirers and disciples who committed the narrative to manuscript form is of secondary and almost immaterial importance.

(b) A linguistic comparison of the prose narrative with the poetic discussion reveals an astounding number of affinities between these two sections of the book:

(i) The word נין, “perfect” (outside of Job only in Gen. 25:27; Ps. 64:5; Prov. 29:10): 1:1; cf. 8:20; 9:20-22.

(ii) The word מָנוּ, “perfection” (outside of Job only in Prov. 11:3): 1:3, 9; cf. 27:5; 31:16.

(vi) The use of both genders in the same sentence for the masculine or feminine noun נר, “wind,” “spirit”: 1:19; cf. 4:15.

(vii) The expression, מָיֶשֶׁה נַה, “to come out of the womb”: 1:21; cf. 3:11; 8:29.

(ix) The verb לָנֵם in the Hiphil with the preposition יב, “to hold fast”: 2:3, 9; cf. 8:15, 20; 27:6.

(x) The verb לָנֵם in the Piel, “to destroy,” “to ruin”: 2:3; cf. 8:18; 10:8.

(xiv) The expression מִשְׁאוֹת, “beginning” and “latter end”: 42:12; cf. 8:7.

No decisive argument should be drawn from the fact of these affinities, however, because an equally great number of dissimilarities between the vocabulary and grammar of the narrative and those of the poem can be easily noted. E.g., the prologue favors the expression נין לָנֵם, “to consider” (1:8), whereas the poem prefers נין לָנֵם (7:17); the prologue understands the idiomatic expression נין לָנֵם as “the work which man's hands undertake” (1:10) whereas the poem takes it to mean “the completed work of God's hands” (14:15). Moreover, while the poem presents the most peculiar language of the Old Testament, being filled with words of Aramaic, Arabic, Akkadian, and even Egyptian origin, the narrative is written in pure, classical Hebrew, in spite of the presence of one word נין in the Piel, “to receive”; 2:10 which has cognates in Arabic and Aramaic but is not necessarily a sign of decadence. The linguistic affinities between the narrative and the poem probably suggest that the poet was intimately acquainted with the prose story and has erected his poetic monument upon its foundation.

(c) The date of the prose narrative cannot be ascertained with scientific rigor, for objective criteria offer conflicting evidence. Many critics propose the end of the sixth century B.C., because the name “Satan” appears with the definite article (הַשָּׁטָן) exactly as in the book of Zechariah (3:1 ff.). Several considerations render this date improbable, if not impossible:

(i) The scenes at the heavenly court have nothing in common with those of the high priest’s trial in Zechariah; on the contrary they are closely akin to the ninth-century vision of Micaiah ben Imlah (1 Kings 22:19-23; cf. Exeg. on Job 1:6-8).

(ii) The language and style of the prose story are similar to those of the patriarchal traditions which were gathered by the Yahwist in the tenth or ninth century and to the ninth- or eighth-century narratives now preserved in the books of Samuel and Kings. See among many others the expression הָיִתָה פֶּן, “there was a man” (1:1;
cf. If Sam. 12:1; סֹאֲדֵי יְהֹוָה “and there was a day” (1:13; 2:1; cf. I Sam. 1:4; 14:1).

(iii) A story which presents an Edomite sheik as a hero of faith, uniquely approved by Yahweh, can hardly have been written or orally adapted in Hebrew during the sixth century or later, at a time when the attitude of the Judeans—and afterward the Jews—against the Edomites was one of hostility bordering on fanatic hatred (see Pss. 83:4-6; 137:7; Isa. 54:5-6; Jer. 49:7-22; Lam. 4:21; Ezek. 25:12-14; 35:2; Obad. 10-14). The mere fact of the Edomite origin of Job almost requires the conclusion that the story was “Hebraized” long before the end of the seventh century B.C.88

Thus the date of the narrative must be at least pre-exilic, and perhaps as early as the ninth or eighth century B.C.

On account of all these considerations, one is inclined to propose that the poet—who did not live before the sixth century B.C. (see below)— borrowed for a preface a tale which had existed in a fixed literary form, oral or written, for several generations. The consequence of this view is important: the theological message of the poet is free from the implications of the tale, such as divine pride in a man’s integrity or the idea of a God who allows human suffering for the purpose of winning a heavenly wager; and more particularly, it does not make the poet responsible for the fabulous ending with its double portion of sheep, camels, oxen, and she-asses.

B. Poetic Discussion.—The dialogue between Job and his three friends seems to be a homogenous composition. Critics, however, have questioned the authenticity of some sections of 88 Such details as the mention of the Chaldeans as nomads (1:17), or the use of the “kesitah” (42:11), a piece of uncoined money of the patriarchal period (cf.

Exeg., ad loc.), do not necessarily indicate an early date but may reflect the writer’s “archaeological” intent.

the third cycle (chs. 21-27) and the hymn on wisdom (ch. 28).

The third cycle differs from the first two because in it (a) Job appears at times to defend the point of view of his friends (24:18-24; 26:3-14; 27:13-23); (b) the discourse of Bildad is unusually short (25:1-6); and (c) the expected discourse of Zophar is absent. In order to account for these peculiarities commentators have proposed many different rearrangements or excisions.89 In all probability a late editor has attempted to tone down Job’s heretical statements by attributing to him sections which were lifted out of the third discourse of Bildad (26:5-14) and of Zophar (24:18-24; 27:13-23), and by censoring Job’s reply to Zophar. Any restoration of the original text remains conjetural, but the following is the most simple and probable:

Eliphaz: 22:1-30
Bildad: 25:1-6; 26:5-14
Job: 26:1-4; 27:1-12
Job: [7]

Thus restored, each discourse yields excellent sense, fits the positions of the respective speakers, and presents satisfactory sequences of ideas.
For instance, the third discourse of Bildad deals with the heavenly beings (25:2-3), man (25: 4-6), and the shades in the underworld (27:5-6).
Likewise, Job’s invective (26:2-4) leads normally to his protest (27:2 ff.), and Zophar’s description of the wicked (24:18-24) is naturally followed by a picture of the fate awaiting the oppressors’ offspring (27:14 ff.), with a pivotal line between the two developments (27:13; see Exeg., ad loc.).

The hymn on wisdom (ch. 28) raises a problem of its own. Since it undoubtedly interrupts Job’s soliloquy and contains a concept of wisdom which is neither that of Job nor that of his friends (see Exeg., ad loc.), many critics regard it as an editorial addition.89 Yet the language and style show close affinities with those of the discourses of Yahweh (see Exeg., ad loc).
The hymn may therefore be a product of the same poetic hand and may have been preserved at this place by a member of the Joban school.

The date of the poem can be determined with some degree of accuracy as that of the 88 See detailed lists in A. Ragnier, “La distribution des chapitres 25-28 du livre de Job,” Revue Biblique, XXXIII (1924), 186-200; Pfeiffer, Intro to O.T., pp.

671-72; cf G A. Barton, “The Composition of Job 24-50,” Journal of Biblical Literature, XXX (1911), 66-77.
89 Driver and Gray, op. cit., I, xxxviii; Eissfeldt, Einleitung in das A.T., p 508; Lods, Histoire de la litterature hebraique, p. 680, Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T.,
p. 672, et al.
first part of the sixth century B.C. A terminus a quo is provided by the facts that Job's soliloquy (3:3-26) has been inspired by one of the confessions of Jeremiah (20:14-18), and that the Joban meditation upon the prosperity of the wicked (21:17 ff.) is an elaboration of that same prophet's anxious query (Jer. 12:1-3).

There is ample evidence, for example, to prove that Job's soliloquy is a literary amplification of Jeremiah's cry of distress: 81

(a) Jeremiah's tone and form are spontaneous, harsh, and violent; those of Job are solemn and sophisticated: his emotion is collected in serene creativity.

(b) The relative particle היה, "in which," is twice used by the prophet (Jer. 20:14ab) and omitted by the poet (Job 3:3): an addition by the former would be pointless, but an omission by the latter indicates poetic flair.

(c) The Pual perfect ירשה, "I was brought forth" (Jer. 20:14a), suggests colloquial abruptness, but the Niphal imperfect ירש, "I was born," implies reflection on time (cf. Greek aorist).

(d) To the curse of the day of birth (Jer. 20:14) the poet adds a maladiction of the conception night (Job 3:3b).

(e) For the man announcing the news (Jer. 20:15) the poet substitutes the personification of night (Job 3:3b).

(f) The prophet's awkward mention of רות יוח, "a male son" (Jer. 20:15), becomes רות, "a human" (Job 3:3b), although the child is only conceived.

(g) The poet develops the curses with mythological allusions (Job 3:4-10) and then returns to the prophet's anxious "Why?" (Jer. 20:18) which he amplifies in a threefold way (Job 3:11, 12, 16).

On the matter of a terminus ad quem, scholars are widely divided,82 but a careful comparison between the Joban poem and Second Isaiah definitely indicates the anteriority of the former over the latter As Pfeiffer has shown,83 there are between the two books numerous parallels of thought and even points of verbal contact. For instance, one may note in both pieces the 81 See Driver and Gray, op cit., I, lxv ff.; Pfeiffer, Intro to O.T., pp. 675-78; et al.

83 Use of rare words, like חוכ, "spittle" (7:19; 30:10; cf. Isa. 50:6); חֵית, "spider" (8:14; cf. Isa. 59:5); נמיס, "vault" (22:14; cf. Isa. 40:22); קּוֹדֶשׁ, "offspring" (5:25; 21:8; 27:14; cf. Isa. 44:3; 48:19). Significantly, many of these common expressions or idioms occur in theological contexts, where both poets depict the transcendence of God or the ephemerality and finiteness of man:

(a) God is "mighty in strength" (9:4a; cf. Isa. 40:26). "Who can hinder him?" (11:10b; cf. Isa. 45:13). "Who will say to him, "What doest thou?" (9:12b; cf. Isa. 45:9b.) God "alone stretched out the heavens" (9:8a; cf. Isa. 44:24d). "By his understanding [הָאָדָם, cf. Isa. 40:28c] he smote Rahab" (26:12b; cf. Isa. 51.9e) and "he stirred up the sea" (26:12a; cf. Isa. 51:15). "Will any teach God knowledge?" (21:22a; cf. Isa. 40:14c.) Divine thoughts are "made for man's reach" (11:7; cf. Isa. 40:26e; cf. also Job 5:9; etc.). God is truly Deus Absconditus (9:11; 23:8-9; cf. Isa. 45:15). In none of these passages, examined in their respective contexts, is it possible to maintain that Job is dependent upon Second Isaiah. If he had been, he could not have afforded to omit the motif of creation by fiat which is one of the trade-marks of the prophet, or to ignore for example the word יָרָשׁ, "to create" (Isa. 42:5; etc.).

(b) Man is "made" by God's "hands" out of "clay" (10:8-9; cf. Isa. 45:9); he is "fashioned . . . in the womb" (31:15; cf. Isa. 44:24b). Yet his life "withers" like a flower or like grass (14:1-2; cf. Isa. 40:27c). God "frustrates" (ועשו) "the devices of the crafty" (5:12a) and "the omens of the liars" (Isa. 44:25a); he "makes fools" (puty) of judges (12:17b) and diviners (Isa. 44:25b); he is the absolute master of "the nations" (12:23; cf. Isa. 40:15, 17). Man's life is comparable to a "military service" (7:1a; 14:15b; cf. Isa. 40:2), "a worm" or "a maggot" (25:6; cf. Isa. 41:14 [LXX], "a moth-eaten garment" (19:28b; cf. Isa. 51:8a). His "way is hid" (3:23a; cf. Isa. 40:27c).

(c) More particularly, it will be observed that the figure of the servant in Second Isaiah is described in a way which is strongly reminiscent of Job and shows that Job is not the borrower. Several words and expressions are identical in both poems, but Job uses them in concrete, personal clauses, with a preference for active verbal forms which claim chronological priority over "static," fresco-like propositions, couched in passive participial forms, and characteristic of the servant songs. Job declares, "The hand of God has struck me" (19:21b), but Second Isaiah says that the servant was "stricken of God" (Isa. 53:4c). One complains that "men . . . smote [him] upon the cheek" (16:10b), but the other states that the servant was “smiten” (Isa. 53:4d). One says, “My kinsfolk have failed” (דְּרֵי, 19:14a) while the other writes that the servant was “rejected of men” (דְּרֵי, 33:9). One explains, “Even young children despise me” מַעְלָה (cf. Job 19:18a), while of the servant the other merely says, “He was despised” מַעְלָה (דְּרֵי; Isa. 53:3a). One asks, “Is there wrong on my tongue?” (6:30a), or protests, “Although there is no violence [ות] in my hands” (16:17a), and the other echoes in two consecutive lines, “Although he had done no violence [ות], and there was no deceit in his mouth” (Isa. 53:9cd; cf. Job 31:5b). If the poet of Job had known Second Isaiah and borrowed these expressions from the servant songs, why should he have scattered them in widely different contexts? Finally, the Joban poet has tried again and again to explain the cause of human suffering. He has investigated all possible theories. But he has never heard of the theme of vicarious suffering. He does not allude to it; he does not polemize against it; he ignores it completely. All the above considerations converge toward the same conclusion: he does not know Second Isaiah.

889

The poet of Job may thus be pictured as a man who lived probably between 580 and 540 b.c. He was acquainted with the international circle of the wise; had traveled widely in Arabia, Mesopotamia, Egypt, and of course the Fertile Crescent; forged for himself an elegant poetic idiom, and was deeply impressed, not only by his personal experience of sorrow, but also by the profound social and political disturbances of the ancient Near East at the beginning of the Neo-Babylonian empire. His outlook was thoroughly Hebraic, although he was completely detached from love of promised land, covenant law, temple, or Davidic royal family.

C. Discourses of Elihu.—The genuineness of Elihu’s speeches (32:1–37:24) has been questioned for a long time; and although some serious defense of their authenticity has been mustered, most contemporary critics regard them as the addition of an early reader or scribe who intended to correct the hero’s statements, chasten the friends for their failure to silence Job (see 32:11–16), and perhaps in a veiled way improve upon the discourses of Yahweh (see 36:2 ff., 57:1 ff.). The main arguments may be summed up as follows:

(a) The character of the speaker is not mentioned outside of chs. 32–37, a fact especially significant in the epilogue where Yahweh pronounces his verdict upon the three friends (42:7 ff.).

(b) The introduction of Elihu is couched in a ponderous, redundant, and obviously scribal style (32:1–6).

(c) The challenge of Job at the end of his fiery oath of clearance (31:8–37) calls not for any Elihu, but for an immediate answer of the voice from the whirlwind (38:1 ff.).

(d) Elihu quotes Job verbatim (cf. 33:8–11 with 13:24, 27; 34:5–9 with 27:3; 35:3 with 7:20; etc.) and addresses him by name (32:12; 33:1, 31; 34:5, 7, 35, 36; 35:16; 37:14), whereas the poet never elsewhere used this method in the poetic discussion. The manner of Elihu gives the impression of academic and even scholastic argumentation. The author of these speeches seems to have studied the poem in a manuscript form.

(e) The language strangely reveals Aramaic influence (see, among others, the Aramaic יִשָּׁר, “to break” [34:24], for the Hebrew יִשָּׁר; the Aramaic מִפְּרֵשֶׁב, “deed” [34:25], for the Hebrew מַעְלָה; the wholly Aramaic sentence מַעְלָה יִשָּׁר, “Bear with me a little, and I will show you” [36:2a]: the Aramaic יִשָּׁר, “to do” [36:3], for the Hebrew מַעְלָה; the Aramaic מִפְּרֵשֶׁב, “in abundance” [36:31], for the Hebrew מַעְלָה; probably also the Aramaic words כְּפַרַע יִשָּׁר, “tempest” [36:38]; מַעְלָה, “to fall” [37:6]; מַעְלָה, “wondrous works” [37:16]; מַעְלָה, “bright” [37:21]), the use of late Hebrew terms or expressions (e.g., the first person pronoun יִשָּׁר rather than יִשָּׁר, except in 33:31 [which quotes 31:3a] and in 33:9b [for the sake of parallelism], and several words or verbal forms which are not found in the poetic discussion (e.g., יִשָּׁר, “knowledge” [32:6, 10, 17; 36:5; 37:16], instead of יִשָּׁר [cf. 13:2; etc.]; יִשָּׁר in the Hipfih, “to wait for” [32:11, 16], instead of the Piel [cf. 6:11; etc.]; יִשָּׁר in the Piel, “to justify” [33:32], instead of the Hipfih [cf. 27:5]; יִשָּׁר, “the men of . . .” [34:8, 10, 54, 36], instead of יִשָּׁר [cf. 11:11; 19:19; etc.]; the unusual יִשָּׁר, 1895); Wenzel Posselt, Der Verfasser der Eliu-reden (Freiburg i. B.: Herder, 1909; “Biblische Studien”); Martin Thilo, Das Buch Hiob (Bonn: A. Marcus & E. Weberst, 1925), pp. 135–38; Paul Szygelski, Das Buch Hiob (Bonn: Peter Hanstein, 1921; “Die Heilige Schrift des Alten Testamentes”); p. 22; Louis Demnfeld, Les discours d’élilou,” Revue Biblique, XLVIII (1899), 163–66.
crowning element—of the original poem.28 The arguments may be summarized as follows:

(a) It is not correct to assert that the discourses of Yahweh condemn purely and simply the attitude of Job and thereby nullify what the poet has accomplished in the dialogue. While it is true that the poet himself is his own hero and paints in Job his own experience of the depths of despair and of the heights of rebellion, he does not imply anywhere in the dialogue that he endorses the innocence of that hero. Nor is it correct to maintain that the author of Yahweh's speeches either condemns the hero's ethical behavior or proclaims the dogma of individual retribution. In effect, the dialogue portrays a man who speaks without knowledge, and the purpose of the divine discourses is to reveal to him this truth. The speeches of Yahweh do not contradict the purpose of the dialogue: they introduce a new dimension by raising the issue at stake from the finite level of man to the infinite level of God.29

(b) It is hardly conceivable that a man of the poet's magnitude would leave his work in suspense with Job's protest of innocence. The hero has most solemnly called for God's intervention (51:35-37). To be sure, he has asked for it only for the purpose of obtaining his own vindication (9:2, 3, 14-16, 17, 20, 29-31; 10:6, 7; 13:15-21): he craved to meet God, but on his own terms since he planned to greet him as a prince welcomes an equal (31:37)! On the contrary, when Yahweh speaks out of the whirlwind, not a word of vindication is uttered, and the noble sheik prostrates himself in the dust (42:6). The difference of attitudes between Job's demanding the divine intervention and his receiving it may suggest a logical contradiction, but certainly not a rhetorical, psychological, or theological discrepancy. To reject the genuineness of 38:1-42:6 on the basis of ideological analysis betrays incomprehension of the poet's purpose and religion.

(c) From the points of view of language and style, the discourses of Yahweh reveal the closest affinities with the dialogue and represent at least the same degree of virtuosity and brilliance. Who would seriously believe that a post-exilic scribe could imitate and at times surpass the poetic genius who brought forth the dialogue?

In conclusion, let it be recognized that the book of Job, like most other writings of the Bible, does not have a strictly individual authorship. The ancient Edomite folk tale of the suffering servant of God captured the imagination and the inspiration of a poet who asked, 28 See p. 902.

"Who is God? What does God require of man? What is the meaning of human life?" His answer has been fairly well preserved, in spite of a few excisions and editorial corrections (especially in chs. 24-27).

V. Language and Poetic Structure

A. Original Tongue.—In view of the Edomitic character of the story, several students have conjectured not only that the poet was an Edomite but also that he wrote in Arabic, of which the present book is a Hebrew translation. None of the arguments which have been advanced in favor of this linguistic hypothesis is valid, and the mere idea that a Jewish poet would have translated an Arabic poem—necessarily during the early part of the postexilic period and before the insertion of the discourses of Elihu—is rather fanciful.

The weight of present evidence seems to indicate that the poem of Job (dialogue and discourses of Yahweh) was written in Hebrew, though undoubtedly the poet—like any true genius of the art of verse—has forged for himself a notably original tongue. The Joban master imitated but seldom. If he had a model, he did not copy but adapted and re-created according to his own mold. His vocabulary is extraordinarily rich and includes a large number of words or expressions which are found nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible. Many of these have been explained with the help of the Arabic (e.g., the feminine forms הרוה, "light" [3:4b]; נפש, "cloud" [3:5b]; מים, "pain" [6:10b]; the סלע legomena לוחה, "attack" [15:24b]; ערב, "to mistreat" [19:3b]; etc.), Aramaic (יהב, "to break" [4:10b]; רם, "stocks" [19:27a]; etc.), Akkadian (כִּבְשָׁה, "belt" [12:21b]; זומן, "reed" [9:26a]; etc.), and even Egyptian (e.g., the two words זומן, "ibis," and יקום, "rooster" [38:36a]; perhaps a few others). In addition, several Aramaic words are used for the sake of poetic parallelism whenever synonyms of Hebrew words are lacking (cf. the Hebrew עֵ֣ז, "witness," and the Aramaic דרָשׁ [16:19b]; the Hebrew גְּבוּל, "wild ass," and the Aramaic עֲדוֹן [59:5b]; the Hebrew מָרָע, "bones," and the Aramaic מְרֻא [40:18a and b]), and a few Aramaic terms are systematically preferred to their Hebrew equivalents (e.g., the Hebrew יִשָּׁה, "words," is used ten times and the Aramaic יֵשׁוּה, thirteen times; but cf. the Aramaic יִשָּׁה, "famine" [5:22a]; יֶסֶם, "rock" [30:6b]). However, while the Aramaic influence is indisputable, it is neither exclusive nor overwhelming—as in the discourses of Elihu—and should not be exploited in any way as an argument for the postexilic date of the poem. The lexicographic wealth, moreover, does not preclude the conclusion that the language is genuinely Hebrew, for the vocabulary, morphological inflections, and syntactic connections are on the whole closely akin to those of the other poetic books of the Hebrew Bible.

B. Style.—The literary mastery of the poet is unsurpassed in the Old Testament, and his stylistic versatility, vigor, conciseness, and elegance are probably superior to those of any other Hebrew poet. Like the best wise men, he was able to fashion his thought and sharpen it into gnomic terseness (as in 6:14), to clinch an argument with a proverbial quotation (as in 6:6), to pack a rhetorical question with double entendre (as in 22:2), and to titillate the hearer's wit and imagination with enigmatic aphorisms (as in 17:5).

He could develop at length an abstract theme with a wealth of concrete illustrations (as in 21:7-13), evoke a scene with the touch of the storyteller (as in 4:12-16), and embroider in a dozen different ways on hackneyed motifs for which he entertained nothing but dislike (as in 5:2 ff.). He was didactic in the best manner, but he had also a dramatic flair for suspense. For instance, he withheld until the end of the soliloquy (3:23) the mention of God, although it was expected at the outset of the curse (3:3). He was ignorant of the art of the swift dialogue, but he cultivated the highly original method of "delayed reaction," by which Job or a friend answers the argument not of the immediately preceding, but of the penultimate speaker (as in 9:2 ff., which replies to 4:17 ff.). He also displayed a subtle sense of rhetoric by inserting at strategic positions a pivotal sentence which at once could bind up a development and usher in another (as in 4:21). He made the hero indulge in blasphemous statements as "shock warnings" (as in 13:13-14); he could toy with a theme, abandon it, and then reintroduce it with deeper intensity (as in 14:7, 14); he was careful to place emotional climaxes not at the end but... before the completion of a discourse, thus making room for a calming decrescendo (as in 16.22, following vs. 18).

He was equally at home in the genre of the lament (as in 3:5 ff.) or in that of the doxology (as in 9:4 ff.). He was able to transmute a soliloquy into a colloquy; and to make a meditation explode with emotional pressure into a prayer (as in chs. 6–7). He was well versed in the art of forensic eloquence (as in 31:1 ff.), but he could also restrain his powers of oratory and impose silence upon his volubility (as in 42:6). He ran the whole gamut of tones: he could be coarse (as in 15:2) or vehement (as in 16:18), gruesome (as in 17:14) or humorous (as in 17:16), tender (as in 14 18 ff.) or passionate (as in 19:13-19). He used all the shades of irony, from earthly sarcasm (as in 12.2) to heavenly persiflage (as in 58:3 ff.).

His versatility of style was coupled and enhanced with an exquisite sense of the beauty of nature which furnished him at will with ready imagery. The theme of the failure of friendship, for example, led him to picture the swollen streams, overflowing with snow water in springtime, soon to vanish in torrid wastes (6:15 ff.). Thus he could summon, for the sake of heightening the effect or of coloring the debate, all sorts of visions and vignettes: the thunderstorms and the desert hurricanes (21:18; 27:21; etc.), the flash floods in mountain valleys (14:19), the hunger of the lioness and her whelps (4:10-11; cf. the five synonyms for “lion”), the soaring of vultures (5:7) or the swooping of eagles (9:26), the shock of heavy grain at the threshing floor (5:26), the sands innumerable along the surf (6:8), the wild ass grazing against the distant sky (6:9), the papyrus growing in the marsh and the reed blooming in the canal (8:11), the constellations moving in the night, not only the Bear and Orion or the Pleiades, but even the Southern Cross (9:9), and the morning stars singing together (38:7).

In lending words to his hero, he suggested the conflicts of moods (as in 7:21); in ascribing utterances to the friends, he was fair toward ideas which he rejected; in daring to make audible “the voice from the whirlwind,” he could transcend the human lack of perspective and borrow for a while the eternal glance. As a dramatic poet, he was the Shakespeare of the Old Testament; as a theological poet, he was brother of the Hebrew prophets.

C. Metrical Forms.—Although many treatises have been written on the subject, the study of Hebraic prosody is a science which is still in its infancy. Thanks mostly to the discovery of the Ugaritic texts, exegetes have learned to exercise extreme caution before correcting the text in order to make it conform to the rhythm, for the simple reason that they now refuse to state a priori what that rhythm should be, and they reject the Procrustean uniformity which has been for too long imposed upon the Hebrew meter.

The poetic form of Job is as versatile as its style. The colon, which constitutes the essential element of the line, is made up of a clause or sentence containing two, three, or perhaps (but in any case infrequently) four beats or accented syllables. The line itself is formed generally with two cola (bicolon or couplet), occasionally three (tricolon or triad), thus creating a wide variety of combinations such as 2+2, 2+3, 3+2, 3+3, 2+2+2, possibly also 3+4, 4+4, 4+3. These meters are intimately linked with the ideas, which may from colon to colon be repeated (synonymous parallelism), developed by contrast (antithetic parallelism), amplified (synthetic parallelism) or qualified (restrictive parallelism). The Joban poet is astoundingly at ease in most of these forms, and he uses them with striking effects. The most common form, however, is that of synonymous parallelism in 3+3. A few examples of other rhythms follow. They should be read in their respective contexts.

(a) Synonymous parallelism in 2+2:

\[
\begin{align*} \text{hahöger 'ëlōsh timça} \\
\text{im 'aḏh-āḵkhlīl šadāday timça} \\ \end{align*}
\]

Canst thou find out the depth of God? Canst thou discover the limit of the Almighty?

Mueller (1896, etc.), Condamin (1899, etc.), Sievers (1901), Schlogl (1912), Gray (1913), Zorrel (1914), König (1914, etc.), Podechard (1918, etc.). On the meter of Job see especially Paul Vetter, Die Metrik des Buches Hlob Freiburg i. B.: Herder, 1897; "Biblsche Studenten"; Joseph Hontheim, Das Buch Hlob als streifisches Künstwerk nachgewiesen (Freiburg i. B.: Herder, 1904; "Biblsche Studien"); Driver and Gray, Job, I, lxxxvli, Dhomme, Le livre de Job, pp cxxv ff.; Edward J. Kissane, The Book of Job (Dublin: Browne & Nolan, 1939), pp 1-1x; Stevenson, Poem of Job, pp 56-59.

121 Still visible in G. Holscher, Das Buch Hlob, rev. ed (1952)
122 The Ugaritic texts have helped Hebraists to understand that a poetic section with a predominating two-cola rhythm may suddenly include a line of three cola (as in 17:1, 11) for the sake of emphasis, aesthetic variation, or structural reason (see p. 895); cf. C. L. Feinberg, "The Poetic Structure of the Book of Job and the Ugaritic Literature," Bibliotheca Sacra, CIII (1946), 283-92.
THE INTERPRETER’S BIBLE

(b) Synonymous parallelism in 3+2 (so-called Qinâh rhythm):

\[yehødhephułh mè’ôr ’el-hôsheq wûmîtêbeth yvûnddhâh (18:18)\]

They thrust him from light into darkness,
And drive him out of the world.

(c) Restrictive parallelism in 2+3:

\[hale’êl yîskon-gâbher ki-yîskôn ’âlêño msâkîl (22:2)\]

Can a he-man be profitable to God?
(Even) a wise-man profits (only) himself!

(d) Synthetic parallelism in 2+2+2:

\[rûhî hubbâlah yânay nîz’âkhû gîhârîm lî (17:1)\]

My spirit is deranged,
(Yes,) my days are extinct,
The graveyard is mine.

(e) Antithetic parallelism in 4+4:

\[yô’bdhâd yôm ’iwâdelâd bô wehaldelâb ’âmâr hîrâh gîdhâbèr (3:3)\]

Perish the day wherein I was born,
And the night which said, A he-man is conceived!

The Joban poem, like all the other Semitic poems, was originally chanted, and the fluctuations of rhythms—no doubt also the tonal melodies—punctuated and inflected the meaning of the sentences in a unique espousal of thought to sound,102 which tended to induce within the hearer’s threshold-consciousness a receptivity proper to psycho-aesthetic comprehension. In its original tongue the poem surely cast a spell upon its audience, in a magnetism comparable with that of the monotonity—with subtle departures—of the desert wind drumming on the sand dunes.

D. Strophic Patterns.—Scholars generally have been slow to admit the existence of strophes in Hebrew poetry, perhaps because some proposals of strophic analysis were artificially systematic; because the existence of tricolon within sections of bicola was not recognized; and because Greek, rather than Semitic, forms of articulation were imposed upon the poetic texts.103 Valuable work has been done on the strophic structure of Job, but this particular study is still in the embryonic stage.104 It is not possible here to discuss the many different arrangements which have been proposed; let it be noted only that the Joban poet appears to manifest in this particular area of craftsmanship a singular mastery. One example will suffice.

The long first discourse of Eliphaz (4:2-5:27) presents a model of strophic composition.105 The first part (4:2-11) falls in two sections (vss. 2-6, 7-11), each of which divides itself into two strophes of three and two lines (couplets or bicola) respectively.

The second part (4:12-21) has an identical pattern in reverse. Each of the two sections (4:12-16 and 17-21) divides itself in two strophes of two and three lines respectively (instead of three and two), and the usual couplets or bicola make room twice for triads or tricolia (vss. 16, 19), obviously for the sake of special emphasis on the ideas expressed.

The third part (5:1-7), anticipated by the pivotal verse which precedes (4:21), is made up of a single strophe which conveys in seven couplets the central message of the discourse and is crowned with the capital verse (5:7).

The fourth part (5:8-27) falls into two sections, an appeal (5:8-17) and a promise (5:18-27), each made up of three strophes of three couplets and followed by a concluding couplet beginning with the word “Behold!” (vss. 17, 27).

It will be observed that this strophic arrangement respects in every way the Masoretic Text. To be sure, not all the poems of the book readily present such a striking pattern; but those in chs. 3, 6-7, 12-14, 19, 28, and others, display similar structures and indicate that the artistry of the poet was not confined to language, style, and meter, but included an architectural plan of eloquent design. The poet did not often develop a theme at random; he did not allow his imagination to carry his mind away without the reins of a chosen motif. He worked within the pattern which would best express his thinking. Like many psalmists (cf. Ps. 29; 42-43; 46; etc.) and prophets, especially Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Second Isaiah, he was an authentic poet, linking truth with beauty.

JOB

a) THE DOGMA OF DIVINE JUSTICE (4:2-11)
(1) CONFIDENCE IN INTEGRITY (4:2-6)
(a) 2. If one assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved?
   But from speaking, who can refrain?
3. Behold, thou hast instructed many,
   And the weak hands, thou hast strengthened.
4. Thy words have upheld him who was stumbling,
   And made firm the feeble knees.
(b) 5. But now, it is come upon thee and thou art impatient;
   It toucheth thee, and thou art dismayed.
6. Is not thy fear of God thy confidence,
   And the integrity of thy ways, thy hope?

(2) HARVEST OF TROUBLE (4:7-11)
(a) 7. Remember, I pray thee, whoever perished being innocent?
   Or where were the upright cut off?
8. As I have seen it they that plow iniquity,
   And sow trouble, reap the same.
9. By the breath of God they perish,
   And by the blast of his anger are they consumed.
(b) 10. The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the fierce lion,
   And the teeth of the young lions, are broken.
11. The old lion perisheth for lack of prey,
   And the whelps of the lioness are scattered abroad.

b) THE MYSTERY OF SUFFERING (4:12-21)
(1) VISION IN THE NIGHT (4:12-16)
(e) 12. A word was brought to me stealthily,
   And mine ear received a whisper thereof,
13. In thoughts from the visions of the night,
   When deep sleep falleth over men.
(b) 14. Dread came upon me, and trembling,
   Which made all my bones to shake;
15. A breath of air swept over my face,
   And the hair of my flesh bristled up;
16. Someone was standing still, of undiscernible aspect;
   A form was before mine eyes;
   There was silence. Then, I heard a voice:

(2) THE HUMAN SITUATION (4:17-21)
(a) 17. “Can mortal man be righteous before God?
   Can a strong man be pure before his Maker?
18. “Behold! in his own servants God putteth no trust,
   And his messengers he chargeth with folly!
(b) 19. “How much more them that dwell in houses of clay,
   And whose foundation is in the dust!
   They are crushed like a moth.
20. “Betwixt morn and even they are beaten small;
   Without any regarding it, forever they perish.
21. “Is not their pre-eminence departed from them?
   They die, and not of wisdom!”

c) THE FRUIT OF OBSTINACY (5:1-7)
1. Call now: is there any one who can answer thee?
   To which of the holy ones wouldst thou turn?
2. For surely the wrath of God will slay the fool,
   And his jealousy will bring the silly one to death.
3. Yea, I have seen the fool taking root;
   But suddenly his abode became rotten.
4. His sons are far from safety;
They are crushed at the gate, and none shall deliver them.
5. His harvest the hungry will eat up.
Or God will take it away by drought?,
And the thirsty will pant after his milk?.
6. For affliction cometh not from the dust,
Neither doth trouble spring out of the ground:
7. It is man who begetteth trouble,
As surely as the sparks fly upward.

d) The Duty of Man on Earth (5:8-27)

(1) The Appeal (5:8-17)

(a) 8. As for me, I would seek unto God,
And unto God would I commit my cause;
9. He doeth great things and unsearchable,
Marvellous things without number:
10. He giveth rain upon the face of the earth,
And sendeth water upon the face of the fields.

(b) 11. He setteth the lowly on high,
And they that mourn are exalted to safety.
12. He frustrateth the devices of the crafty,
So that their hands cannot perform their enterprise.
13. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness,
And the counsel of the froward is carried headlong.

(c) 14. They meet with darkness in the daytime,
And grope in the noonday as in the night.
15. But he saveth from the sword the guileless,
And the poor from the hand of the mighty.
16. Thus hope cometh to the destitute,
And iniquity stoppeth her mouth.

(d) 17. Behold! Happy is the man whom God correcteth!
Therefore, despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty!

(2) The Promise (5:18-27)

(a) 18. For he maketh sore, but he bindeth up;
He woundeth, but his hands heal.
19. From six troubles he shall deliver thee;
Yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee.
20. In famine he shall redeem thee from death,
And in war from the power of the sword.

(b) 21. Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue,
Neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh.
22. At destruction and death thou shalt laugh,
Neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth.
23. For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field,
And the wild beasts shall be at peace with thee.

(c) 24. Thou shalt know that thy tent is in peace,
And thou shalt inspect thy fold, and miss nothing.
25. Thou shalt know also that thy seed shall be great,
And thine offspring as the grass of the earth.
26. Thou shalt come to thy grave in full vigor,
As a shock of grain cometh up in its season.

(d) 27. Behold! This we have searched out; it is true!
Hear it, and know thou it for thy good!

VI. Text and Versions

It is to be expected that an ancient writing composed in highly original poetry and presenting many unusual words and grammatical constructions, several repetitions of motifs in various garbs, a style which cultivates subtleties of expression bordering sometimes on the esoteric, and more especially a theological outlook which could never become popular, would suffer at the hand of pedestrian editors and copyists. To say that the Hebrew text of Job is not well preserved is therefore an understatement. Yet the fact that it was preserved at all deserves recognition. Lower critics have done considerable research on the Joban text, although it must be added that some of them have wrought more damage even than censorious editors and careless scribes have done in the early years of transmission.

Scrutiny of the Masoretic Text and comparison with the ancient versions, especially that of the Septuagint, have revealed a number of graphic errors, particularly omissions of letters, words, and lines, as well as some transpositions. However, the critic should be slow to tamper with the text without due warrant. Modern discoveries, especially in the field of comparative linguistics, have proved more than once that a strange form or supposedly "faulty spellings" had been rightly preserved by the Masoretes. Moreover, the testimony of the versions, especially that of the Septuagint, is not always helpful, for the Alexandrine and other translators often paraphrased and sometimes deliberately corrected the wording and the ideas of the original in order to elucidate an obscure passage or even to impose a theological bias.

Among the versions other than those depend-

Inaugurated by the pioneering work of Louis and Jean Cappel in the seventeenth century and C. F. Houbigant in the eighteenth, the textual criticism of Job has attained in modern times the attention of many students, among whom may be mentioned Merx (1871), Beer (1896, etc.; cf. the critical apparatus prepared in 1906 and 1932 for Rudolf Kittel's Biblia Hebraica [1937]), Ehrlich (1898, etc.), Houtsa (1928), G. R. Driver (1956, etc.), and all the standard exegeses (see "Selected Bibliography," p. 905).

E.g., Bickell (in the second edition of his work, 1894), Torczeny (1920; 1941), Ball (1922), Richter (1927), and Stevenson (1951).

For a detailed list see Dhomme, Le livre de Job, pp. cliv ff., cf. also Driver and Gray, Job, I, lxxii ff.

E.g., in the famous text of 13:15, the Masoretes apparently preserved in the Qued a tradition which objected to the idea of Job's despair (see Exeg. ad loc.), but the Greek translators went further and rejected also the idea that God might slay Job, thus reading:

If the ruler masters me, even when he has become first,
Verily I shall speak and bring to the proof before him.

In 1932 the Septuagint (Jerome's Recension, Syro-hexaplarch, Coptic-Sahidic, Coptic-Bohairic, and Septuagintian Arabic), some are quite useful for the restoration or the explanation of the text; that is, the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, the Targum, and the Peshitta. The Vulgate has literary beauty but it shows undue obedience to the Septuagint and Symmachus, and so is not of primary importance for the textual reconstruction of Job.

VII. Theological Significance

It is often maintained that the book of Job was written in order to answer the question, "Why do the righteous suffer?" But actually the ancient tale as well as the poem utilizes the problem of undeserved suffering for the pursuit of a broader and higher purpose. Important and even crucial as the enigma of unrequited pain may have been for the Hebrews, and especially for those Judeans of the sixth century B.C. under whose feet a world had crumbled, a much more fundamental issue was at stake—namely, what is the meaning of faith? This is in the strict sense of the word a theological matter, for it involves no less than man's knowledge of God.

At the critical end of an era the scattered men of Judah and Jerusalem either gave way to despair or at best found refuge in quietism, musing:

It is good to hope and silently to wait
For the deliverance of the Lord (Lam. 3:26);

and a few generations later in similar straits even some Greeks confessed, "Not to meditate, herein lies the good life." But the poet of Job resolutely faced the dark riddle of existence, looked beyond the wisdom of men, and sought the wisdom of God.

For the onset of his argument he borrowed an acute case history which showed in extreme terms the shock of adversity upon integrity. Such a setting allowed him to scrutinize man's situation at its worst—demonic death or sickness unto death—and to repudiate the comforts which theism traditionally afforded. Traveling into the theological unknown, he was led unwittingly to imply the necessity of a Christ, learned the sufficiency of grace, and was brought to the threshold of pure religion.

A. Adversity Against Integrity.—Many scholars deny that the book of Job deals with a problem of theology properly speaking. They say that it is the protest of a "humanist" against the tyranny of stultified orthodoxy, the revolt of individual conscience against organized religion, the claim of man against ecclesiasticism.

Sophocles Ajax 554.

897
It is true that the question of selfless piety upon which the folk tale is articulated (cf. 1:9) is never developed explicitly within the poem, which on the contrary concerns itself again and again with the dogma of retributive justice. The purpose of the poet, however, must be sought in the total context of the book, which ends not with the hero's protest of innocence but with the theophany and its subsequent effect upon Job. The poet's use of the tale and his handling of the discussion between the hero and the friends must therefore be viewed in the light of the poem's denouement—the immediate revelation of God and the hero's response to the divine intervention. With a keen sense of drama and a profound knowledge of psychology, the poet withholds until the climax of his work the secret of his intention, which is to show the divinity of God, the humanity of man, and the specific nature of the relation between a God who is truly God and a man who is truly man—namely, one of grace alone apprehended by faith.

Now to separate this particular object of study from its vast context—spatial and temporal—in human life is not an easy task. The poet wished to concentrate his powers of vision upon man as man, man disentangled from the environment of society, history, and cosmos. He selected therefore an appropriate setting for his investigation. At the same time, since he was not an academic theologian trained in the methods of conceptual thinking, he followed the only course open to him: he exhibited a concrete sample of humanity. As a true poet, he could not deal with abstractions. His material had to be the very stuff of life, delineated sharply and compellingly in an existential situation. The story of the man from Uz fulfilled these requirements. It furnished him opportunity to look at a representative of the human species unencumbered with national or religious peculiarities. The figure of Job, Edomitic as it may have been in its origin, transcended time and space. By lending words to him, the poet could present homo sapiens, or rather, plainly and merely, homo vivens, isolated from racial, cultural, political, and especially ritual characteristics. Moreover, he could not use an average man, leading an average life, moderately good and bad, reasonably happy and unhappy. For his microscopic scrutiny he needed not an average example of mankind, endowed with ordinary gifts and encountering an ordinary fate, but a hero, a model of the most uncommon integrity swept by the most extraordinary kind of adversity. And since "All actual heroes are essential men," his scalpel did not lay bare the soul of an Edomite sheik only, but the core of essential man.

Job, then, is pictured with the poet's endorsement as "perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil" (1:1). His integrity means that his personality is "integrated" within himself and within its environment (see Exeg., ad loc.). His relationships are of the "right" kind, toward himself, his family, his God. This co-ordination of "right" relations creates in him a legitimate sense of "righteousness," which translates and demonstrates itself by "peace" (shalôm), a healthy (shalêm) wholeness, wealth, and—the crown of prosperity—a happy progeny. His sense of responsibility for the welfare of his home is such that he even anticipates the possibility, not of criminal deeds, but of inward sins among his sons; and he performs atonement for them (1:5). His piety matches his morality.

Misfortune strikes in heroic proportions, and with an incredible magnanimity the hero accepts his fate as the expression of the divine will (1:20-22; 2:10). Adversity meets integrity head on, and integrity is not defeated. It is at this very point that the poet intervenes. Lifting the hero from a world of legend, he brings him to the level of psychological reality and portrays the "disintegration" of this fabulous integrity. The perfect man who had blessed the divine name is now a man who, still conscious of his integrity, has no alternative in the face of injustice but to curse his own life (3:3 ff.).

B. Sickness unto Death.—Much more than mortal illness is here described. The patient suffers not only from bereft love, destitution, bodily pain, and social isolation; he is estranged from God and knows enough of God to evaluate his loss. If he could only dismiss that God from his world, he would dissolve his burden in the woe of his initial soliloquy (3:3 ff.). For many beside him have said,

Not to be born is the most
To be desired; but having seen the light,
The next best is to go whence one came
As soon as may be.

But he is different from ancient and modern pagans because he clings to his belief in a just 114 Notice the unusual status of the daughters among their brothers (1:48; cf. 1:18; 42:15).

115 The scenes at the heavenly court (1:6-12; 2:1-7a) have been preserved by the poet because they confirm the hero's integrity (1:8; 2:3) and at the same time raise the question of his selflessness (1:9; 2:4-5). They should not be construed as a reflection of the poet upon the nature of the Deity.
116 Sophocles Oedipus at Colonus, 1295.
and omnipotent Deity. Were he to yield to unbelief, his problem would immediately cease to exist. His physical and moral grappling with undeserved evil would remain, but his spiritual torture would end. Thus the path of his agony is not comparable to a continuous descent into hell: it is an incessantly up-and-down movement, a conflict between denial and affirmation, doubt and certainty, revolt and acceptance, “a struggle against God and a hope in him, a flight from before God and a longing to encounter him.” 119

Even this belief, this hope, and this longing are in a profound sense misguided; for Job believes not in God, but in his own conception of God. He aspires to meet God, but on his own terms, in order to have his integrity vindicated. To be sure, his statements concerning the power of the Creator, Provider, and Ruler of nature and man are theologically correct (see 9:5-10, 18; 14:4, 20; 17:4; 21:22; 23:3, 8-9, 13; 50:21-23; 31:13-15; etc.), but his attitude toward God is not that of a creature acknowledging creatureliness. It is rather that of a man who (a) uses his sense of innocence as a claim upon the Deity’s will, and (b) when unable to reconcile his righteousness with his fate challenges the Deity’s justice and stands erect as the judge of his creator.

(a) While Job admits that, as a human being, he is not pure in comparison with God (14:1-6), and even confesses that he may have committed some misdeeds in the time of his youth (13:26), he also knows that his sufferings are out of all proportion to the pettiness of his failures. He therefore shouts that God attacks him “without cause” (9:17). The omniscient Ruler must know that his victim is not guilty (10:7), so until the end Job will hold fast to his righteousness (27:6) and carry it as a trophy, a crown of glory and a badge of honor (51:36). He concludes the poetic discussion with an eloquent rehearsal of his virtuous deeds (30:1 ff.) in a way which demonstrates the fact that he has never abandoned his belief in the dogma of retribution.

(b) Job does not doubt for an instant that God is directly responsible for his plight. It is in God that he seeks the reason for his suffering. “The friends declare that Job is a sinner. Job declares that God is arbitrary, unjust, immoral. The root of the matter is not in him but in God.” 120 He constantly implies and often explicitly states that the Deity behaves with him as a capricious tyrant (9:18-19), a corrupt judge (9:20-29), a wild beast which has torn his flesh (16:7, 9), a ruthless warrior (6:4, 9; 16:12-14; 19:8-12) who takes him for a target (7:17-21) and will soon deliver the death blow (18:15).

Physical pain and theological anxiety combined are slowly leading him to magnify his own person. He fancies himself to be playing the part of God’s mythical enemy, the cosmic antagonist (7:12) against whom the Creator, like a general in the field, must hurl wave upon wave of fresh hosts (10:17; 16:13-14; 19:12).

With a strange contradiction which reveals the utmost confusion of his mind, he condemns the justice of God and yet expects to receive from him a verdict of acquittal (23:3-7). He desperately seeks the presence of a God who forever eludes his pursuit (23:8-10), but at the same time is terrified by a presence which overwhels him more completely than the thick darkness of his impending death (28:11-17). But he is determined to maintain his stand at all costs, and his last word is one of unrelieved defiance. “Neither to change, nor falter, nor repent,” 121 is the vain glory of a Titan who hopes to meet God as a prince welcomes an equal (91:37), and to take advantage of a divine encounter for the ultimate assertion of the self. There is no place for divine grace in his quest. “Rather than seek help he would prefer to be himself—with all the tortures of hell, if so it must be.” 122 He asks for recognition of his worth, but not for mercy; and there lies the root of his “sickness unto death.”

C. The Mixed Comforts of Theism.—The discourses of the friends provide an eloquent example of blundering with truth. Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, each in his own way, exalt the greatness, the wisdom, the power, and the justice of God (4:17 ff.; 5:9 ff.; 8:3, 20; 11:7-9; 22:2 ff.; etc.). They are right when, in order to extol divine glory, they point out the “great gulf” which separates God from man, and even from his heavenly servants (4:17-21; 15:15; 25:4-6); but they are wrong when, for the sake of safeguarding the absolute freedom of God, they declare that it is no “pleasure to the Almighty if [man is] righteous” (22:2-3). They are right when they discern that Job’s sin lies in his proud refusal to accept the limitations of his manhood:

Art thou the first man that was born?
Or wast thou made before the hills?
Hast thou listened in the secret council of God?
(15:7-8a);

but they are wrong when they attempt to explain the misfortune of this haughty well-doer as an exact penalty for the sins of his sons (8:4) or for his own ethical crimes (11:14; 15:15; 18:21; 22:5 ff.). They are right when they advise 119 Weiser, Hihn, p. 12.

120 Bever, Literature of O.T., pp. 322-22.
121 Shelley, Prometheus Unbound, Act IV. him to seek God with humble trust and to make supplication unto the Almighty (5:8; 8:5; 11:13; 22:21-22), and they strike a note of delicate and profound beauty when they describe the joy of communing with God (22:23-26); but they are wrong when they uphold mechanically the dogma of retribution as an impersonal law which always finds its verification in historical experience (5:17-27; 8:6:22; 11:15-20; 15:17-52; 18:5-21; 27:13-23). By doing so, they unwittingly fall into Job’s fundamental error, because they hold to a merely moralistic view of salvation. They believe that it is man who, by his own will and power, is the author of his fate and the master of his destiny (11:14 ff.; 22:21).

In the friends’ conception of the relationship between God and man, as in that of Job, there is no room for the category of divine grace, just as there is no place for man’s pure love of God. Like “the Satan” of the folk tale, they do not actually believe that man serves God for nought. Worse, they do not understand the mercy of God. Religion for them is a bargain, humility the best policy, and morality the coin which purchases peace. On the surface they profess a magnificent creed and their theism appears at first sight to be free from flaw. But their belief is not faith. Their orthodoxy, learned in the schools and scrupulously maintained from the tradition of old, is a devious attempt to maintain the sense of their own honor. It is not God they defend, but rather their own security. Indeed, it is their pride which they uphold when they condemn Job, and it is their sin which they reveal when they pay tribute to divine sovereignty. They arrogate to themselves the right to speak ex cathedra, and like other self-appointed vicars of God (15:11) they soon eschew the elementary virtue of human kindness (6:14; see Exeg., ad loc.; cf. 12:5). The presumption of these ethically honest men is comparable to that of the morally evil men who “have brought God into their own hands” (12:6). Their theism has become a subtle form of idolatry.

When orthodoxy becomes a source of theological sin, however, it fulfills a paradoxical function: it sharpens the quest of the heretic into a frantic search for light; and it transforms him, wrong as he may be in the midst of his rebelliousness, into a herald of truths hitherto concealed or unborn. Thus the injustice of the friends not only accentuates the torture of Job but also quickens his power of vision: the lamenting hero becomes a prophet.

D. The Necessity of a Christ.—Comfortless solitude among men leads at times to a solitude with God, but Job is alone even before God. Yet a luminous thread runs through the drab canvas. Any one of the details taken separately may be of little significance, but viewed together they reveal the authenticity of the poet’s inspiration as well as the height of his literary genius.

Job prodded by the cruelty of his friends, who not unlike the sneering thief cry, “Save thyself!” answers only in his hubris, “I do not need salvation, but demand only the vindication of my honor.” Such is the impasse, the dead end, the bottom of the pit wherein he lies. And slowly, almost imperceptibly, his self-sufficiency breaks down. He knows that he cannot throw a bridge which might give him access to the good will of God, but the paradox of his faith prevents him from believing that God will abandon him forever. Above the darkness a light glimmers.

First, there is the strange irony of a hope which is thwarted as soon as entertained:

Why shouldst thou not pardon my transgression and take away my iniquity?
For now I shall lie in the earth;
Thou wilt seek me, but I shall be no more (7:21).

Picture the bold image: God is groping in the darkness which precedes dawn for the creature who is lost (see Exeg., ad loc.), but it is too late. Self-pity? Perhaps. But at the same time there is the thought of a God who cares. The idea of divine love may be at this juncture an idle fancy; yet it enters the mind of the hero as a seed is buried in the ground.

Second, there is the remarkable awareness of man’s impotence with regard to his own salvation. If Job cleanses himself and washes his hands in snow water and lye (9:30), the outraged Giant will throw him into the ditch (9:8). No path to God can man beat out for himself. “Man cannot be his own pontifex.” Cerimonies are of no avail. The rituals of all religions and the deeds of all moralisms are vain. Against the absolute will of God every human attempt at clearance miscarries. Job knows that techniques for self-purification result only in worse helplessness. God is God, and forever above man (9:32). But if there were only a daysman, a mediator, who would place his hands upon the shoulders of God and of man, and bring God and man face to face (9:33)! For a Semite, a prince of monotheism, this is a stupendous thought. If only the awful

---

128 It is not correct to assert—with many commentators—that the purpose of the poet is to defend the dignity of man. The poet knows that man “is but a driven leaf in autumn, a thing of nought, petty, ephemeral and infinitely to be pitted” (James Strahan, The Book of Job [Edinburgh: T & T. Clark, 1918], p. 11). But he does uphold the right of individual man to oppose the tradition of the past or the dictum of the majority.

129 Welser, Hub., p. 75.
gap between Creator and creature could be bridged! If only the abyss between God transcendent and man impure could be spanned! If only some being, at once God and man, could effect reconciliation and beget peace! Of course the text is no witness to the Christian mystery of the Incarnation, but it prophetically proclaims, through some via negativa, the necessity of a Christ.

Third, Job toys with the prospect of an after-life. Taking up the sure surmise of a God who will not let him go (7:21), he is allured by the fancy of resurrection:

Oh, that thou wouldest hide me in Sheol, that thou wouldest appoint for me a set time, and then, remember me (14:19)!

Again the image of a loving God haunts his distraught spirit. As elsewhere in the Old Testament (cf. Ps. 16:8-11; 73:23-26), the thought of a life after the grave originates in man's desire for the continuation or the inception of an intimate dialogue with God himself:

If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my service I would wait, till my release should come. Thou wouldest call, and I would answer thee; thou wouldest long for the work of thy hands (14:14-15).

This hope, however, is withdrawn as soon as expressed, for the Hebraic mind, perhaps in reaction against the fantastic emphasis of Egyptian culture upon rituals designed for ensuring immortal bliss, lived for a thousand years in the affirmation of the finality of the grave (cf. Ps. 88:10-12; etc.).

Fourth, the theme of the daysman reappears in a new form as the sufferer suddenly discerns beyond the miseries of the present the face of a heavenly witness. His blood will be shed unto death (16:18), but his last breath will not mean the closing of his case:

Even now, behold, my witness is in heaven, and he that vouches for me is on high.

And he will maintain the right of man with God like that of a man with his neighbor (16:19, 21).

To be sure, the interpretation of this passage is uncertain (see Exeg., ad loc.). It seems, however, that this heavenly figure is different from God and will fulfill Job's ultimate desire, not the restoration of worldly happiness, but the vindication of human honor. This too the hero will have to surrender.

Fifth and last, therefore, in the climactic passage of the redeemer, the motifs of the daysman and of the witness, combined with the hope of a resurrection, seize the hero's imagination and grip him with the intensity of unshakeable conviction. This time, however, he no longer seeks acquittal:

For I know that my Redeemer liveth; and at last he shall stand upon the earth; And after my skin hath been thus destroyed, then, within my flesh shall I see God, Whom I shall see for myself; and mine eyes shall behold, and not another. My heart is consumed within me (19:25-27).

His fellow creatures have utterly failed the hero (19:13-19) and the hope of a distant rehabilitation by generations to come offers no comfort (19:23-24), but there is now for Job a gööt (see Exeg., ad loc.) who will live beyond Job's death and will usher him into the holy presence. The hero himself, within his flesh, and not as a stranger, will contemplate with his own eyes the fullness of the Divine. Not a word is now hinted about God's recognition of his innocence. He expects now neither reward nor clearance. The vision of God is enough. The agelong repugnance to lift the veil of death is broken, but only for the sake of communing with the Deity. This is not a belief in the natural immortality of the soul, nor is it the hope that man is able by his own power to find access to God: Job now surrenders all claim and trusts solely in the power of a heavenly high priest to present him before the holy of holies.125

The flash, however, is momentary. Although the hero seems ready to understand the sufficiency of grace, he relapses into his former self126 below heavens which remain closed, upon an earth where God is absent (21:2 ff.; 23:3 ff.; especially 24:12); and his final protest of innocence shows that his arrogance has not abated. He will not capitulate unless the heavens open and the voice is heard from the whirlwind. This is not man's doing; it is the initiative of God.

125 It is clearly incorrect to maintain—as a number of exegetes do—that the thought of Job remains stagnant throughout the poetic discussion; cf. W. A. Irwin, "An Examination of the Progress of Thought in the Dialogue of Job," Journal of Religion, XIII (1933), 150-64.

126 Inasmuch as the third cycle bears traces of editorial deletions and alterations (see p. 888), and in view of the poet's rhetorical, dramatic, psychological, and theological mastery, one may entertain the conjecture that in the original form of the work the passage on the redeemer (19:25-27) did not constitute the climax of the hero's thinking. The absence of a reply to Zophar may be due to the "curtailment of erstwhile sceptical material" (Kraeling, Book of the Ways of God, p. 100; cf. p. 199), perhaps also to an editorial censure of another and even bolder expression of Job's faith in an intercessor between God and himself. It should be observed that Eibiru (33:25 ff.) pursues the same theme and draws its soteriological consequences (see Exeg., ad loc.).
E. The Sufficiency of Grace.—"Let the Almighty answer me!" (31:35.) Such is the final challenge of Job and of natural man. But the divine answer is always different from human expectations. From the whirlwind Yahweh does not answer questions: he asks them (38:3 ff.). Because the Lord does not explain the mysteries of the universe, solve philosophically the problem of evil, or publicly declare the righteousness of his servant, many scholars have expressed their disappointment. Some have even gone so far as to condemn the divine irony as a display of refined cruelty, if not of devilish scorn. This is not apparently the way Job himself felt (42:5).

By boldly lending human words to the transcendent Deity, the poet succeeds in the most delicate task: the hero becomes aware of the divinity of God, and at the same time senses that a God who is truly God, creator and ruler of the cosmos, consents to incline himself toward the creature of his hands and grants him the vision of divine glory. Job is raised from prison into the wind-swept pageant of the universe. He leaves the enclosure of his aching self and discovers a world. Will he condemn God that he may be justified (40:8)? He learns in awe and wonder that God stands beyond and above the traditions, the ideals, and the wisdom of men.137 He who had expected to "come forth as gold" (23:10) bows in adoration and repentance (42:1-6). In the presence of the most holy God all pain is stilled, for grace is sufficient (see Exeg., ad loc.). Job becomes aware of his sinfulness at the very instant of his reconciliation. He is saved at the moment of his surrender. He receives all when he surrenders all. God's judgment is none other than the blossoming of his mercy. The shattered giant no longer attempts "To grasp this sorry Scheme of Things entire," 138 for he now understands that the will of his Sovereign is to make him a witness of the holiness and care displayed by "the faithful Creator":

I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee (42:5).

Thus, one cannot say that the book of Job "is an exhortation to emulate God's unconquerable will." 139 On the contrary, one is led to conclude that the book is an appeal to yield by faith to the grace of God. It is also from the vantage point of sola gratia that the epilogue in prose and its account of Job's worldly restoration should be appreciated and enjoyed. Whatever its literary origin, the conclusion is now part of the book's canonical form; and in its present context — coming immediately after the hero's repentance — the story of the hero's rehabilitation appears in the light not of his righteousness, but of the grace which is freely and divinely granted him.

F. The Poetry of Pure Religion.—The theological significance of the book of Job quite clearly by-passes the problems of undeserved suffering and of theodicy. That the mystery of human pain and of divine justice is discussed by Job and his three friends, none will deny. But the poet did not write his book for this purpose. Instead of standing still before the problem, he goes forward through it; and he proposes not a speculative answer (he has not asked the question), but a way of consecrated living. Of him one may say, as of the poet of Ps. 73:

In his fellowship with God he has found that nothing matters in comparison with that fellowship. . . . The man who has found fellowship with God is rich though he possesses nothing. That is the real solution — not an answer to the riddle, but the attainment of a state of mind in which there is no desire to ask it. 140

The poet stands with the prophets and the psalmists at the core of Hebraic faith, and like some of them he goes beyond the limits of the Old Testament; for above the peculiarities of race, ritual, and law, he knows and shows that the chief and highest end of man is to glorify God and fully to enjoy him forever. Indeed, the poet of Job conveys the poetry of pure religion because he understands, almost as well as Paul, 141 that righteousness is not the work of man but the gift of God. The book of Job is not at the fringe of the Old Testament literature. Like the prophecy of Second Isaiah, it asks the most profound question of Hebraism and it leads directly to the New Testament.

VIII. Outline of Contents

I. Prologue in prose (1:1-2:13)
   A. Presentation of the hero (1:1-5)
      1. Job's country, name, and character (1:1)
      2. Job's family, wealth, and fame (1:2-5)
      3. An illustration of Job's piety (1:4-5)

137 "It is as though he were saying, in the mood of certain trends of modern theology, that the righteousness of God is distinct in kind from human morality, so that only an ignorant presumption will demand that God be just according to our standards" (Irwin, "Job and Prometheus," p. 107). This admission is the more remarkable in that its author disparages the speeches of Yahweh.

138 The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, st. xix.

B. First act of the drama (1:6-22)
1. The heavenly court (1:6-12)
   a) Yahweh commends Job (1:6-8)
   b) The doubt and plan of “the Satan” (1:9-12)
2. First visitation of evil (1:13-22)
   a) Four messengers of woe (1:13-19)
   b) The resignation and faith of Job (1:20-21)
C. Second act of the drama (2:1-10)
1. The heavenly court (2:1-6)
   a) New praise of Job by Yahweh (2:1-3)
   b) New doubt and plan of “the Satan” (2:4-6) 2. Second visitation of evil (2:7-10)
   a) The disease (2:7-8)
   b) The resignation and faith of Job (2:9-10)
D. Presentation of the hero's friends (2:11-13)
1. Names and countries of the friends (2:11)
2. Mourning of the friends (2:12)
3. Silence of Job and the friends (2:13)
II. The poetic discussion (3:1-31:40)
A. Lament of Job (3:1-26)
1. The curse (3:1-10)
2. The query (3:11-19)
3. The cry (3:20-26)
B. First cycle of discussion (4:1-14:22)
1. First discourse of Eliphaz (4:1-5:27)
   a) Dogma of divine justice (4:1-11)
      (1) Confidence in integrity (4:1-6)
      (2) The harvest of trouble (4:7-11)
   b) The mystery of suffering (4:12-21)
      (1) Vision in the night (4:12-16)
      (2) The human situation (4:17-21)
   c) Fruit of obstinacy (5:1-7)
   d) The duty of man on earth (5:8-27)
      (1) The appeal (5:8-17)
      (2) The promise (5:18-27)
2. Job’s reply to Eliphaz (6:1-7:21)
   a) Soliloquy (6:1-20)
      (1) The weight of anguish (6:1-7)
      (2) The boon of death (6:8-13)
      (3) The failure of friendship (6:14-20)
   b) Invective (6:21-7:7)
      (1) “Show me my error!” (6:21-27)
      (2) “Is there any wrong on my tongue?” (6:28-30)
      (3) “Life is without hope!” (7:1-6)
   c) Prayer (7:7-21)
      (1) Appeal (7:7-11)
      (2) Defiance (7:12-16)
      (3) Bewildermend (7:17-21)
3. First discourse of Bildad (8:1-22)
   a) Divine justice (8:1-7)
   b) Testimony of the past (8:8-9)
   c) The divine welcome of the innocent (8:20-22)
4. Job’s reply to Bildad (9:1-10:22)
   a) Man’s guilt before God (9:1-31)
      (1) Reason of man’s guilt (9:1-7)
      (2) The amorality of omnipotence (9:8-13)
      (3) Futility of contending with God (9:14-19)
   b) Intentions of God toward man (9:30-10:22)
      (1) Need of a mediator (9:30-35)
      (2) Human behavior of God (10:1-7)
      (3) The artist and his handiwork (10:8-12)
   c) Fruits of conversion (11:13-20)
   d) Defiance of friendship and Godhead (13:1-27)
      (1) The incompetent healers (13:1-12)
      (2) A God who murders (13:13-19)
      (3) Summons to God (13:20-27)
   e) Fate of mortal man (13:28-14:22)
      (1) Picture of man’s mortality (13:28-14:6)
      (2) Finality of man’s death (14:7-12)
      (3) Vision of an afterlife (14:18-17)
      (4) Man’s irrevocable annihilation (14:18-22)
C. Second cycle of discussion (15:1-21:34)
   a) A threefold indictment (15:2-16)
      (1) Job’s self-incrimination (15:2-6)
      (2) Job’s self-delusion (15:7-11)
      (3) Job’s self-assertion (15:12-16)
   b) The evil man’s destiny (15:17-35)
2. Second reply of Job to Eliphaz (16:1-17:16)
   a) The sorrow-making “comforters” (16:1-6)
   b) The relentless hostility of God (16:7-11)
   c) “My prayer is pure” (16:12-17)
   d) “My witness is in heaven” (16:18-22)
   e) Held without bail (17:1-5)
   f) A byword in the world (17:6-10)
   g) Communing with worms (17:11-16)
3. Second discourse of Bildad (18:1-21)
   a) Disturbing the natural order (18:1-4)
   b) Fate of the ungodly man (18:5-21)
      (1) Quenching his light (18:5-7)
      (2) Laying snares about him (18:8-11)
      (3) Marching him to the King of Terrors (18:12-15)
      (4) Eradicating his memory (18:16-18)
5. Second discourse of Zophar (20:1-29)
   a) Expulsion of anxious thoughts (20:1-5)
   b) Evanscence of godless joy (20:4-29)
   a) Courage of honesty (21:1-6)
   b) Impunity of criminals (21:7-13)
   c) Profits of prayer (21:14-18)
   d) Immorality of hereditary guilt (21:19-27)
   e) Testimony of the travelers (21:28-34)

D. Third cycle of discussion (22:1-27:23)
1. Third discourse of Eliphaz (22:1-30)
   a) God does not need man (22:1-5)
   b) Catalogue of Job’s iniquities (22:6-11)
   c) The ancient path trod by wicked men (22:12-20)
   d) A new call to conversion (22:21-30)
   a) “Oh, that I knew where I might find him!” (23:1-17)
      (1) A new plea for an audience (23:1-7)
      (2) The elusiveness of God (23:8-14)
   b) “God pays no heed to prayer” (24:1-25)
      (1) Burden of human pain (24:1-12)
      (2) Triumph of evil on earth (24:13-24)
      [Zophar: vss. 18-24? 25]
3. Third discourse of Bildad and Job’s reply (25:1-27:12)
   a) [Bildad] God’s greatness and man’s impurity (25:1-6)
   b) [Job] The futility of helping a powerless man (26:1-4)
   c) [Bildad] Man’s inability to grasp the power of God (26:5-14)
   d) [Job] Reaffirmation of innocence (27:1-12)
   a) Fate of the wicked man’s sons (27:13-23)
   b) Job’s reply to Zophar’s third discourse [?]

E. Hymn on wisdom (28:1-28)
1. Scientific technique fails to find wisdom (28:1-19)
2. Religious technique is equally futile (28:14-22)
3. God alone understands the way to wisdom (28:23-28)

F. Job’s peroration (29:1-31:40)
1. Remembering happier things (29:1-25)
   a) Bounties of God’s presence (29:1-6)
   b) Satisfactions of social esteem (29:7-13)
   c) Claims of righteousness (29:14-20)
   d) Prestige of integrity (29:21-25)
2. The suffering of this present time (30:1-31)
   a) Irreverence of worthless men (30:1-8)
   b) Hostility of society (30:9-15)
   c) Cruelty of God (30:16-23)
   d) Misery of dereliction (30:24-31)
3. Final oath of innocence (31:1-40)
   a) A covenant of inward purity (31:1-4)
   b) Self-maledictions (31:5-34)
   c) The ultimate challenge (31:35-37)
   d) One further self-imprecation (31:38-40)

III. Discourses of Elihu (32:1-37:24)
A. Preface in prose (32:1-5)
   1. Silence of the friends (32:1)
   2. Presentation of Elihu (32:2a)
   3. Reasons for Elihu’s intervention (32:2b-5)
B. Poetic introduction (32:6-22)
   1. Spirit, not age, is the source of wisdom (32:6-10)
   2. Failure of the professionals (32:11-14)
   3. Inner compulsion to speak (32:15-22)
C. First part: Refutation of Job’s defense (33:1-35:16)
   1. Meaning of endurance in suffering (33:1-33)
      a) A discussion from man to man (33:1-7)
      b) Implications of Job’s claims (33:8-12)
      c) Self-disclosure of God to man (33:13-14)
   d) God’s techniques and man’s response (33:15-30)
      (1) Warnings in the night (33:15-18)
      (2) Chastening of pain (33:19-22)
      (3) Intervention of a mediator (33:23-25)
   e) Prayer and confession of the sufferer (33:26-28)
   (5) God’s ultimate purpose (33:29-30)
C. Final appeal to God (33:31-38)
   2. Justice of the ways of God (34:1-37)
      a) The need to test words (34:1-4)
      b) The irreligion of Job (34:5-9)
      c) The defense of divine justice (34:10-28)
      (1) There is no evil in the Creator (34:10-15)
      (2) There is no partiality in the Judge (34:16-20)
      (3) Divine omniscience is absolute (34:21-28)
   d) Meaning of divine silence (34:29-37)
      (1) Apparent inactivity of God (34:29-33)
      (2) The rebelliousness of Job (34:34-37)
   3. Giver of songs in the night (35:1-16)
      a) Rights of man before God (35:1-4)
      b) Freedom of God from man (35:5-8)
c) Gifts of God to man (35:9-12)
d) Vanity of Job's argument (35:13-16)
D. Second part: The hidden mercy of God (36:1-37.24)
1. Methods of the divine educator (36:1-25)
   a) Further utterances on God's behalf (36:1-4)
   b) Purposes of affliction (36:5-15)
   c) Let Job beware and praise (36:16-25)
2. Unsearchable glory of the Lord of nature (36:26-37.13)
   a) Lord of autumn (36:26-33)
   b) Lord of winter (37:1-15)
3. Last admonition (37:14-24)
   a) Lord of summer (37:14-22)
   b) Fear of the Lord (37:23-24)
IV. Voice from the whirlwind (38:1-42:6)
A. First discourse of Yahweh (38:1-40:5)
   1. Opening challenge (38:1-3)
   2. Creation of the world (38:4-15)
      a) Creation of earth (38:4-7)
      b) Creation of sea (38:8-11)
      c) Creation of days and nights (38:12-15)
   3. Mysteries of land and sky (38:16-38)
      a) The deep and the extremities of the earth (38:16-18)
      b) Light and darkness (38:19-21)
      c) Snow, hail, and lightning (38:22-24)
      d) Rain, dew, and ice (38:25-30)
      e) Constellations, clouds, and mist (38:31-38)
   4. Wonders of wild animals (38:39-39:30)
      a) The lion and the raven (38:39-41)
      b) Mountain goats and hinds (39:1-4)
      c) The wild ass (39:5-8)
      d) The wild ox (39:9-12)
      e) The ostrich (39:13-18)
      f) The horse (39:19-25)
      g) The hawk and the eagle (39:26-30)
5. Silence of Job (40:1-5)
   a) Closing challenge (40:1-2)
   b) Submission of the hero (40:3-5)
B. Second discourse of Yahweh (40:6-42:6)
1. Renewed challenge (40:6-14)
2. Behemoth (40:15-24)
3. Leviathan (41:1-34 [=Hebrew 40:25-41:26])
   a) Meaning of pure religion (41:1-12)
   b) Additional observations on Leviathan (41:13-34)
4. Repentance of Job (42:1-6)
V. Epilogue in prose (42:7-17)
A. Job's intercession for his friends (42:7-9)
B. Job's restoration (42:10-17)

IX. Selected Bibliography

JOB

TEXT, EXEGESIS, AND EXPOSITION

The Book of Job.—This is one of the most sublime books of Scripture. To many it seems at first glance one of the most bewildering. Certainly it is one of the most often quoted—or misquoted!—and perhaps one of the least often read. For the casual reader it has comparatively little to offer; and that little is at times hardly more than the distorted remnant of an idea, torn away from the context, and interpreted without any too careful regard for the original intent. Those who do actually sit down to it rarely seem prepared, for one reason or another, to come to their task with an open mind. To approach it as if it were an object lesson in patience under trial is to go utterly wrong at the start. If there is any single key word to some measurably adequate understanding of the whole, that word is not "patience" but "impatience." To assume that its aim is to furnish some kind of philosophical clue to the enigma of innocent suffering is to miss the author's purpose entirely. The Hebrew mind was not primarily a philosophical mind; primarily it was a religious mind. Even when it asked philosophical questions, it gave religious answers. No merely speculative solution of any one of the knotty problems here raised is either given or arrived at. More than that, the half dozen suggestions which are thrown down in the hurly-burly of the argument are for the most part introduced in order to be refuted. Some would see it as a drama, strikingly reminiscent in many ways of Greek tragedy. They would think of the friends as serving the function of the chorus, and of the Almighty, like some deus ex machina, as providing the denouement. Yet it must be said that there is little or no action anywhere save in Job's own mind, and there is certainly little if any plot. Those who would have it a theodicy, an attempt to "justify the ways of God to men," are embarrassed by the fact that nowhere does the author seem particularly interested in making out a very convincing case; nor is God himself allowed to do so. From beginning to end the point is by no means what man thinks of God; rather is the point everywhere and by all means what God thinks of man. Here is no character study, nor is it in any proper sense a discussion—after the manner of the wisdom schools of the ancient East. There is nothing about it that can be called objective or dispassionate. More than that, the thread of the controversy seems bent on getting lost, only to appear again, while the over-all pattern itself, so much of it as can readily be discerned, seems in no particular haste to emerge.

Is there nothing left for us then but to deal with this book as if it were no more than one of the masterpieces of the world's great literature? To that at least it can lay undisputed claim. J. A. Froude, somewhat extravagantly perhaps, would set it "far above all the poetry of the world." Carlyle wrote of it with even less restraint:

I call [it], apart from all theories about it, one of the grandest things ever written with pen... It is our first... statement of... man's destiny and God's ways with him here in this earth...; grand in its sincerity, in its simplicity; in its epic melody, and repose of reconciliation... Sublime sorrow, sublime reconciliation; oldest choral melody as of the heart of mankind—so soft, and great; as the summer midnight, as the world with its seas and stars! There is nothing written, I think, in the Bible or out of it, of equal literary merit.

In despair of ever arriving at any very clear-cut conclusion as to what it all means, shall it be read and reread simply for the sheer enjoyment of its lyrics and elegies, its monologues and rhapsodies? Surely that would be to surrender without a struggle, to acknowledge defeat before ever the battle is joined.

Whoever will devote to it serious effort must begin with the critical problems raised by the text itself. As the Intro. points out, the work in its present form gives conclusive evidence of composite authorship. Suffice it to say that we have before us to begin with a prose folk tale, here possibly for the first time committed to writing. No matter what its provenance, pagan (Edomitis?) or Israelitish, it was widespread; no matter what its basis in fact, and there is a truth far more profound than any mere chronicle of events can record, it had become the stock in trade of those who would incultate (or deride?) humble and unquestioning submission to the dispensations of an inscrutable Providence. To take that tale as it now stands, in chs. 1–2 and in 42:7-17, is to come at once upon the origin of the proverb about "the patience of Job" (Jas. 5:11), and no doubt at the very outset to catch an inkling of the author's purpose. As of some Horatio Alger novel, packed with sweetish virtues, or better still, as of some old-fashioned Sunday-school lesson, with its inevitable moral tag, this genuine realist among the Jewish people, this Shakespeare of the O.T., is saying in effect: "That time-worn story just isn't so, as you have heard it all your life: the rich and upright Arab sheik, and the almost unbelievable misfortunes that overtook him—how he quietly bowed his head before them, and 'sinned not, nor charged God foolishly,' and how 'the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning.' There is nothing wrong with the first part of it, or with the last part either; but let me tell you what actually happened in between!" His new and profounder version of "what actually happened in between"—new because nobody in the O.T. had ever before seriously challenged the doctrine of God's evenhanded justice—begins with Job's lament in ch. 3, and continues through the three cycles of debate, in each of 8 Jastrow, op. cit., pp. 26 ff. which the friends address Job in turn, one by one to be answered, formally if not directly, by Job himself. Whereupon, after the intrusion of Elihu's speech, and with the entrance on the scene of Yahweh in very person, the resolution of the "tragedy" is complete (see Intro. for further details).

Obviously some such general and preliminary blueprint is necessary as a minimum before even an attempt can be made to understand or expound the meaning of the whole or of any of its parts. But structure is not the only consideration to which the would-be student of the book must give himself if he would dig at all below its surface. He must familiarize himself also with the historical situation out of which the poem sprang. All of the great classics, Dante's Divine Comedy, Milton's Paradise Lost, Goethe's Faust, speak in the name of the ages. So does Job.
But that speaks best to the ages which best speaks to its own age. Of what it speaks is one thing; to what it speaks is of scarcely less importance. Lift it out of its moment in the march of the years, and its voice grows relatively muffled and indistinct. Eternity finds its only sharp focus in the transient. The temporal is the timeless on its way through the calendar. It is the perennial mysteries of human existence that thrust themselves to the top in the tragic lot of this ancient Titan of the East, who is represented as having dragged out the weary length of his days while Abraham sought a city whose builder and maker is God, and Isaac digged again the wells of his father, and Jacob served for Rachel in Paddan-aram in the house of Bethuel. Into that distant past the author projects those ul-time questions about God and sin and suffering, about life and death and justice, which had begun to disturb his own generation as few others had ever been disturbed (see Expos. on 15:20).

Israel was standing at the crossroads (read again carefully Intro., pp. 897-902), and it was no longer possible for either the nation or the individual to hold fast the balanced simplicities of the traditional faith in that holy will which with an equal hand, according to the oracles of the prophets, weighed out to man for his rebellion terrible and sure disaster, for his obedience peace and power and measureless bounty.
With his poignant sense of humanity's burdensome lot, its grief and pain and unexplained misery, the author of Job would scrutinize the whole wide area of human experience for whatever sign of God's justice might be there; and he finds few enough. The facts were not so clear and unequivocal as the pious liturgy of the faithful would seem to make them, the mumbled phrases of men who would con patience by heart and preach it to all the neighbors by rote. Life was not like that. And he said it with such "madness in the brain" as comes of being "wron-gh with one we love."

For madness indeed it is, not doubt. Doubt is no name for the wild tumult in Job's heart.
In whatever age we come upon it, the word doubt is "modern" as the mood is "modern." Here is the bitter challenge of a man whose faith will not be denied and cannot be dismissev: the somber and stately defiance of an outraged devotion, at its feet the edge of an abyss unillumined, the stiff upper lip of hell; across its face, intermittently, like bats flying, the impenetrable shadows of what all too often in the darkest chambers of the mind seems an evil, cosmic tyranny. There is nothing paltry about it because there is nothing paltry about Job. Though the idea of tragedy is not congenial to Scripture, his are at least the dimensions of the tragic hero. Such a figure cannot be knocked together out of the flotsam and jetsam of life in the streets. He stands up to the full height of his stature, an epic grandeur among the ruins, stark in a stark world: a world not yet bedeviled with things, still asking great questions; a brave world, where the souls of men, baffled by the endless riddles of being, were betaking themselves from the rude shelter of all the old, habitual answers into the storm and stress of a new freedom. Out of the moral and intellectual flux of the times, under "the acids of modernnity," in the hard laboratory of events, a universal cult of "wisdom" had begun to make its influence felt in the shaping of both sage and saint (see Intro., p. 878). Another order was emerging. A strange wine was being poured into the ancient wineskins. The conventionalized faith of the prophets was giving ground before another faith that was yet the same.
Within its vaster reach was a nation sorely tried, speaking out syllable by syllable the clue to its destiny; in closer perspective was a solitary life, its "horns in the dust," its eyes red with weeping,
but ready at last,

like the catholic man who hath mightily won God out of knowledge and good out of infinite pain, ready at last to whisper,

As the marsh-hen secretly builds on the watery sod, Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness of God;
I will fly in the greatness of God as the marsh-hen flies
In the freedom that fills all the space 'twixt the marsh and the skies.5

It is with this "folk tale at the crossroads" that our study begins (for a summary interpretation of the whole see Expos. on 38:1; 42:5).

4 Coleridge, "Christabel," Part II.
There was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job; and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil.

I. Prologue in Prose (1:1–2:13)

The purpose of the prologue is to present the hero and protagonists of the poem. Composed in a crisp and serene style, after the manner of the patriarchal narratives, the story moves swiftly without psychological transitions. It is a drama in two parallel acts, preceded by a prelude and followed by a postlude. The drama itself offers an introduction to the poetic discussion.

A. Presentation of the Hero (1:1–5)

1. Job's Country, Name, and Character (1:1)

1:1. The land of Uz has been variously located, either in the Hauran (Trachonitis), at the northeast of Palestine, on account of various remains associated with Job in Christian and Moslem traditions, or (as is more probable) around the territory of Edom, at the southeast of Palestine, as indicated by biblical allusions (Jer. 25:19 ff.; Lam. 4:21) and by the homes of the hero's friends (2:11).

The name Job (ʾıyōḇh) has been related to the Hebrew verb ʾāyabh, "to be hostile," "to treat as enemy," and it might mean "object of enmity and persecution." It has also been connected with the Arabic stem ʾwb, "to come back," "to be penitent," and thus its meaning might be "one who is converted." Indeed, the epithet ʾauwāḇh, "repentant," is attributed by the Koran (58:16, 44) to both David and Job. In all probability ʾiyōḇh was the proper name of a well-known figure of the ancient past, associated with such righteous men as Daniel and Noah (see Ezek. 14:14, 20). A certain A-ia-ab (Ayab)

1:1. Once Upon a Time.—As children invariably ask of their parents, so many a maturer mind has wanted to know at the very outset whether or not this is "a true story." Luther was sure that the Job of history, whoever he was, did not speak as the Job of the Bible is said to have spoken. What has come down through the years is the tradition of his patience, not the violence of his revolt. Back of it all perhaps (see Exeg.) was the experience of some great Oriental emir. G. K. Chesterton once remarked that legend is the only "true" history, true in the deepest of all senses. Certainly there is much in the daily exchange of human life which is far likelier to be preserved by frequent telling, particularly if it enshrines a truth that transcends the truth of fact, than ever it is to get itself set down on some written page. Under the figure of one whose pious resignation had long since become a proverb, as his hapless friends are now, the author propounds the enigma of Israel's election and her woe (cf. Isa. 42:1-4, 19-20, 22, 24-25; 53; also Expos. on 3:20). Yet he does it in such terms that his hero cannot possibly be regarded as nothing more than the personification of God's chosen people (see Expos. on 13:15). It was precisely now, since the days of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, that the relevance of the divine justice to the varying fortunes of every living soul had begun to occupy the foreground of Jewish thought (cf. Jer. 31:29-30; Ezek. 18). "Evenhanded," said the fathers. "None but the impious would question it," said the friends. "Nonsense, I tell you," cried Job. "Look around!" And he stood up alone to do his battle, against a wide, unanswered sky. Not for a moment will he truckle, let Omnipotence do what it will. He cannot prevail, but not an inch will he yield. The delirium of another world seems to be shut up inside him. When God took a handful of clay and hid in it the very torment of eternity, he got him a turmoil out of it. And why not? But the birds of heaven and the beasts of the field looked on with wondering eyes; for this strange creature had its heart among the stars, and its head was only a little lower than the angels! There was a man. To obscure that, or lose sight of it in a figure of speech, is to miss the innermost circle of the poet's concern (see Expos. on 4:12-21, 19-21; 6:1-7:21; 9:14-19; 15:15; 15:20).

1. Does Faith Matter?—The picture given us of Job is of a man sound in body and mind, honest and forthright in all his ways (see Exeg.). This is really the first of the three profound unities presented in the opening verse. With them

The character of Job is indicated by a pair of twofold expressions, perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil. Like Noah (Gen. 6:9), Abraham (Gen. 17:1), and Jacob (Gen. 25:27), Job was perfect (tōm). Yahweh himself attributed this quality to him (vs. 8; 2:3), and even the hero’s wife recognized his “integrity” (tummāḥ, 2:9). Likewise, in the poetic discussion Job never doubted that he was tōm (9:20, 21, 22) or tāmim (12:4), or that he possessed tummāḥ (27:5; 31:6). The Hebrew idea of perfection referred to physical and mental health, soundness, completeness, entirety, “roundness.” A perfect man was comparable to a “finished product.” Job was not only well rounded, self-possessed, and balanced, he was also well adapted to his social environment, upright (yāšāḥ), by practicing straightforwardness and justice in his dealings with his fellow men. Integrity and uprightness are complementary ideas (see Pss. 25:21; 37:37; Prov. 29:10). The narrator proves to be a master of psychology. He shows that Job had a “well-integrated personality” (to use the modern expression), as evidenced by a sense of social integrity. But he goes farther than modern psychologists when he indicates in another double expression the secret spring of that mental equilibrium: Job feared God, and eschewed evil. Psychological unity and social adaptability depend upon religion and morality. Furthermore, religion is always accompanied by morality (Prov. 3:7; 14:16), and morality is the direct expression of religion (Ps. 15:1 ff.). It is the fear of God which gives man the power to avoid evil (Prov. 16:6). The language and theology of the Oriental sages is here apparent. Note the use of the word Elohim (God) rather than the national name, Yahweh, for Job is represented as a foreigner, an Arab, one of “the sons of the East” (vs. 3).

the Hebrew never even thought of tampering. But we have, and with singularly unfortunate results! (a) Man in himself, and man in community (perfect and upright): The religious, social, political, and economic heresies of the twentieth century have sprung largely out of the antithesis that has been set up between the two. Religion has been defined as “the flight of the alone to the Alone,” or “what the individual does with his own solitariness.” So all around the circle the doctrine of “rigged individualism” puts in its appearance, to strive every step of the way with a totalitarianism that succeeds in correcting its vagaries very much as death corrects disease. (b) Man as man (perfect and upright), and man under God (one who feared God, and turned away from evil): For four hundred years and more, ever since the dawn of modern history in the Renaissance, and on through the Enlightenment, man has struggled to know himself as man—it is almost impossible to assess the gains that have come by way of that struggle—only to have such catastrophes overtake him at last as would seem once and for all to underscore the fact that he cannot even know himself as man unless he knows himself under God. “Where there is no God, there is no man.” Witness Lidice and Buchenwald. Nothing, says Berdyaev, is so truly terrible as humanity when there ceases to be anything above it.* (c) Religion as reverence (one who feared God) and religion as singleness of heart (turned away from evil): A civilization which undertakes to discount the one and live on “the ethical capital” of the other is a civilization doomed to moral bankruptcy. Sooner or later, possessed of demons, it rushes headlong down a steep place into the sea. The Sermon on the Mount, dissociated from the “theology” implicit in it, is as ethics altogether visionary and unrealistic. Paul in his letters, while consistently intent on moralizing religion, never makes the mistake which since his day has shaken the world to its foundations: the failure to religionize what morals had been left over to it from “the age of faith.” We have to do here with a man, among men and under God, not sinless (7:21; 15:26; 14:16-17) but whole—integer vitae, scelerisque purus. (See Expos. on 25:2-6; 29:2-20). And we are not permitted to cavil about it, or explain what follows by supposing that maybe it was not so. The seal is heaven’s own (vs. 8). The verdict is God’s.

2 And there were born unto him seven sons and three daughters.

3 His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a very great household; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the east.

4 And his sons went and feasted in their houses, every one his day; and sent and and turned away from evil. 2 There were born to him seven sons and three daughters.

3 He had seven thousand sheep, three thousand camels, five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and very many servants; so that this man was the greatest of all the people of the east. 4 His sons used to go and hold a feast in the house of each on his

2. Job's Family, Wealth, and Fame (1:2-3)

2-3. The use of the consecutive imperfect tense, and there were born unto him, provides a swift link between the description of Job's character and that of his posterity. Divine approval of man is demonstrated by man's fecundity and estate. Total health leads to wealth. Sons are the inheritance of Yahweh, and the fruit of the womb is a reward (Pss. 127:3; 128:3). Thus the narrator subtly suggests to well-informed and expectant listeners that Job might not continue to fear God and live righteously were it not for the enjoyment of an extraordinarily full compensation.

The number of children and cattle (seven and three, seven and three, five and five) reveals the artistic, frescolike nature of the story.

3. An Illustration of Job's Piety (1:4-5)

4-5. The sons of this Edonitic prince were apparently unmarried, yet each one kept his own house in a regal manner (II Sam. 13:7; 14:28 ff.). So unusual was the atric evangel points it. When religion is made the highway to mental health or the bulwark of democracy, morality all too easily becomes prudential, the Beatitudes platitudes, and the Golden Rule no more than a maxim culled from Poor Richard's Almanac. The "good" man who is not "happy" sets the dilemma (cf. Luke 21:12-19; etc.). To the Greeks foolishness, to the Jews a stumblingblock (1 Cor. 1:23). With the resolution of it in Job cf. Robert Louis Stevenson's "If This Were Faith" (see Expos. on 3:20-21):

God, if this were enough,
That I see things bare to the buff
And up to the buttocks in mire;
That I ask nor hope nor hire,
Nut in the husk,
Nor dawn beyond the dusks,
Nor life beyond death;
God, if this were faith?

To go on for ever and fail and go on again,
With the half of a broken hope for a pillow at night
That somehow the right is the right
And the smooth shall bloom from the rough:
Lord, if that were enough?

4-5. Sin's Disguise.—It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Job was anxious lest all inadvertently they be enticed away (see Expos. on vss. 20-22) by the very ceaseless round of their pleasures, and so grow forgetful of him who is the giver of every called for their three sisters to eat and to drink with them.

† Webster's New International Dictionary, s.v., "Eudaemonism."

5 And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

6 ¶ Now there was a day when the sons of brotherly harmony that they regularly gathered for family banquets to which they invited even their sisters—an exceptional custom, as it would seem, in the ancient Near East. So keen was the father's religious concern for his children that he offered on their behalf a series of burnt offerings in order to atone for their possible crimes of secret misbehavior. The narrator thus indicates that Job's conception of man's duty to God was of the most scrupulous kind. At the same time the hero's understanding of true worship was not confined to a superficial recognition of the divine demands upon man, nor was it satisfied with outward acts of devotion. Above and beyond the formal performance of a ritual or the correct enunciation of a theological creed, Job's religion penetrated to psychological attitudes and inner dispositions. He cared not only for the outward religiosity of his sons, but also for what they thought of God in their hearts.

The description of Job's character reflects the moralistic optimism of the wise men and proposes an idealized picture of human nature. To be sure, Job is not represented as being endowed with the attributes of divine perfection. He was neither blameless nor sinless. In the poetic discussion he acknowledged that even the angels were not pure in comparison with the purity of God (13:26; 14:16; etc.), and he confessed the possibility of having committed sin (7:20-21; 13:25[?], 26; 14:17; etc.); but he was not conscious of sinfulness before God. Here is the "something" lacking. Job, as a man, had nothing of which to repent. He did not ask for the mercy of God; he felt no need of it. He was in some measure ancestor of the Pharisee, with his faults and virtues (Luke 18:9-14).

B. FIRST ACT OF THE DRAMA (1:6-22)

1. THE HEAVENLY COURT (1:6-12)

a) YAHWEH COMMENDS JOB (1:6-8)

6-8. The sons of God were conceived as divine beings who shared in the nature of the Deity (cf. 2:1; 38:7; Gen. 6:2; Pss. 29:1; 82:1; 6; 89:6; Dan. 3:25), and they "presented good and perfect gift (Jas. 1:14-17; cf. Deut. 8:7-14, 17-18). Humanity's besetting sin is not avowed godlessness but idolatry, whether barefaced or implicit (Rom. 1:21, 25), what has been called "a loving out of [away from] God." Against even the chance of it, against the chance of it even in their hearts, Job with unremitting regularity would set, in purification and atonement, what reverent safeguards he could.

But there is more than one gate into the citadel of Mansoul; and evil provides itself with more than one disguise. Prosperity carries its threat, and adversity its peril. There came a day when the sin Job feared for others stalked him: when, not under sunny skies but under a frowning Providence, his heart became a desolate place, and with his lips he cried out against God.

So manifold is the temptation that assails us! Nor is it any the less destructive because it leaps on us unrecognized and unexpected. Psychoanalysis is replete with instances: The condemnation of pride in others which is itself a revelation of pride; the contempt for self that wears the mask of contempt for neighbor. In Hawthorne's Scarlet Letter both Hester Prynne's lover and her husband furnish tragic examples. Read Rom. 2:1, 3, 17-24. His it is who stands to take heed lest he fall (1 Cor. 10:12). The prodigal of all prodigals was the prodigal who never left home (Luke 15:25-32). "Watch ye therefore, and pray always" (Luke 21:36; see Expos. on 31:24-28).

6. BEHIND THE SCENES.—Here and in 2:1 we are given access for a moment to the secret of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them.

7 And the Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

8 And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?

They came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them.

7 The Lord said to Satan, "Whence have you come?" Satan answered the Lord, "From going to and fro on the earth, and from walking up and down on it." 8 And the Lord said to Satan, "Have you considered my servant Job, that there is none like him on the earth, a blameless and upright man, who fears God and turns away from evil?"

Similarly, before Yahweh, their father and ruler, at regular intervals (see I Kings 22:19; Zech. 6:5) in a manner reminiscent of the royal courts in the ancient East. Before Yahweh "came also the Satan." Nothing is told about him, except by implication that he was not one of the sons of God, but among them. The use of the definite article (as in Zech. 3:1, 2) shows that the word Satan was not then a proper name (as in I Chr. 21:1) but designated a special function, presumably that of instigator of evil upon the earth, or at least of accuser and prosecutor; hence Moffatt's translation, "the Adversary" (cf. RSV mg.). In Arabic the verb shatana means "to be remote," especially from truth or God. The scene is closely similar to that of the vision described by the prophet Micaiah ben Imlah (I Kings 22:19-23). There, however, the "being which stood before Yahweh" in order to "entice Ahab" was merely a "spirit" which apparently did not specialize in evil-doing, and which consequently had not the professional title of "the Satan." Similarly, the "angel of Yahweh placed himself in the way of a satan against" Balaam (Num. 22:22).

This adversary is pictured as a shady character, yet Yahweh seemed to tolerate and perhaps even to enjoy his presence. Just as a king would inquire of one of his most corrupt and attractive minions, Yahweh asked, "Where dost thou come from, thou rogue?" And the fellow retorted impudently, without answering the question, "Oh, just from roving around somewhere."

counsels of the Most High, and so provided, as often in Greek tragedy, with information that the hero lacks. The result is a certain heightening of the dramatic tension, a silhouetting of both Job and his friends against the faraway landscape of eternity. In his engravings Blake makes frequent use of the same device. Paul does all his thinking in that perspective (Rom. 9–11). Earth's struggle in the footlights; heaven's secret in the shadows. We are to understand from the very beginning that Job is not being punished. He is not even being disciplined. He is being tried. And that not because God himself intends the trial; God permits it. Not as testing, but confidently and proudly as vindication. Evil is not ascendant in the universe. Back of its mystery is another mystery greater still: a love that "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things" (I Cor. 13:7). What but that is the meaning of the Cross? (See Expos. on 53:14; 56:8-25; 38:1; 42:5.) In George Eliot's phrase, there are "dealin'-n' wi' us."

6-12. Will a Man Serve God for Nought?—Without in the least desiring to squeeze a sophisticated theology out of an ingenuous and untutored narrative, it may yet be remarked:

(a) The trials of Job are Satan's idea (cf. vs. 9; 2:5; Matt. 13:27-28a; Expos. on 16:11). This is not a rational view. It is a religious view. Elizabeth Barrett Browning has it in those lines of hers:

You who keep account
Of crisis and transition in this life,
Set down the first time Nature says plain "no"
To some "yes" in you, and walks over you
In gorgeous sweeps of scorn. We all begin
By singing with the birds, and running fast
With June days, hand in hand: but once, for all,
The birds must sing against us, and the sun
Strike down upon us like a friend's sword caught
By an enemy to slay us, while we read
The dear name on the blade which bites at us!—
That's bitter and convincing: after that,
We seldom doubt that something in the large Smooth order of creation ... has gone wrong.]

(b) God on his part undertakes, as one might look with a patient smile on a jaundiced lad, to point out that surely matters on earth are...
Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, Doth Job fear God for nought?

Hast not thou made a hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land.

But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.

in the earth and roaming about it.” The Deity challenged the villain, “Hast thou observed my servant Job?” No one should at this juncture remark, “Why invite trouble? Let sleeping dogs lie!” For the narrator was not a theologian. He was not concerned with a description of divine attributes. He was not even conscious of the theological implications which might follow God’s endorsement of Job’s virtues. He merely retold a popular tale, probably of early origin (see Intro., pp. 887-88), because he wanted to introduce his poem with the skeptical question of “the Satan.”

b) The Doubt and Plan of the Satan (1:9-12)

9-12. The adversary had to concede that “there was none like Job in the earth,” but he seemed to know more than Yahweh about human nature. He implied that the Deity was naive. Doth Job fear God for nought? Here is the starting point of the discussion, the nerve of the drama, the basic verse of the whole book. Here is a valid criticism of historical religions. Is not Job pious, as any other man, in exchange for his privileges? Does not every devotee understand piety as part of a bargain? It pays to be religious. “The Satan” probed to the hidden pride of clericalism—by which “holy men” yield the central shrine to the devil. The astounding fact is that the concept of disinterested religion was keenly sensed by the narrator and the hearers of this folk tale. The disturbing question was not primarily that of undeserved suffering, but that of genuine not so bad as Satan would have everybody think, and gently reminds him of Job as a case in point. Recall 1:1, and notice the addition to it here.

(c) The disasters which follow are nevertheless attributed by Job as well as by the friends to God himself. There was no ultimate dualism in the Hebrew mind. There was no knowledge of “secondary causes,” which for us seem to postpone the perplexity at least until we can turn the page; no nice distinctions between “absolute will” and “contingent will.” There was no theory of chance either. To walk under a ladder and at that precise moment have a paint bucket fall on one’s head was not bad luck. When creeds disappear charms take their place. As faith vanishes superstition runs wild. The universe, in “the strange world of the Bible,” belonged to God, and it belonged to him from top to bottom. It was instinct with him. Nature and history were the manifestations of his sovereignty. The hosts of heaven were “ministers of his, that do his pleasure.” Through them he executed mercy and judgment. All “powers” and all “mights” were his messengers. Whatever man’s response might make of the message, whether good or bad, they went on their appointed rounds to the ends of the earth, “hearkening unto the voice of his word” (see Expos. on 3:23; 4:8; 6:4).

So are the roles assigned and the stage set. Whereupon, with a promptness that reveals if not the author’s primary intent then one at least of his major concerns, the problem which has already been subtly suggested (vss. 2-3) is raised into bold relief. And the Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, with his hands in his pockets, his tongue in his cheek, and a shrug of his shoulders, “From all over.” He seems to have had no particular province allotted to him, as some of the others had. His “is a roving commission. He is a kind of ambassador at large. There is not yet about him any of the full-blown mallevolence of the figure that writhes and flashes its way through the drawings of Blake.* This is

1:12 AND THE LORD SAID UNTO SATAN, BEHOLD, ALL THAT HE HATH IS IN THY POWER; ONLY UPON HIMSELF PUT NOT FORTH THINE HAND. SO SATAN WENT FORTH FROM THE PRESENCE OF THE LORD.

Piety and authentic devotion. They did not ask, with Habakkuk and the psalmists, "Why do the righteous suffer?" but rather, "Is there on earth a man faithful to God for the sake of God?" In spite of the traditional statements to the contrary, the primary and essential question of the book of Job is not theodicy but true worship. The enigma of suffering is not the central concern of the poet: it is merely the instrument of his argument.

Yahweh confidently accepted the challenge, for "the Satan" received permission to put Job on trial by striking his estate and his posterity. Again it is necessary to remark that the narrator was not conscious of theological problems raised by such a development, and that any comment on divine cruelty is out of place.

Not Milton's fallen angel, Lucifer, son of the morning; nothing nearly so magnificent as that captain of heaven's rebellious legions, standing there in Paradise Lost, stripped of all his honors:

As when the sun new-ris'n
Looks through the horizontal misty air,
Shorn of his beams, or from behind the moon,
In dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds
O'er half the nations, and with fear of change
Perplexes monarchs. 1

The Satan of Job is a kind of devil in the making, already more enamored of his faultfinding than is quite decent. He can fairly be seen kicking up the star dust and looking around with a smirk, as if the cynicism he harbors in his heart were a sweet morsel on his tongue. He does not think too highly of God's government; much less has man been able to pull the wool over his eyes. He is the "nobody's child" of the universe, 2 who has seen it all and likes none of it. It is the mention of Job that sets him off. None like him—l dare say! But who does not know why? Does he fear God for nought? Hast not thou made a hedge about him? (Cf. 3:23.)

Almost inevitably that question arises every time the claims of Christianity are presented. "Do You Want Abundant Life?" "How to Tap the Springs of Power." And of course the correct answer is that nobody serves God for nought. Nobody can. Jesus was very explicit on that point. (Luke 18:28-30. Cf. Mark 10:28-30, with the significant variant. In Matt. 19:27-30 the promise is followed by the parable of the laborers in the vineyard, which carries its own moral in that connection. In all three instances we are already standing within the shadow of the Cross. In Mark and Matthew there is in addition the pathos of that brief story about the sons of Zebedee.) Some wish it might be otherwise. H. G. Wells used to insist that the prospect of heaven, with its pearly gates and golden streets, was altogether too much of an enticement to righteousness. He preferred to be good—for nothing. And no man can be, in a world that is God's world. There is always something. Virtue is its own reward, but not its only reward. There is a harvest to the sower. Friendship has its benefits. So does piety. God makes something of the pious—at cost. He that is in Christ is a new creation. But the man who fixes his eye on the new creation is not in Christ! The trouble is that the only truth Satan knows—and it is a truth—carries back of it a cynical lie. To that lie, here in the book of Job, the lie is given (see Expos. on vss. 20-22; 2:1-6, 7-10; 17:9; 27:2-6; 31:2-4). This is part at least of the author's meaning. And there is no delay in getting at it. Put forth thine hand now, and see what happens. I give you my oath, he will curse thee to thy face. Not my hand, answers the Lord, thy hand. All that he hath is there. Only touch not his person. And swiftly, eagerly, Satan is gone, to abide his time (see Expos. on vss. 2, 3, 13). How near he comes to winning his wager, the sequel will disclose. And how far short—by what breadth, and length, and depth, and height! He is not pitted against Job. He is pitted against God!

1 Eh. L. ll. 594-99.

12. Why Does God Permit Evil?—(See Expos. on vs. 6.) To the author of Job this was not a problem for the mind to tease; it was a problem for the soul to wrestle with. The "wisdom" of this book, and indeed of all Jewish literature, has to do with life and not with logic. It has to do with the sweeping passions of the human heart, with the stalwart qualities of the human will, and not alone with the calculating processes of the human mind, which incidentally may well belong more to the mind itself than to what-13:16 And there was a day when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother’s house:
14 And there came a messenger unto Job, and said, The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding beside them:
15 And the Sabean’s fell upon them, and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.
16 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The fire of God is fallen from heaven, and hath burned up the sheep, and the servants, and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

2. First Visitaton of Evil (1:13-22)

a) Four Messengers of Woe (1:13-19)

13-19. The action immediately shifts back to the world of men as the news of four disasters reaches Job in quick succession. The oxen and the asses were carried away and their attending servants slain in a typical raid by some Arabs (vss. 13-15); the sheep and their shepherds were struck in a sudden desert storm (vs. 16); the camels were stolen and their drivers slain by bands of Aramaean nomads (vs. 17); and in a climactic stroke the sons and the daughters of the hero perished in a hurricane (vss. 18-19). The symmetrical and stylized character of the scene is evident. Each bearer of bad news escaped alone, for the seemingly single purpose of telling the tale, and was still speaking when ever it is in the universe that is ultimately "real"! Bertrand Russell has said that even the so-called laws of nature are of necessity little more than human conventions. Reason has its proper work to do, and within its sphere can bear true witness. But it is not sovereign. Nor does it have the last word (see Expos. on 36:8-25). The philosopher may suggest that evil is contingent upon whatever freedom of moral choice is requisite to moral stature. He may think of it as implicit in all moral achievement. But somebody before long will call for the previous question: If God did indeed fashion the world so, why did he not fashion it otherwise? And to that any man’s self-born answer is as good as any other’s. What the problem needs is a change of venue, which is precisely what the Bible gives it: not why is evil permitted, but how is evil overcome? The book of Job hints at the one, but cries out its assurance of the other. Beyond this world, and in it too—God! “Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another” (19:27). It is in life’s arena that the battle is joined and the victory won. There all our tentative little theodicies, our little arguments on God’s behalf (13:4, 7-8), break down. Such efforts may be pious enough in their intent to defend the Almighty against the assaults of reason. To the modern religious person they may seem quite obviously necessary if religious faith is to justify itself in the eyes of the intelligentsia. But to the see and the poet they are—what other word is there for it?—wicked. In Thornton Wilder’s novel “The Bridge of San Luis Rey” half a dozen people meet their death in the collapse of that bridge, are plunged into the dark abyss of Nature and of God without any warning; so senseless a thing, so utterly casual, that a young priest sets about tracing through those lives one after the other to see what pattern there might be beyond all appearance of meaninglessness and grinning chance. In the end he succeeds in establishing the fact that for every one of them death came promptly at the right moment of all moments; whereupon he himself is burned as a heretic for attempting to justify the ways of God! And that too makes sense! “Verily,” cries the prophet Isaiah, “thou art a God that hidest thyself” (45:15). To proceed on any other hypothesis is to climb the last pinnacle of pride and evil presumption. Read Browning’s “Mihrab Shah.”

13. There Was a Day.—“There was a man” (vs. 1), and “there was a day”—in heaven (vs. 6). Then a day on earth, and another day in 17 While he was yet speaking, there came another, and said, The Chaldeans made out three bands, and fell upon the camels, and have carried them away, yea, and slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

18 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house:

19 And, behold, there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

20 Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped, capped to tell you.” 17 While he was yet speaking, there came another, and said, “The Chalde'ans formed three companies, and made a raid upon the camels and took them, and slew the servants with the edge of the sword; and I alone have escaped to tell you.” 18 While he was yet speaking, there came another, and said, “Your sons and daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house; 19 and behold, a great wind came across the wilderness, and struck the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young people, and they are dead; and I alone have escaped to tell you.”

20 Then Job arose, and rent his robe, and shaved his head, and fell upon the

the next messenger arrived. The first and third blows were due to human evil, while the second and fourth resulted from natural phenomena. Here is another indication of the sophisticated aspect of the narrative. By concentrating in one instant four different calamities, gathered from four corners of life’s horizon, the narrator produces a sense of supernatural awe in the minds of his hearers. Modern readers’ attention, like theirs, is focused with anguish and pity upon a rich man made poor, a sheik stripped of his heirs, and a godly worshiper smitten with inexplicable adversity.

b) The Resignation and Faith of Job (1:20-21)

20-21. Now that his life was rent and sunlight had vanished from his day, the hero silently rose and performed the traditional ritual of grief. Then, after his prostration was consummated, he avowed in a couplet, now most famous, his resignation and his faith (vs. 21). Resignation, because he was born destitute and destitute he will return to the heaven (2:1). So back and forth, like a metronome, ticks the clock of destiny. Suddenly the blow falls. First the human stroke, then—or so it would seem—the divine; only to have man strike again, then heaven (vs. 15-18). A sledge hammer is rising and crashing to its target, with vast muscles behind it, each blow heavier than the last, hardly a breath between. And all on a day. Not just any day would do. That day of holy remembrance, when the round of their feasting was gone about, and they were ready to meet again in their eldest brother's house; that day when “early in the morning” (vs. 5) Job had sent for his sons and daughters and offered burnt offerings for them. “Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity” (Ps. 32:1-2). To get up from your knees like that, and brush the dust from them, and walk right out—into what? It was on Sunday, December 7, 1941, that the bombs fell on Pearl Harbor. You pray, and a child dies. You receive the Lord's Supper, and go home to get a telegram from the War Office. What sort of world is this? Surely the only final sense there is in it is the sense that God makes. And he is under no compulsion to make our kind of sense. The only security there is in it is his kind of security. You can sit in the nook and chimneyside of his favor, cleansed of all your sin; and there lose your fortune and lose your health—without ever losing the favor, or missing by so much as a hairbreath the best he has in store for you. If Job had known that, if the Hebrew people had known it, life might have been spared many a Calvary—and been the poorer for it!

20-22. The Hand of the Giver.—(Cf. Expos. on 2:7-10; 29:1-23.) To Satan's lie the lie is given. Job maintains his piety. There in that desolation of grief, hemmed in below by “man's inhumanity to man,” above by the silent and inscrutable sky, the uncomplaining victim— rending his mantle and shaving his head, as they were wont to do who had plunged into the dark loneliness of some bleak disaster—lifts his

916
21 And said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD.

22 In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

womb of the earth his mother (Gen. 3:19; Ps. 139:13, 15; Ecclus. 40:1); faith, because Yahweh owns all and his name shall always be blessed (cf. I Sam. 3:18; Eccl. 5:15).

The benediction of the name of Yahweh placed on the lips of an Arab prince is unexpected and disconcerting. Elsewhere in the prologue Job spoke of Elohim (vs. 5; 2:10), and so did the Satan (vs. 9), the messenger (vs. 16), Job's wife (2:9) and Yahweh himself (vs. 8; 2:3).

Duhm's conjecture that the text originally had the word Elohim, which was then accidentally transformed into Yahweh by an absent-minded scribe, is attractive yet gratuitous. But another hypothesis may help to explain the anomaly: the narrator may have introduced a thoroughly Hebraic benediction, for that was the only one known to his listeners—a poetic strophe of a liturgical character. Indeed, one may say that the blessing of the name would not have been possible to the Hebrew mind unless it were the name of Yahweh (Ps. 118:2). Even today in northwestern Arabia, according to Emil G. Kraeling, the survivors of a dead person intone a liturgical formula, "His lord gave him, his lord has taken him away" (The Book of the Ways of God [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1959], p. 184).

The first act of the drama draws to a close (vs. 22) with an indication of Job's refusal to "ascribe to God any folly." The word tiphľāh, "tastelessness," applies to moral capriciousness and ill behavior. Job did not accuse the Deity of immoral caprice and misrule.

eyes and worships God in the waste. The-hand that has added without desert may subtract without reproach. Let Swinburne have his bitter fling at the God who "gives a star and takes a sun away" 4 (see Exeg. on 10:1-22).

For whatever reason (see Exeg. for one of the likeliest conjectures), the Israelitish name for God is used at this dramatic moment in the prologue, not to occur again, with two exceptions that are perhaps to be accounted for as accidental (12:9; 28:28), until the Lord himself appears (38:1): but from that point on increasingly, and consistently in the epilogue. It can hardly be without artistic significance, as the work now stands, that here at the beginning and at the end the mood of reverence so long associated with that name prevails, a reverence so profound that the devout Jew would not even allow his lips to frame the word. Through the cycles of debate, which are kept doubling on their tracks with a ever more caustic reiteration, as well as in passages elsewhere that are not intended to reflect the covenant relation, the God to whom reference is made is the God of nature and of all the nations and races of men, a strange, remoteness, and mighty God, of whom so little is known, dwelling somewhere outside the intimacies he had established with his people, a God about whom the Arab sheik and his friends converse almost as if they had been orphaned of his presence, a vast and shadowy God, far from the affairs of men. From the warmth and love of one who had made himself known, we are to move farther and farther into the realm where only whispers are heard; until we come back at last to that dear name, and the majesty that kindles again its flame on the hearth of a life restored.

Observe too the double meaning of the word "to bless." It could be a benediction, or it could be a curse. It could be an open door to friendship, or it could be a door slammed in a man's face. The context alone is decisive. It stands in vss. 5 and 11; and in 2:5, 9 (see Exeg. on 2:9-10). In each instance the word may be a euphemism, as if the very thought of cursing God were intolerable, and the divine name itself, so to speak, had drawn the venom of the curse and by some celestial alchemy had made of it a blessing. A. B. Davidson and H. C. O. Lanchester, 6 however, cite a "similar secondary

4 Atalanta in Clydon.

2 Again there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them to present himself before the Lord.

2 And the Lord said unto Satan, From whence comest thou? And Satan answered the Lord, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

3 And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? and still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou movest me against him, to destroy him without cause.

---

C. Second Act of the Drama (2:1-10)

1. The Heavenly Court (2:1-6)

a) New Praise of Job by Yahweh (2:1-3)

2:1-3. The second dialogue—again artistically stylized—between Yahweh and “the Satan” is strictly parallel to the first one. But Yahweh now testifies that his servant has maintained his integrity, and he accuses the adversary of having tormented the hero without cause.

use” in the Latin valere, which could be for greeting, or for taking leave—permanently. So may one in English speak poetically of “the Blessed Damozel,” and a moment later, peering down for a collar button under the lowest-swung article of furniture in the room, mutter imperca- tions, in colloquial if not vulgar prose, on “the blessed thing”!

Blessed be the name of the Lord. In any case, what distance is there between that humility and the rebellious defiance which is soon to leap in the face of heaven? To bless, to curse—it is a kind of contrapuntal minor theme, weaving its way in and out of a melody that stands trembling now on the brink of crashing, shuddering discords. The turning of a hand: shall it be El Shaddai, the Almighty, curse him!—or Yahweh, Adonai, blessed be his holy name forever!

In all this Job did not sin. Be prepared for what follows; but at this point, to say no more, the answer to Satan’s question comes up roundly from the earth: “Yes! By the eternal Lord of Sinai and the wildness, of Canaan and the Exile, a man will serve God for nought!” There is nothing any more in Job’s hands that could possibly account for his piety. His forehead is in the dust. Yet on his lips there is a prayer, and in his heart no sign of a thought that God had dealt unjustly with him; no slightest murmur against what the Hebrew called “foolishness” in heaven’s high place, no whispered charge that on the throne of the universe was wrong, not right, standing there among the shadows, keeping watch above its own (7:12-20).

“God, it isn’t fair! This should never have happened to me! I don’t deserve it!” None of that, not now. Only a man, God’s servant, none like him in the earth; and God still proud of him in heaven, still justified in that pride. The first bout with Satan is over—the liar, and the father of lies. In Job’s victory God has won.

There is a faith that stands: stands in the peace of remembered good, in the confidence that back of all life’s riddles there is meaning, that over all its evil there is God. In the memoirs of Dr. John Brown occurs this passage:

We were all three awakened by a cry of pain—sharp, insufferable, as if one were stung... We found my father standing before us, erect, his hands clenched in his black hair, his eyes full of misery and amazement, his face white as that of the dead. He frightened us. He saw this, or else his intense will had mastered his agony, for, taking his hands from his head, he said, slowly and gently, “Let us give thanks,” and turned to a little sofa in the room; there lay our mother, dead.

2:1-6. The Final Cynicism.—The curtain has been lowered only to rise again, this time on a second assembly in heaven, almost identical.

---

"My Father’s Memoir," Spare Hours (Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1862), pp. 150-81
4 And Satan answered the Lord, and said, Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life.
5 But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face.
6 And the Lord said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life.
7 So went Satan forth from the presence of the Lord, and smote Job with sore

b) New Doubt and Plan of the Satan (2:4-6)

4-6. Skin for skin, or "a hide for a hide," is probably a popular expression familiar to bartering traders and reflects the view that religion too is a bargaining method for obtaining happiness. The precise meaning of the proverb is now obscure, but its general application is made clear by the context. "The Satan" was not convinced after the first trial that Job was selflessly devoted to the Deity he worshiped. Property, even posterity, are less precious than physical existence and well-being. According to such a line of reasoning, Job merely executed a strategic retreat and by continuing lip devotion to his God hoped to salvage the only property he still owned—his health. To prove the fallacy of that argument, Yahweh was willing to have the hero put to torture.

2. Second Visitation of Evil (2:7-10)

a) The Disease (2:7-8)

7-8. Job was smitten upon his whole body by an "evil inflammation" (šēḥîn rā' ). The word for leprosy is not used here, although it was well known to O.T. writers (see leave that to others more naïve: he will abandon the kind of cynicism that anybody could trot out, and go in for something wholly sophisticated and mature. Here on his lips now is humanity's shout of derision for the image of God in the human soul. "Everybody has his price." Only those could ever be guilty of it who are so obsessed with self that they have begun to mistake their own blindness for sight. There is enough wrong in the world to give it birth, as with all the lies that cradle themselves by the side of truth, but beyond the wrong there is enough right to keep even the man who yields from yielding his own consent. Beyond the wrong, and out of its reach, is an integrity which cannot be bought or had, with threat or bribe. Beyond the wrong, saints and martyrs, how many of them unsung! Beyond, a God who is willing to risk it with anybody! "Behold, not my hand, but thine. I will leave him there, though not his life. That I require of thee, no more." Still that immemorial pride, staking now its love, its confidence, its honor, its hope, laying away in store only death itself, lest there be no foothold left on earth for the soul's triumph. Job will not reckon that a kindness. He will call it the very last of cruelties. To him it will be doom to live and not die.

7-10. Shall We Receive Good and Not Evil?—So are we rushed at once into the maelstrom of boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown. 8 And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal; and he sat down among the ashes.

Lev. 13:9-11; Deut. 24:8; II Kings 5:3), but the shehin was a symptom of one of the worst forms of leprosy (Lev. 13:18-23; the same word was used for describing the effects of one of the Egyptian plagues (Exod. 9:9-11) as well as the illness of Hezekiah (II Kings 20:7; Isa. 33:21). The shehin rá' is listed in the curses of Deuteronomy (28:35) as appearing upon the skin, like Job's ailment, "from the sole of the foot to the top of the skull." In the same passage the disease is called "Egyptian" (Deut. 28:27). Since the ancient writers considered elephantiasis as specifically Egyptian (Pliny Natural History XXVI. 5; Lucretius Of the Nature of Things VI. 1104-5), early commentators on Job identified his disease with leprosy. There is no valid reason, however, for maintaining the traditional view. Modern exegetes have conjectured a number of identifications with various dermatic ailments (see S. R. Driver and G. B. Gray, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Job [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1921]; "International Critical Commentary", I, 23-24). A case might be made for a skin disorder known as pemphigus foliaceus which, unlike Hansen's disease, appears suddenly and reaches almost at once an acute stage. It is particularly common among young adults endowed with vigorous vitality (cf. 3:13; etc.; Job describes himself fourteen times as a "strong man"), and it is characterized by bulbous inflammation (cf. 30:30) which produces intense itching (cf. vs. 8). Atrophic changes appear on the skin of the face (cf. 2:12) and generalized blistering produces an offensive, musty odor. The patient becomes extremely emaciated (cf. 19:20) and suffers from cyclical evening rises of temperature followed by periods of apparent improvement. These are terminated by relapses which reveal constant deterioration, until death eventually comes, sometimes after twenty years (see Rupert Hallam, M.D., "Pemphigus Foliaceus," in The British Encyclopaedia of Medical Practice [London: Butterworth & Co., 1938], IX, 490-92). In spite of several allusions to Job's pathological state which may be found in the poetic discussion (see 7:5; 16:13, 15; 19:17; 30:17, 30), no diagnosis can be assured.

Scraping himself with a potsherd, Job left his house for a heap of dung-ashes—the mazbala, which exists to this day outside Arabian towns—and there he sat, amid rubbish, rotting carcasses, playing urchins, homeless beggars, village idiots, and howling dogs. The respected prince was now an outcast, awaiting death, tormented by pain, and rent by mental anguish.

mystery and disaster. This time there is no hul before the storm. No sooner is permission given than Satan hurries forth from the divine presence to smite with putrefying sores (see Exeg.), from head to foot, the man he had already stripped and bereaved. Hell lets loose its bolts, but all within the providence of heaven: for nothing can befall a man outside that circle. The evil is not to be thought of as deliberately willed of God. Explicit in the prologue, and implicit throughout, is the realization that the problem of God's providence may not be so simply resolved. The exercise of it lies rather in the fact that even the wiles of Satan are no more than an instrument in his hands. There was a purpose beyond Satan's purpose, whatever that other purpose was (see Expos. on 36:8:25; 42:5), and to this purpose Satan's purpose and man's response alike could do nothing but contribute. Otherwise the permission given Satan would itself have been satanic.

Writs James McKechnie:

It is not enough to say that [Satan] loses in spite of his gains—that does not express the full irony of his position—for, indeed, he loses by and through his gains. He makes Job a rebel, and in rebellion Job lays grip on a deeper loyalty. He provokes him into complaints against God, yet these complaints mark not a renunciation of, but agonizing struggles after God. He makes him a heretic, a passionate repudiator of the faith of his people, yet even while the old faith is being destroyed, a new and nobler faith is taking root in his heart. Satan is thus, in most unforeseeable fashion, duped by his own activities. Yet if, after our facile manner, we sum up the results of Job's Ordeal by saying that good comes out of evil, let us beware in what sense we use the
9. Then said his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? curse God, and die.

10. But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

b) The Resignation and Faith of Job (2:9-10)

9-10. One may wonder why Job's wife had mysteriously survived the tragic blows of ch. 1. Chrysostom and others maintained that the narrator meant thereby to increase the sufferer's torture to a climactic degree: In the light of subsequent events it becomes clear that Job would have found relief in becoming a widower. The woman's question and advice may be interpreted in two ways: (a) "Do you still pretend to be a perfect man? Do you not see that such a fantastic succession of calamities proves beyond doubt that you are a sinner? Bid God farewell and die!" Or (b) "Do you still ridiculously believe that your perfection is recognized by a righteous God? Let blasphemy bring its certain and immediate consequence. Curse God and die." The idea is in line with that expressed in Isa. 8:21-22.

The second interpretation seems preferable, for the verb bērēkh, "to bless," had already been used euphemistically by the Satan in the sense of "to curse" (vs. 5; 1:11). In other words, the desperate and bewildered woman, still confident in her husband's integrity, unable to hope for his healing, and profoundly sympathizing with his plight, found her only recourse in the idea of euthanasia, and prescribed for her husband a theological method of committing suicide. Death by a curse was better than a slowly dying life. Such a piece of advice seems to have been inspired by love and common sense. Yet one may understand why Augustine called Job's wife "the adjutant of the devil," a spiritual sister of the woman in the story of the garden (Gen. 3:1 ff.), for she tempted the hero to forsake his Creator.

Job did not fall into this temptation. He recognized in her seemingly reasonable proposal the sign of frenzy. Faith offered to him a reason higher than human reason. He saw only folly in the apparent reasonableness of the scheme, and said, "You speak as one of the nēḇāḥōlēţh." The masculine singular form of the same word (nāḇāḥōl) designates the fool who "said in his heart, There is no God" (Ps. 14:1). The insanity of human wisdom is opposed to the sanity of faith. Job was outspoken, but he remained courteous: he did not accuse his wife of being a fool but only of using fools' language. He understood that she too was suffering in agony. His final expression of trust in God took the form of a rhetorical question, in a loving attempt to win her over to his own words. Never by way of natural and necessary sequence does good come out of evil. It is as a glad surprise, a miracle and triumph of grace, that it comes. Satan accomplishes nothing for God, though God may accomplish much through Satan.3

Hell makes its moves on the checkered squares of human existence; but all its moves are on heaven's own chessboard. The Adversary himself has an Adversary (see Expos. on 9:20-24; 19:6; 29:1-25; 34:14; 36:5-15). There are no feints, no sham battles lost or won. There is a profound sense in which by Job's testing God is tested. He will fail if Job fails. If Job now stands, he will stand.4 It is his handiwork that is cast into the fire and furnace of life's peril and sorrow—there on the refuse heap beyond the town, where the scavenger dogs of the East prowl among the ashes. There the issue will be drawn—and settled. And there the last prop of Job's thus far stalwart soul is struck from beneath him. Blake represents Job's wife as the faithful attendant upon all her husband's misery. We may perhaps be permitted to assume

Now when Job’s three friends heard of all this evil that had come upon him, they came each from his own place, Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Na’amathite. They made an appointment together to come to condole with him.

D. Presentation of the Hero’s Friends (2:11-13)
   I. Names and Countries of the Friends (2:11)

11. After a certain lapse of time, perhaps weeks or even months, during which, it may be presumed, Job’s health deteriorated, three of his friends heard of his misfortunes. Eliphaz was a resident of Teman, in Edom (Gen. 36:4, 11; Jer. 49:7; Obad. 9; Ezek. 25:18; Amos 1:12)—a country famous for its wisdom (cf. Robert H. Pfeiffer, “Edomitic Wisdom,” Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XLIV [1926], 19-25). His name may have meant “God crushes.” Bildad belonged to the tribe of Shuah, probably associated with Aramaean nomads who migrated somewhere in the southeast that the gentle remonstrance in vs. 10 won her back to her fealty; but at this moment she fails him. Whether out of the unutterable depths of her compassion or because, whatever her husband might do, she could herself no longer bear a life with every visible token of God’s favor and presence gone from it (cf. 1:9-11), she cries out against the whole impossible horror (see Exeg., and recall vss. 3, 5). On this tremendous ground, which only heroes can take, Job meets her: “The good is none of ours. It is not even our due. It comes from God. Shall we not then acknowledge his sovereign hand when the shadows fall and evil is our lot? [See Expos. on 1:20-22.] All our light is no more than a borrowed ray; and the dark no other than a mantle which God spreads over us. Shall we then be godly in the day, and in the night godless?” So it is before a man’s self gets in the way and he begins to brood. For Job there is still the vision of God, high and lifted up; and no matter how far he wanders from it in the course of the argument, driven like a wind-tossed ship under a leaden sky, he will return to it, and find there the peace which passes understanding, and hear again the words that are hardly lawful for a man to utter. Around the splendor of that same throne and majesty the persecuted church of Christ was rallied, centuries on centuries later, with “the removing of those things that are shaken, . . . that those things which cannot be shaken may remain” (Heb. 12:27). What did it matter if they were despised and rejected of men? “Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, . . . that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light” (I Pet. 2:9). What if evil did seem rampant in the world? “Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth” (Rev. 19:6). The flag has been run up full mast. In all this did Job not sin with his lips (cf. vs. 5; 1:11, 20-22). God is justified, Satan vanquished. But around those sunny heights now the clouds gather.

11-13. Job’s Comforters.—It is a mistake to deal harshly with these men. They have become a proverb; but not all proverbs are fair, because not all the people who fashion proverbs are fair.
12 And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice, and wept: and they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven.

of Palestine (Gen. 25:2, 6). His name may be derived from the Aramaic, "Beloved of the Lord." Zophar (a name with an uncertain meaning, perhaps "twittering bird" or "sharp nail" or "goatlike jumper") lived in Na’amah, perhaps Djebel-el-Na’ameh, in northwestern Arabia.

2. Mourning of the Friends (2:12)

12. The narrator tells how the three friends met at an appointed place, apparently in order to plan together a common strategy of pastoral ministration. This leature is another indication of the artistic character of the story. They lifted up their eyes afar off, as well they would, since Job was sitting on the prominent top of the mazbala outside the town. So terrible were the ravages of the disease that they did not recognize him. Thereupon they performed the approved ritual of mourning for the dead (II Sam. 12:16; Lam. 2:10).

Neither was Job. What he says of his friends will appear. But what he says is never to be taken with too great literalness. He is a man distraught, who yet gives many a sign that in his heart of hearts he yearns toward them (19:21). They had been grieved to hear of his calamities, they had fixed their rendezvous and come to him, and they meant him the best they knew. That they failed in their mission should never have fastened on them the stigma they have borne through the years. The only thing that can be said of them is that they were poorly equipped for their ministry of consolation. They were "too white"; and "the flower of life is red." They lacked most where the need was greatest. The world perishes not of dark but of cold. The soul in its deep distress seeks not light but warmth, not counsel but understanding. If they had ever suffered any themselves, it might have been different.10 As it was, they came with a theory to meet a person, were of one mind and one will; but the heart is the place of meeting. They undertook their task with certain premises—as who does not: all sufficiently true to give rise to the problem of the book, and lend it even now a peculiar poignancy; and all sufficiently false to stir anybody’s affliction into rebellion (cf. Expos. on 32.6). God punishes the evil and rewards the good, so ran their logic. His mercy is toward them that fear him; and his wrath upon the disobedient, that they may forsake their wicked ways and live. The man whom catastrophe overtakes, that man has sinned. Let him repent and his deliverance is sure. If he will not, the very stars in their courses will fight against him. That was the Hebrew faith, straight out of Deuteronomy and the prophets; and it was their faith. There was certainly nothing contagious about it, to bring a soul, for all the lonelines of its anguish, to cry out “Immanuel, God with us!” Quite the contrary. But they could not themselves afford to become involved with anyone who would break with it, as Job had broken with it. For it had been his faith too, until he saw that never again for him could it cover the facts. He was one of those facts. He had done nothing commensurate with this disaster. There was no answer that way. But what other way was there, and what other answer? The friends twisted and squirmed and guessed and supposed and hurled it back at him over and over again. It was by their traditional piety that Job was goaded into a passionate fury, while round by round their vehemence turned into venom. Less and less did they concern themselves about the sufferer; more and more it was “the principle of the thing” that mattered. They were not intentionally cruel. Theirs was the cruelty of those who “for conscience toward God” would see to it that you “endure grief and suffer wrongfully” (1 Pet. 2:19). And it distorted everything they said. It made abysmal folly of their wisdom (cf. Expos. on 4:1–5:27; 6:14).

Through Blake’s drawings there runs the suggestion that the debate which stagers back and forth through the body of the poem is little more in reality than the conversation that went on in Job’s own mind, between himself the accuser and himself the accused (see Expos. on 19:25). No doubt it is altogether too fanciful, yet almost irresistible, to think of Eliphaz the seer as the word of the prophets of Israel, knock-

13. The friends had intended “to condole with [Job] and comfort him” (vs. 11), but seven days and seven nights of silence were more eloquent than words. He himself remained mute with woe. He did not try to take his life, perhaps because he had reached a state of complete despair. “When a man attempts suicide, it means he cares about something. He cares whether he’s alive or dead. . . . But real despair means there is no hope, no door, no escape. . . . We never do try to commit suicide in that circle of hell, which is the lowest of all. It is as if we were already dead, rotting, yet still suffering.” (William Seabrook, Asylum [New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co., 1935], p. 195.) On the other hand, it may be that Job, like most ancient Semites, did not consider at all the idea of bringing death upon himself; and that he kept silence because a remnant of faith prevented him, not from despair, but from a desperate act. He faced death but he did not hasten its coming, like another of whom it was later said,

The parching thirst of death
Is on Thee, and Thou triest

The slumb’rous potion bland, and wilt not drink:
Not sullen, nor in scorn, like haughty man
With suicidal hand
Putting his solace by.
(John Keble, The Christian Year, “Tuesday Before Easter.”)

The narrative is now brought to a solemn pause, and dramatic pathos is created in the mind of the listeners with a minimum of devices. The last notes of the overture have been played, leaving the audience in suspense. The poetic opus may now begin.
After this opened Job his mouth, and cursed his day. 2 And Job spake, and said, 3 Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, There is a man child conceived. 4 Let that day be darkness; let not God regard it from above, neither let the light shine upon it.

II. THE POETIC DISCUSSION (3:1–31:40)

A. LAMENT OF JOB (3:1–26)

After weeks and perhaps months of solitude (see 7:3) and seven days and nights of friendly presence without words, Job himself broke the silence. Far from the height of submissive faith in which he had last spoken (2:10), he apparently fell into an abyss of hopelessness. Not quite total, however, for in absolute despondency man cares for nothing and speaks not. Job broke into a curse, not against God, but against his own existence, and he expressed three wishes: (a) that he had never been born (vss. 2-10); (b) that he had died at birth (vss. 11-19); and (c) that he might die now (vss. 20-25). Ignoring both his friends and his God, he let his soliloquy rise as a rhythmic cry of wounded animality.

I. THE CURSE (3:1-10)

3:1-10. Job . . . cursed his day, viz., the day in which he was born (vss. 1-2). Days and nights, according to ancient beliefs (see Ps. 19:3), were endowed with a kind of long compassion for the Negro, away there in the deep South where he came from. And suddenly her eyes shone with a strange light. “Maybe,” she said, “I ought to go back and carry on where he left off.” It was as near as she came to smiling. Softly the door closed behind her as she left. There was no answer that day; but there was a stirring, and a kind of peace that was like the brush of an angel’s wing.

So they sat down with him upon the ground. With every manifestation of grief, as those who mourn the dead, stricken as he was stricken, all the verude of his life no more than dust, they waited for him to speak, not daring themselves to begin. And it was like rain to the parched ground of Job’s lonely soul. The flood gates of his sorrow swung wide open (see Matt. 27:36 for purposes of contrast and comparison). 3:1-26. Job’s Lament.—(Cf. Jer. 20:14-18; Expos. on 6:2-7, 4, 6, 8-13.) In the release that so often comes when a sufferer finds himself as he thinks among those who will assuredly understand, and not take amiss anything he says, Job lets loose the pent-up torrent of his anguish. In verses of somber beauty, breaking out at once into imprecation solemn and sustained (vss. 3-10; on vss. 4, 6 see Expos. on 10:19-22), then drying away, with a change of mood quite characteristic of the poem, into a kind of wistful tranquillity (vss. 11-19), only to surge again like the tide (vss. 20-26), he pours out his lament. It is the beating of a pulse behind a tired and aching forehead, the writhing of a human soul under incredible torture of mind and body. If only the night had never concurred him, or the day when he first saw the light had never dawned! (Cf. Milton’s “Lycidas,” i 26, “the opening eye-lids of the morn.”) Surely, with all the possibilities, something else could have happened to him—not this. He could have died before he was born. He could have died at birth, or after. Why not? It would have made no difference when. Why was he ever taken up and owned, or fed with milk at his mother’s breast? He might have lain down and been at peace with the great dead—or the not so great. What of it? Where high and low were alike: kings and princes, the wicked and the weary, every one of them at rest now, the prisoner and the slave. Life had no business going on as it was: not when men, multitudes of them, longed for death as frantically as he longed for it, he whose way was hid, not knowing how to go, or which turn to take, or what to do but to cry out and tremble with pain.

1. THE ANATOMY OF DESPAIR.—In 1621 Robert Burton published what was intended to be a medical treatise under the title The Anatomy of Melancholy. There he explored with a great wealth of learning not only the cause and cure
5 Let darkness and the shadow of death stain it; let a cloud dwell upon it; let the blackness of the day terrify it.

6 As for that night, let darkness seize upon it; let it not be joined unto the days of the year; let it not come into the number of the months.

7 Lo, let that night be solitary; let no joyful voice come therein.

8 Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up their mourning.

9 Let the stars of the twilight thereof be dark; let it look for light, but have none; neither let it see the dawning of the day:

10 Because it shut not up the doors of my mother’s womb, nor hid sorrow from mine eyes.

autonomous existence. If only the day of Job’s birth—nay, the night of his conception—had never come to pass, if Leviathan had been stirred up (vs. 8), then chaos would have overcome the created order and Job would not have received life. The pain he now endures would never have excruciated him. Leviathan is a sea monster which in ancient Semitic mythology belonged to the world of chaos that the creator God had to subdue in order to establish a livable earth. In Isa. 27:1 Leviathan is an enemy of God, while in Ps. 104:26 he has become a mere plaything of Yahweh. Job 41:1 ff. and Ps. 74:14 use the term in order to convey the feeling of elemental fear produced by the crocodile. Like tannin (7:12) and Rahab (9:13; 26:12), Leviathan has become a personification of cosmic antagonism to God. To stir and make them is to bring the world back to primeval chaos. The sufferer wished that the earth had come to an end before he had been conceived.

of melancholy, but the nature of it, and its relation to love, to religion, and indeed to all of human life. There is no doubt that its springs lie deep in man’s heart. His literature celebrates it endlessly, at times romanticizes it. To live is to suffer from a disease that only death can cure. It is to set out on an uneasy pilgrimage. It is to be the butt of a cosmic jest, or a cosmic blunder; the unsuspecting victim of a lie, a cheat—bubble, dance, dream, shadow, what word you please. Any good encyclopedia of familiar quotations will provide stanza and verse. From momentary whim to poetic mood to settled tendum and dejection, man’s finitude, coupled with the manifold frustrations of his existence, has left its mark on him—to say nothing of the sin that clouds his sky and blots out his sun.

But there is something other than melancholy here. There are premonitions of despair. The problem is theological to the core. At first no mention is made of God: partly because of a lingering reverence, but partly too because God is becoming a stranger. It is that which little by little will prove the most terrible thing of all. The anchor is beginning to drag in the storm. The lines that have held Job fast to eternity are giving way. And it makes of life an answerless riddle and a curse. It turns light into darkness, wipes out the good, and spreads over the past, the present, and the future the shadow of evil (see Exeg. on vss. 20-26). That shadow will not lift until the old relationship can somehow be restored.

It is certainly worth noting too that to the Hebrew—and so by transfer here to Job—life was essentially good, and death evil (see Exeg. on vss. 11-19; 6:8-13). Only in such a context can there be any despair that is profoundly religious in character. This is by no means the Weltenschmerz of the poet, or the despondency of the suicide; obviously it is anything but the impassive acquiescence of the Stoic or the Buddhist. This is the unrestrained cry of an outraged faith, the torment of a spirit no longer at home in a world where at least some measure of being at home is possible.
11 Why died I not from the womb? why did I not give up the ghost when I came out of the belly?
12 Why did the knees prevent me? or why the breasts that I should suck?
13 For now should I have lain still and been quiet; I should have slept: then had I been at rest, 14 With kings and counselors of the earth, which built desolate places for themselves;
15 Or with princes that had gold, who filled their houses with silver:
16 Or as a hidden untimely birth I had not been; as infants which never saw light.
17 There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest.
18 There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor.
19 The small and great are there; and the servant is free from his master.

11 "Why did I not die at birth, come forth from the womb and expire?
12 Why did the knees receive me? Or why the breasts, that I should suck?
13 For then I should have lain down and been quiet; I should have slept; then I should have been at rest, 14 with kings and counselors of the earth who rebuilt ruins for themselves, 15 or with princes who had gold, who filled their houses with silver.
16 Or why was I not as a hidden untimely birth, as infants that never see the light?
17 There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary are at rest.
18 There the prisoners are at ease together; they hear not the voice of the taskmaster.
19 The small and the great are there, and the slave is free from his master.

2. THE QUERY (3:11-19)

11-19. The aggressiveness of the lamenter soon subsided into an inquiring mood as the curse of the first strophe became an anxious question and awakened Job to pained curiosity: Why did I not from the womb? This inquiry was not immediately pursued, however, for the idea of death began to engage his morbid fancy. While Hebrew thought considered death as evil, Job looked upon it, with some Egyptian and Babylonian pessimists (see Intro., pp. 879-80), as a state of tranquillity and sleep (vs. 18) in which he might have enjoyed rest in the company of the former princes of the earth (vss. 14-15). He contemplated for an instant even the state of nonexistence, such as that of infants dead in utero (vs. 16). There is no reason to maintain (with Duhrn et al.) that this verse is now out of place and should be reinserted after vs. 11. To be sure, a copyist's error is always possible, but it may also be that the poet used here the stylistic device of the afterthought. Job, having apparently completed the first theme (vss. 3-10), started 11. Why Not?—Why died I not from the womb? To Job anything would have been better—if anybody had cared to manage it so. death at birth, death in infancy, best of all, death before birth; but if none of these, then death now! With everything there was to choose from, why should very worst turn out to be very fact? Why not this, or that, or some other thing? Almost everybody whose lot it is to suffer finds himself on the verge of asking that question sooner or later. It keeps repeating itself like a recurring decimal. Sometimes men ask it of the wide and lambent air, as Job asked it. Sometimes they ask it about God, not bold enough to face him straight (cf. 10:18). Always they ask it out of an ignorance that would petulantly offer itself as wisdom. One often wonders if the choice had really been ours what we would have done with it, had we too been troubled with omniscience, as God is. His choices must not be so simply made, or painless for him. To trust that wisdom which is beyond our own, reckoning on the power that in all things works for good with those who answer his love with theirs—what might that not make of life, the life of which so many say they can make nothing at all? The facts are yet facts, even after we have given up wondering about them; and not one of them so trivial or so tragic but that men and women by unnamed thousands have taken its like in their hands and fashioned a splendor of it.

17. There the Wicked Cease FromTroubling. — (Cf. 15:20; Isa. 57:20-21.) Both the oppressor and his victim find in Sheol "scurce of sorrow." The text is frequently misconstrued. The reference is not to the repose of the blessed, delivered at last from the hand of the tormentor. Moral distinctions had not yet been carried over 20 Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life unto the bitter in soul;

20 "Why is light given to him that is in misery, and life to the bitter in soul, to develop the second (vss. 11-15), and in the midst of its unfolding introduced a parenthetical hypothesis which logically belonged to the first (vs. 16) . He then proceeded to bring the second theme to completion (vss. 17-19).

The contemplation of the quietude of the dead suggested another vision, that of their harmlessness (vs. 17) and social equality (vss. 18-19) . This image in turn introduced a third development.

3. The Cry (3:20-26)

20-26. Job's desire for a quick death was not expressed in the subjective mood of modern romanticists. Once again he spoke in bitter question and in the name of any into the life beyond. It was the wicked themselves who in that shadowy place were no longer troubled. So completely was the world we know identified with God's world, and the time we know—we talk sometimes of killing it—caught up into his time, that no other world, no aftertime, seemed able to hold out any promise or carry any threat which the years did not already carry. So full and rich was life, so immediate God's Word, so urgent the necessity for instant obedience, so present and real in each day's experience, and in the movements of history, God's judgment and God's mercy! Strange to think of how much more than with us man's being here mattered—more, not less—and that in spite of the veil which was to be done away in Christ (II Cor. 3:14; see Expos. on 14:1-6).

20. Why?—It is out of Job's wrestling with these ultimate mysteries of providence, without ever allowing them, by some mystery of grace, finally to alienate him from the divine Protagonist, that the flashing insights come (14:14; 16:19; 17:3; 19:25-27), and the resolution of all mystery in the mystery of a presence (42:5). Certain it is that much of man's knowledge both of God and of the world has been mediated to him through just such struggle (see Expos. on 10:1-7, 8-12). Supremely true was it that the religion of Israel was inseparable from the suffering of Israel as a nation (yet see Expos. on 1:1). In a letter one young scholar of the O.T. writes:

It is obvious in the servant passages that the meaning of Israel's loss of selfhood is being explored, with an effort not so much to find a solution as to indicate a redemptive line of reaction and to make God's dealing with the chosen people intelligible at this point. . . . Israel [is] seeking to understand her vocation, and her relation to God: whether the covenant will hold or not. [If the same is true in Job] then the Vindicator passage (19.25-27) can have all sorts of meaning, possibly messianic. The feeling which keeps haunting me is that the book is certainly not a theological discussion of the problem of suffering, or merely a satire on the orthodox doctrine of retribution, or a story for its own sake. But primarily it seems on a par with Isa. 52-53 in its summing up of all that disturbed the exilic and postexilic community in its understanding of God's dealing with them. The cataclysmic element, the stubborn and unimaginative reactions, the search and longing for some revelation from God of his purpose in it all, and the final conclusion (so similar to Isa. 40:12 ff., and indeed all of Second Isaiah), which emphasizes the sovereignty of God—all this makes me feel that Job and Second Isaiah belong together as the two great witnesses to the surviving awareness of community and of Israel as still related to Yahweh, if she will but find out how. It seems to be a kind of glorious rebuke to those who would seek an allegorical interpretation at every point in history ("This bit of destruction means that God is angry with us"); or "We have prospered, now he has forgiven"), with the answer in terms of a vast depiction of the nature of God. And that's all they need to know; it turns their attention toward vocation, rather than to justification of past tribulations.10

But not only does the revelation come through the conflict; it comes in its fullness only when the conflict itself gives place to high commitment (cf. 42:10). Both misery and bitterness of soul have been known to yield light and life; but not for the man who tarry in either of them. The implication in Job's question is that if the purpose of God had not been hidden from him—and that it was, is one of the major points of the prologue—he could have borne his affliction with greater fortitude. It is hard to say. Even if we knew the end God has in mind, most of us would prefer some other means. The "Why?" may not die on a man's lips with the granting of an answer; if it dies anywhere, it will die in his hands.

10 Grace Edwards, formerly Assistant Professor of Philosophy and Religion, Hollins College, Virginia. Used by permission.
21 Which long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more than for hid treasures; man who is in misery (vs. 20), whose way is hid, and whom God [Eloah] hath hedged in (vs. 23). At last the Deity was remembered, but only as the author of evil. Still, even a fleeting reference to an absent and hostile God represented a step forward, away from the depth of the seven days and nights of numbness. With consummate skill and profound knowledge of the human spirit, the poet moves his hero toward theological argument. The champion had not yet attacked the Deity, but he was ready to begin the fight. He had challenged the validity of the gift of life to the bitter in soul (vs. 20). He had questioned the reasons for living against one's longing for death (vs. 21). He had implicitly doubted the purposes of the creator of life by explicitly accusing him of making a strong man (gebher) intellectually blind and impotent (vs. 23). By another skillful transition the poet makes Job turn back to himself to suggest a comparison between his fate and that of a wild and powerful animal hedged in with no chance of escape.

22 Which rejoice exceedingly, and are glad, when they can find the grave?

The energy he managed to muster for his roarings (vs. 24) has now been spent. The opening curse has given way to the shocked amazement of an apprentice philosopher, which in turn subsides into a childish wailing of tortured flesh (vs. 25-26). Then Job lapses again into silence.

According to some commentators, the last verses do not constitute a complaint against physical pain but reveal the mental anguish which seized Job at the anticipation of the friends' rebuke. In favor of this interpretation one may point out (a) the abstract and general character of the fear mentioned in vs. 25, and (b) the use of the word rōghez in vs. 26, which does not mean trouble but "raging," "wrath," "rumbling of thunder," and may admirably apply to the theological frenzy that Job may suspect he has inspired in his learned and pious listeners. Against this it must be said that vs. 24 introduces the digging for hidden treasure, Job represents what to him seems, among the multitudes of mankind, the all too widespread longing for death. Freud and his disciples have made much of the so-called "death wish," life's own deep shudder at life, the desire that being has for not-being; but when every due allowance has been made, it is the unhealthy and jaundiced that see, as a result of their own misery and bitterness of soul, any appreciable number who rejoice exceedingly, and are glad, when they can find the grave. Many a weary traveler lies down with no protest on his lips, and nothing but welcome in his eyes; but the broader one's acquaintance with human sorrows the greater one's awareness of the almost incredible tenacity with which life clings to living. Ecclesiastes set down his dolorous conclusion, "Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead, more than the living which are yet alive. Yea, better . . . than both they [is he] which hath not yet been, who hath not seen the evil work that is done under the sun" (4:2-3). But Ecclesiastes himself must have got a good deal of satisfaction out of writing a book about it. And no doubt he wanted to finish his book before anything untoward happened to him. More than that, however, and nearer the purpose, courage is too often born under circumstances, and cradled in conditions, that would seem to make dying a boon. Robert Louis Stevenson sent back home from his sickbed such valorous bits so light-heartedly that one reviewer, not knowing him, hazarded the opinion that their author had never felt even a twinge of rheumatism (see Expos. on 1:2-3; 11:7; 30:1, 9, 16, 24). To be sure, facile optimism belongs as little to this world as morbid pessimism; but it gets around more, is much better liked, and fool though it is because facile, stands often closer to the facts. If what a man sees is monstrous, hate not love, ugliness not beauty, gloom not gladness, the chances are that he is staring as in a mirror at his own image. It is not just the life around him, it is the life within, that calls for a cleansing, healing touch. In Dickens' Christmas Carol Christmas had not changed; Scrooge had, and more than once! Read Gen. 1 and catch that insistent refrain, "and God saw that it was good." When Satan looked, he saw not that, but 23 Why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in?

24 For my sighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like the waters.

Job was sure that once he had been able to see clearly. In 12:3; 13:2 he boasts of his knowledge of God; in 42.1-6 he calls that knowledge little more than ignorance (see also Expos. on 1:4-5). The way, when it seemed clearest, was hidden; when it seemed utterly hidden, it was growing clear! Once more the memory of all God's goodness in the past will flood his mind (ch. 29). It will seem to him then like "sorrow's crown of sorrow;" untill, rid of too much self, he sees it again in the presence of God, and knows it for a pledge.

23 Whom God Hath Hedged In.—(Cf. 1:10.)
The barrier which God had fashioned to keep the danger out (?) proved to be Job's most vulnerable point (Luke 18.24); the wall which God now seems to have built in order to keep the misery in (?) proves to be the gate "which leadeth unto life" (Matt. 7:14). Is heaven's dealing with us bane or blessing? Are the Ten Commandments safeguard or imprisonment? Are they perhaps both? And who determines which they are (see Expos. on 2:1-6)? Or transforms the one into the other—and how (see Expos. on 1 6-12, paragraph [c])? Read any Thanksgiving Proclamation. The wealth of mine and field and factory—God's good angels, or bad?

It is in this passage for the first time that Job directly attributes his calamity to God. He does not say that it is unjust, not yet; he does say that God has done it, and that it has made 'sixes and sevens out of everything. The shafts he has been hurling at the universe find their mark at last. And there seems less of evasion, there seems more of the strong man's (géber, vs. 23) honesty about it (see Expos. on John 18:11). One can almost see by this time not the surreptitious glances—they no doubt have been in evidence from the beginning—but the horrified gestures of the friends. They will not be able long to hold their peace.

24 The Impatience of Job.—Job's cries of wretchedness are now his food and drink; a fear is no sooner feared than it becomes fact (not as in KJV; cf. 29:18), in very waves of trembling, like the seizures of an epileptic, or the chill that shakes the body in fever (yet see Exeg.). From that as its source is shortly to break a welter of magnificent imagery, poignant yearning, repetitious debate, charge and counter-

1 "Lead, kindly Light."

I do not ask to see
The distant scene—one step enough for me.

What step? "Lead thou me on!" "O Lord, be not far from me" (Ps. 35:22). "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path" (Ps. 119:105). Only the unimaginative and the unadventurous would have it otherwise (see Expos. on 4:7; 5:14).

So, let him wait God's instant men call years;
Meantime hold hard by truth and his great soul,
Do out the duty! Through such souls alone
God stooping shows sufficient of his light.
For us i' the dark to rise by.

* Heb before
25 For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me, and that which I was afraid of is come unto me.
26 I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came.

subject of physical pain, and that almost every discourse of Job in the poetic discussion ends, in traditionally Oriental fashion, with a lament over his bodily ailments.

Job has said nothing of his past; he has forgotten the blessings of his youth and early manhood. He has said nothing of his present; the consciousness of his innocence remains beyond the range of his pain. He has expressed no hope for deliverance: death is his only future, and it tarries.

The soliloquy stands at the beginning of the round of disputations. It is a poem of rarely equaled magnitude, for its style has not aged, its themes find echo in the mind of every man who has been crushed, and the unraveling of its threefold plan, with its curse, query, and cry, is true to the pattern of smitten life.

The Job of the prologue is a hero of legend; the Job of the soliloquy is still alive. One is man as he should be; the other is merely man of our flesh and age.

charge, fond memory, eager anticipation, abysmal despair, blasphemy: waves that come roaring in out of the deep against some mountainous, rock-bound shore, hurling their crests high into the air, then slithering back by half a hundred tortuous ways to gather their fury for another onslaught. There will be heard now the tumult that in the words of Reinhold Niebuhr "begins with a mystery which is felt to be instinct with meaning, and ends with a meaning which is felt to be instinct with mystery."

We may not talk any longer of patience. There is yet no outright defiance, but there is implied rebellion. Is this the man who laid his forehead in the dust, submissive before God, and said, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord"? Is this the man who asked of his wife, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" The answer obviously is "No." It is not the same man: unless indeed, as the poet more than once seems to wish we would assume, his protracted sufferings have almost unhinged his mind. It is Job the titan who will soon begin in his madness to take issue with the Almighty.

It is sometimes said that suffering cleanses the soul and purifies the spirit and ennobles the life. Only bear it with fortitude and patience. Somerset Maugham dipped his pen in venom to say that it crushes the soul and breaks the spirit and degrades the life. Be that as it may, there is surely a kind of hypocrisy that makes a virtue of necessity, and in the midst of anguish puts on the mask of piety and resignation. It is that in his friends against which Job will rail and cry out. It was better almost, were it not, to defy heaven than to assume a counterfeit humility, or achieve patience and quietness of spirit by refusing to wrestle with the ghastly contradictions which life and experience seem to throw up in the face of God's goodness? The Bible itself attaches no such meaning to the word patience. "That we," writes Paul, "through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope" (Rom. 15:4). The very word itself in Greek is a twisting and a turning; a holding on, like Jacob to the angel, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me" (Gen. 32:26). The book of Job is not an object lesson in our kind of patience; it is an object lesson in that kind of patience. A patience too proud to cover its hurt, too honest to make light of it, too brave to deal in platitudes, too truthful to call black white, too decent to whine, and too stanch to quit. It is an object lesson in the kind of patience of which Miguel de Unamuno, the Spanish philosopher, must have been thinking when he wrote, "May God deny you peace, but give you glory!" In that imprecation—or should we say in that prayer?—the epic of Job unfolds itself. God no doubt was still in his heaven, but all was not right with the world. Definitely not right.

4 Cf. John Stuart Mill, An Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy (London: Longmans, Green, Reader & Dyer, 1867), p. 124: "I will call no being good, who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow-creatures, and if such a being can sentence me to hell for not so calling him, to hell I will go."

931
Then Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said,

2 If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? but who can withhold himself from speaking?

B. FIRST CYCLE OF DISCUSSION (4:1–14:22)

1. FIRST DISCOURSE OF ELIPHAZ (4:1–5:27)

There is no reason to believe that the friends came to Job with hostile intentions. They traveled from afar in order to comfort him (2:11). Their initial silence probably was due to respect and compassion as well as bewilderment (2:15). When Job had shown in his lament that he could not accept his fate with fortitude, the friends felt compelled to speak. Friendship is a favorite theme in Oriental and Hebrew wisdom literatures; and the ancient sages liked to say that friends should reprove as well as sympathize (Prov. 27:6, 17; etc.). Eliphaz spoke first, presumably because he was the oldest and most learned of the three. (For the strophic structure see Intro., pp. 894-96.)

a) DOGMA OF DIVINE JUSTICE (4:1-11)
   (1) CONFIDENCE IN INTEGRITY (4:1-6)

4:2. If one ventures a word: Tactful and cautious, Eliphaz does not intend deliberately to start an academic discussion. He knows that even a considerate reproof will

4:1–14:22. The First Cycle.—The argument of the friends in the first cycle of the debate presents one of humanity’s false approaches to the problem of innocent human suffering. In a word, it sets forth Browning’s thesis, though not with Browning’s discernment:

   God’s in his heaven—
   All’s right with the world!

There is nothing wrong with the intent. Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar have it in mind to turn the sufferer from thought of self to thought of God. Beside it our quasi-religious, quasi-psychiatric attempts to deal with anguish of body or anguish of soul seem rather pitiful, almost in themselves a profanity. In all such efforts to rid the self of self, the self is centered upon the self and its ailments; with the result, frequently enough, that even the gospel becomes involved in the failure of a technique. One often wonders what would have happened to Paul, with his thorn in the flesh, if somebody from a pulpit had talked to him about relaxing, about getting free of his inferiority complex, about saying to himself after each meal, and three times on going to bed, “Every day in every way I’m getting better and better.” Can there be any question that if the preacher had made any easy identification of that with the Christian faith the world would have lost its greatest apostle?

But the friends were wrong nevertheless. They were wrong because the point they fastened on was already becoming a sore point with Job. People may restrain themselves from recommending to you patience under affliction; but if they are pious people, they will hardly resist the temptation to refer you to God’s ordering of his universe. It is no soulless place, they will tell you. It is inhabited by a holy God, high and lifted up. Surely you can trust him. And that sounds all right. It is simply inept at times, and peculiarly inept. The man who is suffering does not always feel like that about the universe and the God who inhabits it. Your words may be true, and yet not speak to his condition. It is precisely this that happens (see Expos. on 5:9-16).

4:1–5:27. The Word of the Seer.—Eliphaz begins considerately, and proceeds with notable gentleness and courtesy; notable in view of the provocation which Job’s lament must undoubtedly have occasioned not only to the settled pattern of his faith, but also to the reverend and ancient piety of his spirit. That singularly happy metathesis attributed to W. A. Spooner, once warden of New College, Oxford, “The fearful chudings of the gospel,” might well serve to strike off the tenor and content of Eliphaz’ first speech. What few tears—if any—there are in his voice, however, are not for the sufferer; they are for the unseemliness of that impassioned outburst. Entirely apart from the question of Job’s innocence or guilt, he deprecates the violent reaction which has outraged his sense of the fitness of things, and to his way of thinking has already given more than sufficient indication of a bearing far less than “perfect” and “upright.” Extraordinary as the whole performance is, there is it no healing for a mind distraught. because there is no understanding of what it is in that mind that has gone wrong. Without any realization of what Job has endured. Eliphaz cannot endure what Job has said (see Expos. on 2:11-13; 3:1). "A strange sight this," so we might put the gist of it, "that the comforter of many is now comfortless! You should be finding your strength in the sense of your own integrity. People like you do not finally perish. Remember that. Only the wicked, who make a profession of their wickedness. Let them cry out and complain. Nobody on earth has any right to do such a thing. Nobody on earth or in heaven either. Who is righteous when you come down to it? Who is pure? Is not God's dealing with us then forever just? If I were you, I should turn to him, whose goodness is everlasting, whose retribution never fails. He will deliver you, nothing is so sure; and with tender mercy establish your ways in peace."

6 “Pippa Passes,” Pt. L

There is much that is lofty and impressive about it all, much that from a literary point of view is rarely if ever surpassed anywhere in the book. But there is also a certain uncalculated aloofness about it, which is all too thoroughly calculated to leave Job's misery a cold misery and kindle his anger: a kind of unintentional remoteness, as if the speaker, not consciously, but without meaning to do it—which is worse—conceived of the matter in hand as a fit subject for careful diagnosis and therapeutic counsel. Something is not as it should be when the moment you open your mouth you either apologize for not opening it sooner (see Exeg. on vs. 2), or say, "I've got to talk to you about all this. It won't be pleasant, but I must do it."

And then go on to remind one who is in the depths of despair that of old he himself was the source of strength to others; why in the world is he unable to bear up under misfortune when it comes near him? Eliphaz does not yet doubt Job's essential piety; but he is secretly convinced that some undisclosed fault must lie behind such suffering, particularly because of the mood in which the sufferer has responded to it. He regards the situation in the abstract, impersonally, in accordance with his own systematized theological presuppositions; and that ruins everything. He speaks of Job's integrity as if that should be a solace; and to Job it is the very core of the problem. He tries to persuade Job that when all is said and done, everybody has sinned and "come short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). Why should anyone then be offended at the suggestion that some kind of sin is inseparably bound up with calamity?

And to Job, while there was nothing the matter with that as theory, there was a great deal the matter with it as fact. No doubt every man who shared man's common lot could say, "He hath not dealt with us after our sins; nor rewarded us according to our iniquities" (Ps. 103:10). But if a saint had said it while he was being hurried to the lions—if Jesus had said it on the cross—it might have carried another meaning, sardonic and ghastly. Whereupon Eliphaz went on to recommend a different course. In view of God's greatness and power (5:9-11), the impatience and resentment of the ungodly (5:2) can be nothing but the precursor of doom; in view of God's beneficence (5:17-27), "If I were in your shoes" (16:4-5)—may heaven deliver us from all such!—"I should turn to God for my refuge." And to Job God's power will seem terrible, because God's beneficence seems a thing of the past. Curiously enough, very much as Satan's plans miscarried (see Expos. on 2:7-10), so does Eliphaz' comfort. It becomes an irritant. Instead of a soothing poultice, it turns out to be a mustard plaster. It is a comment from the side lines, with a bit of good advice thrown in.

The kind of thing Carlyle once said Emerson did quite too often: like someone safely up on the beach throwing a cheery word or two to poor souls wrestling in the great dark deeps, with the huge billows knocking the breath out of them. What Job needs is the compassion of a human heart. What he gets is a series of absolutely "true" and absolutely beautiful religious clichés and moral platitudes.

It should perhaps be remarked as the debate begins that no great progress is made anywhere in the argument. For the most part it swings around in circles, with some shift of center from heaven to earth to Job himself. And when Job answers, what he says seems often to have little relevance to what has gone immediately before: much more at times to what was said before that. He is a man dazed, trying to find his bearings; while little by little it dawns on him that these friends are not friends at all, never mind their sincerity: they are adversaries, treating softly at first, then as he persists in refusing to admit his guilt of any great transgression, growing more and more outspoken. And somehow he is unable to take it all in at once. The horror of it keeps piling up. While one is speaking, something another has said suddenly stabs his mind awake. Nothing could be more faithful, line upon line, 3 Behold, thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands.
4 Thy words have uphelden him that was falling, and thou hast strengthened the feeble knees.
5 But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest: it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled.

3:17, and the heart to keep them from being like the words of Eliphaz, Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null,

Dead perfection, no more.*

17) , and the heart to keep them from being like

Blake (Illustration V) has Job doling out his charity with the left (material) hand, symbol of the fact that true sympathy is absent. Such a suggestion seems quite gratuitous, though no doubt there will be a new dimension in everything he says and does when the story of his own suffering is over. Meanwhile we are not permitted to cavil about the warmth of his spirit. “Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? was not my soul grieved for the poor?” (30:23.) And with the words that he spoke went deeds to match them. “I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame” (29:15). “If I have withheld the poor from their desire, . . . or have eaten my morsel . . . alone . . . ; then let mine arm fall from my shoulder blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone. . . . The stranger did not lodge in the street: but I opened my doors to the traveler.” (31:16, 17, 22, 32.) Human life needs nothing so sorely, nor is any service a man can render so well within every man’s daily reach. It is a very sign of the cross, and a seal of all true greatness (Matt. 20.26-28).

5. When Trouble Draws Near.—Something of tact has gone out of Eliphaz’ speech. He intends to be kind. What he says is not said with a grin or a roused eyebrow, “Why on earth can’t you take your own medicine?” He seems genuinely troubled by this physician who cannot heal himself, who at the first touch (!) of misfortune goes to pieces. But the observation, even if altogether accurate, cannot be regarded as particularly soothing. It may be that this reproof is at times in order (see Exeg.:) but “the manner of giving is worth more than the gift.” To reprove does not often mean “to rub in.”

7 Shakespeare, Othello, Act I, scene 3.
6 Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways?
7 Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off?

6. Is not . . . thy fear [of God] thy confidence? The word fear used without object refers to faith and piety (cf. 15:4; 22:4). “Let your religion reassure you” (Moffatt). The friend does not doubt at this stage the integrity (tôm) of Job. On the contrary, he finds in it a ground for hope (tqwâh, “tense but hopeful expectation”).

(2) The Harvest of Trouble (4:7-11)

7. To be sure, the origin of affliction is sometimes an enigma, but the fact remains, who ever perished, being innocent? Eliphaz appeals to Job’s knowledge and experience, which is in the heart of God, who “knoweth our frame,” and “remembereth that we are dust” (Ps. 103:14), he might himself, as a steward of the mysteries, have entered in and strengthened failing hands and made firm the feeble knees (see Expos. on vs. 7).

6. Religion that Reassures.—In the O.T. “the fear of the Lorp” is that dread which steals into the human soul—Eliphaz describes it in vss. 12:16—with the realization of God’s awful holiness, and is the mainspring of “faith and piety” (Exeg.). It is a fear that troubles man’s conscience and humbles his pride; for before God no mortal can stand, nor any angel. It is a fear that commands his allegiance and brings the whole of his life into the unity of a willing and reverent obedience. It is not the fear that love casts out (1 John 4:18). Rather is it the fear that casts out all other fears (Matt. 10:28), and by the coming of Christ, in his life, his death, his resurrection, is “made perfect in love.”

What is there about that to reassure a life which like Job’s has fallen away into the dark night of despair? It is the majesty and “otherness” of God that terrify him. It is the purity and holiness of God that his own experience seems to call into question. The integrity of his ways is precisely what he has relied on; and it has offered no stay to calamity. Why all at once should it become the “ground for tense but hopeful expectation” (Exeg.)? The prime purpose of the poem is to portray the shifting of that “ground” from man to God. “Hope in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God” (Ps. 43:5). Not man’s faith, but God’s faithfulness. Not man’s piety, but God’s love. Who did anything about mediating that to Job? (Cf. II Sam. 9:1, 3.)

7. Mistaking the Case.—Not only does Eliphaz consistently fail to understand what the trouble
8 Even as I have seen, they that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same.

8 As I have seen, those who plow iniquity and sow trouble reap the same.

Remember, I pray thee. Surely Job still accepts the traditional doctrine of a material, individual, and this-worldly retribution. This is the reason why Eliphaz is shocked by Job’s half-blasphemous lament. Since the upright are never cut off prematurely, Job should not yield to despair. If such is the undertone of this verse, then Eliphaz, while well intentioned, misunderstood Job, who is not afraid of dying but rather longs for death.

8. The progression of thought is smooth. Vs. 7 suggests that the sufferer is innocent, but vs. 8 shows a decided change of tone. Those who . . . sow trouble reap the same.

was (see Exeg.) ; he gives the distinct impression, as McKechnie aptly points out, of not understanding that there is anything to understand. He has lived a long time, and he has pondered much; he has read many opinions, and sought diligently: and he knows the answers (5:27). He does not know Job. Instead of interesting him, Job horrifies him. He judges “human nature without taking human nature into account.” He reasons in a vacuum. The answers he has arrived at are no longer theory: “theories preserve an attitude of questioning humility to the facts of life.” They are dogma, and dogma that has lost contact with reality. “Something of chaos seems to cling round . . . reality.” Eliphaz’ answers were tidy, and so not true answers. They were “flouted by the mystery [they] professed to explain.” And they were answers to the wrong questions (see Expos. on vs. 5).

It was not death that Job feared, it was life. To be cut off at a stroke did not seem to him any more, as it still seemed to the friends, a signal judgment: it would have seemed a signal mercy. It was not so much the pain gnawing at his body that troubled him; it was the perplexity eating its way into his mind: not the calamity, but the fact that in a world of God he could make no sense of it. Eliphaz could, without turning his hand. So could the others. Job’s premise was wrong: it was as simple as that. Why try to explain a fact when you could rub the fact out, and so have nothing to explain? Who ever perished, being innocent? “Who ever, being innocent as I am innocent, and suffering as I suffer, would not long to perish?” Where were the upright cut off? “Why not, in God’s name, when they are wretched?” Every arrow is beside the mark (see Expos. on vs. 6). Every word is salt in a wound. It is the ceaseless dilemma of multitudes of pious and well-meaning people. Little wonder that most of the effective counsel given by friend or loved one, by pastor or psychiatrist, is neither admonition nor exhortation. The best word for it is contagion.

The issue for “a man whose way is hid” (3:23) cannot be provided by the recovery of 1 Job, Moral Hero, pp. 38, 46, 47.

lost ideas or the acceptance of rejected standards: it appears in some place of meeting, where heart lies bare to heart, heart of man to heart of man, or heart of man to heart of God. There and there alone can the sufferer talk out his grief; there and only there can it be resolved—proximately and partially in that dimension of love which is temporal and human; wholly and ultimately in that other dimension of love which is divine and eternal.

8-11. The Evolution of the Self-Righteous.—(Cl. 5:3-4, 6-8.) “I have observed,” says Eliphaz. He has already made one observation that utterly missed the point, attempting to buttress it with an appeal to Job’s better judgment—not better than his, but better than that expressed in ch. 3. “Remember, I pray thee” (vs. 7). The upshot of it was that when calamity overtakes the righteous, there is nothing final about it. Now he opines, on what is to him the unimpeachable authority of his own long acquaintance with life, devoting four verses of choice rhetoric to it, that when calamity overtakes those who are habitually and deliberately wicked they are completely and devastatingly done for. The Exeg. conceives him as musing darkly on the problem of suffering in its relation to innocence and guilt—though it must be added that the guilt takes up more of his time. The implications, one may be quite sure, were not lost on Job. And it is all done with such scrupulous objectivity, such superior (see Expos. on 4:1-5:27) and almost studied remoteness, as to suggest the kind of complacency, secure and undisturbed, which is always the first step in the evolution of the self-righteous. Only God knows how troubled such complacency ought to be, and how insecure it is (42:7-8). Certainly his own “fear of God” is Eliphaz’ “confidence”; the “integrity” of his ways is the hope of his soul. From that point on, through growing suspicion to final and outright accusation (22:5; cf. Expos. on 6:28-30), the movement is slow but steady. So did the Pharisees begin, continue, and end (Luke 18:9; 11:15-16; John 8:48). Over against it, in the N.T. Jesus set the parable of the Pharisee and the publican (Luke 18:9-14), and Does Eliphaz mean to comfort Job by contrasting him with those who plow iniquity, or on the contrary does he suggest that in all cases, including Job’s, misfortune is the harvest of evil sowing? The word trouble, ’āmāl, has already been used by Job in 3:10, but Eliphaz is not necessarily alluding to that verse, for the word trouble and its parallel iniquity are familiar expressions of his (cf. 5:6; 15:35). In all probability he does not know at this stage whether Job is innocent or guilty, and he merely muses darkly on both possibilities. However, the poet skillfully anticipates the general pessimism of the next strophe (vs. 17). While the fate of the innocent is considered only in a brief rhetorical question (vs. 7), that of the wicked is described at some length (vss. 8-11).

his inimitable story of the good Samaritan (Luke 10 25-37): the one to humble a man toward God, the other to gird him toward his neighbor.

8. They that Plow Iniquity.—These are the people “whose sinning is, so to speak, a business which they practice as the farmer ploughs and sows his field, and whose harvest is unfailling.” 2 The doctrine of divine retribution, as Eliphaz propounds it, is in itself a sound doctrine. It means that we live in an orderly and righteous universe (Matt. 7 2), where men do not gather “grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles” (Matt. 7:16); not because of some “natural law” that grinds out results as a printing press grinds out newspapers, but by reason of that law which is the will of God. There is in very truth an “even-handed justice,” not only in heaven but on earth, that Commends the ingredients of our poison’d chalice

To our own lips. 3

But it is a justice which calls for greater discrimination in the reading of it than any of the friends could show. (a) They were right on two counts. First in their insistence that

God’s good time
. . . does not always fall on Saturday
When the world looks for wages. 4

Life does not seem very promptly partial to the righteous. Quite the contrary (Matt. 10:16-39). Else what value in their righteousness? Nor does it seem very promptly prejudiced against the wicked (Matt. 5:45). So much the friends knew (yet see Expos. on 20:2b); though about “the iniquities of the fathers” which are visited upon the children, which they put forward again and again (5:4; 8:13-19; 20:10) as their protest against a too simple and individual and immediate view of divine retribution, Job himself has something to say by way of protest (21:19). They were right, second, in their insistence on the fact that God’s justice in being retributive is at the same time intended as redemptive (8:21; 11:14-19; passim; cf. Heb. 3:2). (b) But they were wrong on two counts. They were wrong not only in arguing from a doctrine to a particular case, always a disastrous procedure, but also in their inclination to read history as if it could be neatly interpreted in the light of their doctrine—as Job shows, to his own satisfaction at least, in ch. 21. All the “wise” men who tag events—as people did the Lisbon earthquake, and labeled the tag “the righteous judgment of God,” bringing down on themselves the still more righteous if vitriolic wrath of Voltaire; or as others wrote down their liberation from German prison camps to “the lovingkindness of the Most High”—all such “wise” men would be wiser if they understood that life is somewhat more complicated than they think. Hamlet says bluntly, “There is nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so.” 5 To the Hebrew, as we have seen, the angels themselves, God’s messengers, were good or bad in accordance with the human response made to their message (see Expos. on 1:6-12, p. 91l; 5:23). Every Sunday devout Christians praise God for his bounty. Can bounty itself be judgment, and ruin mercy?

They that plow iniquity [in 5:6 the word is translated “affliction”] reap the same. In what divers ways Eliphaz never dreamed! He would hardly have included himself among the plowers of iniquity and the sowers of trouble; yet already he was standing in the face of God’s wrath (42:7-8). Writes Seneca: “The greatest chastisement that a man may receive who hath outraged another, is to have done the outrage; and there is no man who is so rudely punished as he that is subject to the whip of his own repentance.” 6 But how many are?

Though the mills of God grind slowly,
Yet they grind exceeding small.

That may be. Still, “how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!” (Rom. 11:33.) The apostle was much more careful in his stating of the law of the harvest (Gal. 6:7-8).

8 Davidson and Lanchester, Job, p. 85.
8 Shakespeare, Macbeth, Act I, scene 7.
4 Browning, “Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau.”
Footnotes:

* Act II, scene 2.
* Longfellow, “Poetic Aphorisms: Retribution.” From the Sinngedichte of Friedrich von Logau.
9. Premature death is the result of God's wrath, an idea expressed almost in the same words in Ps. 90:7.

10-11. There is no reason to dismiss these verses as revealing the hand of an inferior poet. It is possible that the roaring of the lion (vs. 10a) is a subtle reference to Job's "my roarings" (5:24b): if Job roars like a lion, let him remember that this animal symbolizes the evildoer (cf. Pss. 17:12; 34:10, etc.), and worse still, that the whelps of the lioness are scattered (vs. 11b). Is this a veiled allusion to the fate of Job's children? Perhaps not an insinuation consciously made. But the poet is possibly anticipating here the pointed remark of 5:4, and especially Bildad's crushing meanness (8:4).

b) The Mystery of Suffering (4:12-21)

(1) Vision in the Night (4:12-16)

This famous description of dread in the dark constitutes a wise man's literary attempt to indicate the suprahuman origin of his knowledge. The style and the ideas are quite different from those of the prophets' accounts of their own visions.

9-11. The Breath of God.—In two dramatic figures Eliphaz dashes off the fate of the wicked. "The breath of God"—as a wind, favoring or ill, blows upon a ship—came upon Saul and worked a mighty deliverance (1 Sam. 11:6); it departed from him, giving way to an "evil spirit from the Lord" that troubled him (1 Sam. 16:14). It clothed itself with Gideon and went out to deliver Israel (Judg. 6:34); it stirred up strife "between Abimelech and the men of Shechem" (Judg. 9:23), that God might render to all of them their due. It blows, and there are those who travel with it. It keeps blowing, and men try to battle their way against it. Here it is the burning, devastating sirocco, sweeping up from the arid deserts of the south, leaving behind it a scorched earth. In the second figure the "dens of iniquity" are laid waste. As has been frequently pointed out, there are five different words for lion in these verses; four hundred such words in Arabic, and no doubt ample opportunity to use all of them. Could we chart the contours of our culture by means of the words for which we have the greatest number of synonyms? One finds, for instance, far more synonyms for the ability to give pain than for the ability to give pleasure. The list for "possessions" and its kindred runs to whole pages. That under "disapprove" is twice as long as that under "approve." "Flattery" and "detraction" are of about equal length. Upon the fierce lion as he roars over his prey, upon the young lions and the strong lion, upon the lioness and her whelps the stroke falls (cf. 5:3-5). Nature in all her aspects, terrible and benign, was the agent of God's awful sovereignty. As for man and his destiny, what mattered was the way his face was set. "All things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8:28). But the workers of iniquity, he "shall cut them off in their own wickedness." (See Ps. 94:23, where Job's problem is the nation's problem.)

12-21. Why Do the Righteous Suffer?—Eliphaz knows. The riddle that puzzles Job is no riddle at all. "There is none righteous, no, not one" (Rom. 3:10). It is knowledge that has come to him by revelation. In the time when men sleep, when the hustle and bustle of life are stilled, he has fallen into a trance and sees clearly with the inward eye what is beyond the realm of sight. While he is meditating on it all, troubled and mystified, a dread experience is vouchsafed him.
13 In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, 14 Fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake.
15 Then a spirit passed before my face; the hair of my flesh stood up:
16 It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof: an image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a voice, saying,
17 Shall mortal man be more just than God? shall a man be more pure than his Maker?

15. Not a spirit but “a wind.” The word רוח, normally used in the feminine, may be translated either way, but when used in the masculine, as here, it always refers to a breath of air (cf. 41:16; Exod. 10:13, Eccl. 1:6; 3:19). Moreover, in the O.T., a רוח is never a ghost or a disembodied spirit. Samuel’s shade is called אלהים, “a god” (I Sam. 28:13).

16. Someone stood (the subject is unexpressed), whose appearance was unrecognizable, although Eliphaz could see a תנן, a form, or “a figure.” There was silence, and then he heard a voice (cf. the “voice of silence” in I Kings 19:12; the poet of Job may have been acquainted with the story of Elijah’s theophany on Mount Horeb).

(2) The Human Situation (4:17-21)

17. The M.T. could be rendered “more just than God,” but the truth revealed to Eliphaz would then be trivial and obvious. The preposition מ, usually translated “than” or more than, sometimes means “in comparison with,” “on the part of,” “from the point of view of,” or “before,” especially when it is constructed with the verb תָדִיחֵג,"it. If Eliphaz is saying anything by appropriating the celestial announcement as his own, he is saying (a) that whatever happens to men in general, we may be sure they deserve it; while to make the point doubly impressive, he is willing to assume (b) such an exalted view of God as to dwarf humanity’s stature to the level of insignificance (see Expos. on 9:2-10). What are people anyhow, by and large, but denizens of a day, their houses clods of earth, their foundation...in the dust, the span of their life from dawn to dark, crushed as easily as one would crush a moth—and who cares? All their boasted mastery, which so often makes rebels of them (see Exeg.), gone like a flame that has lighted fools.

The way to dusty death*

Of course such an “explanation” of suffering renders explanation unnecessary by abolishing not only the ground but the importance of the question. And Job resents it. You cannot undercut the whole thing from the bottom up: the

* Shakespeare, Macbeth, Act V, scene 5.
18 Behold, he put no trust in his servants; and his angels he charged with folly:
19 How much less in them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth?

18 Even in his servants he puts no trust, and his angels he charges with error; 19 how much more those who dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, who are crushed before the moth.

"to be just" (cf. 32:2; Gen. 38:26; Num. 32:22; Jer. 51:5; see also Ps. 139:12 [Hebrew]). The verse may then be rendered:

Can a mortal be just before God?
Can even a strong man be pure before his maker?

The ancient versions support this interpretation: ἐναρίου τοῦ κυρίου (LXX), Dei comparatione (Vulg.). Of course Job has not compared himself with God, but he has spoken as if he had forgotten the distinction which separates "mortal man" (ἐνοσί) from the transcendent Godhead (ἐλεόν), or even a "strong man" (גְּבֵה) from his creator. The verb קדחה, which sometimes in the poem means "to be in the right," "to have a just cause" (9:15, 20; 18:13; 33:12; 34:5; cf. Gen. 38:26), whence "to be justified in one's plea" (Job 11:2; 40:8), should be rendered, "to be righteous in life and character," in the light of its parallel תָּהֶר, "to be clean and pure" (usually referring to ritual purity, but sometimes to ethical cleanness, as in Prov. 20:9). According to human standards, Job may be considered blameless, but in comparison with God's holiness, or from the standpoint of divine glory, no mortal can make the claim of innocence. This is an idea of theological sinfulness which transcends ethics.

18-20. Even angels are charged with toholah, folly (a hapax legomenon): a sortiori, men whose foundation is in the dust (cf. Gen. 2:7; 3:19). The poet does not intend in vs. 18 to discredit the angels; he merely wishes to exalt the perfection of God. Thus the rising sun outshines the brightness of planets and constellations. The frailty of men's nature explains their mortality, which is described in a threefold way: they are crushed [like] a moth (vs. 19c; "like" rather than before: cf. 3:24; I Sam. 1:16; also LXX and righteous do suffer (6:5, 28-30). And you cannot just snub it all from the top down. God cares, if nobody else does (cf. vs. 20b with 6:4; 7:12, 17, 20). At least he cares enough to take a man for his target (see Exeg. on vs. 18-20; Expos. on 1:1). It would not be likely meanwhile to escape Job's attention that Eliphaz was sufficiently impressed with the sense of his own significance the while he was denying to others a like dignity. He had the air of one who was condescending to illumine the unillumined. Mankind was sinful. It was an unfortunate fact, but he had it straight out of heaven. He was not himself very noticeably involved in it, but there it was. If this indeed is what the author intended to convey, then Eliphaz was not the first, and he will not be the last, of whom it might be said, as Phaedrus said, among others:

The mountain groaned in pangs of birth:
Great expectation filled the earth;
And lo! a mouse was born! *

"Nothing so resembles a swelling as a hollow."
Fables IV. 22. 1.

19-21. The Poverty of Man's Estate. — (a) His body is clay, its foundation no more than dust. (b) His life is frail, like the moth's. Death comes to him all too easily (vs. 19c). It comes to him all too soon (vs. 20a). He may be here today, but tomorrow he is gone. It comes to him all too inconspicuously (vs. 20b), causing no great stir anywhere on earth, perhaps not even in heaven. (c) His excellence, everything that marks him off from the brute creation, is snatched from him, and he dies, far from that wisdom which is his goal. It is a somber view of human existence; but it suits Eliphaz' book to be somber. That is it in reality Eliphaz' view—a "slant," not a divinely bestowed insight; the two are often confused—is made manifest enough by its very onesidedness (see Exeg. on vs. 18-20). The Bible knows man quite differently. It knows him, even on what we would call his physical aspect, as a paradox of dust and divinity; on what we would call his moral aspect—though there is no such artificial cleavage in the earlier writings of the O.T.—it knows him as potentially both angel and devil. So Pascal. To lose sight of the devil is to leave the divine 20 They are destroyed from morning to evening; they perish for ever without any regarding it.

21 Doth not their excellency which is in them go away? they die, even without wisdom.

Vulg.; they last less than a day (vs. 20a); and when they perish for ever, no one pays attention or cares (vs. 20b). The expression without any regarding it, if it is correctly rendered by these words, reveals the gulf which separates the God of Eliphaz from that of the Hebrews in general and of Job in particular (cf. 22:3). It illustrates the process by which a truth (such as divine transcendence or human finiteness) is twisted into an error by the complete one-sidedness with which it is viewed and formulated. A God who does not care for a dying man is a majestic but un-Hebraic figure. Some critics believe, however, that instead of the M.T. המֶלַכְיָא שָׁלֹשׁ, the LXX has read שָׁלֹשׁ מְלַכֵי, “without any one delivering,” or “for want of a savior” (Merr, Graetz, Ginsburg, Dhorme, et al.). Other scholars conjecture the reading reading this way: שֵׁלֶשׁ מְלַכָּא, “without any one restoring [to life]” (Ehrlich, Kissane, et al.), an expression which suggests an answer familiar to the poet (cf. 7:10: 10:21; 14:10-12). The Vulg. reads et quia nullus intelligit, and this is possibly close enough to the meaning of the original: nobody among mortal men pays attention to his own impending death (Ewald) or takes much notice of another’s. “One knows well from experience that men deceive themselves and run to ruin when they imagine . . . that they will always remain on this earth” (Calvin).

21. Excellency: There are in the Hebrew Bible two different words יְהֵתְךָ which are written exactly alike. One means “lute-string” or “bow-string,” the other “what remains,” “advantage,” “abundance,” “wealth,” “excellence,” “pre-eminence.” Most modern scholars read tent-cord, although this meaning is not attested elsewhere in biblical Hebrew. Others correct it to תָּנַטֶּר הַרְכָּבָה (Olshausen, Hitzig, Siegfried, et al.) and read “their tent-peg,” a word which fits the verb “is pulled out” (cf. Isa. 33:20). However, the doctrine which is in line with ancient tradition. God has always new truths to reveal. He will not contradict himself in the revelation. That revelation is self-consistent when properly understood. For this reason “the rule of faith” has its uses. But its purpose is to illumine, not to obscure by shutting out the new light which is forever shining from God’s Word, whereby he supplements and corrects man’s fragmentary knowledge. Eliphaz’ God was majestic (vs. 9-10) but remote, dealing justly (vs. 12-16), infinitely pure (vs. 17-18), showing mercy (vs. 17-26), but never for a moment involved in his world. Man’s “righteousness” was no gain to him (cf. also Eliph., 33:5-8), and man’s sin no hurt. In that much at least he would have agreed with Job (7:20a). There are traces all through the poem of this remoteness, a reflection no doubt of what was happening just then to Israel’s faith (see Expos. on 18:2-4). But the poet himself would not have it so. Neither would Job. He had his moods of alienation: but never was it an alienation in space, so to speak; it was an alienation of the heart from one with whom he had 5 Call now, if there be any that will answer thee; and to which of the saints wilt thou turn?

5 "Call now; is there any one who will answer you? To which of the holy ones will you turn?

if this textual correction is accepted, the image of the tent is abruptly superimposed upon that of the house of clay (vs. 19a) without adding any significant idea to a pericope already overloaded with a threefold description of death (vss. 19c, 20ab). Moreover, there is no support for this correction in the ancient versions. The LXX read an entirely different text (perhaps borrowed from Isa. 40:24b), but a variant of the LXX (Complutensian, Cod. 248; see Paul Dhome, Le livre de Job [Paris: J. Gabalda, 1926; "Etudes bibliques"], ad loc.) agrees with the Vulg., Syria, and perhaps Targ., in reading the other word yéther, which means "excellence," "abundance" (cf. Gen. 49:3; Prov. 17:7; Ps. 17:14). Eliphaz uses this word in a similar context (22:20). The poetic parallelism suggests that the word wisdom in vs. 21b calls for an abstract term in vs. 21a. If yéther is translated "pre-eminence," the strophe is climaxed in a powerful and original way.

"Is not their pre-eminence pulled away from them?" The preposition ἀπό, used in Job after a verb expressing separation, means "from" (cf. 20:20). After the verb ἀπέθανεν, "to die," the preposition ἀπό indicates the cause of death (i.e., "to die of thirst" [Judg. 15:18], "to die by the sword" or "to die by famine" [Jer. 11:22]). The verse may thus be translated,

Is not their pre-eminence departed from them?
They die, and not of wisdom.

A sense of excellence does not enable men to perceive or to reach the goal of human existence, but merely gives them the vanity of self-satisfaction; the awareness of their "pre-eminence" (over nature and the animals) tends to make them self-sufficient, if not rebellious against the warnings of God. Their claim to perfection, perhaps tinged by arrogance, is taken away from them, and thus they die, but certainly not from super-abundance of wisdom!

c) Fruit of Obstination (5:1-7)

Eliphaz now applies his general understanding of the human situation to the case at hand. The sequence of his thought is tightly interwoven throughout the poetic development. He has noticed that Job had never surrendered, in the presence of the friends, in a prayer of commitment. A pious man would have bowed in trust in God (4:2-6). He may be, underneath his surface of integrity, one of the plowers of iniquity (4:7-11). In the end all men, and even angels, are impure before the Most High (1.12:16, 17:21). If Job refuses to commit himself to God (vss. 1-5) does it mean that he intends to use the intercession of mediators? That in itself would constitute an act of lese majesty.

5:1. According to a method of development which is familiar to the poet, Eliphaz, who has just mentioned the angels (4:18), is suddenly wondering whether Job's failure to been on terms of intimacy (29:4b). From it hate might spring—or valiant love; mere orthodoxy, correct dogma and no more, could not. The God of Eliphaz was in Eliphaz’ image. The God of Job will “in the fullness of time” reveal himself as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Again the balance is to be preserved (as in Expos. on vss. 12-21; 9:2-10): between man’s need for a God nearer than hands and feet, and man’s need for a transcendent and mighty God, ruler of heaven and earth. “God was from the beginning transcendent in that He was different from man, but He was by no means transcendent in that He was remote from man.”

5:1-5. Which of the Holy Ones?—(Cf. Ps. 73, especially vs. 25.) In Scripture, mediation between God and man takes place as the result of God’s initiative toward man—as through Moses, the prophets, and Christ—and then as the result of man’s response Godward—as through the priesthood. The sense of separation always lurks in the background, whether it is the separation due to the divine transcendence (difference, not pray to God does not indicate a recourse to intermediaries like the heavenly beings. He ironically asks then, Which of the holy ones would be a representative of man and would approach God on man's behalf? The holy ones are probably angels, as in 15.15 (cf. Zech. 14:5; Dan 8:13). At this early stage the poet may purposely have placed in the mouth of the friend a suggestion which will haunt the tormented mind of Job and which will gain concreteness as the dialogue progresses.

Call now; is there any one (besides God) who can answer thee?
And (anyway) to which of the holy ones wouldst thou turn?

The idea of intercessory angels may well constitute the first sign of a trend of thought which will lead to the vision of the "mediator" (9:33), the "heavenly witness" (16:19), and the "Redeemer" (19.25).

2. Surely vexation kills the fool: The transition appears to be abrupt, and several commentators have consequently thought that the original text has suffered some disorder. It is possible that vs. 1 was originally placed between vs. 7 and vs. 8, which would leave vs. 2 following easily 4:21 (in addition, 4:21a is placed by the same critics between 5:5b and 5:5c). If the present M.T. is accepted as original, however, one may surmise quite naturally that the poet is weaving an elliptic pattern of reasoning. If Job really did think of begging for the intercession of the angels (vs. 1), this shows how deeply mistaken he was about God's intention toward him. Surely a man who judges God is a fool, and his theological resentment a crime whose fatal issue is certain. In Moffatt's free translation, "'Tis death for a fool to flame out against God." Indeed, men do not die from a surplus of wisdom (an echo of 4:21).

3-5. To be sure, the fool may sometimes appear to take root, but suddenly his dwelling is "consumed" (LXX), and his sons will suffer after him in solidarity with his guilt. The text of vs. 5bc seems to be corrupt beyond the possibility of interpretation.

To enforce his warning in vs. 1 and the maxim he draws from it in vs. 2 Eliphaz sketches in the fate of the fool. No matter how much he seems to prosper for the moment, the curse is fast (suddenly) on his heels, for every man to see it and call it by its name. His house is brought low, his children oppressed, his fields overrun, his fences broken through (vs. 5b?); his wealth no more than bait for the covetous (vs. 5c?), to make some stranger's mouth water. Eliphaz had seen it with his own eyes (vs. 5) and understood it thoroughly. For such ignorance, not only of Job but of God—it is his ignorance parading as knowledge, not Job's ignorance parading as violence, that comes 6 Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground;
7 Yet man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward.
8 I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause:

6 For affliction does not come from the dust, nor does trouble sprout from the ground;
7 but man is born to trouble
    as the sparks fly upward.
8 "As for me, I would seek God, and to God would I commit my cause;

6-7. With vs. 6, Eliphaz apparently continues to make objective statements. In fact, it is hard to escape the impression that he formulates opinions concerning life without thinking of the situation which confronts Job. He does not admit that physical evil is independent of man's behavior. Everyone knows that affliction does not sprout from the ground ("ādhamāh"): "it is man ["ādham"] who begets sorrow" as surely as the sparks fly upward. The verb רָדַי is pointed יְרִיל by the Masoretic, and therefore should be translated is born. However, the presence of a mater lectionis suggests (in spite of Judg. 18:29) a form other than Pual. The LXX reading (γενώσατε) and the sequence of thought from vs. 6 to vs. 7 make the pointing יְרִיל in the Hiphil most probable: "Man brings trouble on himself" (Moffatt). Some commentators follow the ancient versions in understanding the expression "sons of the flame" to mean "vultures" or "eagles" rather than sparks. With such a rendering the idea of man's responsibility for his suffering is further stressed: it is by his own will and power that man brings an evil fate upon himself, just as mighty birds fly high by sheer exertion of their muscles.

d) The Duty of Man on Earth (5:8-27)
   (1) The Appeal (5:8-17)

Vs. 8 may constitute another veiled allusion to Job's readiness to address a power other than the Godhead. One may even ask whether his original lament (ch. 3) did not sharply into focus—he will himself need a mediator (42:8). So completely does the real differ from the actual.

—This verse appeared as a banner headline in the Paris press the day Hitler marched in. It is one of the profound truths to which Eliphaz not infrequently gives utterance. Unfortunately, as is always the case with him, he sets it in a context that distorts his wisdom into folly (see Expos. on 2:11-13). He is the classical embodiment of all the men since the beginning of time who have said the right thing in the wrong place.

He means that affliction never just happens (cf. 4:8). Man by his sinfulness brings trouble on himself. And it all goes on as naturally and inevitably as the sparks fly upward. Which of course is quite true. One must remember, however, that there is no suggestion of any automatism in the process. It is God himself who is active in judgment. The wages of sin are not doled out by the nature of things. Nor altogether on the basis of an individualist ethic (4:17). There may even be here some intimation that suffering is so bound up with the divine order that neither the "wicked" nor the "righteous" can hope to be immune.\(^8\) In any case, it belongs to humanity's primeval lot (Gen. 3:16-19; see Expos. on 86.8-25), and in Job is represented by the friends as largely punitive, with certain probationary, disciplinary, and redemptive overtones, though like death, it had its entrance not by way of God's original purpose, being itself foreign to his nature, but by way of sin, which is man's warping and twisting of that purpose.

Certain it is that no view, whether secular or religious, of the role that suffering plays in human life makes any sense at all unless due account is taken of the relationship it obviously bears to what the Bible calls sin. Every Utopia man have imagined without the one has had to omit the other from the res gestae. The problem lies not in the fact but in the distribution. It is with this that the psalmists wrestle. Most of their conclusions will appear in Job as matter for rebuttal (cf. Ps. 37:39; 49: etc.).

8 If I Were You.—But that is precisely what is not and can never be (see Expos. on 2:11-18).

9 Which doeth great things and unsearchable; marvelous things without number:
10 Who giveth rain upon the earth, and sendeth waters upon the fields:
11 To set up on high those that be low, that those which mourn may be exalted to safety.

It need hardly be said that the easiest thing in the world, and the one utterly impossible thing, is to see what is right for someone else (see Expos. on 4:5). There are of course traditions and standards which may not be flouted; but when one person undertakes to prescribe for another he is always at the point of assuming a superiority which he does not possess, a knowledge which he does not have, and an assurance of what he himself would do in similar circumstances to which he has not even the shadow of a claim. In view of the fact, says Eliphaz, that everybody manufactures his own misery, I would seek unto God if I were you, if my soul were in your soul's stead (see Expos. on 16:4), that he might raise me up (vs. 11). He would never have dared such presumption, amounting almost to effrontery, in the days of Job's prosperity. You may hand over one of your truisms, brocaded with rhetoric, to one who is down and out, though it would be a peculiarly graceless thing to do; you would never think of dealing with him in such fashion when he is up and in. More than that, the man who slaps a homemade poultice on a cancer may be a courteous fool, even a well-intentioned fool, but nevertheless a fool. Eliphaz was guilty on both counts, and never dreamed he was guilty. He was doing the best he knew. He is a warning, not an object for derision. He is to be pitied, not despised.

It is among the ironies of life that men like Eliphaz are the first to offer themselves as soul-physicians to the afflicted. They have cartloads of wholesome advice to bestow, and who but the afflicted are their lawful dumping ground? It is always permissible to take liberties with misery. Advice may be the frankest form of friendship; but when pressed on the unfortunate it may be the most offensive form of patronage. It is offered on the assumption that a man, just because he is unfortunate, must be on a lower moral or intellectual plane than his prosperous adviser. ... Job was no longer great, therefore he need no longer be counted enlightened ... How these men took advantage of their position! How they dinned rudimentary counsel into the ears of the man at whose feet they had once been willing to sit! 4 9-16. My Soul Doth Magnify the Lord.—(Cf. Luke 1:46-55.) To turn a man's thought of self to thought of God is an altogether praiseworthy attempt (see Expos. on 4:1-14:22); but when a man's thought of God has already become confused the strategy is not apt to prove effective. The more Job dwells on the theme which the friends keep urging, the less God seems like the God he had once known. Everything was going very well with them; why should they not "magnify the Lord"? But saying so never makes it so. Job will assent to every word as theology; but not to a single sentence as either competent or final.

But the author sets up no men of straw. He expends much of his skill on just such passages as this, from vs. 9 to the end of the chapter. Eliphaz particularly, among other things, is an orator. Here he extols in ordered and stately rhythm the majesty of God and his beneficence (see Expos. on 4:20b), his justice and his mercy, applying it all at last to Job, in an idyllic picture of the sufferer's restoration. Only—not one item 12 He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise.

13 He taketh the wise in their own craftiness: and the counsel of the froward is carried headlong.
14 They meet with darkness in the daytime, and grope in the noonday as in the night.
15 But he saveth the poor from the sword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty.
16 So the poor hath hope, and iniquity stoppeth her mouth.

12-14. Eliphaz is a wise man and a great admirer of wisdom, but this does not prevent his knowing that its efficiency depends ultimately not on the work of man, but on the will of God. He is not a moralistic humanist. He knows that some wise men are crafty ('ārām, a word used of the snake in Gen. 3:1), and that success (tūšiyyāh) is ultimately the result of inward disposition. Vs. 13a is the only part of Job quoted in the N.T. (I Cor. 8:19).

of it fits. Every bit of it had been true in those "dear, dead days" that were gone; every bit of it would again be true in "the giant mass of things to come" (42:10-17). It was the present that was Job's prison house. "As it was in the beginning, . . . and ever shall be"—but is not now! At the moment Job had his own way of looking at the past (10:13), and he had his own way of looking at the rosy future which his counselors held out to him (17:11). There are times when praise may not be comely for the upright. "Ye ought rather to . . . comfort him, lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow" (II Cor. 2:7).

12-16. God's Great Reversals.—The crafty, the wise, and the wily find themselves frustrated, fall into the pit which they themselves have dug, and are foiled by having their plans come to nothing. It is iniquity that is struck dumb (vs. 16), while the lowly are set up on high . . . and those who mourn are lifted to safety, and the poor have hope. We are forever dwelling on the mystery of life's inequities. Why not dwell at times on the mystery of life's reversals? It is a favorite subject in the N.T. (Matt. 10:39; 18:8; 20:16, 27; Luke 12:18, 20, 14-11). Meditating on the greatest of all reversals, which took place between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection, Paul discovers in it the clue to God's plan of redemption (I Cor. 1:23-29), and to many another mysterious providence along the way of his own life (II Cor. 12:10). There was a notable meeting of eight great industrialists and business tycoons in Chicago during the era of prosperity when Calvin Coolidge was president of the United States. They controlled more wealth among them than was available to the national government from taxation. Eight years later seven of the eight had either died in poverty, been imprisoned, or committed suicide. Without arguing as Eliphaz would have argued, we may at least stop long enough to inquire who are the weak and who are the strong, and who are the likelier to prove themselves quite the contrary—by the grace or the judgment of God.

14. Groeping at Noonday.—(Cf. Isa. 59:10; Deut. 28:29). In vivid metaphor Eliphaz sets forth the fate of those who "take counsel together, against the Lord" (Ps. 2:1-5). Their blindness is the kind of judicial blindness which "smote the men that were at the door" of Lot's house in Sodom (Gen 19:11). It smote the heart of Pharaoh (Exod. 8:15; 19; 9:12). It smote the host of the king of Syria at the word of Elias the prophet (II Kings 6:18). It smote the politicians and "wise men" of Isaiah's day. At the very moment when their policies seemed likeliest to prevail, the prophet had for them just this one devastating footnote, "Yet he also is wise" (Isa. 31:2, see Expos. on 3:23). In such fashion does God's light become darkness. Read again Paul's terrible indictment of the Gentile world in Rom 1:18-32, with its downward plunge from revelation (vs. 19) to self-sufficiency (vs. 21-22) to idolatry (vs. 23) to degeneracy (vss. 24-27) to the collapse of society (vss. 28-31) and the deliberate encouragement of vice (vs. 32). Ps. 1 graphically describes the entrance upon such a course: walking, standing.
17 Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth: therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty.

18 For he maketh sore, and bindeth up: he woundeth, and his hands make whole.

17. Although Eliphaz hinted several times at all sufferers' guilt (vs. 2-3, 7, 12-13), he did not wish to dwell on this dark aspect of his yet unformulated diagnosis. He preferred to extol the purifying aspect of suffering, and so quoted a beatitude on the benefit of mishār (chastening, "correction"). The word happy is probably derived from a root meaning "to go forth," "to reach for a distant goal," "to walk briskly forward," and does not correspond to a static blessedness but connotes an idea of constant development or ongoing process. Misfortune is thus used as a warning and as a method of improving the self.

(2) The Promise (5:18-27)

18-27. If God wounds and smites, he also binds up and heals. One who does not despise the Almighty's lesson (vs. 17b) will escape all evil (vv. 19-22).

sitting; then goes on to portray, in terms very much like these that Eliphaz employs, the contrast between the righteous and the ungodly. It is a contrast, as we have seen, which cannot be wrought out with such exactness; neither can it be dismissed. The office of the psychiatrist is filled with people who have tried.

17. Happy Is the Man Whom God Correcteth.

—(For vs. 17a see Ps. 94:12; for vs. 17b, Prov. 3:11. In Heb. 12 5-13 is a brief homily on the subject.) Strahan 6 objects that none of the three friends—only Elihu—regards suffering as discipline; they regard it at most as probation. The sufferer is under trial. If he proves tractable, all will yet be well with him; if not, he will perish (4:7-11). In any case, the word happy (see Exeg.) serves to indicate the kind of issue which Eliphaz envisions for Job: but only on condition that he receives God's chastening in a humble and contrite spirit; not shrug it off, as he has been doing, while violently protesting the fact of it. In all times of persecution men have found great comfort in the thought that "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." Their very suffering has seemed to them, especially under the Christian dispensation, a signal mark of sonship. Not that God ever willingly afflicts any of his children; but chiefly no doubt because in an evil world it is the good that has to pay the price of its goodness, as Christ paid; and because out of that dark, all through the years, such light has shone as "never was, on sea or land."

One word of caution, however, needs to be uttered against all such bright hopes as these which Eliphaz and the others hold out (see

6 Job, p. 68.

17 "Behold, happy is the man whom God reproves; therefore despise not the chastening of the Almighty.

18 For he wounds, but he binds up; he smites, but his hands heal.

Expos. on 6:2-7, 8:7; 23:18): in reality they constitute an avoidance of the issue. P. T. Forsyth writes of the method in general:

1. The first effort of a philosophic theology is to ease the jar... The assault on the beneficent scheme of the world is admitted, but it is less than it seems, especially less than it seems to the victims. ...

But ... personality has a sense of shock and damage to it from evil too severe and deep to be met by pooh-pooh treatment from the morbidity robust. ... The reaction ... against such consolations goes so far that it tends to bound into the extreme of pessimism, or a denial of any possible mitigation. ...

2. So recourse is had to the second method, which is not to soften the collision by a buffer but to avert it by a shunt. ... Banes are boons, indirect or inchoate ... Evil is but good in the making. ...

This view ... like the other ... is resented by the moral personality. ... The right sense of the blessed whole would be an anodyne submerging our contributory pain. ... But this cosmic elevation is not every man's affair, and pain and guilt are. And, in the failure of such a nepenthe, the mind finds again to pessimism ... and again comes to hope but in a dissolution of reason, and a Nirvana in chaos. 6

18. Piety or Policy?—The stress of Eliphaz' first speech is largely on man's duty toward God. Notice in the outline provided by the Exeg. the number of strophes devoted to it specifically. Now the theme is repentance; but it is repentance with an end in view. It is a turning to God as just about the only way there is of getting out of trouble, out of any number of 19 He shall deliver thee in six troubles: yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee.

20 In famine he shall redeem thee from death: and in war from the power of the sword.
21 Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue: neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh.
22 At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh: neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth.
23 For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field: and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee.

19 He will deliver you from six troubles: in seven there shall no evil touch you.
20 In famine he will redeem you from death, and in war from the power of the sword.
21 You shall be hid from the scourge of the tongue, and shall not fear destruction when it comes.
22 At destruction and famine you shall laugh, and shall not fear the beasts of the earth.
23 For you shall be in league with the stones of the field, and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with you.

Prosperity (vss. 23-24), posterity (vs. 25), and long life (vs. 26) will follow Job's appeal to God. The conclusion of the discourse (vs. 27) reveals on the part of the speaker a certain impatience and perhaps a tinge of superiority. He will not allow any questioning of his own view of existence, for it has come by long probing and investigation: Lo, this we have searched out [by digging]; it is true. Experience, moreover, is mentioned in the same breath with repentance. That comes of meeting God face to face. It is not induced by threat of penalty or hope of reward. As honesty turns dishonest, so piety turns impious, when policy comes down stage (cf. Matt. 10:39; 16:24).

23. In League with the Stones of the Field.— There was a sermon preached in London during World War II which promised to all men and women of faith that no bomb would come nigh their dwelling (cf. Ps. 91). For all that, the psalmist was no fool; neither was the prophet (Isa. 11:6-9). Paul speaks of “the earnest expectation of the creature”; indeed of “the whole creation” as groaning and travelling “in pain together until now... waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body” (Rom. 8.19, 22-23). Without trying to make prose of poetry, it is perhaps worth noting that the biblical view of life and nature is sacramental throughout, a view cherished by the Eastern Church in its traditions and practices far more than by the West. “The prophet... views nature within the orbit of the situation vis-a-vis God in which he stands, and is led to see all creation as sharing the history of rebellion-and-return” *5 There is a wholeness, a vast unity, about God's order, moral and physical, which is not always to be apprehended, but will nevertheless suffer no final contradiction or infringement. We would no doubt have other “explana-

---

And thou shalt know that thy tabernacle shall be in peace; and thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt not sin.

Thou shalt know also that thy seed shall be great, and thine offspring as the grass of the earth.

Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season.

Lo this, we have searched it, so it is; hear it, and know thou it for thy good.

But Job answered and said,

Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed, and my calamity laid in the balances together!

Then Job answered:

"O that my vexation were weighed, and all my calamity laid in the balances!

strengthened by tradition: "We have heard it" (LXX; a rendering which the Hebrew letters of the C.T. make possible). "But thou [observe the abrupt contrast between "we" and "thou"] learn it for thyself!" This final imperative is intended to leave the sufferer with a sharp sense of inferiority, and justifies in the mind of the poet the rebellious character of Job's reply (chs. 6-7).

2. Job's Reply to Eliphaz (6:1-7:21)

The reply of Job to the first discourse of Eliphaz is composed of nine strophes grouped together in three rhetorical parts: a soliloquy (6:2-20), an invective (6:21-7:7), and a prayer (7:8-21).

They will set their seal to it that it is true. If Job knows what is good for him he will take their word for it. If not, he will have to come to it the hard way. And with that Eliphaz dismisses the subject (see Expos. on vs. 8; 4:8-11).

It is almost inconceivable that a man should fold his arms and conclude what he is prepared to call "the consolations of God" (15:11) with a bolt like that. It shifts the center of gravity from person to precept, from pain to panaceas, and the whole weight of responsibility from the shoulders of Eliphaz to the shoulders of Job; the while moving down from such Olympian heights as to suggest instead of the intimacies of friendship the condescensions of an impossible omniscience.

6:1-7:21. Job's Reply to Eliphaz.—The book of Job is an "epic of the inner life." Luther in one passage compares the sufferer with Vergil's Aeneas, type of the eternal hero, led through all waters and seas, through all hostielies, until he becomes a capable and skillful warrior. There is simply no such thing in Job. The poem is thoroughly Oriental, its speeches hung like pearls on so tenuous a string of narrative as almost to shimmer, each in its own right, in midair. Instead of journeys, there are kaleidososcopic moods of the soul (cf. Expos. on 2:11-13). Instead of new scenes, there are visions and images, hopes and fears, memories, all the shifting phantoms of the mind. Instead of new faces, there are faces that are old and familiar: the face of God and the faces of men; but shadows sweep over them, as clouds sweep over the sky—the divine loving-kindness hiding itself away behind implacable enmity, or so it seems; human friendliness darkening over with suspicion, to blaze out at last in livid flashes of resentment and horror. The German poet Herder was eager to imagine that the author himself had endured the calamities and wrested his way through the misery of which he writes. In "noble words" he addresses that great unknown:

Wast thou thyself the narrator of thy sufferings and thy triumph, of thy victorious and yet conquered wisdom, thou the fortunate Unfortunate, the tortured and rewarded? If so, thou didst give vent a second time to the lamentations of thy heart and didst spread abroad thy victory over the ages and across continents. Out of thy ashes there has gone forth in this book a Phoenix, a rejuvenated palm-tree whose roots drink water. Ever since thou didst die in thy nest in accordance with thy wish, its incense has been wafted about, has refreshed much faintness of heart and will continue to do so until the end of time.1

Whether or not we draw any such conclusions must be a matter largely left to the individual fancy. There is nothing in the book—beyond a persistent sense of the author's own involvement in the tragedy of his hero—which would tend to support them, as there is nothing in Macbeth which would identify the Scottish chief with Shakespeare himself, nothing in Hamlet to make the Bard of Avon a Danish prince. Jonathan Swift once wrote of introducing Aristotle to his commentators: in the course of the ensuing conversation the ancient philosopher fell out with all of them, and the experiment ended in name-calling. All that can be said with any assurance is that Job portrays the struggle which goes on in human life against a too easy resolution of its central problem. And its central problem is not suffering but God. In a time when religion was self-seeking and when the people who needed it most—people who were aware in their own flesh of the slings and arrows of the Almighty—were thought of as cut off from the divine favor, in such a time this book would assert, against all the conclusions drawn from an oversimplified view of the relationship between

1 Quoted by Emil G. Kracling, The Book of the Ways of

2 Ibid., p. 249.
3 For now it would be heavier than the sand of the sea: therefore my words are swallowed up.

3 For then it would be heavier than the sand of the sea; therefore my words have been rash.

a) SOLILOQUY (6:1-20)

(1) THE WEIGHT OF ANGUISH (6:1-7)

Vss. 2-3 may be given two different interpretations. One may consider that my grief (vs. 2a) and my calamity (vs. 2b) are to be weighed separately: either one of them would then be found heavier than the sand of the sea (vs. 3a). That is a sufficient explanation and defense of Job's lament (vs. 3b). Alternately, one may insist on the importance of the word together (vs. 2b) and understand that my grief, or rather, my vexation, "my impatient irritation," should be estimated, criticized, and perhaps condemned, only if it is compared in the same scales with my calamity (read with Qeré, hawwâthî, "my fall," "gulf," "chasm," "abyss," "hell"). Since the latter is intolerable and of unheard of proportions, Eliphaz should recognize the reason for which my words have been "wild" (vs. 3b).

We seem to have no great difficulty with the thought that a ship laden with instruments of death may make its way safely through the hurricane, while another, with its cargo of missionaries, may founder on some hidden reef. Ours is a world where there is "chance" and yet not-chance (see Expos. on 1:12). Job lived in a world where all wretchedness and misery were from God direct, though for the reader the alien figure of Satan broods over the darkness to keep it from being too simply God's darkness. The beleaguerung army of perplexing thoughts and fears was the very army of the Almighty, organized into cohorts of evil. That was the burden which his soul could not carry. He was not just the plaything either of circumstance or of natural law in the autonomous world of which science likes to think. He was a man hungry for that goodness of God which he had known; and it was a hunger accursed because denied now of its food.

'Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or loweth the ox over his fodder? Life to me now is tasteless, like the white of an egg (?) on my lips. I loathe it. Oh, that God would let loose his hand and cut me off! Is my misery the strength of stones, or my flesh brass? You ought to show me kindness—even the impious man needs that. And you are like a brook run dry. The caravan of all my years turns aside into the desert to perish. I have not asked you to give me anything. I want none of your substance. That might have been too great a strain on your friendship. Teach me, and I shall hold my peace. Look at me. Would I lie to your face? I tell you, my cause is just! (See Expos. on 7:1-21.)

27. The Spirit of Heaviness.—A man does not always mean everything he says when he lets himself say everything he thinks he means. Job's passionate lament in ch. 3 should never have been counteracted by Eliphaz' dispassionate logic in chs. 4-5 (see Expos. on 5:17). Almost as if talking to himself, Job the comfortless now begins to brood over the chasm that has already yawned between him and his would-be comforters (see Exeg. on vs. 30). Eliphaz has not weighed the utterance against the provocation. To cry out in anguish was as natural as for a wild ass to bray when it has no grass, or for an ox to low in its empty stall. Sheer animal need was enough to account for it. And Job is no animal. He is a man desolate, bereaved, stricken; not in body alone, but in mind. The arrows that have stuck fast in his flesh are the arrows of the Almighty. Their poison is the poison that his spirit drinks. The terrors that beset him are God's terrors. What wonder that his words have been rash! What wonder that life on his lips is tasteless! How is it possible for anybody to have an appetite for living when living makes him sick, like food that is loathsome, so that he wants to spew it out of his mouth (see Exeg. on vss. 4, 5-7)? Result had followed cause. It was the cure that Job sought—and found at last, though sadly enough with no human help (cf. 38:1 and 40:3-5; 40:6; 42:1-6; cf. Luke 4:18-21 with Isa. 61:1-3). There is "beauty for ashes." There is "oil of joy for mourning." There is "the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." There is more for the Christian, far more even than

That blessed mood,
In which the burthen of the mystery,
In which the heavy and the weary weight
Of all this unintelligible world,
Is lightened.8

8 Wordsworth, "Lines Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey."
4. Moreover, the excess of suffering, which of course comes from the Almighty, has acted as a poison in the hero’s spirit: God himself, compared here to a brutal warrior or hunter who is not scrupulous about his choice of weapons, has brought about Job’s mental and religious undoing.

5-7. Eliphaz has severely judged the hero’s language, but has he reflected upon the cause of the sufferer’s rashness? Would Job have cried out in anguish had he been

4. The Arrows of the Almighty.—It would have been of some comfort to Job had he been able to think as we think, of a universe where it is of God’s own ordaining, lest men lose their souls, that the good should “chance it” with the bad, earthquake and flood, famine, and pestilence, and sudden death, the righteous with the wicked. Ecclesiastes sees in it token of the divine indifference, if nothing worse (Eccl. 9:2; 11:3). Jesus sees in it token of the divine forbearance (Matt. 5:45). It might conceivably have been of some comfort to Job if he had been able to think that God had nothing to do with what had happened to him; though when all is said and done, there could scarcely be a more desolate view. A man whose wife had gone down with the “Titanic” said to a friend, “I don’t believe for a moment that God had anything to do with it.” Said his friend, with sad and unearthly insight, “Don’t you wish you could believe that he had?” It might have been of some comfort to Job if he had been able to think of his calamity as allowed of God, though not sent; allowed for reasons beyond our reasons. So the prologue suggests. But as in so much of the Greek drama, such knowledge, while provided for those of us now who look on, was denied the sufferer himself. It might have been of some comfort to him had he been able to think of his pain as punishment. That he bitterly resents. For every ounce of truth in it there is likely to be a pound of falsehood. “Pastor,” sobbed a woman, “our family doctor has just told my sister that she has cancer. Mother died of it two years ago. You know that. What have we done? Tell me. Something is the matter. We have been faithful to the church. You know that too—you must know it. What have we done that God should deal with us like this? It is more than I can bear.” “No other comment is necessary than that such people have to quit believing in a God like that (Lam. 3:38).”

Job had already quit. Not so his friends. To him there was more. And he was right. There is. He was wrong only in this: that he could not yet read the text of life’s multitude of sorrows in the context of a love that for all its hiddenness was love still. It was in such a context that George Matheson read his blindness, and the broken troth of a woman who could not face with him the threat of those dark years.

O Love that wilt not let me go,
I give thee back the life I owe.
That in thine ocean depths its flow
May richer, fuller be.

And the “borrowed ray,” and the cross that lifted up his head. To tug at the arrows of the Almighty is one thing. To enter some little way into what Studdert-Kennedy called “the sorrows of God” is another. Job had not come far enough along for that. His friends, with their angry God, were in his way. They were in Calvary’s way. It was there that God shot his last arrow.

6. Dead Sea Fruit.—Life to Job was Like to the apples on the Dead Sea’s shore,

All ashes to the taste.4

When he drew a line under the days and added them all up, that is what he got. So with Hamlet:

O, that this too solid flesh would melt,
Thaw and resolve itself into a dew!
Or that the Everlasting had not fix’d
His canon ‘gamst self-slaughter! O God! O God!
How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable,
Seem to me all the uses of this world!5

Job recovered. Hamlet died of it. Everybody has to make up his mind sooner or later what to do

4 Byron, Childe Harold’s Pilgrimage, Canto III, st. xxxiv.
5 Act I, scene 2.
without salt? or is there any taste in the white of an egg?

7 The things that my soul refused to touch are as my sorrowful meat.

or is there any taste in the slime of the purslane?\(^1\)

7 My appetite refuses to touch them; they are as food that is loathsome to me.\(^k\)

\(^{1}\) The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain

\(^k\) Heb obscure

8 Job was a flourishing and satisfied. Is not his resentment as natural as animal hunger (vs. 5)? Likewise, does not man feel instinctive repugnance before insipid food or the slime of the purslane (vs. 6)? In other words, man needs not only food like the animals but also a decent and attractive food. Man wants not only life but also a worth-while existence: otherwise he rejects it and protests the compulsion to live (vs. 7). The proverbial allusions of these verses may well have a secondary and additional meaning (Duhm, et al.): “Do you really think,” Job indirectly asks Eliphaz, “that I can accept your tasteless consolations and your repugnant advice?” According to this exegesis, Job is no longer on the defensive, as in vs. 5, but challenges the right of a prosperous friend to comfort him by reprimand (vs. 6-7).

about it, because it is not exactly an unknown mood to anybody who has lived a while.

Life has a way of becoming unpalatable. Sometimes whole generations seem to lose heart. They adopt some naive view of history and affirm the doctrine of inevitable progress. Then one morning they see how their ideals, their beliefs, their hopes, and even their rebellions have turned out. The word “disillusion” was born into the common vocabulary of every day and grew up full size in the first quarter of the twentieth century. At about that time Will Durant was addressing an open letter to a few of his “famous contemporaries.” What is the meaning of life? he asked them. Thought seems to have destroyed itself. Knowledge has brought disillusion. Truth has not made us free. Why did we hurry so to find it? It has taken from us every reason for existence except the moment’s pleasure and tomorrow’s trivial hope. Walter Lippmann took up the chorus, telling us of brilliant atheists who had all at once become very nervous; of women who had emancipated themselves from the tyranny of their homes, and with the intermittent but expensive help of the psychoanalyst were enduring liberty at last as interior decorators; of young men who were world weary at twenty-two, and crowds enfranchised by the blood of heroes who could not be persuaded to take an interest in their own destiny. In that world Nazism sprang up like a weed. Hitler knew that men and women who were fed to the gills with the whole sorry mess were ready to take a chance on anything.

And Stalin knew it too. So all unconsciously do men allow the subtle process of the years to rob them of the very stuff out of which they might otherwise have built a hopeful view of mankind’s strange pilgrimage on this earth (Eph. 2:12). The most imperious of all their necessities, God and the human soul, fellowship and love, mercy and truth, slip over into the margin, while wealth and comfort, achievement and mastery, learning and pleasure, everything that belongs in the margin, they undertake to write down in the text. The result is sure enough, and much too swift for comfort. It is never long before the life that has no meaning beyond its own narrow horizons begins to grow emptier and emptier. With no interest left but self-interest, there is soon no interest left. With Job it was disaster (see Expos. on 3:1-26); with others, routine, a listless boredom that plods down the hours watching the clock; with others still, just sin. They start out with a smacking of the lips; they wind up with nausea in a third-rate hell, where everybody seems to be elaborately and intolerably dull.

And what is the answer? When the zest goes out of life? When the only flag a man has is flying perpetually at half-mast, as if somebody were dead? Whoever will spell that “somebody” with a capital S will have the secret in his hand. It was not just the majesty and mystery of life that dawned on Job at the last. What he stammered out was the only thing that could have taken him bodily and lifted him out of himself and his pain: “I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee” (42:5). Life had found its center again. It has been said that true happiness consists in having someone to love, something to do, and something to hope for. Paul had his own way of say-

8 Oh that I might have my request, and that God would grant me the thing that I long for!
9 Even that it would please God to destroy me; that he would let loose his hand, and cut me off!
10 Then should I yet have comfort; yea, I would harden myself in sorrow: let him not spare; for I have not concealed the words of the Holy One.
11 What is my strength, that I should hope? and what is mine end, that I should prolong my life?
12 Is my strength the strength of stones? or is my flesh of brass?
13 Is not my help in me? and is wisdom driven quite from me?

(2) The Boon of Death (6:8-13)

8-13. The sufferer will therefore reassert the desire to die which he expressed in his initial lament (ch. 3). Death at the hand of an unloving God (Eloah) is preferable to a continuation of existence under conditions of misery. Job picks up the thread of vs. 4 and hopes that a brutal Deity (again Eloah) will soon crush him (vs. 9). He feels that disintegration of his spirit has gone so far that, if his agony lasts a little longer, he might reject the commandments of a holy God (vs. 10c). An immediate death would be a means of overcoming the temptation of blasphemy and therefore a comfort (vs. 10a). He would even exult in pain unsparing (vs. 10b), for then, he would not have denied the words of the Holy One (vs. 10c). As it is, he has no moral or physical strength left within him (vss. 11-13), and any resource that he might find in his wisdom is driven away by Eliphaz’ clumsy and supercilious recommendations.

8 “O that I might have my request, and that God would grant my desire;
9 that it would please God to crush me, that he would let loose his hand and cut me off!
10 This would be my consolation;
   I would even exult in pain unsparing;
   for I have not denied the words of the Holy One.
11 What is my strength, that I should wait?
   And what is my end, that I should be patient?
12 Is my strength the strength of stones, or is my flesh bronze?
13 In truth I have no help in me, and any resource is driven from me.

1 The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain

8-13. At the Bottom of the Cup.—There may be those who find it strange that no thought of suicide man’s final thrust not only at self but at the world and God (Judg. 9:54; 1 Sam. 31:4; 11 Sam. 17:23—the only three suicides in the O.T., men mortally wounded, or expecting to be slain), ever seems to have entered Job’s mind. The Hebrew’s verdict on life was that it was good. Death was no boon. Sheol was a place of shadows, where being could hardly be called being, cut off as it was from God (yet see Pss. 16:10; 49:15; 86:13; 139:8). No man who was not beside himself could long for it (cf. Expos. on 8:1). Job’s own yearning appears at times no more than a cry caught halfway between life and death, hardly knowing in what direction to turn. It would have been quite impossible for him to adopt our romantic if not sentimental view, taking to flowers and soft music, as if 14 To him that is afflicted pity should be showed from his friend; but he forsaketh the fear of the Almighty.

14 "He who withholds\textsuperscript{m} kindness from a friend forsakes the fear of the Almighty.

\textsuperscript{m} Srr Vg Compare Tg Heb obscure

(3) The Failure of Friendship (6 14-20)

14. A \textit{crux interpretum}. All ancient and modern versions reveal attempts to make the best of an obscure and probably corrupt text.

(a) Many translators have understood the first word \textit{mas} as derived from the verb עַדָּד, "to melt," "to dissolve," "to faint," "to grow fearful or desperate." Hence the literal rendering:

To the man in despair kindness (is due) from his friend,
And he [the man in despair] forsaketh the fear of the Almighty.

What is the sequence of thought between the two lines?

(i) On the basis of similar uses of the copulative \textit{waw}, "and," it is possible to translate (with Dillmann, Budde, ERV, ASV, Amer. Trans., \textit{et al.}):

A friend should show kindness to a man in despair,
Even [to a man who] is about to forsake the fear of the Almighty.

This idea is boldly modern and probably unique in the O.T., but the poet of Job is unique and modern in many respects. He is not afraid of placing blasphemous statements on the lips of his hero. This translation presents the advantage of respecting the Hebrew text and of fitting admirably with the context preceding and following, for it points back to the sufferer’s fear of religious denial (vs. 10c), and it also anticipates his indictment of the friends’ lack of understanding (vss. 15 ff.). Job has received no real sympathy from Eliphaz. His expectation of comfort has been thwarted, and he now senses that his faith is about to founder on the rocks of his sorrow.

(ii) On the basis of syntactic parallels one may alternatively suggest (with ASV mg., Moffatt, et al.):

A friend should show kindness to a man in despair,
Or else [this man] will forsake the fear of the Almighty.

In this case Job would threaten his friends with the theological consequences of his loneliness and of their blundering ministrations. He makes them responsible in advance for his blasphemy. In view of the fear expressed in vs. 10c, this is the most likely interpretation.

(b) Other students point out that none of the ancient versions seems to have followed one and the same Hebrew text. In vs. 14a, the Syriac and the Vulg. (perhaps also Targ.), instead of דָּבָר have read either דָּבָּר, דָּבָּר עַד, or דָּבָּר ("the withholder," "the remover," "the refuser"), and appear to have omitted the copulative וַאֲשֶׁר at the beginning of vs. 14b. Hence the translation (Graetz, Beer, Duhm, Driver, et al.):

[Whoever] withholds kindness from a friend
forsakes the fear of the Almighty.

If such is the meaning, then Job is sharply indicting Eliphaz for a grave lack of friendship: pastoral failure is the equivalent of religious apostasy. Faith is betrayed whenever love is absent from a neighbor in need. It is not Job who is in danger of abandoning his religion, but the prosperous theologian who condemns blindly and mercilessly the rashness of the sufferer. Such an idea is just as revolutionary as that suggested by the first translations. It is equally unique in the O.T. and it constitutes in effect a foreshadowing of Jesus’ teaching as revealed by the parable of the good Samaritan. Scholars who reject the first interpretations on the ground of their modernity might likewise refuse to accept the second.

its own sake, but for theirs. It asks Cain, “Where is thy brother Abel?” But it asks Abel too, “Where is thy brother Cain?” It asks those who are up and in about those who are down and out. But Eliphaz had heard no whisper of it. And Job heard none in him. The love that is at the heart of the universe is a stern and splendid thing, deep and tragic. C. S. Lewis calls it the intolerable compliment which God has paid us. We are something, he goes on, that God is making, and he will not be satisfied with anything less than he wants us to be.

Over a sketch made idly to amuse a child, an artist may not take much trouble. . . . But over the great picture of his life—the work which he loves . . . —he will take endless trouble—and would, doubtless, thereby give endless trouble to the picture if it were sentient. One can imagine a sentient picture, after being rubbed and scraped and re-commenced for the tenth time, wishing that it were only a thumb-nail sketch whose making was over in a minute

There is a passion for torn and bleeding life which has to root itself at the foot of a cross if it roots itself anywhere. Hosea understood. Eliphaz had heard no whisper of it. So Job heard none in him. George Buttrick tells of a knock which sounded on the door of a poor little house in Japan. A voice answered it, “Don’t come in. I have a contagious disease.” Said the man who knocked, “I have something far more contagious than that: the love of God in Christ Jesus.” As he entered, there on the bed lay Kagawa.

14. The Test of True Piety.— (See Exeg. for possible interpretations.) However we read the passage, the point is clear enough: there is nothing that can remit the debt of kindness that man owes to man under God, and friend to friend. The piety that wears on its face no such authentic seal is counterfeit piety: and the counterfeit imperils all genuine currency. It is often the only encouragement that impiety needs. Austere virtue sits in the pew. Is that why profanity walks the street? Prodigals leave home

My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away;
Which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid:
What time they wax warm, they vanish: when it is hot, they are consumed out of their place.
The paths of their way are turned aside; they go to nothing, and perish.

(c) Other renderings have been proposed on the basis of various textual conjectures:
(i) By postulating from the Arabic lamasa a Hebrew verb מַסָּה (which respects fully the C.T.), one may read:

He has requested kindness from his friend
And he (now) abandons the fear of the Almighty.

Vs. 14 would then constitute a scribal reflection inserted in the margin.
(ii) By considering הב_traits as a noun without prepositional prefix (see Gen. 26:26; II Sam. 3:8), and by reading יִבָּט הַמָּסָּה for יִבָּט מַסָּה, one may also suggest the rendering (with Dhome):

His friend has despised kindness
And he [i.e., Job] has abandoned the fear of the Almighty.

The verse would again be a marginal annotation.
(iii) By translating רָחֵב not “kindness,” but “reproach,” “shameful thing” (see Lev. 20:17; Prov. 14:34; cf. Prov. 25:10), a few authorities have proposed:

If reproach comes from his friend to the desperate man,
He may forsake the fear of the Almighty.

(iv) By correcting חָסְדָּה into חָסְדָּה, one might translate (with Kissane):

When his friend faileth him who is in despair,
He forsakes the fear of the Almighty.

Notice that these two last renderings yield a meaning which is not distant from that of the first translations mentioned above.

15-20. The rest of the strophe contains several details which are of doubtful interpretation, but the general sense is clear. Job accuses his brethren of failing him precisely because elder brothers stay there. There are “stale saints” and “attractive sinners”; and there are times when the relationship between them is nothing less—and nothing more—than cause and effect (cf. Luke 6:27-36; John 15:12-13; I John 3:14; 4:20-21). The church that is not somewhere in the slums, the church of the unconcerned, whether in peace or in war, Dives’ church, would do well to tear down its steeple and quit pretending to point a finger at the sky (cf. Ps. 129:5-4 for the plea of a man who has come to the limit of his endurance).

18. Caravans that Turn Aside.—Such grim righteousness as Eliphaz had shown was like dashing a cup of cool water from the lips of one who was dying of thirst. To Job friendship of that sort was a dried-up brook, not a trickle left across the hot sands. You came staggering up from the distant horizon with a parched throat and swollen tongue; then you turned back into the desert to die. There is no more accurate description anywhere of the part played by some people. There were scribes and Pharisees like that, for instance, in the time of our Lord: fancy applying to them for friendliness and counsel. A Carpenter from Nazareth stood there before them, with love in his eyes and the whole world on his heart, yearning to make of life 19 The troops of Tema looked, the companies of Sheba waited for them. 20 They were confounded because they had hoped, they came thither, and were ashamed.

what God had always intended it to be: and had his yearning hurled back in his teeth. “Samaritan! Devil! Who do you think you are?” while they looked around for a few handy stones (John 8). There had been no refreshment in them either for Matthew, or for Mary of Magdala, or for Peter, or Zacchaeus. That in part was why Matthew was still Matthew when Jesus found him, and Zacchaeus still Zacchaeus. These religious folk who were good, but with no understanding, righteous but without tenderness—you made your way into their company wanting far more than you dared to ask, as people always do; and you might as well have kept to yourself, or better, out there on the burning sands: no tiniest bit of moisture in them to slake the blazing thirst of a man’s soul.

Surely every life is a kind of caravans, carrying its hopes and fears somewhere, many a long mile; hardly knowing where, perhaps, quite lost now and then, looking about today and tomorrow, always anxiously, for anything that may help it to keep going, put heart into it, make it feel that holding on is worth while, across an all too trackless waste. And surely there is some human pilgrimage that turns aside from its distant quest and sets in toward us: feet that come running up, and stop for a moment eagerly; other feet that trudge along slowly, and wait without enthusiasm—the sound of them after a while dying away in the distance, all of them somehow steadier, or a little more weary, for having skirted yonder the edge of our life.

Sympathy is one of the things they come seeking of us. And we are living in a world where just now of all times we can least afford to be without it. Not the cheap kind, which is nothing but diluted sentiment: the kind that costs something, that makes its way deliberately into the center of another man’s condition, and instead of lording it about there with criticism and advice bows its head. We can get along with considerably less rubber-gloved diagnosis and ten-foot charity and transatlantic indignation. Wrongs are not righted with distant chatter, or the tips of the fingers. No use opening the grill and looking sad when somebody lays down his burden on your step, the question then is, How much can you carry and how far can you go? We like to talk about how complicated, how very complicated, everything is. That gives us a comfortable sense of being unable to do anything about it. Congress must act. Mass meetings must be held. Resolutions must be adopted. And where is there anyone who is laying hold with great, strong hands on the life that falters yonder at his door, pressing it for even a moment, like God, to his heart?

Good cheer is another of the things they come seeking of us. We need a surplus of that for sharing. They used to say of Phillips Brooks that the sun seemed to break through the clouds every time he set his foot on the streaming pavements of Boston and raised his umbrella. There are enough people who go about helping along the twilight and doing it theoretically. A sick world is not likely to improve if we all keep jerking up the shades in the morning and saying, “Well, I see it’s worse today.” Perhaps a sign should be posted for a while on the poor patient’s door: “No Visitors.” There is nothing to be had of grinning or of slapping every third person on the back. There is much in being the kind of soul who has deep and hidden resource. Read again the three “good cheers” of Jesus (Matt. 9:2; 14:27; John 16.33). The apostles go marching through the Acts singing their songs and waving their hands to us. They had something to be gloomy about; but no man can lay his life alongside of Stephen’s or Peter’s or Paul’s and not have his pulses quickened. There was a triumph on which they drew in the midst of disaster; not a chirp and twitter practiced for the occasion; but a note resonant, like the diapason of an organ, leaving all the life around it quivering and glad.

Faith is still another thing men come seeking of us. Do we find it such difficult business holding on to our own that there is hardly enough for us, let alone a margin for anybody else? In one painting of the Crucifixion the hands of God may be seen, through the darkness that shrouds the Cross, supporting the two pierced hands of Jesus, and beyond, the face of God, fuller still of agony than the face of the Crucified, 21 For now ye are nothing; ye see my casting down, and are afraid.
22 Did I say, Bring unto me? or, Give a reward for me of your substance?
23 Or, Deliver me from the enemy's hand? or, Redeem me from the hand of the mighty?
24 Teach me, and I will hold my tongue: and cause me to understand wherein I have erred.
25 How forcible are right words! but what doth your arguing reprove?

21 Such you have now become to me: "you see my calamity, and are afraid.
22 Have I said, 'Make me a gift?'
   Or, 'From your wealth offer a bribe for me?'
23 Or, 'Deliver me from the adversary's hand?'
   Or, 'Ransom me from the hand of oppressors?'
24 "Teach me, and I will be silent; make me understand how I have erred.
25 How forceful are honest words!
   But what does reproof from you reprove?

* Cn Compare Gk Syr: Heb obscure

b) INJECTIVE (6:21-7:7)

(1) "SHOW ME MY ERROR!" (6:21-27)

Job's tone rises from weary melancholy to abrupt bitterness. The mood of soliloquy turns suddenly into the passion of invective.

21a. "Thus, you are now as if you did not exist": Lit., "You are . . . , no!" The text may be corrupt. More probably, the syntactic incoherence may indicate emotional upset and outburst.

21b. "You see (my) terror, and you are afraid!" Pastoral counseling is sometimes vitiated from the start when the spectacle of sorrow freezes into fright the would-be comforter.

22-23. In his destitution Job expected not material help, but true sympathy and intelligent understanding.

24-27. A convincing argument from Eliphaz might at least have reduced Job to silence, but the friend's insinuations have not been concrete or compelling. Job would be ready to give up the discussion if he only knew in what way he has erred: the verb shâghâh usually means "to reel in drunkenness" (Isa. 28:7; Prov 20:1), and may refer to a ritual error of ignorance (Lev. 4:18; etc.) or to an act of moral turpitude (I Sam. 26:21; Prov. 5:23). But Job does not confess here any ethical crime (cf. 19:4). He probably thinks of the rashness of the language he has used in his initial lament (an with the thorns on its brow. Facing the facts is gallant work. But what facts? And did you find God in any of them? Were there no hands back of them, and no face? It is not realism just to grit your teeth and clench your fists and run out and get in the dirt. Nobody will swing along more bravely for it. Or less bravely for the man who lifted up his clear eyes on Calvary and said even in that desperate place, seeing as he saw, "It is finished. Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (John 19:30; Luke 23:46).

21-27. When Friendship Misses the Mark.—There is a spurious brand of friendship that on occasion fades away into the background as if it were not (see Exeg. on vs. 21a). At other times it proves cowardly (see Exeg. on vs. 21b; there may possibly be here a hint that the friends are afraid to take Job's part lest they compromise their own standing before the Almighty). Always it withholds itself, that cheapest but rarest of gifts (vss. 22-23); the gift which is no strain on any man's generosity or courage, yet is the spring of both in others. And always it is lacking in insight (vss. 25b-26). In any case, it is base instead of boon. It both hurts and gets hurt (see Exeg. on vs. 27; Expos. on vss. 14, 18).

24-27. The Force of Honest Words.—(Cf. Expos. on 4:4; Ps. 129.) Job would not have Eliphaz "by indirections find directions out." He wants a straight hewing to the line: When a man is desperate, do you mistake what he says for wind? Will you "charm ache with air, and agony with words?" You think I have been reeling and staggering back and forth like a drunken man. Deal plainly with me. Show me what I have done, and I shall hold my peace.
26 Do ye imagine to reprove words, and the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind?
27 Yea, ye overwhelm the fatherless, and ye dig a pit for your friend.
28 Now therefore be content, look upon me; for it is evident unto you if I lie.
29 Return, I pray you, let it not be iniquity: yea, return again, my righteousness is in it.

26 Do you think that you can reprove words, when the speech of a despairing man is wind?
27 You would even cast lots over the fatherless, and bargain over your friend.
28 "But now, be pleased to look at me; for I will not lie to your face.
29 Turn, I pray, let no wrong be done. Turn now, my vindication is at stake.

interpretation confirmed by vs. 26b). Passing now from defense to attack, he insinuates that Eliphaz has been dishonest. How forceful [would be] honest words! But what do arguments prove, coming from you? (Vs. 25.) His mental agony leads him to use an unjustified hyperbole (vs. 27). As so often happens in a quarrel, Job, being hurt, tries to hurt in his turn. You would even . . . bargain over your friend. As the next verse may imply, Eliphaz, upon hearing this, gives sign of an abrupt leave-taking.

(2) "Is There Any Wrong on My Tongue?" (6:28-30)

It is now the turn of the sufferer to give advice. His anger has subsided. "Come back, please! let no wrong be done" (vs. 29a). The certainty of his innocence has never left him. Perhaps the friends again made as if to leave (Renan). Thus he repeats more insistently, and without the preceptive particle, "Come back! My righteousness is still in it," i.e., "in the plea that I make," or "in this matter" (Dhorme rightly points out the neutral use of this expression in Gen. 24:14). On the other hand, the meaning of the imperative may well be: "Convert yourselves!" lit., "Change your course," let no wrong be done! It is the friends who need conversion, not Job (see vs. 14). By assuming a double metathesis some read, "Recognize my right in this affair" (La Sainte Bible [Paris: Société Biblique de Paris, 1947], III, 222).

That would be a kindness. Anything else is cruel. It’s like casting lots over the fatherless. It’s like selling out a friend.

There are not a few who will come up to you, take you by the lapel and say, "Now I’m going to be honest with you." And nine times out of ten what comes out is something nasty. There has to be self-forgetful love behind the honesty to make it honest; and behind the self-forgetful love a conscience, not one that tells its neighbor when he goes wrong, but one that first of all has learned to stay at home and keep house. The force of honest words is not so much in them as behind them (I Cor. 13:4-7). "Faithful are the wounds of a friend; but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful" (Prov. 27:6; see also Ps. 141.5; Matt. 7:1-5). "There are two elements," writes Emerson, "that go to the composition of friendship. . . One is Truth. . . The other . . . is Tenderness." *

28-30. Beyond Misunderstanding.—(See Exeg.) For one who will follow the progress of the dialogue, character by character, from beginning to end, there could scarcely be a more forceful illustration of what happens when no heed is taken of Jesus’ word, “Judge not, that ye be not judged” (Matt. 7:1-5; Luke 6:37-45). There is a suggestive and inevitable parallel between (a) the movement through the speeches of the friends—from well-intended criticism, veiled and considerate, to downright accusation, dogmatism meanwhile stiffening into rigor mortis, and sensitiveness turning into personal resentment; and (b) the movement through the speeches of Job—from what is hardly more than the cry of an animal in pain, to the blasphemies of one who more and more sees himself deserted not only by man but by God as well, in a world where nothing but death makes sense any longer. The whole situation has its origin in the presumption against which Jesus uttered his warning. The issue of it is mutual abuse (see Expos. on 4:5, 7, 8-11). But that time has not yet come. Here, in an appeal filled with pathos, and reminiscent of that solemn moment in our courts when the clerk is about to call for the verdict—“Members of the jury, look upon the prisoner. Prisoner, look upon the jury”—Job entreats his comforters: “Don’t turn away from

* Essay on “Friendship.”
30 Is there iniquity in my tongue? cannot my taste discern perverse things?

7 Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? are not his days also like the days of a hireling?

30. Is there any wrong on my tongue?

The word wrong is the same as that in vs.
29a and means “perversion,” “wickedness.”
Job insists not only on his uprightness, but also on the soundness of his discernment.
(Moffatt.) Cannot my taste discern hawwôth (vs. 30b)? This word is used in the plural of majesty and refers to a chasm or abyss (cf. the singular use of the same word in vs. 2).
The psalmists generally apply it to an evil wrought by their enemies (Pss. 38:12; 52:4; 55:11; etc.). Thus by a single word Job lets his friends know that he is quite aware of their inward dispositions toward him. But he may allude to the abyss of blasphemy on the edge of which he now perilously hangs. The word may even suggest his fear of the annihilation which he had previously desired, and which he now both seeks and loathes, in common with all suffering humanity. This idea, if present in the poet’s mind at this place, would in turn admirably introduce the poem which follows.

(3) “Life Is Without Hope” (7:1-6)

7:1-6. Job suffers because human life in general is a hard service. He is subjected to the condition of mortal man (עַיִן), who leads the existence of a soldier or mercenary (vss. 1-3). Physical pain makes nights and days appear to be endless (vss. 4-5). Job me. You do me wrong, I am telling you the truth. I am innocent. Not a fact have I twisted with my tongue. I know the difference between white and black. Give me credit for that.”

Indeed, one of the most difficult things in the world is to give another credit, to assume the best and not the worst (I Cor. 13:7 Moffatt). In his Small Catechism, Luther, writing of “false witness,” contrasts it with speaking well of our neighbor, and putting “the most charitable construction on all his actions.”
There is risk in it, of course: risk of the give and take of harm. But it is love’s risk. Ultimately it is God’s risk. The only help there is for anybody lies on the other side of it (see Expos. on 16:21).
Better, it may be, than mistaken judgment is mistaken kindness. Better than either is that flame which only God can light on the world’s hearth to cleanse them both.

7:1-21. A Medley of Pathos and Complaint, Appeal and Remonstrance.—Innocent as he has professed himself to be (6:28-30), yet wretched as who could know better than he, Job with utter pathos looks out for a moment upon the world—and upon the life from which so many wish to be free, wish to be paid off like a hire-ing, wish to find some rest in the shadow. Days are like months, and the months are all nothing; yet swifter are they than a weaver’s shuttle. He hardly knows how life seems. In the nights there is no relief. There ought to be pity

* Explanation to the Eighth Commandment.

for him somewhere up in heaven—with only the grave to look forward to, and that undiscover’d country from whose bourn

No traveller returns.*

I will be quiet no longer. I will speak out my mind and not hold back. Am I a sea, O God, that you set a watch over me, a dragon that has to be crushed before any of your creation can be? Sleeping, you afflict me with dreams. Wake-ing, I choke. Let me die. I am not worth the pains you are taking to torment my soul. What if I have sinned? Forgive me, and have done. Or one day you shall seek me and I shall not be.

The wistfulness is the pathetic wistfulness of a child, looking up through its tears at the father who has chastised it, whimpering out of the love that tugs at its heart, as children do, “You’ll be sorry sometime. You’ll be sorry when I’m dead.” There are those who call the book of Job a gloomy book. If it were the story of life in its natural condition, that would be gloomy, with gloom impenetrable; but it is the story of a life that is lost, away from its home and its Father’s house, in a far country. For such a life there is always the possibility of return. So has the doctrine of man’s fall been called a pessimistic doctrine. Rather is it that if man as he is were not fallen man, there would be no gleam of light at all. For fallen man there

* Shakespeare, Hamlet, Act III, scene 1.
2 As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow, and as a hireling looketh for the reward of his work;
3 So am I made to possess months of vanity, and wearisome nights are appointed to me.
4 When I lie down, I say, When shall I arise, and the night be gone? and I am full of tossings to and fro unto the dawning of the day.
5 My flesh is clothed with worms and clods of dust; my skin is broken, and become loathsome.

should logically renew his plea for death (see 6:9), but instead of wishing to die he clings to the drear and awful lot that is left to him and he complains, My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle (vs. 6a). Such an inconsistency is true to the experience of men everywhere. They call for death, but if they face it they generally ask for a reprieve,

For who would lose,
Though full of pain, this intellectual being,
Those thoughts that wander through eternity,
To perish rather, swallow'd up and lost
In the wide womb of uncreated night?
(Milton, Paradise Lost, Bk. II, II. 146-50.)

On the other hand, there may be no psychological contradiction in Job's desire both to die and to remain alive, but only a poetic ellipsis: "If life could be passed without constant is a true estate. For Job in his blackest mood there is a future in the hands that even now are weaving it; and the pattern is God's.

1-6. Life's a Pain, and but a Span.— (Cf. Expos. on 3:1, 20-21.) What began in 3:19, reverently enough, as a lament induced by his own life's misery, proceeded as an indictment of life's misery in general (3:20-22), and then to direct accusation of God as the only responsible author of it all (3:23). Job now turns from his effort at self-justification in the eyes of his friends (6:28-30) to what he is ready to assert is God's allotment of time all too brief and labor all too constant and unremitting, not only to mankind, but to Job himself par excellence, part and parcel as he is of the weariness and the woe which he sees all about him. A soldier, trudging out the forced marches of a hard campaign; a slave who draws his breath in great gulps and longs for evening to come; worse still, a man brought in off the streets and set his day's backbreaking toil, with nothing at the end but being paid off and let go (yet see Exeg.): what else is there in the world? (See Expos. on 6:6.) He might, indeed—some sunnier morning before his universe went wrong, and the God of it—have answered his own question; he might have thrown in on the other side of the scale everything that belonged there.

But not now. So greedy is the evil that strikes the eye, or fills the mind, or assails the body, to swallow up the good that lies in the memory or stands around waiting for a welcome.

The angels keep their ancient places;—
Turn but a stone and start a wing!
'Tis ye, 'tis your estranged faces,
That miss the many-splendoured thing.

In Job's unique case—of that he was persuaded—what solace in any event could there be in the contemplation of such widespread wretchedness (see Expos. on 2:11-13)?

That loss is common would not make
My own less bitter, rather more;
Too common! Never morning wore
To evening, but some heart did break.

What on earth was there to live for? With days as long as empty months, and no shadow of the evening to bring him a little reprieve; nothing but tossings to and fro from dusk to dawn. Would God it were day! And every day, Would God it were night! (Deut. 28:67.) His flesh worm-eaten, hardening into scabs, then break-

6 Tennyson, In Memoriam, Part VI, st. II.
6 My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle, and are spent without hope.
7 O remember that my life is wind: mine eye shall no more see good.
8 The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more: thine eyes are upon me, and I am not.

pam, its brevity [would be] an evil, since none would willingly exchange its warm glow and thrilling interest for the cold and colourless monotony of Sheol” (A. S. Peake, Job [Edinburgh. T. C. & E. C. Jack, 1904; “The Century Bible”], p. 101). As it is, man’s existence is too short precisely because it is without hope beyond the grave (vs. 6b).

c) Prayer (7:7-21)
(1) Appeal (7:7-11)

7-8. At last Job breaks into prayer. Not a sharp remonstrance, but a plaintive request. Remember that my life is a breath (vs. 7a). Job appeals to God’s pity. He believes that the seemingly aggressive or impassive Deity may be moved to compassion by the spectacle of man’s despair. Even at this early stage of the discussion Job’s prayer presupposes a faith in the kindness of God. Only, when God will at last seek him out, it will be too late. “Thine eyes shall be upon me, but I shall be no more” (vs. 8b). Thus, at the precise moment when Job states that life is without hope (vs. 6b), he also believes that there is a God who will wish to find him after death, but in vain.

6. Swifter than a Weaver’s Shuttle.—(Cf. 4:19-21; 9:25-26.) The brevity of life was no uncommon theme with the psalmists (Ps. 78:39; 103:16; 144:4). That brevity could never have been regarded as an evil had not life itself been held as a dear possession, with God as its source (see Expos. on 3:1; 6:8-13), his law its charter (Ps. 34:12-14), his providences in judgment and mercy its sanction (Pss. 27:1; 68:3). Job’s charge against heaven is that for him existence is both evil and brief—brief in fact if not in seeming. But never is his being here discounted as a matter of little worth. Any good concordance (s.v., “now”) will provide evidence enough and to spare of (a) how dominant throughout the O.T. was the sense of the value and significance of life; (b) how urgent its swift and moving finger (Ps. 90:12; contrast the fatalism of Omar Khayyám, The Rubáiyát, st. lxxi); (c) how sure its foothold in the infinite (concordance, s.v., “establish”); Ps. 90:17; see Expos. on 14:1-6).

7.10. Appeal for God’s Compassionate Intervention.—From beginning to end Job complains less of God’s injustice as the author of his calamities than of God’s injustice in failing to intervene as the vindicator of his “righteousness.” That there is no such intervention is the very seedbed of the bitterest of all his complaints (10:9-13). He will not bide God’s time; he will have God wait upon his.

Says Abraham Lincoln in Stephen Vincent Benét’s John Brown’s Body:

I am a patient man, and I can wait
Like an old gunflint buried in the ground
While the slow years pile up like moldering leaves
Above me, underneath the rake of Time.

That is my only virtue as I see it.

Then his thought goes back to his childhood and on to the death of Ann Rutledge, which had left his world so empty, and he remarks that despite what “the smarter people” say:

I can’t be smart the way that they are smart.
I’ve known that since I was an ugly child.
It teaches you—to be an ugly child.
It teaches you—to lose a thing you love.?

Far from being a thing of no possible import in this universe, Job regards his very frailty and

9. As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away; so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more.

10. He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more.

11. Therefore I will not refrain my mouth; I will speak in the anguish of my spirit; I will complain in the bitterness of my soul.

12. Am I a sea, or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me?

9-11. There is no resurrection (vss. 9-10). Therefore I will not restrain my mouth. The thought of the finality of death prompts him to ignore all moderation of language, even with God: the almost tender mood in which the prayer began is now turning into bitter expostulation. Almost every other blasphemous statement in the discourses of Job is thus announced by the hero's warning.

(2) Defiance (7:12-16)

12. Am I the sea, or a sea monster? The sea is the primeval ocean which the Creator has to keep within bonds in order to maintain security and peace in the inhabited world (Ps. 89:9 ff.; etc.). It is mentioned in parallelism with Rahab (26:12; Ps. 74:13) or Tehom (28:14; 38:16), and here with tannin, a sea monster, a poisonous snake (see Exod. 7:9 ff., Deut. 32:33; Ps. 91:13) which lives in the sea or in the subterranean abysses (Gen. 1:21; Pss. 74:13; 148:7; Isa. 27:1). The name tannin may be linguistically connected with those of Leviathan (see 3:8) and neiḥūštān, the serpent of brass. Job's query reveals a touch of satirical humor which is not without grandeur at this time of his spiritual extremity. A tortured man is here in effect saying to God, "Art thou afraid of me? Am I so important and powerful a hero that I risk endangering the whole universe?" The poet is a thoroughly Hebraic theologian, but his language is deeply marked by reminiscences of the ancient myths of creation. That thou settest a watch over me wretchedness as a kind of compulsion weighing on the heart of God. O remember that my life is wind—a breath of air which stirs for a moment in the treetops, and ripples swiftly across some field of grain; with never a chance of any happy issue, either in this world or in the next (vs. 7b). But more: beyond a mere capacity and willingness to respond, he attributes to God a lovingkindness which is already moving out on its immemorial quest, making through all human history, as we know now, its journey toward a Cross (see Exeg. on vss. 7-8, 21b; the RSV, mistakenly it would seem, interprets the appeal in vss. 7-10 as if it were addressed to the friends).

11. Under the Circumstances.—Victim as he is of life's brevity and death's dominion, Job half reluctantly, half defiantly, gives the Almighty notice that he is girding himself to the challenge. Caught in the grip of restless facts, himself almost transcended in the aching wistfulness of his attempt to state them, the prospect of breaking through his bondage into mastery, with all the travail of a rebirth even now begun, hardly seems to occur to him. At the top of his mind—Why not risk it? nothing worse can happen (13:15)—is the helpless rage of the vanquished, a man trapped and done for by his divine antagonist. He will therefore hurl his taunts at heaven and shake his fist. In the depths of his soul is the whispered answer of a love that cannot die to the Love that will never quit its search and go back home. Job as yet is unable to see himself anywhere, but under the circumstances. And God sets no man there.

12-16. The God Who Takes Advantage.—In our finiteness we both yearn toward the infinite and resist it. There are tides in our being, like the systole and diastole of God's own heartbeat; now broadly welcomed, away up some spreading estuary, lifting the world's traffic to the sea; thrown back now from every cliff and headland, as if for all our frailty we ourselves were saying, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed" (38:11). And indeed to refuse God's incessant offer of himself is to make one's self God. With 13 When I say, My bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint;
14 Then thou scarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me through visions:
15 So that my soul chooseth strangling, and death rather than my life.
16 I loathe it; I would not live alway: let me alone; for my days are vanity.
17 What is man, that thou shouldest magnify him? and that thou shouldest set thine heart upon him?

alludes to the Akkadian poem in which Marduk, having overcome the dragon, “drew a bolt and posted a watch, and charged them not to suffer her waters to come forth” (Enûma elîš IV. 138-40; see Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 67).

13-14. Thou scarest me: The patient is now discerning God’s deliberate hostility as it is displayed both in his own physical suffering and in his mental vagaries. Nightmares and insomnia entail a psychological disintegration which is ascribed to divine enmity.

15. My soul chooseth strangling: Again Job expresses the wish to die, but probably not by his own hands. “Death rather than my pains”: Reiske and most modern scholars emend the Hebrew יחלא, rather than my bones, into יחלא, rather than my bones.

16. The first word in the Hebrew is difficult. The verb אзн generally means “to despise,” “to reject,” “to spurn,” but it is used here intransitively. If an unexpressed direct object is supplied, like “death” (vs. 15) or life, then the sequence of thought between vs. 16א and vs. 16א is rather perplexing. The word אзн is probably the result of a scribal corruption (it does not appear in the LXX), and the original verb probably belonged to the preceding line (vs. 15ב), which is now too short (see Jerome’s recension and the Syro-Hexaplaric version). In the present M.T. the verb אзн may be associated with its cognate אзн, and the meaning may then be “I am pining away” or “I waste away” (ASV mg.; cf. Vulg., desperavi). Thus Job, once more having asked for death, once more reflects on the brevity of life and begs for a moment of respite: Let me alone—before I die!

(3) Bewildermment (7:17-21)

17-18. What is man, that thou shouldest magnify him? Most commentators agree in recognizing in this strophe a parody of Ps. 8 (provided, of course, that the latter sardonic humor Job wants to know if the Almighty sees anything in him like that vast swelling of primeval waters, that chaos which had to be overcome before Creation could have its way. What else does God see in every one of us? He sees in us a life of his own devising able to resist not his might—that never really comes under consideration—but his love. It is not of our human weakness that he sets himself to take advantage: it is of our human strength, his own free gift, that he must set himself to make what advantage he can. The bonds that hold us fast (vs. 12ב) are not by his decree, but by our consent. The plagues (vss. 15-15) are for those who are on his other side, away in an alien land (Exod. 11:7). Let me alone; and God would not. There is no respite. For my days are vanity; they would have been if he had had his way—a wraith of cloud under a burning sun, if heaven had loosed its hold. He was sure that God was against him. Who then could be for him? Even so, intuition kept making its demands (9.33, 17:3) and would not be denied. History will one day put another question on human lips (Rom. 8.31-32). A man may think he hears

Down the fair-chambered corridor of years,
The quiet shutting, one by one, of doors.*

But there is a hand that opens them too; and Job will catch sight of it.

17-18. Parodies of the Faith.—There are times when a man’s sense of his own insignificance, astronomically, geologically, and biologically sends through him a sort of cosmic chill, with 18 And that thou shouldest visit him every morning, and try him every moment?

19 How long wilt thou not depart from him?

18 dost visit him every morning, and test him every moment?
19 How long wilt thou not look away from me, poem antedates Job). While the psalmist wonders that the Creator of the starry skies would confer upon man dominion over nature, the tormented Arab wonders, not without irony, why such a great God makes him the center of divine attention. He asks why the Lord of the universe should visit puny man every morning, and test him every moment. Here again the language is similar to that of Ps. 8 (vs. 4b), although the verb יְצִיַּה in the psalm means “to visit with favor,” whereas it is rightly translated in Job “to inspect critically,” or “to visit with punishment.” Another psalmist deals with the same theme with an almost identical intent and, like Job, links the idea of life’s brevity (7:16) with that of God’s exaggeration of the importance of man’s sinfulness:

What is man that thou takest knowledge of him?
Or the son of man that thou shouldest think of him?
Man is like a silent breath;
His days are a shadow that paseth away (Ps. 144.3-4).

19. Till I swallow my spittle: Probably an Arabic proverbial expression. In 9:18, Job requests time to catch his breath.

results in modern life that scarcely need to be elaborated (cf. vs. 20a; 21:15; 22:12-14; Expos on 9:14-19; 25:6; 38:1-40:5). At other times it but underscores his bewildered awareness of that in him which by God’s grace and condescension is warrant enough for all the tumult he has caused in the history of salvation (Ps. 8). Pascal has said it for us:

Man is only a reed, the feeblest in nature; yet he is a thinking reed. It is not necessary for the Universe to take up arms in order to crush him. A vapor, a drop of water is enough to destroy him. Yet were the Universe to crush him, he would still be more noble than that which has destroyed him, because he knows that he dies, he knows that the Universe has the upper hand The Universe knows nothing about any of it.

In bitter mood Job parodies the psalmist’s faith, deliberately and resentfully twisting the words out of their context of wonder and awe to make them serve his turn of satirical reproach (cf. magnify with “thou hast made him a little lower than the angels”; set thine heart upon him, i.e., regard him with such fixed and hostile attention, with “thou art mindful of him”; dost visit him every morning with “thou visitest him”). The story is told of a soldier in World War I, his heart filled with thought of home and loved ones, fatally wounded just an hour before the armistice, looking up at the chaplain and gasping out brokenly with his last breath, as the roar of the guns suddenly ceased, “Isn’t this just like God!” Worse, however, than the bitter travesties which find their way to such lips are those that rarely if ever get put into words, though unnumbered thousands there are who live by them. “The state is my shepherd; I shall not want.” “Our privilege, which is of heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done.” “I believe in my own right arm, wherewithal to shape my world, and in the success that comes of it.” Always the parody has its origin in the heart’s idolatry: in Job’s case not materialism or self-complacency, as Blake would make out, but a traditional God, who had been fashioned by the tradition itself far too closely in man’s image. Let some heavy hammer of adversity shatter that idol, or any other, and faith turns into irony. Let the irony run its course, and what was a sneer becomes cold and calculating evil: gibes climb into crucifixions. Calvary was the place where God did his utmost to bring about a reversal, and to set Job’s final Te Deum (40:4b; 42:6) in every man’s heart.

19. Let Me Alone.— (Cf. Expos. on vs. 12-16; Luke 5:8.) In Francis Thompson’s “The Hound of Heaven” the drama of this same deep human resentment is wrought out.

Act I. The Flight of the Soul:

I fled Him, down the nights and down the days;
I fled Him, down the arches of the years;
I fled Him, down the labyrinthine ways
Of my own mind. . . .

6 Thoughts, “The Greatness and Littleness of Man.”
me, nor let me alone till I swallow down my spittle?
20 I have sinned; what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men? why hast thou set me as a mark against thee, so that I am a burden to myself?

20. If I sin, what do I do to thee, thou watcher of men? Job does not acknowledge any crime, but he becomes concerned with the possibility of his sinfulness. He had already rejected any suggestion of his "error" (6:24). Now for the first time he uses the technical term הָשָׁם, "to be a sinner," and he wonders whether he has committed any sin which might explain the depth of his misery. But no, even if he had sinned, he should not be punished in such a singular fashion. How can a human action concern the divine glory? With incomparable skill and penetration the poet reveals how acutely aware he is both of the nature of sin and of the character of God. By implication he indicates on the one hand that Job at this early stage still considers sin as moral failure rather than as offense or a revolt against God; and on the other hand, that essential sinfulness lies in refusing to recognize that man's behavior is the constant concern of God. Job calls for a Deity who would be impassive and insensitive to human conduct. That implied wish constitutes his real blasphemy. Should not the God of the universe be far beyond any reach of man's capacity to hurt him? The hero portrays himself as if he were a theologian intent upon the seemingly noble task of purging his conception of the Deity from any stain of anthropopathy. But such a god is an idol, the product of the mind of man.

Act II. The Unhurrying Chase:

Still with unhurrying chase,
And unperturbed pace,
Deliberate speed, majestic instancy,
Came on the following Feet,
And a Voice above their beat—"Naught shelters thee, who wilt not shelter Me."

Act III. The Child's Mistake:

All which I took from thee I did but take,
Not for thy harms,
But just that thou might'st seek it in My arms.
All thy child's mistake
Fancies as lost, I have stored for thee at home.²

20a. The Watcher of Men.—H. G. Wells has told of the great eye painted on the wall of a Sunday-school room just above the platform, with the inscription that ran beneath it, "Thou God seest me" (Gen. 16:13); and of how the memory of it day after day rankled in his mind when he was a boy. When he had his hand in the cracker box, it was no comfort. So it is that what God does in mercy (cf. Ps. 121:4-5) is mistaken for what he does in judgment. To the rebellious heart, as to the guilty conscience, the watcher (or preserver) becomes the spy (cf. 1:10; 5:23b; 54:21-28), and "so much the better" gives way to "so much the worse."

7:21 The Interpreter's Bible

| 21 And why dost thou not pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity? for now shall I sleep in the dust; and thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall not be. | 21 Why dost thou not pardon my transgression and take away my iniquity? For now I shall lie in the earth; thou wilt seek me, but I shall not be. |

---

Why have I become a burden to thee? The reading to myself (KJV) is that of the M.T., which in turn represents one of the eighteen corrections of the scribes (cf. Vol. I, p. 51). The LXX has preserved the original with its rendering ἐν την οὐ. Jewish scribes of the early Christian Era, influenced as they were by philosophical beliefs in divine impassibility, could not accept the idea that man may be a burden upon God, although such a bold statement should not be surprising in this context.

21a. Why dost thou not pardon my transgression? Is not forgiveness the essential attribute of God? Dieu me pardonnera, c'est son métier, exclaimed Voltaire. “God will forgive me, it’s his job.” A further display of the hero’s incomprehension of the theological dimension of sinfulness.

21b. The titan’s boldness is now spent. The idea of forgiveness has crossed the threshold of his consciousness and leads him back to the motif of vs. 8. He once more considers God not as the suspected markman, but as the compassionate seeker of the creature. Thou wilt seek me: The verb נִשָּׁב, coined from a noun meaning “dawn” or “deep darkness before dawn,” is used of wild asses eagerly seeking their food (24:5) or of man longing for God (Hos. 5:15; Isa. 26:9; Pss. 63:1; 78:34; Prov. 7:15; cf. Prov. 1:28; 6:6, 22).

---

Yes, with rapt face and sparkling eyes,
Swinging the hot globe out between the skies,

And then—
Men!
I see it now.
O God, forgive my pettish row!
I see your job. While ages crawl
Your lips take laboring lines, your eyes a sadder light,
For man, the fire and flower and center of it all—Man won’t come right!
Alter your patient centuries,
Fresh starts, recastings, tired Gethsmanes
And tense Golgothas, he, your central theme,
Is just a jangling echo of your dream.
Grand as the rest may be, he ruins it.
Why don’t you quit?
Crumple it all and dream again! But no;
Flaw after flaw, you work it out, revise, refine—
Bondage, brutality, and war, and woe,
The sod, the fool, the tyrant and the mob—
Dear God, how you must love your job!
Help me, as I love mine.º

---

To say to such a God, Why dost thou not pardon my transgression?—forgive me and have done with it—was blasphemy against the human soul and the Love that one day would die for it.

21c. Half Love Is Half Hate.—(See Expos. on vss. 7-10.) The mind of Job is a battlefield.

---

8:17; even 13.24). Thus the hero is once more reaching for the hope already expressed in vs. 8b. Through a swift—and quickly spent—reversal of mood which is quite characteristic of human psychology, he obtains in a flash the vision of a loving God. The transition from vs. 21ab to vs. 21c is quite clear. Why should not God forgive the man who is a sinner, especially—Job assumes—if that man is not a sinner? Of course, some day God will once more move eagerly toward his servant. "He will long to renew the old communion" (Peake, Job, p. 106). It is possible, however, that the poet did not intend to convey this idea at all. Inasmuch as the Piel of the verb רָשׁׁא was well known in the sense of "to look diligently and eagerly," one can understand how the traditional interpretation arose. The poet may have even used another verb רָשׁׁא meaning "to blacken" (rabbinical Hebrew Hiphil, Aramaic Pael). If this were the case, Job would merely describe, in utter dejection, the deathly prospect which is before him:

For now I am going to lie down in the dust
And thou shalt darken my face, and I shall not be.

It would be strange, however, that the poet would have used this uncommon verb here while using the other and better known one in Job 24:5, and would thus have run the risk of being misunderstood. The traditional interpretation, therefore, is probably correct. Thus the sufferer is expressing the certainty that God will in the end go about in the gloom of Sheol, groping in the obscurity, looking diligently for his human friend, in an earnest gesture of salvation—but it will be too late: "I shall be no more." The ebb and flow of the sufferer's moods are faithfully and subtly recorded. Receding from the aggressiveness of a persecuted animal, Job rediscovers for a short while the security of being loved as a son, but even this fleeting certainty is cut short by the ultimate bitterness: Death will be final, and God's belated move will be in vain. Thus the poet twists man's desperate clinging to the belief in God's love into a grim joke upon the Deity's frustration.

Every image that lifts above the horizon is raked with crossfire.

Between him and the God of wrath, who hates him, as his afflictions prove, there rises a vision of the God of grace, who surely still loves him, as blessed memories and a good conscience assure him; and at once the sufferer's loud and bitter cries soften to notes of pleading remonstrance. Since God must, as he assumes, sooner or later forgive the sins which have offended Him (whatever they may be), and come back to renew the old fellowship, he pathetically asks why not now, ere it be too late? a

God does indeed speak:

Poor human heart,
I know the ecstasy of all thy pain,
The anguish of thy joy.
The smile thou wearst
Cannot hide from Me
The traces of thy tears,
Or fill the deep hollows of remembered grief.
Thou bearest thyself so bravely:
I wish thou wert less assured!
Then might this orphaned pity in My breast
Find solace for itself
In the coverless pleading of thine eyes—
And tend thy hurt,
And tending be at peace!

But Man answers:

I heed Thee not.
I was not fashioned for Thy care,
To lean on Thee and hope
And wait Thy slow compassion
To overtake my lot.
Speak when Thou art spoken to!
I keep my silence,
Let Thy mercy abide with Thee:
I care not for it!
My eyes are clear—
Save for this one last shadow
That steals across my sun;
And the chill wind that shudders down the valleys!
God! I cannot go! Art Thou near enough to hear? b

Sterile indifference is the one mood that is absent. Job is a house divided (Matt. 12:25). The psychologist would talk of split personality, the physicist of unstable equilibrium. The condition cannot long persist without getting better or worse. The best that can be said of it is that it is fraught with possibilities. Fecundity, not sterility, is the word now. The man who comes out of it will be anything but neutral (cf. Mark 9:40, tolerance of others, with Matt. 12:30, intolerance as regards the self). He will

Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,
1 How long wilt thou speak these things?
and how long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind?

3. First Discourse of Bildad (8:1-22)

a) Divine Justice (8:1-7)

8:2-4. Bildad's position is basically the same as that of Eliphaz, but his attack is different. He begins abruptly, as if out of anger. He cannot endure the irreverence with which Job has spoken (ch. 7) of "the ways of God with men." He is probably a nervous, impulsive, extremely convinced believer, whose religious feelings have been painfully hurt. That may be the reason why he starts without the traditional considerations of courtesy. "How long wilt thou discourse like that?" (Vs. 2a.) For him Job's eloquence is comparable to a "stormy wind" (vs. 2b) since it is directed against the cardinal dogma of divine righteousness. Doth God pervert . . . justice (vs. 3a)? In Bildad's mind a rhetorical question is sufficient to dispose of the mystery of apparent injustice upon tend to be all love (creative) or all hate (destructive).

8:1-22. A Word from the Wise.—How long will you go on talking such violent nonsense? It is Bildad's turn, and he makes no attempt to conceal his impatience. His is the mood of one who would say

I am Sir Oracle,
And when I ope my lips, let no dog bark! a

What! God pervert justice? The Almighty? Who could ever conceive of such a thing? Take your own case for example. Without any further beating about the bush, the suspicion which has been lying dormant in the mind of each of the friends begins to break out into words: Your children have been cut off. Surely that was the result of their sin. While the very fact that you yourself have been spared is indication enough that if you will repent, and so become pure and upright, God will bestir himself for you, and establish you far more firmly than of old. That would be fair enough, would it not? Then in mellower strain: Our fathers' fathers have taught us, in those days when men lived long and were wise, that the godless are rooted out—like the tender green reeds, they used to say, that wilt and perish when the waters recede, before anybody lays a hand on them. The confidence of the wicked, so runs the ancient proverb, is no more than a spider's web. They trust in their wealth, and lo, they are gone. They lay hold on the stones and wither. Their place knows them no more. They die, with none of their offshoots surviving, and others come after them. It is as if they had not been. So just is God. He will not then destroy you in your integrity. But neither shall any evil stand before his face. You shall rejoice with us, and with others like us who are your friends It is rather your enemies, and all such ungodly folk, that shall go down into the dust.

Bildad feels certain that Job, judging from some of the things he has said (6:29; 7:3, 11 ff.), is making the most fatuous of all possible mistakes: he is denying to God the moral discernment which he claims for himself (5:30). Eliphaz, on the basis of knowledge immediate and revealed, had wanted him to see himself as God saw him; Bildad, on the basis of knowledge which had been handed down from generation to generation, wanted him to give God credit for seeing with some clarity. If Job could tell white from black, so could the Almighty. He was not likely to be confused as between the sheep and the goats. What had happened was proof enough. The only difference between Job and his children was that his sin had not yet proved fatal. He still had a chance. Never mind the man's suffering. Never mind his repeated avowals of innocence. Never mind any of the accusations he had brought against his three friends. All of that was beside the point. Dismiss it. What was not beside the point was this: that God unfailingly does ways, not with the righteous, but with the godless. You could look it up in the books and see. Every fine old maxim of the past, every sonorous tradition of the fathers, put it beyond question. Let Job take it to heart (vs. 20-22). Already he had had a taste of it. One can hardly keep from noting the parallels with his experience in vs. 14-19 (cf. vs. 14a with 4:6b). How could he possibly be right and everybody else be wrong?

1-7. Recipe for Revolt.—How long . . . ? So does Cicero begin his orations against Catiline, "How long wilt thou continue to abuse our earth. His anger prompts him to be cruel. While Eliphaz had true sympathy for Job and had not intended insult, Bildad, on the contrary, posing as God’s champion (or thinking himself to be—as his name suggests—“God’s darling”) sharpens his dagger to wound Job precisely where he knew he would hurt the most: at the heart of a father whose children are dead. “Thy sons were sinners, and that is the reason for their sudden and premature death. God hath delivered them into the power of their transgression.” This remarkable formula may imply that death is not so much a penalty which is inflicted after the judge of all men has considered the merits of the case: The omnipotent ruler of the universe, conceived in strictly monistic terms, allows death to follow sin in a quasi-impersonal process, as an immediate and inherent result of man’s crime; or rather, transgression is boldly personified (cf. Gen. 4:7)—it possesses within itself the power (Hebrew, “hand”) of destruction.

But it was a “patient,” not a criminal, whom Bildad was treating with impatience. Nothing but revolt can come of it. Accuse the sick, and let the sickness go. If somebody violates your principles, or offends your faith, or hurts your feelings, never deal with the cause; it is so much easier to deal with the person. Tell him he talks too much, what he says makes no sense. Show your resentment. Fasten on the wild words he has spoken. Undoubtedly the misfortunes he has suffered are an excellent illustration of the inevitable results. Explain him to himself. Make it clear to him how stupid he is. And be sure you hold fast to your theories at this point. No matter about the facts. Hold out to him glib promises, if only he will change his way of looking at things and adopt yours. Labor, the Negro, communism: the world has any number of “patients” on its hands. Treat them with impatience. There is no surer means of getting on—with the revolution!

3. Dismissing a Mystery.—Not infrequently is the attempt made to dismiss a mystery with a rhetorical question (see Exeg.). Here the mystery is the mystery of innocent suffering. No “explanation” of it is possible. Explanations are therefore not called for. Every suggestion that can be offered is bound to oversimplify the problem in one way or another. In John 9 the Jews asked Jesus about the man born blind, “Did this man sin, or his parents?” And Jesus would have none of it. They tried again in Luke 18, this time about the Galileans, “whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices.” And Jesus would have none of it. Only that sharp word, “Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.” The perplexity will not be resolved anywhere but on the field of action (see Expos. on 1:12). Bildad’s strategy is particularly futile. He tries to get around the difficulty when nobody is looking. He will execute a flanking movement. Laugh it out of court. Use exclamation points. Scare people away from it. The emphasis in both lines of vs. 8 is first on the subject and then on the verb. There may well have been subtle innuendoes in the very tone of Bildad’s voice. Inflection often takes the place of argument, and carries a sharper sting in its tail. “You perhaps; not God!”

The trouble is that when you meet trouble with a truism you make trouble. To say that whatever apparent discrepancies there are in the divine ordering of the universe will be set right in good time (vss. 5-7) may qualify you, strangely enough, as either a wise man or a fool: a wise man for believing it (cf. 42:12-17), a fool for saying it. Far better to acknowledge the mystery—which remains mystery for all your pains. Better still to have traveled that way yourself in faith and fortitude (John 20:27; see Expos. on 36:18-25). Something may happen then. Not otherwise. Meanwhile, no short cuts! No fool’s gold that can pave nothing but a fool’s paradise. One might wish, for instance, that hate were born only of blindness, that love would come with sight. Poets have said so—and in saying so have got no more than the soles of their feet wet in the facts. Ignorance is not the only “maker of hell”; nor do “sympathy, charity, kindness” always come of knowledge. They come of love, which has its cradle neither in blindness nor in sight, but elsewhere—in the very heart of the mystery.

4. The Mills of God.—One would not impugn the moral order; but must we be forever exalting...
5 If thou wouldest seek unto God betimes, and make thy supplication to the Almighty;
6 If thou wert pure and upright; surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous.
7 Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase.

To be sure, Bildad may conversely have meant, by accusing the dead sons, to excuse the father still alive, and his words would then have been inspired by a pastoral intent. If that is the case, “God’s darling” is the type of the fumbling counselor.

5-6. If you will seek God and make supplication to the Almighty: Lit., “implore grace” (Hithpael). If Job becomes pure and upright, God will do his part and “bring peace, health, and prosperity [בִּיוֹנָשׁ] to the home of [Job’s] righteousness” (vs. 6c). Such a conditional restoration reveals a strange conception of “grace”: Bildad’s words presuppose between God and man a moralistic relation in which man achieves his own righteousness and remains the author of his salvation.

7. “Thy former state will appear insignificant compared to thy future greatness.” As Dhorme points out, beginning (תַּחְשָׁרוֹת) and end (תַּחְשָׁרוֹן) refer respectively to a man’s former and latter conditions (cf. 42:12, where the same words are used; see also the LXX rendering of this verse, τὰ μὲν πρῶτὰ σου ... τὰ δὲ ἑσχατὰ σου; cf. Matt. 12:45; Luke 11:26; II Pet. 2:20).

The mills of God were by way of fact; the presence of God by way of courtesy. In a world where even the so-called “laws of nature” have been written down as a kind of “convention,” and that by no less a luminary than Bertrand Russell, may it not be that “the moral order” is another plum we pull out of the Christmas pie by putting in a thumb? G. K. Chesterton once remarked that the sun rises every morning because God says, “Get up!” Deism believed in a Person, but got rid of him. He became an absentee landlord. Christianity confronts him. What else is there to do at last with a Person, a troublesome Person, who keeps saying “I” and “thou” in daily encounter? Bildad’s words are filled with very considerate if’s (vss. 4-6); and all of them raise in Job’s mind very considerable buts—which no circumlocution will ever circumvent, least of all this dodging behind a process (9:17-18, 24c; 31a; 13:24-27).

7. All Will Come Right.—Each insists on it: Eliphaz, with all the ornaments of rhetoric (5:17-26); Bildad, in the present passage, with something more of prose than of poetry; Zophar, with much more detailed reference than either of the others to Job’s immediate condition (11:15-19). After the first cycle they give it up unanimously as an unlikely prospect. Of course the disconcerting response in all such circumstances is “How do you know?” And Job in effect makes it (14:7-12). These men must not, however, be reckoned meanwhile as sheer optimists. There is more here than the mood which flourishes best, as another has put it, in the lunatic asylum; more than what Voltaire once called “the madness of maintaining that everything is right when it is wrong.” ¹ They at least base their forecasts on Job’s fundamental integrity and God’s elemental justice (vss. 20-22). What they say misses the mark nonetheless, not because there is no truth in it—their prophecies are fulfilled to the letter—but chiefly because future relief is never a very potent remedy for present grief. Add to that two footnotes, and the indictment will be complete: (a) They all alike take it for granted that Job is hurt more in body and estate than in mind. Satan too was

¹ Longfellow, “Retribution.”

² Candide, ch. xix.
8 For inquire, I pray thee, of the former age, and prepare thyself to the search of their fathers:
9 (For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, because our days upon earth are a shadow:)
10 Shall not they teach thee, and tell thee, and utter words out of their heart?
11 Can the rush grow up without mire?
can the flag grow without water?
12 Whilst it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb.
13 So are the paths of all that forget God;
and the hypocrite's hope shall perish:

8 "For inquire, I pray you, of bygone ages, and consider what the fathers have found;
9 for we are but of yesterday, and know nothing,
for our days on earth are a shadow.
10 Will they not teach you, and tell you, and utter words out of their understanding?
11 "Can papyrus grow where there is no marsh?
Can reeds flourish where there is no water?
12 While yet in flower and not cut down, they wither before any other plant.
13 Such are the paths of all who forget God;
the hope of the godless man shall perish.

b) Testimony of the Past (8.8-19)

8-10. The tradition of the ancient sages (vs. 8) is needed by man whose life is too short to afford adequate experience (vs. 9). Bildad is more of a didactic dogmatically than Eliphaz. The latter had appealed to his own brand of revelation: “A ghost in the night came and told me” (4:12 Œ). He probably fancied that he was in some way like the prophets of old. Bildad, on the contrary, is a mere teacher of religion. He knows the creed and that is enough. The source of his enlightenment is not a personal contact with a present God, but scholarly learning and archaeological hoarding. He is a "paleoorthodox" type of theologian appealing to the past without realizing that the present requires the rethinking of formulas which are no longer adequate.

11-13. The wisdom of the former sages as preserved in proverbs (vs. 11-12) shows that all who forget God wither before others (vs. 13a). The hanēph (vs. 13b), certain that these would prove his vulnerable points (1:11; 2:5). They were not at all. His vulnerable point was a relationship which he thought had been destroyed. (b) They all alike misconceive the nature of man, the grace of God, and the proximate cause of true repentance (see Exeg.; Expos. on 5:18).

8-10. The Tyranny of Tradition.—Inquire, I pray thee, of the former age. The habit of romanticizing the past is well-nigh universal.
To Bildad the age of the patriarchs, when men lived long and grew wise, was the golden age.
It is interesting enough to take casual note of the fact that the setting of the poem is itself, from beginning to end, a patriarchal setting (cf.
1:5; 42:16). Whether or not by inadvertence the author represents Bildad as belonging to the very time which he so highly esteems, yet given over to the praise of a time gone by—a not uncommon state of affairs. Such people always discount the present, which a moment's thought might tell them is "the heir of all the ages" and therefore in a better position than any of its forebears to profit by inheritance. So does tradition lay its "dead hand" on the living. Instead of serving from its place of vantage as a lookout, it takes over the helm. The thrill of it is lost in quotation marks. Proverbs turn into burial grounds. To recapture the life that gave rise to it is to break the bonds of its tyranny and live again: to seek as others before us sought (vs.
8b), rather than simply to con their wisdom by rote (cf. the use too often made of the Apostles' Creed as a test of orthodoxy; at most it is the soul's avowal of trust in response to an ultimate beckoning, at least it is a kind of "invitation to pilgrimage") until we too can speak as they spoke, uttering words out of our heart (vs. 10b).

11-19. The End of Those Who Forget God.—
(Cf. Expos. on 5:12-16, 14.) Eliphaz speaks of them as frustrated, trapped, blind men groping at noonday; Bildad, in the manner of the International Encyclopedia of Prose and Poetical Quotations, records the brilliant metaphors of the past. The godless are a reed, a spider, a plant, their trust betrayed (cf. vs. 15 with Amos 5:19), no trace of them left on the earth.
There is enough fact in it (Ps. 57) to make it 14 Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be a spider’s web.
15 He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand: he shall hold it fast, but it shall not endure.
16 He is green before the sun, and his branch shooteth forth in his garden.
17 His roots are wrapped about the heap, and seeth the place of stones.
18 If he destroy him from his place, then it shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee.
19 Behold, this is the joy of his way, and out of the earth shall others grow.

14 His confidence breaks in sunder, and his trust is a spider’s web.9
15 He leans against his house, but it does not stand; he lays hold of it, but it does not endure.
16 He thrives before the sun, and his shoots spread over his garden.
17 His roots twine about the stone-heap; he lives among the rocks.9
18 If he is destroyed from his place, then it will deny him, saying, ’I have never seen you.’
19 Behold, this is the joy of his way; and out of the earth others will spring.

9 Heb house
9 Gk Vg Heb uncertain

originally “a profane person” (Jer. 3:1; Ps. 106:38), is a renegade and disbeliever who betrays (or forsweares) his holy mission (cf. Isa. 10:6).

14-19. Bildad admits that strange situations appear to contradict the dogma of God’s righteousness. Ultimately, however, the evildoer will receive his retribution. His confidence is without solid basis (vss. 14-15) and his security superficial (vss. 16-18). Behold, this is the joy of his way. Such an exclamation should be interpreted ironically, unless the M.T. is corrupt. Instead of וָסָעַת, joy, the LXX probably read מִשְׁמָרָת or מֵאֲשָׁא (Beer, et al.) since they translated καταστροφή. Dörner conjectures that the spelling מִשְׁמָרָת may easily be a variant for מִשְׁמָרָה, which in turn could derive from a verbal stem מָשָׁר, meaning “to decay.” Thus the poet would continue here the image of the plant, and vs. 19 might be translated as follows:

Behold, here he is, rotten on his way,
And from the soil another will sprout

(i.e., out of the renegade’s own decay). Forceful language, and a fitting climax to the strophe.

stranger than fiction, and enough fiction in it, (ch. 21) to make all of it too tenuous for any rating with empirical fact. As proof of God’s justice it is of doubtful value; as witness to life’s often ambiguous, yet always persistent disavowal of the evil, it is as valid today as ever it was. Around that disavowal a whole body of the world’s great literature has grown up. The Bible, with its belief in God’s decisive intervention (apocalypse) and its doctrine of the last things (eschatology), is not the only book which is aware of some ultimate meaning in the ups and downs of human life and civilization: a meaning decipherable only to the eyes of faith. To leave God out of it all, and so to reduce the whole thing to gibberish, is one of the prerogatives of moral freedom; to be rid of him by leaving him out is not. Arthur James Ballou tried his hand at it one night, and wailed on to his heart’s content.

[Man’s] very existence is an accident, his story a brief and transitory episode in the life of one of the meanest of the planets, . . . with conscience enough to feel that it is vile, and intelligence enough to know that it is insignificant . . . : blood and tears, . . . wild revolt, . . . stupid acquiescence, [going] down into the pit, [where] all his thoughts will perish. . . . Matter will know itself no longer . . . Death itself, and love stronger than death, will be as though they had never been. Nor will anything that is be better or be worse for all that the labour, genius, devotion, and suffering of man have striven through countless generations to effect.9

Job never even thought to make the attempt. Meaning kept forever intruding itself, intolerably. Life’s tragic inequities grinned at all the glib talk about a just God. Let him rather then have his say about a God who was unjust

20 Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evildoers:
21 Till he fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoicing.
22 They that hate thee shall be clothed with shame; and the dwelling place of the wicked shall come to nought.

Then Job answered and said,
2 Then I know it is so of a truth: but how should man be just with God?

20-22. God will not reject a blameless man: Job still has time to change his attitude. Like Eliphaz, Bildad still hopes that Job is essentially a man of integrity (see William A. Irwin, “An Examination of the Progress of Thought in the Dialogue of Job,” Journal of Religion, XIII [1933], 151; “The First Speech of Bildad,” Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, LI [1933], 205-16). It seems as if, toward the end of his speech, Bildad regrets the violence of his exordium or outburst. His peroration is thus warmer, more friendly than one might have expected. While Eliphaz was long-winded and not quite convincing in his description of Job’s future restoration (see 5:23-27), Bildad is surprisingly concise and concrete. God will yet fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoicing. Those who now hate Job will be clothed with shame. Once more the poet deserves high praise. His characters are not wooden types. They live. They are men. We recognize ourselves in their portraiture.

4. Job's Reply to Bildad (9:1-10:22)

As pointed out in the Intro. (pp. 892-93), the poet appears to follow a method of discussion which might be called “delayed reaction.” Job answers not the immediately preceding speaker, but the penultimate one. The first part of his present discourse (9:2-31) is a discussion of the thesis of Eliphaz; the second part (9:32-10:22) is a meditation on the character of God which again turns into a prayer.

a) Man's Guilt Before God (9:1-51)

(1) Reason for Man's Guilt (9:1-7)

9:2-7. As if he had had time to meditate on the first speech of Eliphaz, Job quotes the latter’s cardinal statement with seeming approval:

(9:30-31; 10:15). If there were nothing that could gather up that dreadful contradiction into a reality beyond, a reality that could affirm the justice without a simple denial of the injustice, there could be for him no renewal of faith. It was a problem that had to be lived out, not thought out. Always it must wait for “the final account God gives of Himself.” There is no theodicy apart from theophany. God's justification is his self-revelation. “The supreme theodicy is atonement.”

20-22. Just You Wait!—(See Expos. on vs. 7.) There is more to do, always more to do, than just to wait. Waiting in Scripture has content.

It is not a form of idleness (see concordance s.v. “wait”). For all three friends the interval was to be marked by repentance (vs. 5; cf. 5:8; 11:13-19). If Job had allowed them to persuade him, he would thereby have uttered the final blasphemy against God (2:8) and his own soul (13:15); for what they urged upon him would have been a denial of the one and a betrayal of the other. His waiting was quest, and it came into its own.

9:1-10:22. Job's Reply to Bildad.—For a moment Job seems scarcely to have heard Bildad at all. He has been brooding over something Eliphaz said. But one thing will lead to another, and he will catch up soon enough. The sequence of thought becomes clear when we understand what his mind, embittered by his pain and bewildered by his wretchedness, has been doing. It can fairly be seen twisting and pulling at the stuff that has been given it to work with, as he thinks out loud about Eliphaz' revelation, with its swelling and sententious maxim, "Can mortal man be righteous before God?" (4:17.) In chs. 6-7 he has attempted to justify his complaint on the ground of (a) the acuteness of his misery: and as if his cup were not already full, (b) the spurious comfort of his friends; to say nothing of what meant most, (c) the gratuitous suffering with which the Almighty has afflicted him.

In chs. 9-10 he comes to both the explanations that have been offered. Throwing logic to the winds, out of his passion he frames his own solution: no man can be just before God for the very simple reason that God will not permit it. There may be nothing at all wrong with the man. There must therefore be something wrong with God, Bildad notwithstanding. He does "pervert judgment" (8:3). "If . . . not he, who then is it?" (9:24c.) The premise is the premise of all human helplessness: man stands accused before God because God wants it that way, and has power enough to see to it. Job realizes that for one reason or another a trial of sorts is on foot, and he is at the bar, whether as defendant (9:3) or plaintiff (9:16) makes no difference. Something is being held against him—his misfortunes make that self-evident—and he has no way of knowing what it is. The one thing quite plain to him is that he is bound to lose the case. One might well compare Franz Kafka's novel, The Trial.8 There the hero "K"—scarcely an impenetrable veil for the concealment of Kafka himself—is shadowed, arrested, accused, arraigned, tried, and executed without ever finding out really what it is all about. The whole movement of Job's mind comes very near lending itself to the interpretation which Kafka would have us put on K's mind: as an allegory of human existence, a study in the psychology of guilt, a transcript from the records of almost any psychiatrist.

How could anybody make good his case against God? You talk of angels (4:18); I say anybody: poor run-of-the-mill humanity, men wise and mighty (9:4) even the gods themselves (9:18; see Exeg. on 9 8-13). That Power yonder can do as he likes. The world is his from tip to toe. He can make it or break it. He can adorn it or ravish it (9:12), and who will say him nay? What is there to do but to give up (9:15)? He will not listen to anybody. Here am I with my sores. He would strike me dumb. I could only mumble out who knows what. But I will not be browbeaten by him. Come what may, I tell you he makes no distinction between the good and the evil. Where to draw the line indeed! He laughs when the innocent suffer. He not only puts up with wickedness, he arranges for it. With my life fast ebbing out of me, he keeps pronouncing his verdict on me, no matter what I do. He keeps saying that I am guilty. If he were only a man! If only somebody who knows us both could step in between us! But there is no such thing. I am alone (9:35b; see Exeg.), and sick of my life anyway (10:1). God, why do you do it? Of what possible good is it? What pleasure, or profit, or sembliness? Or is it all simply inhuman? There is no conceivable reason for it. You know very well I am not guilty. Was all your kindness to me just a cover for the malice in your heart from the beginning? Did you plan it like this at the start? For pity's sake, have done with it, and let me go to my grave.

2-10. God the All-terrible.—Job is quite willing to recognize and affirm the truth of much that has been said (see Exeg.); but it is so because of God's omnipotence, not because of any sense he might have of fair play (8:5).9

8 Cf. the speech of Ahab in Herman Melville, Moby Dick, ch. xxxii: "Oh! thou dear spirit of clear fire, whom on these seas I as Persian once did worship, till in the sacramental act so burned by thee, that to this hour I bear the scar; I now know thee, thou clear spirit, and I now know that thy right worship is defiance. To neither love nor reverence wilt thou be kind; and onen for hate thou canst but kill; and all are killed. No fearless fool now fronts thee. I own thy speechless, placeless power; but to the last gasp of my earthquake life will dispute its unconditional, unintegral mastery in me. In the midst of the personified impersonal, a personality stands here. Though but a point at best; whenceso'er I came, where soe'er I go; yet while I earthly live, the queenly personality lives in me, and feels her royal rights. But war is pain, and hate is woe. Come in thy lowest form of love, and I will kneel and kiss thee, but at thy highest, come as mere supernal power; and though thou launchest navies of full-freighted worlds, there's that in here that still remains indifferent. Oh, thou clear spirit, of where thou maddest me, and like a true child of fire, I breathe it back to thee."

3 If he will contend with him, he cannot answer him one of a thousand.
4 He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength: who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered?

of evil, but solely in his recognition of God's arbitrary omnipotence. In a contest of strength with the Deity, mortal man would be silenced at once (vs. 3). Even among the best of human beings, the wise in heart, and mighty in strength: who hath hardened himself against him, and has remained whole? Against the versions one may perhaps consider the words wise in heart, and mighty in strength not as attributes of God, but and bitterness and resentment and fear—when love was gone (cf. I John 4:14-19). But there is something more to be said.

Love without power is impotent (see Expos. on vs. 24). It is not permitted that we open Paul's Epistle to the Romans and begin reading at ch. 8. We may not exult in denatured love, or water down the judgment and the might in order to satisfy a taste for concentrated solutions of goodness and mercy. Men of old used to turn loose all the music in their souls on

Come hither, ye faithful, triumphantly sing;
Come see in the manger the angels' dread King!

But "dread King" proved altogether too robust. The lines had to be made safe for boys and girls:

O come, all ye faithful, joyfully triumphant,
O come ye, O come ye to Bethlehem!

It was marked "irregular" because nobody could scan it, and even to untrained ears it sounded like three wooden legs and a half. But it got rid of that word "dread." No one, not even the youngest, need be frightened anymore. They used to sing, those men of old, another hymn that set out bravely enough: "God the All-terrible! King, who ordainest." Somewhat later it was made to read, "God the Omnipotent. . . ." trimming it down a little. That, however, was still too strong for delicate constitutions; so a good many hymnals omitted a stanza and began with "God the All-merciful." Then somebody noticed that even this went on to speak of how man had forsaken the ways of the Eternal and slighted his word. Whereupon that too was dropped. Quite a number of versions now had nothing at all about "man hath defied thee" or "the fire of thy chastening": just God the All-righteous One! When we obey thee, Earth shall to freedom and truth be restored.

Three fifths of the original had been lost in the interests of sweetness and light. When suddenly 5 Which removeth the mountains, and they know not; which overturneth them in his anger;
6 Which shakest the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble;
7 Which commandeth the sun, and it riseth not; and sealeth up the stars;
8 Which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea;

5 he who removes mountains, and they know it not, when he overturns them in his anger;
6 who shakes the earth out of its place, and its pillars tremble;
7 who commands the sun, and it does not rise;
8 who alone stretched out the heavens, and trampled the waves of the sea;

as characteristics of men who dare to oppose the Deity. The sequence of thought would then be quite clear from vs. 2 to vs. 4. How could man, a weakling, be just with God? Even the wisest and mightiest man cannot safely oppose him. The traditional rendering, nevertheless, is probably right, for there is no example of qualifying adjectives preceding the interrogative pronoun ו. Vs. 4a may therefore constitute the anticipation of the doxology which is unfolded in vs. 5 ff.

(2) The Amorality of Omnipotence (9:8-13)

8-12. The doxology continues in the second strophe and is cut short as Job applies its significance to his own case: if God so completely transcends the created cosmos, no

God entered the pulpit, and preached in his own way by deeds. And his sermons were long and taxing, and they spoiled the dinner. So P. T. Forsyth put it toward the end of World War I:

Clearly God's problem with the world is much more serious than we dreamed. We are having a revelation of the awful and desperate nature of evil. The task which the Cross has to meet is something much greater than a pacific, domestic, fraternal type of religion allows us to face. Disaster should end clarity and dreamy religion, and give some rest to the winsome Christ and the wooing note... It is a much wickeder world than our good nature had come to imagine, or our prompt piety to fathom. We see more of the world Christ saw,.... And it must cast us back on resources in that Saviour which the mental levity of comfortable religion, lying back for a warm bath in its pew, was coming to stigmatise as gratuitous theology. The salvation of the world is a much greater agony and victory than any but the very elite of the Church's faith had seen, and it calls for more than a Cross merely kind and sacrificial, or a Gospel but blithe and wise.

We have to realize, however, the limitations which God himself has set on his power, that men might rise to their full stature, unencumbered by an intrusive and self-asserting omnipotence. He does not sign his sunsets as Turner did, or blazon his name across the tempest or the earthquake in letters monstrous high. Whatever other purpose the speeches of the Almighty have (see Expos. on 58:1-42:6), they are not intended to cow Job into subsis-

978
9 Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south;
10 Which doeth great things past finding out: yea, and wonders without number.
11 Lo, he goeth by me, and I see him not: he passeth on also, but I perceive him not.
12 Behold, he taketh away, who can hinder him? who will say unto him, What doest thou?
13 If God will not withdraw his anger, the proud helpers do stoop under him.

9 who made the Bear and Orion, the Pleiades and the chambers of the south;
10 who does great things beyond understanding, and marvelous things without number.
11 Lo, he passes by me, and I see him not; he moves on, but I do not perceive him.
12 Behold, he snatches away; who can hinder him?
Who will say to him, ‘What doest thou?’
13 “God will not turn back his anger; beneath him bowed the helpers of Rahab.

wonder then that I do not perceive him (vs. 11). Are human standards of morality applicable to a being of absolute power? If he snatches away, who can hinder him (vs. 12a)? The verb פָּשַׁם, “to prey upon,” is a hapax legomenon, but its stem refers elsewhere to human violence (Prov. 23:28; etc.). God is implicitly compared to a thief or a kidnaper whom no man can resist, or even criticize and censure. Who will say unto him, What doest thou?

13. According to the usual translations, this verse does not clearly follow the idea of the preceding line. Since the word Eloah is placed in an emphatic position, and sometimes designates not God but “a god” (see 12 6, II Kings 17:31; II Chr. 32:15; Dan. 11:37), it may be understood as an excellent parallel to the helpers of Rahab in vs. 13b. Thus vs. 13a might be read, “Even a god could not turn back his wrath” (Kissane). Incidentally, such a translation supports the conjectural rendering of vs. 4a mentioned above. Job’s process of thinking may follow a slow gradation: naturally mortal man (vs. 2) cannot be just with God; the wise and mighty cannot defy him unscathed (vs. 4); even a god is powerless before him (vs. 13). Kissane rightly notes that if this translation is correct, Job makes a further allusion to the discourse of Eliphaz (4:18; 5:1 ff.), who had stated that men, even angels, are impure before God. Job replies that men, heroes, and even gods are powerless before God.

the last half of the nineteenth century and the first quarter of the twentieth seemed primarily intent on making a gentleman out of God, a Christian gentleman, a Protestant Christian gentleman, sad needing the corrective of a theology that was intent on making God “the Wholly Other.” It can just as readily be conceded that this “Wholly Other” often tends to become too wholly other. The line from man to God is not one unbroken line. We may not argue from the human to the divine, whether we have in mind philosophical concepts, emotional states, or ethical standards (Isa. 55:8-9). But unless somewhere there is a common denominator between man and God, the result of God’s own creative or revelatory act, then “the fruit of the Spirit” (Gal. 5:22-23) is Dead Sea fruit “upon this bank and shool of time.” God’s judgments are still unsearchable, and “his ways past finding out” (Rom. 11:33); but they may not ultimately offend that image of himself in human life which is his own handiwork. Otherwise his wonders would become “wonders” indeed (10:16).

With this Power, across the unbridged gulf, Job knows he has to do. It is not a dogma, not a theory, not an abstraction, not just there, out of all relation to man and his needs, but there in that relation, inseparable from that relation: invisible, incomprehensible, indomitable, with none even to criticize what goes on. How can anybody do anything about the brush of a wing he cannot see, or the uncanny sound of a footfall in an empty house? The divine snatcher-away—as in Job’s own case—will not stop long enough to be questioned or called to account. Even chaos itself is but the footstool of his might (7:12; 26:12). He does not will a thing because it is good; it is “good” because he wills it. His is an amoral freedom, subject to no
How much less shall I answer him, and choose out my words to reason with him?

Whom, though I were righteous, yet would I not answer, but I would make supplication to my judge.

If I had called, and he had answered me; yet would I not believe that he had hearkened unto my voice.

For he breaketh me with a tempest, and multiplieth my wounds without cause.

The helpers of Rahab (vs. 13b), like Leviathan (see 3:8) and tannin (see 7:12), are monsters of the sea (26:12) which are tamed by the creator God. In the Akkadian poem of creation (Enûma elîš IV. 107; see Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 67), the gods who fight Marduk are called “the helpers” of Tiamat.

(3) Futility of Contending with God (9:14-19)

If even the primeval forces of chaos bowed beneath him (vs. 13b), how much less can Job answer him (vs. 14a)? The image is now that of a lawsuit in which Job fancies himself to be either a hopeless defendant (vs. 14-15) or a plaintiff powerless to compel a hearing (vs. 16). That Job still holds fast to his integrity is obvious from the expression I am innocent (נֵימָנֶה), or rather, “I am in the right” or “I am righteous” (vs. 15a). Indeed, Job may be answering Bildad’s advice to make supplication to the Almighty and to have recourse to God’s grace (נֵימָנֶה, 8:5); Job, being falsely accused, concedes that his only chance is to appeal for mercy (נֵימָנֶה, identical verb) to his accuser (vs. 15b); but apparently the Arabian nobleman rejects such an attitude of contemptible humiliation and demands instead the vindication due his honor. Thus Job understands better than Bildad the implications of the biblical reality of grace (נֵימָנֶה), but at this stage of the drama he rejects it completely. His relation to God is placed on a footing of equality—equality in right if not in might. Human pride leads to unfaith: “If I sum-restraint, whether of others or of self; a liberty which is license, and license full-blown is immorality (vs. 22-24). In some such fashion, were the gulf between man and God still unbridged by word or deed, would the vast Presence toward whom humanity’s heart seems always to have yearned, even if only in a weird sort of challenge (25:3, 8-9), become the hateful Unseen, before which all humanity’s ways would be helpless.

The Bill of Rights.— (See Expos. on 1:1.) What standing can a man have in such a trial as that which in vs. 3 Job for the first time dimly envisions? For one driven into a corner and taken into custody by omnipotence, there could be no careful choosing of words. Innocence could do no more than stammer like guilt, and beg for mercy (cf. 8:5; see Exeg.). If a summons could be served on the Almighty, it would be to no purpose. Were he to answer, he would still turn a deaf ear to every complaint. The proof of it is in Job’s own body, crushed and wounded for a trifile, and kept that way (vs. 18, RSV; with KJV cf 7:19; 14:6) as evidence of his “guilt,” his mind filled with bitterness. For strength, there he stands ready, this God (vs. 19a; cf. vs. 8-13). Who will enter the lists with him? As for justice, who can get a hearing? (Cf. vs. 14-18.)

Against the utter helplessness and hopelessness of that situation Job revolts. He has no rights because he has no standing in court. The conclusion, on the premises, is unavoidable—and much too grievous to be taken lying down. Man’s pride will sooner justify itself in blasphemy than surrender itself to sheer wanton, arbitrary power. And properly so. There is something else in God besides wayward, contrary, capitious might, and something other. Job is on the way to it; but the abyss yawns at his feet. He is the protagonist of all mankind, and the facts are very much as he sees them, though at deeper levels than he dreams. Man may assert his rights against man—if there is nothing better for him to do—and so hammer out for his society some kind of approximate 18 He will not suffer me to take my breath, but filleth me with bitterness.
19 If I speak of strength, lo, he is strong: and if of judgment, who shall set me a time to plead?
20 If I justify myself, mine own mouth shall condemn me: if I say, I am perfect, it shall also prove me perverse.
21 Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my soul: I would despise my life.

moned him and he answered me, I do not believe [םדוק יד; cf. Isa. 7:9] that he would listen to my voice” (vs. 16). At any rate, this hope is idle fancy, for in the present reality he crushes with a tempest (vs. 17a). The Targ. and Syriac read the same consonants as those of the M.T. (mızıוש) with a slightly different vocalization, besa’arāh instead of bis’ārāh, “with a hair,” i.e., “for a trifle” (Ehrlich, et al.); this meaning would provide an excellent parallel to without cause (vs. 17b). However, the reading “storm” or tempest is not excluded, inasmuch as the verb הָשָׁ ה is used not only for the “crushing” of the head of the serpent’s seed and the “bruising” of the heel of the woman’s posterity (Gen. 3:15), but also for the “overwhelming” of man by darkness (Ps. 139:11).

Job knows that in a contest of strength God is stronger, and that in a judicial suit none can summon him (vs. 19).

(4) The Mocking Laughter of God (9:20-24)

20-24. The sense of injustice brings the sufferer to issue the most vehement protest of innocence. Although in the presence of the almighty Tyrant he might be so overcome by fear that his own mouth would condemn him (vs. 20a), he knows that he is perfect (כּ, vs. 20b). The repetition of the ejaculation, “I am perfect” (vs. 21a), reveals the passion which now animates the hero. The violence of his feeling of self-righteousness, no doubt heightened by physical pain and mental agony, prompts him to deny any preoccupation with self-preservation. “I do not care about my nephesh!” (Vs. 21b). “I despise justice. He may assert them against nature, and out of her rough granite hew for himself a kind of progress. His struggles are chapters in the history of civilizations. Always he wins, and always he loses: his victories almost incredible, every one of them ambiguous, none of them final. But against God? What “right” has being to assert against the ground of being? What “right” has the mind to assert against the life that animates it? Yet where there is no right against, there may be claim upon. And this Job vaguely but increasingly sensibly (7:8b; 10:9-12; 14:15; 19:25 f.; etc.). It is God who has himself fashioned humanity’s “rights,” and honors them (Deut. 7:7-8; Isa. 46:4). What Job saw was (a) that man was a good deal more than nothing in the sight of God—the fact and being of God were the very source and substance of his integrity—and (b) that he had of himself no inherent “rights” which he could assert against the Almighty. What Job could not yet see was the divine love that not only gives man his standing, but undertakes to make it good against man’s own betrayal of it. Calvary was God’s mark, his seal and signature, on the bill of rights which he drew up at Creation. And more: it was the vindication at cost of that holiness in him which is the only hope humanity has, and of that power which alone can give his love “eternal and righteous effect.”

20-24. He That Sitteth in the Heavens.—In the twisted agony of Job’s mind is mirrored a distorted world. He sees himself, for all his innocence, driven to confess his guilt. All despotisms know how to bring that about. Though blameless, God would prove him perverse. What matter then if he should live or die? Life he despises. Let God strike him dead. He will risk it, and say what he thinks. There is no line drawn on earth between good men and evil (4:7; 8:20): they all perish alike (Eccl. 9:2). In flood and pestilence, in war and famine, there is only laughter in heaven, as the righteous go down with the wicked’ (vs. 23). “On 22 This is one thing, therefore I said it, He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked.
23 If the scourge slay suddenly, he will laugh at the trial of the innocent.
24 The earth is given into the hand of the wicked; he covereth the faces of the judges thereof; if not, where, and who is he?
22 It is all one; therefore I say, he destroys both the blameless and the wicked.
23 When disaster brings sudden death, he mocks at the calamity of the innocent.
24 The earth is given into the hand of the wicked; he covers the faces of its judges — if it is not he, who then is it?

my life!" (Vs. 21c.) Such declarations constitute the usual build-up for the utterance of a blasphemy (cf. 7:11 ff.; 13:13 ff.; etc.). "Therefore I say: Both the perfect and the wicked he exterminates" (vs. 22). This is a direct reply to the creed enunciated by Eliphaz (4:7) and Bildad (8:20). Not only is God devoid of a sense of justice, but he lacks even any human decency, any humane sense of pity. He mocks at the calamity of the innocent (vs. 23). He is responsible also for social injustice and political oppression (vs. 24b). Perhaps anticipating polemics on the extreme monism of his theology, Job adds defiantly, If it is not he, who then is it? (vs. 24c).

We have a judgment which is not visitation but irony. Its tarrying works upon us more than its coming. . . . It broods evasive, provoking, potent. If God do not yet intervene on earth his sits in heaven —sits and laughs. And his smile is inscrutable, and elusive, only not cruel: the smile of endless power and patience, very still, and very secure, and deeply, dimly kind. . . . The heavens are not so simple as they seem, nor is God so mocked as he consents to appear, and to appear for long. He gives our desire, and it shrivels our soul. Of our pleasant vices he is making instruments to scourge us. . . . Satan's last chagrin is his contribution to God's kingdom. [See Expos. 2:7-10] This is the irony of history—when the very success of an idea creates the conditions that belie it, smother it, and replace it! Catholicism becomes the Papacy. The care for truth turns to the Inquisition. . . . A revival movement becomes a too, too prosperous and egotistic Church. Freedom as soon as it is secured becomes tyranny. . . . Misfortune need not be judgment, nor need defeat; but victory may be. And defeat may be victory. . . .

In Christ's moral, historic, final Cross alone do we learn to interpret the irony of history as the irony of Providence, the tender, portentous smile of a victorious, patient God. If His words are acts, so is that slow smile. . . . It is a smile more immeasurable than ocean's [sic] and more deep, it is an irony gentler and more patient than the bending skies. The irony of a long love and the play of its sure mastery; it is the smile of the holy in its silent omnipotence of mercy.

24. If Not He, Who Then?—To Job's defiant question many answers have been given (see Expos. on 1:6-12; 6:12, 10:18-17). Some have written down much of humanity's anguish, both of mind and body, to the account of a universe sublimely (1) indifferent to all things human. Others have found man himself the chief culprit—back of him, it may be, a devil (as in the prologue). In any case, the ultimate responsibility is God's. There is no other answer when you add omniscience to omnipotence. But what if, instead of shirking the responsibility he should assume it, binding by it not just his creation but himself, in a purpose transcending every purpose which the human mind can attribute to him (see Expos. on 10:8-12; 24:2-12). Marc Connelly, author of The Green Pastures, dissatisfied with the cheap and smart agnosticism of his generation, felt that he simply had to say something about the basic dignity of faith: no matter if he had anything to eat or not; no matter if what he had to say could find a producer or not. The play actually did lie on the shelf for nearly seven months—that stately tale of a God perplexed; a God who over and over again ran into this human willfulness of ours, to be beaten back in the patriarchs, stoned in the prophets, and crucified in his Christ. The 25 Now my days are swifter than a post: they flee away, they see no good.
26 They are passed away as the swift ships: as the eagle that hasteth to the prey.
27 If I say, I will forget my complaint, I will leave off my heaviness, and comfort myself;
28 I am afraid of all my sorrows, I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent.
29 If I be wicked, why then labor I in vain?
30 If I wash myself with snow water, and make my hands never so clean;

(5) "THOU WILT NOT HOLD ME INNOCENT" (9:25-29)

25-29. Again the poet reveals himself as a profound master of psychology. Job has just made a heretical pronouncement at the risk of his life, and he immediately afterwards complains of the brevity of his days. Having spoken of life with contempt, he soon reveals his fear of death in three images of appealing beauty the runner (vs. 25), the ships (vs. 26a), and the eagle (vs. 26b). When his brave resolutions to be of good cheer (vs. 27) are broken by the excesses of his pain, he turns to God in a prayer of melancholy (vs. 28), which again leads to a philosophical query, Why then do I labor in vain? (vs. 29).

b) INTENTIONS OF GOD TOWARD MAN (9:30-10:22)

(1) NEED OF A MEDIATOR (9:30-35)

30-35. This strophe provides a second landmark in Job's spiritual journey (cf. 7:21d). Although he has recently said that God blindly destroys both perfect and wicked men pastures were not green at all. They were desolate, barren wastes, until a man shouldered a Cross and by Paul's "patience and long-suffering with joyfulness" (Col. 1:11) put his own downfall to rout, drobbled his own drubbing, and made the desert blossom like a rose!

There was never such a fateful experiment as when God trusted man with freedom. But our Christian faith is that He well knew what He was about. He did not do that as a mere adventure, not without knowing that He had the power to remedy any abuse of it that might occur, and to do this by a new creation more mighty, marvellous, and mysterious than the first. . . . If the first creation drew on His might, the second taxed His all-might. . . To redeem creation is a more creative act than it was to create it. It is the last thing omnipotence could do.*

25-29. Why Labor in Vain?—Job's efforts to vindicate himself are futile. His days glide swiftly by. In one of Jerome Kern's songs, "Ol' Man River," the Negro laborer on a levee along the Mississippi is "tired o' livin" and "scared o' dyin" (cf. Hamlet's soliloquy, Act III, scene 1). So is Job torn. He longs for God and fears him. He hates life and loves it. Every time he decides to brighten up a bit and forget all about his trouble, there is something to remind him of it, some twinge of pain to tell him that God still has it in for him (see Expos. on 10:1-7, 13-17). "He hath a spite against me, that I know." 8 What then was the use of it all?

There are thousands who make of his deponent mood their only comment on life itself. Stark across the years of their striving stands the specter: their wages are earned only to be put "into a bag with holes" (Hag. 1:6). But there is no hole in the middle of our going round and round, our hurrying to and fro; no hole through which are poured at last our human loves and human hopes, our human defeats and human victories. God is there. Even Job's labor was by no means in vain (read I Cor. 15:2, 10, 14, 58).

9:30-10:22. Who Hath Known the Mind of the Lord?—Whatever man can know of the mind of God—and on that quest Job is now beginning to embark—must be known by revelation, not by speculation. The facts from which Job argues are summarized in 9:30-31. They seem to him by this time well enough estab-

* Browning, "Caliban upon Setebos."
THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

31 Yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes shall abhor me.
32 For he is not a man, as I am, that I should answer him, and we should come together in judgment.

(vs. 22), he dimly realizes that he is persecuted by God because he is considered guilty (vs. 28). Now in an aside he proclaims the inability of man to save himself against the will of God (vss. 30-31). The text, of course, must not be pressed excessively, but one may recognize here a man in need of salvation by grace. While the penitent theologian of the sola gratia implores God, “Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow” (Ps. 51:7), Job exclaims, If I wash myself with snow, . . . yet thou wilt plunge me into a pit. Like the psalmist, Job realizes that he cannot wash himself, but unlike the psalmist, he does not give up the idea of self-purification and yield to the divine bounty, crying, “Have mercy upon me!”

A thought of stupendous dimensions, however, invades the consciousness of this Semitic monotheist. He admits that God is infinitely transcendent. He perceives that the absolute remoteness of God makes intimacy with man—nay, even colloquy—impossible. There is no common ground between them. There is no meeting place between heaven and earth. God and man may not come together in judgment, since he is not a man, as I am (vs. 32). The thought of God becoming man, of God made flesh, does not possess the poet’s mind, but it enters there for a fleeting instant. The noble Arabian prince is not a prophet of the Christian mystery of the Incarnation, nor is he able to glance at the “shocking” spectacle of a God Incarnate. Yet the poet is desperately trying to bridge the awful gap which separates Creator from creature, to fill the abyss which keeps impure man apart from the holy God. Toying with the idea of a human God for a short while, Job rejects it almost as soon as it is conceived. But for a moment he dwells on the new perspective thereby opened at the edge of his despair. He cannot altogether abandon this impossible thought. Obstinately he clings to his foolish fancy and goes groping in the lished. The difficulty is canvassed in 9:32-35: God is not man, but he acts like a man (10:1-7) and worse (10:8-12). There is but one explanation: if God is omnipotent, he is not good. The other possibility, that if God is good he is not omnipotent, could hardly have occurred to Job. Beyond question, the Almighty is predisposed to evil, with malice aforethought (10:13-17), and never will let up even for a moment (10:18-22).

Is this not always the risk that speculation runs? Out of its understanding of events it would read its understanding of God. Let any man try that method on any other and see where it leads him. Life will not be read—save as a ghastly and answerless riddle—without regard to its beginning and its end (Rev. 1:8, 11). Post faith, then read events: Israel’s history becomes God’s history, and the history of man’s salvation; Bethlehem and Calvary, the trouble he went to, and the price he paid. Events are words; but they do not always say what we think they say. The interpretation comes of faith—or of unfaith.

30-35. The Foolishness of the Gospel.—In these verses we peer “through a glass, darkly” (I Cor. 13:12), catching but the dim forms of things unknown. First a kind of nightmare (vss. 30-31), which often enough is a disguise that the naked truth tries to wear. There is a difference between Job’s if I wash and the “wash me” of the psalmist (Ps. 51:7). How much nearer the realities of human experience it would have been had Job exchanged his subjects in the condition and the conclusion of his sentence! There is no psychologist but would be inclined to ask him, on the basis of such a statement as his, “Why do you hate—youself?” Second, there is a kind of folly, with fact behind it (vs. 38; cf. Expos. on 19:25; see Exeg.; set the fact against the folly in Luke 24:11). Perhaps the lines that Keats wrote “On First Looking into Chapman’s Homer” might almost serve as a footnote.

Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swells into his ken;
Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
He stared at the Pacific—and all his men
Looked at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien.

The very foolishness which Job rejects even while he clings to it is the foolishness of the 33 Neither is there any daysman betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both.
34 Let him take his rod away from me, and let not his fear terrify me:
35 Then would I speak, and not fear him; but it is not so with me.

33 There is no* umpire between us, who might lay his hand upon us both.
34 Let him take his rod away from me, and let not dread of him terrify me.
35 Then I would speak without fear of him, for I am not so in myself.

* Another reading is Would that there were darkness of his theological thinking, spurned on by his passionate search for a way to bring God and man face to face. Would that there were (reading 9:33 as lu' instead of lō' with several Hebrew MSS, LXX, and Syriac) a third party, a neutral observer, an arbitrator, a middle man, a mediator, yes, a daysman or umpire between us (vs. 33a)! The word מִרְכָּבָה (mirkāḇa) applies to a person who decides, judges, and convinces, sometimes corrects and rebukes. The astounding significance of its use in this verse lies in the fact that it refers here to some hypothetical being who would be different from God and man, and who might lay his hand upon us both (vs. 33b). Since God is not a man, and a human God remains an impossibility in terms, let there be someone else who might understand the respective standpoints of both God and man, who might terminate their mutual estrangement, make them intelligible to one another, reconcile their differences, and resolve their reciprocal antagonism into the unity of peace.

To be sure, the image of the umpire still suggests primarily a juridical settlement, as if man, on equal terms with God, had rights of his own to safeguard. But the overtone of the figure goes beyond the realm of justice. A conciliator who places his hands over the shoulders of two enemies is more than a judge who imposes a verdict. He not only mediates justice, he also fosters harmony and inspires love. In the words of James Strahan (The Book of Job [Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1913], p. 102): "The man who uses such language is ostensibly pleading for justice; but deeper down he is seeking reconciliation, he is thirsting for love. Job is no conscious prophet, but his instinctive cry for a God in human form, and for a daysman between God and man, is an unconscious prophecy of incarnation and atonement. His faith is creative, his heart's intuitions are precursors of revelation."

Vs. 34, according to most translators, begins a new sentence, with God as the unexpressed subject: Let him take his rod away from me. It is syntactically more natural, however, to consider the umpire of vs. 33 as the third person masculine singular agent of gospel (I Cor. 1:21-29). Finally, there is the nonsense with which he dismisses the subject, "It is not so" (Exeg.; the more usual interpretation of vs. 35c would make it another assertion that the sufferer's conscience is clear and his spirit in itself unafraid; cf. Heb. 4:15-16); and the negation of all hope that comes of it, "I am alone."

T. Z. Koo has told in his lectures of his first experience of an air raid in the days when the Japanese sent their planes in wave after wave over China. Said he: We had to go out into the fields because we had no dugouts in the city. Everybody took his rug and waited. Soon the final warning sounded, and we knew that in ten minutes the planes would arrive. In that short ten minutes I lived through the experiences of a lifetime. A feeling of utter helplessness swept over me. The usual things with which we surround our lives suddenly lost their significance. Most of us had been thinking that if we had money in the bank we would be fairly secure; but as I sat on that rug waiting, I realized that no amount of money, not even of American dollars, could be of any help to me. I used to pride myself on the fact that I was a university man; but what could a Ph.D. do for me as I sat on that rug waiting for those planes? One after another all these things fell away, until I saw that out there under the sky in the fields I was before my Maker just as I was, stripped of everything, nothing more in life to fall back on. And my lips began to whisper, "Yea, though I walk in the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me." That was no doctrine then. It was no precept in a code of ethics. It was not a beautiful phrase in a poem. It meant that I was not alone, that I had found something in life which even war could not wipe out! (Cf. I Pet. 4:19.)

33 Is Life a Game Without an Umpire?—See Expos. on 7:7-10, 21; 14:15; 17:3; 19:25-27.

985
My soul is weary of my life; I will leave my complaint upon myself; I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

"I loathe my life; I will give free utterance to my complaint; I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

Job ceases abruptly from indulging in this daydream. "For it is not so. I am [alone] with myself." (Vs. 59b.) Such is possibly the meaning of this difficult phrase. In other words, "I am left to my own resources." This would provide an admirably concise transition between the lofty flight of the preceding verses and the relapse which follows.

(2) HUMAN BEHAVIOR OF GOD (10:1-7)

Confronting the misery of his existence (vs. 1), Job goes back to God himself and begs not to be condemned without knowing first what charges are brought against him whose very coming (ch. 38) there will be something reminiscent of Hosea’s God, with that “Galilean accent” of his, “I am God, and not man. How shall I give thee up?” (Hos. 11:9, 8). Not some mad craftsman (vss. 9-12) who is ready to turn about and destroy the work of his own hands, but the God who “provided for the raven his food,” and causeth “it to rain on a land where no man is” (38:41, 26). Not some watcher (7:20) and hunter of men (vs. 16), but the God who “hath begotten the drops of dew,” hath generated “the hoary frost of heaven,” who knoweth “the time when . . . the hinds do calve,” and sendeth out “the wild ass free” (38:28, 29; 39:1, 5). Job asks his questions (vss. 9-5), but the answers are already struggling up through his heart into his mind (16:19). He makes his appeal like a child aghast, holding its breath (vss. 8-12); only to surrender with a sigh (vs. 20) to the mystery of evil (vss. 13-17), where for him there can be no dwelling place.

That mystery is still with us (see Expos. on 1:12; 16:11). It taunted Swinburne until his lines dripped with bitterness:

None hath beheld him. none
Seen above other gods and shapes of things,
Swift without feet and flying without wings,
Intolerable, not clad with death or life,
Insatiable, not known of night or day,
The lord of love and loathing and of strife
Who gives a star and takes a sun away.6

It is a mystery that at its deepest never gets itself adequately expressed. But over against it waits still the mystery of good. Why Truth should go on living in a world like this, when it is so very inconvenient and so painful and costs so much! Why you can drive great nails through its hands and feet, and can never, never 6 Alalanta in Calydon.

2 I will say unto God, Do not condemn me; show me wherefore thou contendest with me.

3 Is it good unto thee that thou shouldst oppress, that thou shouldst despise the work of thine hands, and shine upon the counsel of the wicked?

4 Hast thou eyes of flesh? or seest thou as man seeth?

(vs. 2) Does it seem good to thee . . . to despise the work of thy hands? (Vs. 3ab.) Is there a streak of sadism in the temperament of this creative artist? “Dost thou derive pleasure [lit., “radiance”] from the designs of the wicked?” (Vs. 3c.) This last question is considered by many commentators as a gloss, for it introduces an idea apparently alien to the context. But the mind of the poet must not be placed in a strait jacket. The persecution of the righteous leads normally by association to the thought of the success of the wicked.

10:4-7. Hast thou eyes of flesh? or seest thou as man seeth? Job’s grim mockery appears like a twisted afterthought of his recent wish for the advent of a human God. Having rejected the idea of an incarnation, he seems to reflect on the Deity’s strange behavior toward him and to conclude, “Yes, this God acts as a man, in man’s inhumanity

2 I will say to God, Do not condemn me; let me know why thou dost contend against me.

3 Does it seem good to thee to oppress, to despise the work of thy hands and favor the designs of the wicked?

4 Hast thou eyes of flesh? Dost thou see as man sees?

hammer it down! Thrust a spear into its side, and get nowhere at all! Why loyalty should go on living in such a faithless world, and sacrifice, and a thousand shining things men give their lives for! Is that not mystery too? Except that now, as in Correggio’s “Holy Night,” all the light there is at the end of every adventure Godward, shining through the clouds into the thick darkness, comes from Christ (see Expos on vs. 1-7).

1-7. Let Me Know Why.—Job can never abide any of his moods long. In 7:20 he suggested what Pliny the Elder once set down in so many words: “It is ridiculous to suppose that the great head of things, whatever it be, pays any regard to human affairs” ⁶ There is none of that here. Rather are three entirely different ideas turned up in quick succession and discarded: God takes some kind of pleasure in the wickedness and destruction that are going on (vs 3); God shares himself in “man’s inhumanity to man” (vs. 4); God is just like any other tyrant who knows very well that the victim is innocent, but gloats over the fact that he cannot escape, and tries to wring a confession out of him. (Vss. 5-7. See Exeg.; also Expos. on vss. 13-17. Does Elihu quote from this speech in 33:10? And are the shadows of Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar back of vs. 2-7? Is God as they are?)

But none of it would do. The only way for Job to get out was to get in, deeper and deeper. It was not a dilemma for the mind. It was a pilgrimage for the soul. And there was no escape from it (see Expos. on 19:25). Certainly no escape by the simple device of canceling God out of the picture entirely. Nowadays we may find it possible to fool ourselves, scientifically and philosophically, into believing that all reality must somehow be commensurate with human reason and subject to the tests of human logic. Some things no doubt do lie outside the reach of our general propositions, they seem a bit beyond nature as we know it, will not readily submit themselves to the laboratory method. Macneil Dixon in The Human Situation⁷ lists quite a number of them, e.g., that “blazing mass,” that “incandescent whirlpool” of matter, which we are told set to, one Wednesday at 8 a.m., and dizzily turned out an empire, and a statue by Praxiteles, and Beethoven’s Fifth Symphony. Or space, as it has now been “photographed with the mathematical ‘lenses’ of a ‘cosmic camera’.” No longer one thing at all—unless there have been some changes since!—but “two identical sheets joined by many new bridges.” Never mind, though. What we do not understand today we shall no doubt be able to decipher tomorrow; and without having recourse to the supernatural. You will not likely catch us trying to smuggle anything “occult” past the customs. God is not an indispensable factor in our equations. For Job there could be no equation without him. The failure of every other hypothesis was driving him to one which seemed for the time being altogether final (vss. 13-17). But it was not, and could not be.

Perhaps we need life’s riddles if we are to ⁶ Natural History II. 5. 20.

5 Are thy days as the days of man? are thy years as man's days,
6 That thou inquiriest after mine iniquity, and searchest after my sin?
7 Thou knowest that I am not wicked: and there is none that can deliver out of thine hand.
8 Thine hands have made me and fashioned me together round about; yet thou dost destroy me.

5 Are thy days as the days of man, or thy years as man's years,
6 That thou dost seek out my iniquity and search for my sin,
7 Although thou knowest that I am not guilty, and there is none to deliver out of thy hand?
8 Thy hands fashioned and made me; and now thou dost turn about and destroy me.

* Compare Gk. Svr. Heb made me together round about and thou dost destroy me

(3) The Artist and His Handiwork (10.8-12)

The thought of the artist's cruelty for the work of his hand (see vs. 3) emerges once more, but this time it is purified of its derisiveness and conveys a sentiment of desperate hold on at all to any sense of God's greatness, and not just waste our time pottering about with a Deity who is indeed very like other men, the grocer at the corner, or the neighbor across the street (see Expos. on 3.20), throwing open the windows of heaven in the morning, doing the day's chores, and pulling down the shades at night. Remember the black curtain that fell on "Nebo's lonely mountain" when Moses died there (Deut. 34:1-6), looking out over a land of promise he would never enter. In some far-off way it was like the curtain that fell on Calvary, with something of the same sublime pathos, the sadness of inexplicable defeat. Yet strangely enough it serves only to make us conscious of how awful a thing the soul of man is. Life is not futile, life is nobler for it: less trivial because of the victory that was not won and the trumpets that were not blown. Riddles without an answer are in part the hope we too have of being found of God. The dark must fall before the stars can show themselves, flaming this way and that, countless jewels set against the soft cushions of the night.

Job lowers himself away into the mystery. It is as if a ship were leaving her cradle, gliding first into the backwaters of a sullen bay. Arthur Porritt in The Best I Remember speaks of the drear, everlasting moment [of her launching] when the props have been knocked from under the hull and a soft whistle announces . . . that the ship is free . . . The silence is so heavy that literally one hears the breathing of one's neighbours. . . . A second passes, two, three, perhaps four; and still the great ship . . . stands poised and motionless. Then the yard hands raise a cheer. Quick to detect the first faint movement, their eager eyes have observed what to others is an imperceptible stirring of the dead weight. Two seconds more and . . . the mighty hull begins to glide with ever accelerating speed down the greased ways till like a rushing wind she speeds down the slips. Her bows cleave the waters amid a roar of cheering.8

8-12. Why Hast Thou Made Me Thus?—(Cf. Rom. 9:20; Isa. 45:9.) Implicit in Job's words from first to last, the ground of all his complaining, the premise of every taunt, is his faith in God as creator, even as father. Between that faith and what seems to be his lot in the world

8 New York: George H. Doran Co., 1923, p. 166.
9 Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me as the clay; and wilt thou bring me into dust again?
10 Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled me like cheese?
11 Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh, and hast fenced me with bones and sinews.
12 Thou hast granted me life and favor, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.

Remember that thou hast made me of clay;\(^9\) and wilt thou turn me to dust again?
10 Didst thou not pour me out like milk and curdle me like cheese?
11 Thou didst clothe me with skin and flesh, and knit me together with bones and sinews.
12 Thou hast granted me life and steadfast love; and thy care has preserved my spirit.

\(^9\) Gk. Heb like clay abandon, with the undertone of helpless reproach, as that of a rejected child to his unnatural parent—worse still, of the horror of a son about to be murdered by his own father (vs. 8). As in Ps. 139:14 ff., Job describes with the images which were appropriate in his time the mystery of embryonic growth, but he insists less on the wonder of this process than on the painstaking love and delicate skill displayed by his maker (vss. 9-12). His rebuke is the more piercing, for it hints at frustrated sonship, and so teaches by implication the doctrine of the fatherhood of God. Instead of defending his own right to live, the son of this inhuman father appeals to whatever feeling of tenderness or of creative pride may remain in the heart of his progenitor: Remember, I pray . . . (vs. 9).

12. Thy care has preserved my spirit: Rather, “my breath” (יהָי).

he can make no adjustment that will satisfy mind and heart and soul (see Expos. on 3:20). The friends of course were sure that he should never have allowed any such question on his lips (vss. 8-9). But it is an honest question, a universal, human question. By asking it and not being able to answer it, except on the basis of suppositions (vs. 13) that neither human reason nor human experience (vs. 12) can readily abide, many a man has found the barred shutters of his life loosened and swung open, as if by an unseen hand, on vast horizons (see Expos. on 19:25; 21:19). So Tennyson:

Thou wilt not leave us in the dust:
Thou madest man, he knows not why,
He thinks he was not made to die;
And thou hast made him; thou art just.\(^9\)

If the universe is like a mad witch, fashioning with infinite care the most intricate patterns of lace, only to tear them to bits at the last, and with an idiotic grin scatter them over her dust heap, then no

choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence\(^1\) can rid it of its witless incongruity (cf. 21:19).

What troubles Job, however, is not annihilation (vss. 21-22) but the manifest unreason of his present state. His appeal is to “a faithful creator” (I Pet. 4:19) who has already by the very act of creation involved himself (see Expos. on 34:14). Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me. In both Joshua and Judges is written the story of Caleb (Josh. 15:16-19; Judg. 1:12-15). He promised his daughter one day, in an expansive mood, to any warrior who would subdue a certain portion of the land of Canaan. His nephew—or some relative of his at any rate—went out and took it. Caleb gave the daughter as he had promised. But they were young people, and had nothing with which to begin their life together; so Caleb, musing no doubt on what it is in the world that keeps dragging a man in deeper and deeper, gave them a field. But in the field there was no water; and his daughter came to him saying, “Thou hast given me a south land; give me also springs of water.” So Caleb, with perhaps a gesture of desperate and unpromised bounty, gave her both the upper and the nether springs. He had begun it, and in decency he had to see it through. Some such claim would Job lay on God's continuing favor. And it is this claim to which God finally responds (cf. Jer. 18:4, “And the vessel . . . was marred . . . ; so he made it again another vessel”). There is more than purpose in God's dealing; there is the purpose of a God who is always himself: not full of whims and dispositions, not angry and tender by fits and starts, always what we have now seen him to be in Christ. On Calvary words had stopped counting;

\(^9\) In Memoriam, Prologue, st. iii.
\(^1\) George Eliot, “O May I Join the Choir Invisible.”
13 And these things hast thou hid in thine heart: I know that this is with thee.
14 If I sin, then thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.
15 If I be wicked, woe unto me; and if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head.
I am full of confusion; therefore see thou mine affliction;
16 For it increaseth. Thou hast made me as a fierce lion: and again thou shewest thyself marvelous upon me.

18 Yet these things thou didst hide in thy heart;
I know that this was thy purpose.
14 If I sin, thou dost mark me, and dost not acquit me of my iniquity.
15 If I am wicked, woe to me!
If I am righteous, I cannot lift up my head, for I am filled with disgrace and look upon my affliction.
16 And if I lift myself up, thou dost hunt me like a lion,
and again work wonders against me;

(4) The Unscrupulous Hunter (10:13-17)

13. With the KJV, one should consider the demonstrative pronouns as referring to what follows. The conjunction is one of antithesis: Yet these things thou didst hide in thy heart.

14-15. If I sin, . . . if I am wicked, . . . if I am righteous: As the third expression shows, Job is not making any admission of culpability. He merely states that whatever his conduct, his fate would remain the same. The translation “drunk with affliction” (vs. 15b) is probably correct, reading with Geiger et al. נָא for the hapax legomenon נַאֵו, and thus obtaining an excellent parallel to filled with disgrace.

16-17. The first word, אֱלֹהֵי, “and he rises up,” is disconcerting. One may perhaps read with the Syriac the first person, אָנֹיה, and if I lift myself up. Dhorme’s emendation into אִנָי is phonetically possible and fits the context: “And (when I am) exhausted like only deeds mattered (cf. Isa. 46:4, “I have made, and . . . I will carry”).

13-17. The Dread Perhaps.—(See Expos. on 23:8.) Carlyle once called the religion of Burns “at best . . . an anxious wish; like that of Rabelais, ‘a great Perhaps.’” " His reference was to Rabelais’s deathbed metaphor, “Je m’en vais chercher un grand Peut-être.” To Job, by the process of elimination, the trend of the argument at the moment seems altogether inescapable. His is a faith that in the agony of its desolation can only twist into nightmarish shapes, writhing in every nerve and muscle against the background of what looks to him like an evil, cosmic tyranny, coming to rest now in one of the rigid, misbegotten distortions of a Caliban’s brain:

His spirits hear me,
And yet I needs must curse. But they’ll nor punch,
Fright me with urchin-shows, pitch me I’m the mire,
Nor lead me, like a firebrand, in the dark
Out of my way, unless he bid ‘em; but
For every trifle are they set upon me:
Sometimes like apes, that mow and chatter at me
And after, bite me; then like hedgehogs, which Lie tumbling in my barefoot way and mount
Their pricks at my footfall; sometimes am I

All wound with adders who with cloven tongues
Do hiss me into madness

There is no “perhaps” about it: I know that this was thy purpose. By God’s goodness he has been tricked into believing in the goodness of God. And all the while the only end in view was the consummation of “his misery by giving him that remembrance of happier things which is a sorrow’s crown of sorrow . . . . Human doubt reaches its ne plus ultra in the terrible conclusion that behind a smiling providence God hides a frowning face . . . . This was the last of life for which the first was planned.” So writes Strahan, and continues:

The poet evidently intended such a theory to be the reductio ad absurdum of the traditional doctrine of retribution. It is bound up with a theology—even now not quite extinct—which makes one exclaim, “Your God is my devil!” There is a very famous passage in Calvin’s Institutes (ix 28. 7): “The decree, I admit, is dreadful (Decretum quidem horrible, factotum); and yet it is impossible to deny that God foreknew what the end of man was to be before He made him, and foreknew, because He had so ordained by His decree.”

2 The Tempest, Act II, scene 2.
17 Thou renewest thy witnesses against me, and increasest thine indignation upon me; changes and war are against me.
18 Wherefore then hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? Oh that I had given up the ghost, and no eye had seen me!
19 I should have been as though I had not been; I should have been carried from the womb to the grave.
20 Are not my days few? cease then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little,
21 Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death;

17 thou dost renew thy witnesses against me, and increase thy vexation toward me; thou dost bring fresh hosts against me.
18 "Why didst thou bring me forth from the womb? Would that I had died before any eye had seen me, 19 and were as though I had not been, carried from the womb to the grave.
20 Are not the days of my life few? Let me alone, that I may find a little comfort. a 21 before I go whence I shall not return, to the land of gloom and deep darkness, a (pursued) lion, thou huntest me." The comparison, however, applies to the hunted, not to the hunter, and the idea is in line with the general opinion that Job has of himself. His capacity for resistance is such that the hunter, in order to subdue him, must rally all his forces. Thou renewest thy [attacks] against me, and fresh hosts must be brought into the fight. The word יְרִשָּׁה, thy witnesses, is reintroducing a juridical image. It may, however, derive from the stem נֶשָּׁד, “to advance in an aggressive mood” (cf. 28:8).

(5) Respite Before Death (10:18-22)

18-22. Inasmuch as death did not put an end to this ludicrous life before it began (vss. 18-19; cf. 3:11 ff.), let there be a truce now for the few days which remain (vs. 20) before the voyage to the land of no return (vss. 21-22). The pathos in the thought of Temporarily, for Job, it is the only solution that makes sense, and morbidly he clings to it, explores it, proves it. If he commits some trivial sin (vs. 14; cf. Expos. on 7:20c), God looks around for it, peers under everything (cf. vs. 6), holds it against him. If he is deliberately wicked (cf. vs. 7), for him the bell tolls. If righteous, he dare not lift up [his] head, but must go about filled with disgrace, and drunk with affliction. What else can all that mean? When for an instant he does lift himself, to steal a furtive glance around, like a weary lion, God renues his "wonderful works" (5:9; 9:10; 12:7-23), calls up other witnesses, increases his wrath, throws in fresh troops!

But the answer will not come by elimination. Or by any "philosophic theodicy" (cf. Expos. on 5:17). It comes by other means. (See Expos. on 19:25; 23:13, 15.)

O world, thou choosest not the better part! It is not wisdom to be only wise, And on the inward vision close the eyes, But it is wisdom to believe the heart. Columbus found a world, and had no chart, Save one that faith deciphered in the skies;

To trust the soul's invincible sunrise Was all his science and his only art.

18-22. Let Me Brighten Up a Little Before I Go.—(Cf. Ps. 39:13) Throughout the poem there are themes that enter and re-enter, as in a symphony. This is one of them, a motif in minor key (cf. 3:11 ff.; 6:8 ff.; 14:13; 16:22; etc.). Why did you not repent of your evil purpose before ever I was born? The days of my life (reading of my life [RSV] for cease then [KJV]) are few enough. Go somewhere else (see Expos. on 7:19), that I may brighten up a little (9:27) before I leave for "the land of no return," where there is darkness like the shadow of death (vs. 21), where the night is as chaos (without any order [KJV], i.e., with no moon or stars to light it), and so the day (cf. 3:4; 6; Job would

A phrase used to describe the underworld in the Babylonian poem, "The Descent of Ishtar"; so Kistane, p. 61. In Hamlet's soliloquy (Act III, scene 1), it is The undiscover'd country, from whose bourn No traveller returns.
22 A land of darkness, as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness.

Then answered Zophar the Na'amathite, and said,

2 Should not the multitude of words be answered? and should a man full of talk be justified?

3 Should thy lies make men hold their peace? and when thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed?

11 Then Zophar the Na'amathite answered:

2 "Should a multitude of words go unanswered, and a man full of talk be vindicated?

3 Should your babble silence men, and when you mock, shall no one shame you?

eternal death is accentuated by a rhythm that has been slowed down to a monotonous beat by the accumulation of synonyms for darkness.

5. First Discourse of Zophar (11:1-20)

a) Job's Iniquity (11:1-6)

11:2-6b. Zophar, like Eliphaz and Bildad, defends the dogma of divine justice, but his temper is even more immoderate than that of his immediate predecessor. He believes that Job is less a misguided heretic than a man full of talk (lit., "a man of lips," vs. 2), and he dismisses the sufferer's passionately sincere apologia as mere babble (vs. 3), which nevertheless deserves a rebuke. How can Job say, My doctrine is pure, and I am relegate to very Sheol itself the night of his conception and the day of his birth). But the whole world will yet be "changed like clay under the seal, and . . . dyed like a garment" (38.14).

11:1-20. The Word of the Zealot.—Zophar is a man of the way called not only Straight but Narrow. He has listened attentively to all that has been said. He has heard Job hinting and then stating outright that God is lacking in moral discernment (6:8; 9:22-24). Eliphaz had done the best he could: Job should at least try to see himself as God saw him. Bildad had taken a hand: all the hoary traditions of the past gave witness to God's clear-eyed justice, and what had happened to Job himself was evidence enough that he would neither "cast away a perfect man" (Job had not yet perished utterly) nor "help the evildoers" (8:20). The implication was clear: something simply had to be wrong with Job, even if Job had no awareness of it. It was Job's reply in chs. 9-10 that left Zophar no choice, or so he thought. The sufferer had now to be dealt with, and roundly.

How you do talk! Do you expect us to pay no attention to it, and have no word to say? You claim that right is on your side, and want God to speak out. Would to heaven he might! He would tell you with sufficient clarity what all this is about. It is about you. God is tracking you down because you are guilty. Say you are not conscious of any wrongdoing. Does that mean there has been none? Do you know the mind of God? Will you never learn "how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out"? How stupid can a man be? Come to your senses. Set your heart right, and turn to him. Let not wickedness dwell in your tents. Never say there is no hope but in the grave (6:8-10a; 10:18-22; cf. vs. 15 with 10:15). There is. You will forget your misery . . . as waters that have passed. Only the eyes of the wicked will fail. Their hope is in tragic fact what you fancy yours to be: nothing is left for them but to breathe their last.

2.6. Knowing What Cannot Be Known.—There is a strange, interesting, and highly suggestive contradiction in what Zophar is at such pains to point out. The assumption that lies back of it, and is of course theologically quite sound, is that ultimately God is unknowable (see Expos. on vs. 7). If we understood him, we would do well to doubt him. The trouble is that Zophar understands him without doubting him. For a man to quote Rom. 11:34, and then not pursue it to its proper issue in mystery (cf. Expos. on 8:3) and awe, is to climb the very pinnacle of presumption, which is pride. It is to profess the undefinable by defining it. Zophar knows what cannot be known, and in the light of his knowledge Job's passionate assertions of innocence (9:20-21; 10:7a) seem no more than talk, the mere babble of some "stupid" fellow (vs. 12) who has about as much chance to "get
4 For thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes.
5 But oh that God would speak, and open his lips against thee;
6 And that he would show thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to that which is! Know therefore that God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth.

For you say, 'My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in God's eyes.'
5 But oh, that God would speak, and open his lips to you,
6 and that he would tell you the secrets of wisdom!

For he is manifold in understanding:
Know then that God exacts of you less than your guilt deserves.

* Heb obscure clean in thine eyes (vs. 4), when he does not know the secrets of wisdom (vss. 5-6a), or rather, its "secret potency" or "potent mysteries" (הסתגלות; LXX, δοξάσμαν). They are "like stupendous marvels" [in vs. 6b read for M.T., בַּלַּאֹלָם, incomprehensible to human reason.

6c. "Know then that God is pursuing thee [read_resources: וישר יועה, יועה יוער] on account of thy guilt." At last the charge has been made explicitly. Eliphaz dropped cautious innuendos. Bildad spoke of the sins of the sons. Now that Job has reiterated emphatically that he is perfect, Zophar feels that he may proceed to a direct attack. The poet slowly increases the tension by withholding a specific accusation until the speech of the third friend.

Although Zophar is even more devoid of sympathy than Bildad, and certainly lacks entirely the courteous approach of Eliphaz, his intellectual powers are not to be denied. He may be the "most rasping disputant of the three" (Peake, Job, p. 125), but it must understanding" as "a wild ass's colt" has of being "born a man." What God would say if God would speak is no secret to anybody whose very agnosticism has become dogmatic. Such people first preen their feathers; then they look down the nose [see Expos. on 5.8]; then they point the finger [see Expos. on 4:8-11]. Until at last they are almost bound to essay the role of the prophet (vss. 13-19), unveiling the things that shall be, with many a fair inducement to those who think as they do [see Expos. on 8:7], and much ominous shaking of the head over those who do not (vs. 20; cf. Expos. on 8:11-19). A swelling is of all things else most like a hollow. "Why should the spirit of mortal be proud?" It never is, except when it has seen nothing in heaven above or in earth beneath to humble it. The self that is filled with self is the self that is emptier than any self can be and remain a self [see Expos. on vs. 5].

5. Man's Word and God's.—It is never very difficult to confuse the two. There is a God who fashions men, and there are gods that men fashion. Who cannot put words in the mouth of a god that he brings in his hand (12:6; cf. Expos. on 4:20b)? It is a kind of pious ventiloquism in which human life has always been terrifyingly adept. Deus vult! And thousands marched out on the First Crusade. "Immanuel! God with us!" And we head north or south, as we like, east or west, or perhaps a little on the bias. Dieu et mon droit is emblazoned on the British royal arms; but how easily in our minds the order reverses itself—or worse: given time, "my right" can learn how to identify itself with God; more time, and identification can no longer be distinguished from elimination.

Said Cromwell to Samuel Rutherford, a Scottish divine whom he found quite troublesome, "Have you ever considered the possibility that you may be mistaken?" (a) To Eliphaz a word had come in the watches of the night. (b) Bildad had found it in the past, embalmed in all the sayings of the wise. (c) Zophar's insight is relatively keener; only—the relative has for him become the absolute. His doxy is orthodox—as whose is not? But the first hazard is neither the where nor the how nor the what: the first hazard is the self—and the last. "Except a man be born again" was Christ's way of putting it (John 3:8). "He that is of God heareth God's words" (John 8:47). There is a touch that cleanses: and the deaf hear, and the blind see, and the lame walk (cf. Matt. 11:2-6). The word that comes then in the stillness (a) may well be God's Word. It can stride up now to meet us (b) out of the years, from prophet and apostle. It is able at last to speak to us (c) in the age-long testimony of the Christian church, in the creeds that have been hammered out on the anvil of Christian experience, in the sacraments.
7 Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?
8 It is as high as heaven: what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know?
9 The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea.
10 If he cut off, and shut up, or gather together, then who can hinder him?
11 For he knoweth vain men: he seeth wickedness also; will he not then consider it?
12 For vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt.

7 “Can you find out the deep things of God?
   Can you find out the limit of the Almighty?
8 It is higher than heaven—what can you do?
   Deeper than Sheol—what can you know?
9 Its measure is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea.
10 If he passes through, and imprisons, and calls to judgment, who can hinder him?
11 For he knows worthless men; when he sees iniquity, will he not consider it?
12 But a stupid man will get understanding, when a wild ass's colt is born a man.

be admitted at the same time that he is in a way a profound theologian. While Eliphaz appealed to a specific revelation, like a wise man playing the prophet, while Bildad pompously rehearsed the tradition of the ancients, Zophar grasps the significance of a reverent type of agnosticism: God is greater than human thoughts and he escapes man's precise formulations. Zophar is not therefore the rationalistic dogmatist, as some critics assert. Yet he is wrong in the very midst of his rightness, for if Job has not received the secrets of wisdom, how can Zophar claim to possess them? How does he know that Job's fate is the result of guilt?

b) God's Infinity (11:7-12)

7-12. Once again Zophar states a valid truth and clothes it, incidentally, in incomparably beautiful poetry. Can you find out the deep things of God (vs. 7a)? The word כָּלָה refers to the object of searching, which is here the essence and true nature of God (cf. the argument around, argue as Robert Louis Stevenson argued, from God to the tuberculosis that racked him with its cough, and the result may well be a hero (see Expos. on 3:20-21). The friends cast up the total of Job's wretchedness too, as much of it as they could understand, and kept setting down under it insistently Job's guilt and God's justice. In every case the addition was wrong (cf. Expos. on 12:2-6).

It is precisely this direction which thought seems so inevitably to take that Kierkegaard attacked in Hegel with all the weapons of scorn and ridicule. Comparing the two, Richard Kroner comments:

Hegel speaks as if there were no distance between man, and God not to be overcome by thought. About the realm of pure thought as it unfolds in the succession of categories Hegel writes: "This realm is the Truth as it is without any veil, in and for itself." And he goes on to add words which always have seemed to be utterly blasphemous to

---

13 If thou prepare thine heart, and stretch out thine hands toward him;
14 If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away, and let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles.
15 For then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot; yea, thou shalt be steadfast, and shalt not fear:
16 Because thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it as waters that pass away:

28:16; Ecclus. 42:19). Job has questioned the motives of the Deity's attitude toward him, and has thereby presumptuously inquired into the very character of the Godhead. Can you find out the limit of the Almighty? (Vs. 7b) The word נֹפֶל, “to be complete and perfect,” and thus means either “the end,” the limit (26:10; 28:8), or “perfection” (Ps. 139:22). Indeed, Job is right when he realizes that no one can hinder God (vs. 10; cf. 9:11-12), but he is wrong when he assumes that God does not distinguish between righteous and worthless men (vs. 11; cf. 9:22). The proverb about a stupid man (vs. 12) applies to him squarely. As in the preceding strophe, Zophar spoils a correct principle by his gratuitous application of it, or rather by his failure to apply it to himself.

c) Fruits of Conversion (11:18-20)

13-20. In spite of his forthright bluntness (vs. 6), Zophar does not give Job up as a hopeless reprobate. He therefore concludes with the customary appeal to repent, pray, 17 And thine age shall be clearer than the noonday; thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning.
18 And thou shalt be secure, because there is hope; yea, thou shalt dig about thee, and thou shalt take thy rest in safety.
19 Also thou shalt lie down, and none shall make thee afraid; yea, many shall make suit unto thee.
20 But the eyes of the wicked shall fail, and they shall not escape, and their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

and amend. A willful decision and a prayer of supplication (vs. 13), followed by moral purification (vs. 14), will bring back security without fear (vs. 15). The present misery will be forgotten (vs. 16) and life again will be worth living (vss. 17-19). This bright prospect, however, is topped by a stern, final warning: there is no way of escape for the wicked.

A brilliant performance, no doubt dictated by genuine conviction, but based upon the familiar moralism of the wise men who believed in salvation by works.

lengthening over the world broods the shadow of a cross; and of One who, needing no repentance, died with nails through his hands and feet. "Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him" (Ps. 91:14). Jesus "bearing his cross went forth" (John 19:17). "I will set him on high, because he hath known my name" (Ps. 91:14). "And sitting down they watched him there" (Matt. 27:36). One grows suspicious of the happy ending—unless one knows what a happy ending really is.

18. Because There Is Hope.—Zophar was quite right. There is. If Job had not thought of himself as being "without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12), an alien now to the love he had once known (10:9-12), taught by everything in his religion—against which he rebelled, to the saving of his own soul—that his misery was the very symbol and token of that alienation, he too would have known the meaning of hope; but it would not have been Zophar's meaning. Even with things as they were, he clung to it desperately, with his finger tips (14:13-15; 16:19; etc.). Roget's Thesaurus gives as synonyms for "hope" "Utopia," "fool's paradise," "castle in Spain." Cynicism like that is surely no accident. It comes of patterned hopes: and life all too frequently smashes the patterns. The way to keep from being disillusioned is to have no illusions. Trace the word "hope" through Scripture. See it blossom in the psalms, when there were no signs of it in the times. The noun does not appear in the Gospels. What need is there, with Christ in every passing moment of the day?

In its full biblical-Christian sense it is hardly found before we reach the Epistles, and this is not surprising. Since Christian hope is grounded on the Resurrection of Christ: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ who . . . begat us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead" (1 Pet. 1:3). . . . The NT conception of hope has nothing at all to do with any this-worldly prospects; it is as far removed as possible from any notion of an earthly Utopia or any secular optimism. [See Expos. on 8:7.] It is through and through eschatological, always bearing reference to the return of the Lord Jesus at the end of the age.1

It is born in despair, not in bright ideas and happy hunches. Job was infinitely nearer the N.T. than any of his friends. His hope, what was left of it, was not a patterned hope; theirs was. His hope had to do not with the things the friends set first (17:13-16); it had to do in very truth with "the last things" (19:25-27b; cf. Expos. on 12:18-19). In The Age of Anxiety, W. H. Auden has Rosetta, a Jewess, say to all "conventional, hearty and bumptious Christians [that they] cannot know what real desperate faith means, as we anxious Jews have to know it. You have a nice 'household god' that brings you luck, and a 'Harpist's Haven for hearty climbers' to look forward to in the next life." 2 1 Alan Richardson, "Hope," A Theological Word Book of the Bible. Copyright 1951 by The Macmillan Co. and used with their permission.

12:3 Then Job answered:
2 "No doubt you are the people, and wisdom will die with you.
3 But I have understanding as well as you; I am not inferior to you; yea, who knoweth not such things as these?

6. Job’s Reply to Zophar (12:1–14:22)

This discourse concludes the first cycle of discussion. Its traditional division into three chapters fits quite accurately its organic plan: (a) an empirical critique of providence (12:1–25); (b) an indictment of the friends’ ministrations leading to a new attack upon God (13:1–27); (c) a prayerful meditation on the tragedy of life (13:28–14:22).

a) An Empirical Critique of Providence (12:1–25)

(1) The Spectacle of the World (12:1–6)

Against the dogma of retribution Job has only one answer: his own experience and the observation of injustice which remains unpunished.

12:2–3. No doubt you are the people: The ancient versions support the M.T., and corrections of modern scholars are conjectural. The traditionally accepted interpretation (see KJV and RSV) is uncertain but possible. Job sarcastically magnifies the opinions of his three comforters as representing the general consensus of mankind. He thereby emphasizes his position as a lonely dissenter, giving affront to the approved beliefs of the human race, or at least of the international school of wisdom (see vs. 2b). He probably feels the pride and the bitter satisfaction of the nonconformist who stands alone against the world. Zophar has in effect appealed to a knowledge of God’s secret wisdom (see 11:6), and Job raises unwittingly the question of epistemological criterion. His adversaries claim to own a monopoly on knowledge: wisdom will die with them (vs. 2b). But he himself has understanding as well as they (vs. 3a). The choice of the word בֵּית (“heart” is the seat of intellectual and volitive processes) suggests that Job has been deeply wounded by Zophar’s use of the proverb on the colt of the wild ass (see 11:12). He is not “a stupid man [unable to] get understanding.” His mental as well as 12:2–14:22. Job’s Reply to Zophar.—No doubt you know everything that can be known. The wisdom you have been talking so much about will die with you. Let me tell you this. I understand as much about the Almighty as you do. I understand that if you call on him, he will treat you as he has treated me (see Exeg.). I understand that the man who succeeds has no time for the man who has failed. Down with him a little farther! I understand that peace is for robbers, and security for idolaters, and for those who provoke God. The beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, the fish of the sea—they will tell you how God rules in the affairs of earth. It has to be God. Who else is there? Wisdom is with the aged. I do not care for the taste of it (vs. 11). Your God of wisdom and might tears down and shuts in, makes fools out of judges and slaves out of kings. Grant his power, but quit talking of his justice. How is that for understanding (13:1–2)? I want to say it to God; you want to whitewash him with lies. It would be wisdom to hold your tongue. Lest he break out against you for trying to defend him with falsehood and deceit. Come what may, I challenge him. There is no hope for me in anything else (see Exeg. on 13:16). Who will say that I am guilty? Give me a fair trial, O God. Show me my iniquities. Hide not thy face from me. What am I but a driven leaf? And thou rememberest the sins of my youth, holdest my feet in prison. I am but mortal, of few days, and full of trouble (13:28–14.1). Why dost thou stare at me so? I am unclean, as all men are. Look away from me for a moment. I shall die soon enough, and not awake. Hide me in Sheol... until thy wrath be past. O God, keep me in mind! I will not let thee go. If only a man could live again! Hast thou no desire to the work of thy hands? Instead, thou dost number my steps, dost mark every move I make; thou dost hoard my iniquity in a bag. Have it thy way! Death be thy victory! And forgetfulness of all but the dread ache of it.

12:2–6. The Dissent of Common Sense.—Traditional piety and orthodox theology have done their best. Job now turns on his friends, an-4 I am as one mocked of his neighbor, who calleth upon God, and he answereth him: the just upright man is laughed to scorn.

4 I am a laughingstock to my friends; I, who called upon God and he answered me, a just and blameless man, am a laughingstock.

his moral capacities are not inferior to those of his interlocutors (vs. 3b may be out of place here: see 18:2b), but his sources of information are different. They are not the esoteric privilege of an elite, but the common man’s property: Who does not know such things as these? (vs. 3c).

4-6. These verses are omitted by Siegfried, Duhm, et al. It is argued that the idea expressed therein interrupts the thread of vs. 3, which is precisely picked up in vs. 7. It is also noted that the LXX offers at this point a widely different reading, and even omits vs. 4ab. Any hypothesis of a gloss, however, must be viewed in the light of the poet’s conception of rhetoric and his shrewd sensitivity to the swift transformation of psychological moods.

It is far from obvious that vss. 4-6 interrupt the sequence presented by vss. 3 and 7. What are “these things” which everyone knows (vs. 3c)? First, “he is [read with Syriac הַלְוִי for the M.T. תְּלְוִי] a laughingstock to his neighbor, (the man) who called upon God and God afflicted him” (vs. 4ab). The traditional rendering, who calleth upon God, and he answereth him, is grammatically exact but fails to identify the subject and the object of the second clause of the line. The general and proximate context shows, against RSV’s conjecture, that God has not yet answered the petitioner. Kissane understands that the just and blameless man is one who prays unto God and obeys him, one who is kindly responsive and obedient to the divine will (see 1 Kings 12:7; Hos. 2:15). In other words, the two verbs depend upon the same subject. Job would then describe himself in the terms of the prologue, as “perfect and upright, one who feared God, and turned away from evil” (1:1). Nevertheless, as the traditional translators have seen, the change of construction in vs. 4b from the participle אֲמַל, “one who calls,” to the consecutive imperfect, וְעָנֵת, and he answereth him, most probably indicates a change of subject. An attractive possibility is to consider יִתְנַשָּׁה as the consecutive imperfect Hiphil of הנָשַׁה III (see Akkadian enā, “to do violence to”) which is well attested in biblical Hebrew (see 1 Kings 8:35, and many uses of this verb in the Piel). Vs. 4b would then read, “One who called upon God, but he [God] afflicted him.” The hero is a laughingstock to [his] friends, precisely because his prayers are futile and his affliction invalidates his claim to uprightness. Here lies the scandal of Job’s situation, the irreducible antimony which confronts his inquiring mind: His piety and his behavior have not produced any fruit. The dogma of retribution is disproved by his own fate.

swering them all together by entering the plain and simple dammerr of what he believes to be common sense. Devout folk and even theologians do sometimes get too far away from the hard realities of existence, and by their very remoteness are betrayed into talking nonsense—about answers to prayer, God’s judgment of the wicked, his tender care of all the righteous; the way of love, the value of sacrifice, the “happy issue” out of all our afflictions (see Expos. on 13:8; 19:21). One good look at the world should suffice. One good look at the Cross should have kept us from being so startled by that one good look at the world. Job’s summary of things as they are is of course embittered by the wisdom which his friends have claimed as their prerogative. Zophar must have been sorry that he ever used the word. Job twists it and turns it over in his mouth, snacks his lips, and makes a wry face. What he says is no truer than what the others have said; but if allowance is made for the bitterness, one may contend that at least it outlines the case for the prosecution (see Expos. on 3:20-21; 7:1-6; 16:10; 18:21; 21:1-34). However pious the theory there can be no adjustment of the facts to fit it. Cynically Job counts them off on his fingers: blameless people who are a laughingstock; poor unfortunates for whom the fortunate need have no pity (see Exeg.)—if their foot slips, give them another push, they deserve it; and there all the while, on the other side, the people who “help themselves”—gen-5 He that is ready to slip with his feet is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at ease.

6 The tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure; into whose hand God bringeth abundantly.
7 But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee; and the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee:

In the thought of one who is at ease there is contempt for misfortune; it is ready for those whose feet slip.

The tents of robbers are at peace, and those who provoke God are secure, who bring their god in their hand. / But ask the beasts, and they will teach you; the birds of the air, and they will tell you;

Another possibility may be considered: without correcting the C.T. but by altering slightly the Masoretic pointing, Hölscher reads 'wayya'anehtiu instead of 'wayya'anehen. The clause might then mean, "One who called upon God so that God might answer him." Job would imply that his prayers remain unanswered.

5. Here is the second of these things (vs. 3) which are obvious to common sense. A happy man's motto is "Contempt for disaster" (vs. 5a). The text is difficult, but if one admits that it is well preserved, its meaning is possibly this: One who is at ease—i.e., "secure and serene"—can afford to despise misfortune and to minimize its significance. More probably Job is observing that a privileged man normally entertains a contemptuous attitude for men affected by calamity—a thought which would admirably prepare that of the parallel clause in vs. 5a, a blow for those whose feet slip. According to this translation, the word 'nun is not taken as a Niphal of the verb 'nu (see RSV), but as a derivative of nun, "to strike." In other words, the popular attitude is summed up in the advice, "Push a stumbling man to the gutter and help him to fall!" This is the practice of the jungle, where strong and healthy animals develop unusual cruelty toward their wounded or ailing mates. Job knows that in primitive society the weak man shows by his very weakness his inadequacy to fulfill his place in the tribal or the civic frame, and that furthermore his ruined life shows that the Deity has abandoned him. It is therefore both socially and religiously correct to attack him. One should side with the majority group and with God by spurning the destitute. Thus the poet indirectly inveighs against a vicious type of morality—vicious even though varnished by a perverted theology.

6. The third of these things (vs. 5) that anyone can observe is that the tents of robbers are at peace, and those who provoke God are secure. This is the counterpart of the preceding two observations, and it clinches the argument against the dogma of retribution. Vs. 6c adds a striking note: those who bring their god in their hand, or with Moffatt those "who make a god of their own power" (cf. Vergil's words, dextra mihi deus [Aeneid X. 773]; Hab. 1:11). If the text is well preserved (ancient versions differ widely from the Hebrew), this phrase refers to the man who thinks he can "bring God in his hand." True idolaters are those who do not submit themselves to the will of God, whatever it may be, but attempt to use God for their own aims and to manipulate religion for selfish gain.

(2) A Monistic View of the Universe (12:7-12)

7-12. The whole passage may be spurious for the following reasons: (a) It begins with the conjunction and adverb 복, "but indeed," "rather," a strong adversative erously. They are the ones God helps (cf. ch. 21). It is a strange world, and will not be reduced to simple formulas. Job knows better than Zophar how hard it is to understand God (see Expos. on 10:1-7; 11:7). The only fact there is that can make the other facts stand down is the faith which God can fashion in the human heart. What answer to any fact but a Person? 7-25. What Great Things God Hath Done!—The Exeg. summarizes the difficulties to be en-
12:8 THE INTERPRETER’S BIBLE

8 Or speak to the earth, and it shall teach thee; and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee.
9 Who knoweth not in all these that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this?
10 In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind.
11 Doth not the ear try words? and the mouth taste his meat?
12 With the ancient is wisdom; and in length of days understanding.

8 Or the plants of the earth, and they will teach you; and the fish of the sea will declare to you.
9 Who among all these does not know that the hand of the Lord has done this?
10 In his hand is the life of every living thing and the breath of all mankind.
11 Does not the ear try words as the palate tastes food?
12 Wisdom is with the aged, and understanding in length of days.

which does not fit the context; (b) it is addressed to a single person, not to the friends in the plural (and thus might have been originally directed to Job himself either by one of his friends—in which case it has been accidentally displaced—or else by a scandalized scribe who made a marginal comment); (c) it contains the sacred tetragrammaton הוהי (vs. 9b), a fact which violates the consistent practice of the poet throughout the discourses of Job and his friends, since they are supposed to be Arabs rather than members of the covenanted people; (d) it includes in vs. 9b an exact quotation from Isa. 41:20, and this suggests a scribal rather than an original hand, especially since the pronoun this does not refer to any identifiable noun in the present context; (e) the thought that wisdom is with the aged, and understanding in length of days (vs. 12) is surprising in the mouth of Job (unless it is a sarcastic statement which then needs to be introduced by such an expression as “Yes, indeed . . .”), but normal under the pen of a conventionally-minded annotator; (f) vs. 12 conflicts so sharply with the statement of the context which follows (vs. 13) that many exegetes are compelled to suppose that Job is here quoting the friends, and therefore they supply some syntactic link in order to make the sequence of ideas intelligible: i.e., “Wisdom, you argue, lies with aged men . . . Nay, . . .” (Moffatt; see Robert Gordis, “Quotations as a Literary Usage in Biblical, Oriental and Rabbinic Literature,” Hebrew Union College Annual, XXII [1949], 209-10).

To be sure, the monistic view of the universe which is expounded in vs. 10 agrees with Job’s thesis:

In his hand is the life of every living thing and the breath of all mankind (cf. 9:22-24).

This verse, however, may constitute a remnant of Job’s original exposition on God’s indiscriminate and therefore unjust government of men’s affairs.

countered in vss. 7-12. The verses may well be spurious. If not, Job is here marshaling against Zophar the weight of all creation’s knowledge, viz., that God cannot be let off so easily: he is responsible for every bit of it, good and bad. The prophets say so (vs. 9; cf. 9:24). See now what the bad is like. Nobody with any sense can swallow the kind of wisdom the friends have been doling out. Might, yes; understanding, yes (vs. 13); but what great things has God done with them? The record is set down in vss. 14-25 (vs. 22 is perhaps a gloss). It is the kind of record that Oscar Wilde once set down. He was sure there was enough misery in one narrow London lane to disprove the notion that God is love. In later years when calamity after its kind overtook him, he seemed equally sure that love of some sort is the only possible explanation of the extraordinary amount of suffering there is in the world. The story of human existence can be read both ways. Possibly vss. 17-25 reflect the sad disillusion of the Exile. If so, it would be an interesting comment on the ambiguities of history to list the profound changes wrought in...
13 With him is wisdom and strength, he hath counsel and understanding.
14 Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again: he shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening.
15 Behold, he withholdeth the waters, and they dry up: also he sendeth them out, and they overturn the earth.
16 With him is strength and wisdom: the deceived and the deceiver are his.
17 He leadeth counselors away spoiled, and maketh the judges fools.
18 He looseth the bond of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle.
19 He leadeth princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty.
20 He removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged.
21 He poureth contempt upon princes, and weakeneth the strength of the mighty.
22 He discovereth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death.
23 He increaseth the nations, and de-stroyeth them: he enlargeth the nations, and straiteneth them again.
24 He taketh away the heart of the chieof the people of the earth, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way.
25 They grope in the dark without light, and he maketh them to stagger like a drunken man.

“With God are wisdom and might;
he has counsel and understanding.

14 If he tears down, none can rebuild;
if he shuts a man in, none can open.
15 If he withholdest the waters, they dry up:
if he sends them out, they overwhelm
the land.
16 With him are strength and wisdom;
the deceived and the deceiver are his.
17 He leads counselors away stripped, and judges he makes fools.
18 He looses the bonds of kings, and binds a waistcloth on their loins.
19 He leads priests away stripped, and overthrows the mighty.
20 He deprives of speech those who are trusted, and takes away the discernment of the elders.
21 He pours contempt on princes, and looses the belt of the strong.
22 He uncovers the deeps out of darkness, and brings deep darkness to light.
23 He makes nations great, and he destroys them:
he enlarges nations, and leads them away.
24 He takes away understanding from the chiefs of the people of the earth, and makes them wander in a pathless waste.
25 They grope in the dark without light;
and he makes them stagger like a drunken man.

Heb him

(3) AN INDISCRIMINATE RULER OF MEN (12:13-25)

13-25. The world reveals the absoluteness of the power of God, but not his justice.
He is the sole author of all events (vss. 13-21). Even the deeps of the cosmos (see 10:21; 11:8) and the utter darkness of Sheol are within his grasp (vs. 22) — a thought which is most unusual for the Hebrew mind, according to which Sheol lies beyond the borders of God’s jurisdiction (Ps. 6:5; etc.; contrast the exceptional passages: 26:6; Amos 9:2; Ps. 139:8, 11; Prov. 15:11). Not only the fate of individuals but also the rise and fall of nations depend upon his almighty fiat (vss. 23-25). It cannot be denied that there is an austere grandeur in this completely theocentric philosophy of existence. But Job does not submit without protest to the iron rule. The whole passage is to be considered as a prelude to the aggressive thrust of the lines which follow.

the Hebrew-Christian tradition by those years of suffering (cf. Expos. on 7:19 [Act III]; 11:18). Must we not say that God’s redeeming purpose, and his power to effect it, are conditioned, relatively though not absolutely, by man’s freedom?
The Cross itself is the measure both of his weakness and his might (see I Cor. 1:25; cf. Expos. on 9:2-10, 14-19). It is not God’s power that we should take for granted. We can stand in the way of it. What we may and should take for granted is his bitter intent to our good, whatever the cost. A leper came one day to Jesus,
THE INTERPRETER’S BIBLE

13:1 Lo, mine eye hath seen all this, mine ear hath heard and understood it.
2 What ye know, the same do I know also: I am not inferior unto you.
3 Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to reason with God.
4 But ye are forgers of lies, ye are all physicians of no value.
5 Oh that ye would altogether hold your peace! and it should be your wisdom.
6 Hear now my reasoning, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips.
7 Will ye speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him?
8 Will ye accept his person? will ye contend for God?
9 Is it good that he should search you out? or as one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him?

13:2 Lo, my eye has seen all this, my ear has heard and understood it.
2 What you know, I also know; I am not inferior to you.
3 But I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to argue my case with God.
4 As for you, you whitewash with lies; worthless physicians are you all.
5 Oh that you would keep silent, and it would be your wisdom!
6 Hear now my reasoning, and listen to the pleadings of my lips.
7 Will you speak falsely for God, and speak deceitfully for him?
8 Will you show partiality toward him, will you plead the case for God?
9 Will it be well with you when he searches you out? Or can you deceive him, as one deceives a man?

b) DEFIANCE OF FRIENDSHIP AND GODHEAD (13:1-27)
1 THE INCOMPETENT HEALERS (13:1-12)

13:3. The expression יִנְעָשֶׁנִי, “but as for me,” is identical with that which opens Eliphaz’ advice in 5:8 and may indicate on the part of Job a sarcastic intent. The friend had said, “As for me, I would seek God.” Job replies, “But as for me, I would speak to the Almighty.” Before he will directly argue ... with God, Job denounces the futility or rather the viciousness of the friends’ endeavors. They are “plasterers of lies” (vs. 4) because they speak falsely for God (vs. 7) and defend him with proverbs of ashes (vs.

and kneeling down to him said, “If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean” (Mark 1:40). In a very real sense we are given there the pagan view of God. The Christian on his knees will rather bow his head and whisper, “If thou canst, my mushliness being what it is, thou wilt make me clean.”

13:1-12. Check and Countercheck. — Job’s “magnificent inconsistency” (Exeg.) provides both a check on his own jaundiced account of God’s dealing—one can hardly help feeling that he is dimly aware of it, despite all his bravado and arrogance—and a countercheck on the friends’ bootless if not indeed downright reprobate attempt to take God’s part by brandishing around half a dozen “old saws.” If Job’s mind is in danger of becoming godless, his heart is not: for all that and all that, there is a God who will have no truck with lies, not even when you tell them in his behalf. One thing we still have to be: honest. Never for God’s sake try to make black seem white. That kind of trickery fools nobody; least of all him The rebuke may fall where you least expect it. Maybe you are in greater danger than I am, he says to his friends. And they were (42:7). It is the “soul’s invincible surmise” that is to be trusted. Nothing else. And Job seems always to be within hailing distance of that. God is not away somewhere, remote and indifferent. There is still a knocking at the door. The sound of it is quite audible in many of the lines that follow: he will not suffer a godless man to come before him—he is that just (vs. 16), and Job will profit by it; it is not God that would be vindicated in such a trial, but Job himself—so much justice remains with the Unjust. Note also the misgivings that have begun to shake the foundations of his boasted innocence (vss. 28, 26). No wonder that what starts out to be blasphemy turns into appeal (vss. 20-25) before it settles down again into brooding (vss. 26-27); and no wonder that despair for a moment gives way to hope (vs. 16) before the shadow falls once more, darker than ever (14:1-12), with nothing but the light of fitful fires that blaze (14:14-15) and die down (14:18-22). A life is at its wit’s end when the self contradicts the self, and God’s “Yes” grapples with man’s “No.” It is the moment of death and birth.

8. Pleading God’s Cause. — (Cf. II Sam. 6:6-7). These attorneys for the defense (see Expos. on

*George Santayana, “The Better Part.”

1002
10 He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons.

11 Shall not his excellency make you afraid? and his dread fall upon you?

12 Your remembrances are like unto ashes, your bodies to bodies of clay.

13 Hold your peace, let me alone, that I may speak, and let come on me what will.

14 Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, and put my life in mine hand?

10 He will surely rebuke you if in secret you show partiality.

11 Will not his majesty terrify you, and the dread of him fall upon you?

12 Your maxims are proverbs of ashes, your defences are defences of clay.

13 "Let me have silence, and I will speak, and let come on me what may.

14 I will take my flesh in my teeth, and put my life in my hand.

12) Having just expounded the indiscriminate character of God's rule over the universe of men, Job is now certain, with a magnificent inconsistency, that the same God will surely rebuke these self-appointed defenders (vs. 10). Thus the blasphemer says that God is unjust toward him, but he still believes in God's retributive justice toward his friends!

As is his wont, Job prefaces a daring thought (vs. 15) with a solemn call to attention (vs. 13) and a forewarning of his boldness (vs. 14). The RSV is correct in following the Greek and in omitting at the beginning of vs. 14 the words ἀληθῶς, why, which appear to be a dittography of the immediately preceding ἀληθῶς at the end of vs. 13.

14. I will take my flesh in my teeth is paralleled by the clause and put my life in my hand. Job will speak, notwithstanding the most severe risks involved (cf. 9:35-10:1).

The image of vs. 14b is comparable with that of Judg. 12:3 (cf. I Sam. 19:5; 28:21; Ps. 119:109). The expression of vs. 14a, on the contrary, is not found elsewhere in the O.T.

vss. 1-12) were working up their brief out of manifest falsehood—manifest at least to Job. They stood in peril of their own "just" God. So do all men who discount the hazards of faith and misrepresent the claims of the Christian gospel in their altogether laudable effort to win for it a hearing. "Try God," wrote Mary Pickford. "Why not aspirin?" answered Halford Luccock. All quid pro quo religion—"You do this and God will do that"—is an attempt to do the Almighty the kind of favor (vs. 8a; the emphasis falls on God in vss. 7-8) which he is apt very promptly to repudiate (Mic. 6:8). Partiality is preference shown out of relation to any ground that would warrant it (see Expos. on 12:2-6). It is the essence of hypocrisy. It will genuflect before the altar and cheat its neighbor. It will cross itself and shut up "the bowels of its compassion." God will not be beholden to fraud and deceit. Ultimately of course he needs no defense at all that we can offer; nor any persuading by fair words, either on our behalf or his (see Expos. on 22:12-20). A drowning man is not saved by some argument that aims to set forth the advantages of learning how to swim.

12. Proverbs of Ashes.—What made them so? There was truth in them; but it was not the kind of truth that heals. It was the kind that embodies the results of experience It was the kind that could forewarn. It was the kind that might stir a sleeping conscience. It was not the kind that can give peace to a tortured soul. All the capsule wisdom of the ages cannot do that. It is a startling fact that most of our secular maxims are prudential: "Honesty is the best policy." "Pride goeth before a fall." "A penny saved is a penny earned." "A stitch in time saves nine." Whatever human life thinks worth embalming is likely to prove either a way to get out of difficulty or a way to keep from getting in (see Expos. on 2 11-13; 5:18). The "wisdom" of the Bible is an almost totally different thing. Always it is theological at its core, whether speculative in character, as often in Job and Ecclesiastes, or "practical," as in Proverbs. But even so, particularly in the form of quotation post eventum, it can scarcely "minister to a mind diseased." Love, and love alone, knows the healing art (see Expos. on 19:21). All other defences may have been bulwarks once; to Job they were clay now.

13-19. The Hope Born of Despair.—(See Exeg. above, also on 16:12-17; cf. Expos. on 12:7-25; 11:18; 10:25.) Fightings without and 18:15

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

15 Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him: but I will maintain mine own ways before him.

15 Behold, he will slay me; I have no hope; yet I will defend my ways to his face.

It may refer to a proverbial trope similar to that quoted by Moses Buttenwieser (The Book of Job [New York: The Macmillan Co., 1922], p. 196), “Salim escaped with his life between his jaws” (i.e., “his life was leaving him”). It may also allude to a man who places between his teeth or his hands his most treasured property—in this case, his life—as a challenge to his enemies, and thus implies the taunt, “Come and take it, if you dare!”

15. The RSV differs sharply from the KJV. The sublime expression of selfless faith, Yet will I trust in him (KJV), is translated not from the M.T., but from the marginal note of the Masoretes. Both the text (Kethibh) and the marginal correction (Qere) sound alike when read aloud, but the former is spelled לְאֵי, lâ’ *eyahel, the latter לַאֵי, lâ’ *eyahel. The famous English rendering of this verse introduces in the text a syntactic link, yet, which is neither in the consonantal MSS nor in the marginal correction, but which makes the meaning apparently intended by the Masoretes more intelligible to the readers of the translations. The question of the original text is most difficult.

On the one hand, the M.T. לְאֵי, “not,” is perhaps the result of an accidental corruption, for the marginal correction לַאֵי, “to him,” is supported by several versions which are anterior to the time when the M.T. was fixed (LXXA, Syriac, Targ., Vulg.). The only certain fact is that the KJV is an impossibility, for even if the marginal reading לַאֵי were adopted as authentic, the natural sense of the verse would be either (a) “I shall wait for him,” i.e., “to strike me,” and I shall be in a state of defiant expectation; or (b) “I shall wait for it,” i.e., “death,” and I shall be adamant in my claim unto the end.

Against these various renderings, and consequently against the authenticity of the marginal reading לַאֵי, one must argue that the verb לְאֵי, as it is used elsewhere in biblical Hebrew with the preposition ל, suggests the sense of “waiting” not for evil but for good (see 30:26). Yet one cannot translate in the direction of the KJV, “I shall wait for him (with confidence),” because such a statement could not be followed immediately by the restrictive word לְאֵי, “only,” “but,” “nevertheless,” in vs. 15b. If, then, one accepts the M.T. as authentic, the translation is I have no hope (RSV).

The conjecture of an accidental corruption, through metathesis, of the verb לְאֵי from an original לְאֵי is attractive. Job expects to be killed by God, and he adds, “I do not tremble” (Graetz, Ehrlich, et al.). However, such a hypothesis cannot be clearly proved.

Another translation is possible and even probable. The first word of vs. 15, לְאֵי, is usually understood as an interjection meaning, “Behold!” In many cases, however (see

---

* 15. An Inspired Mistake?— (See Exeg.) To how many has this “sublime mistranslation” brought courage and peace! (Cf. 19:25.) It cannot be held to convey the original meaning of—Blake 4 precisely at this point represents Job as lifting his eyes to God, away from the accusing figures of his friends, only to see that the “God of Justice” all of them had been commending to him was in reality Eliphaz’ God, with a cloven hoof (see Expos. on 4:20b). There are the first faint indications now of a straining toward God’s “proper work,” which is mercy. That can happen only when the hard protective shell of humanity’s misplaced reliance on itself is broken.

---

1. Illustrations X, XI.
16 He also shall be my salvation: for a hypocrite shall not come before him.

This will be my salvation, that a godless man shall not come before him.

Exod. 4:1; Lev. 25:20; etc.), and especially in Job (see 4:18; 12:14, 15; etc.), it introduces a conditional clause and corresponds to the Aramaic conjunction "if." Granted that such is its meaning in this passage, vs. 15a becomes intimately connected with vs. 15b (which otherwise follows without a strict sequence of thought) and the meaning of the C.T. becomes:

If he slays me, I have no hope!
Nevertheless, I will defend my behavior in his very presence!

All indications point to an imminent death, and Job agrees with his friends that if the Almighty God, in whose existence he believes, intends to exterminate him, there is not for him any prospect of salvation upon this earth. But he will not be silenced by the threat or the fear of death. His courage—one might even say his arrogance—is intensified by the certainty of his innocence. He will speak at all costs. He has nothing to lose. Indeed, he has everything to gain because, if God murders him, Job will at least meet his divine enemy who has heretofore refused to answer his cry.

16. The prospect of meeting God at last, face to face, even if it means death, brings a new thought to Job's frenzied mind. At the precise moment of his extremity, just when he considers the loss of his life to be inevitable, and therefore gives up any hope for the vindication of his righteousness, Job sees a faint glimmer in the recesses of his gloom. A new hope emerges from his very despair: "Even this [read with LXX והנה instead of the M.T. והנה] might become for me (the cause of my) salvation, for no godless man ever dares to face him" (lit., "ever comes to his face").

This is one of the most profound statements of the poem and its import would be considerably lessened, if not altogether eclipsed, were one to accept the traditional English rendering of vs. 15aβ, yet will I trust in him. Indeed, it can hardly be maintained that the honest abandonment of this sublime mistranslation impoverishes the Bible in general or the poem of Job in particular.

In effect, the correct rendering I have no hope is rhetorically, psychologically, and theologically far more pregnant with meaning than the statement of "faith at all cost," when it is viewed in the light of the whole context, especially of the unexpected and dramatic lifting of tension in vs. 16. Job has announced in vs. 13 that he was going to risk his life by uttering a blasphemy. Surely it would be rhetorically grotesque were such a spiritual earthquake to peter out into an expression of submissive faith. On the contrary, one can appreciate the degree of awe with which Job himself must have said, "If he murders me, I have no hope." Likewise, there is an incomparable upsurge of diction as Job passes from the statement of his despair in vs. 15 to the sudden renewal of his hope against the background of God's ineffable majesty and power (cf. vs. 25; 14:3; etc.). Here indeed is one of his perils: he might well have come to think that in the magnificence and vastness of this universe—for he understands God's greatness better than the friends—he amounted to nothing at all. Yet he never gives way to it (see Expos. on 9:14-19; 17:9). On the contrary, he insists that not even God himself can be suffered to maneuver or coerce a man's conscience. Eliphaz, Bildad, Zophar—each has maintained that if only Job would give up that pretension to innocence, God would deal merci-in vs. 16. Psychologically, the poet reveals once again his sharp and penetrating knowledge of human moods. Job is man himself, buffeted without, fractured within. But he must reach the extremity of anguish before he can be found by the new truth which shall make him free. Theologically at last Job takes his place among all men of honor and achievement who need to lose all hope in their own merit in order to grasp the basic fact of man's inability to save himself. At this stage the hero is still a long way from discovering either the theological dimensions of his sinfulness or the all-inclusiveness of God's mercy. Nevertheless, the conviction of his innocence will soon be shaken (see vss. 23 ff.). While he still tries to vindicate himself (vs. 15b), he no longer dares to say at this juncture that he is "righteous and perfect." He begins to turn, at the very depth of his hopelessness, to a thought which creates a new hope—that no ḫanēph, i.e., no profane, irreligious man, no apostate (see 8:18) would ever wish or be rash enough to dare meeting God face to face. If Job had not said in vs. 15a that he had no hope, he would not have been able to comprehend that a real bond still existed between the Almighty and himself. Thus his theological perception is growing in profundity: while God, for no apparent reason, may murder man, and therefore may be judged as amoral, he is at the same time so much God that only a certain type of man may approach him. In a sense, therefore, the poet anticipates the evangelical saying, "Blessed are the pure of heart: for they shall see God" (Matt. 5:8).

17-19. Listen carefully: Rather, "Keep on listening," "hear again and again," a prophetic expression (see Isa. 6:9; 55:2) which is used in a context of antagonism and anticipates a negative reaction.

I know that I shall be vindicated (vs. 18b) sums up the stage of spiritual development which Job has reached at the end of the first cycle of discussion. Although he no longer asserts his innocence, he is certain that his righteousness will be proclaimed at the time of his trial (contrast with 19:25a, "I know that my Redeemer liveth").

The challenge of vs. 19a is parallel to the question of the servant of Yahweh in fully with him; and Job has more than half believed them. But he will not be bribed or threatened into doing it. Not even to secure God's favor will he be false to himself.

Pascal says:

"Were the Universe to crush him, man would still be more noble than that which has slain him, because he knows that he dies, and that the Universe has the better of him. The Universe knows nothing of this." While the modern writer admires intelligent man facing an unintelligent Universe, which has the power to crush him, the ancient poet is awed at the thought of man as a moral being confronting the Maker and Ruler of an immoral Universe, who may have the will to annihilate him. The one reveals the majesty of mind opposing matter, the other the still greater majesty of conscience opposing omnipotent tyranny.6

"I will take my life in my teeth, and defend my ways to his face." There is a dignity about that, and a grandeur. It broke into life afresh at the Reformation, the kind of integrity and stature that will challenge any hand to strike it down, even God's hand. "Though devils all the world should fill. . . " 7 Recall old Andrew Melville, clutching at the robes of Scotland's peevish monarch as he ranted up and down the room prating of his divine right as king: "There are two kings and two kingdoms in Scotland: there is King James the head of this commonwealth, and there is Christ Jesus the King of the church, whose subject James the Sixth is, and of whose kingdom he is not a king, nor a lord, nor a head, but a member." 7

7 Martin Luther. 'A mighty fortress is our God.'
Only do not two things unto me; then will I not hide myself from thee.
Withdraw thine hand far from me: and let not thy dread make me afraid.
Then call thou, and I will answer: or let me speak, and answer thou me.
How many are mine iniquities and sins? make me to know my transgression and my sin.

20-21. Only Two Things.—There can be no bargaining with God. Job says, "If only thou wilt ease my pain and remove from my heart the terror of thy presence, I will not hide myself from thy face" (cf. 9:34-35). Observe that these are the two things which God does not do (38: 1-42:6). The change that takes place (40:4-5; 42:2-6) takes place in spite of it. The suffering has not yet passed, but there is no resentment any more. The terror is vaster than even Job had dreamed, but there is no groveling before it. God moves in his own mysterious ways, not by our charts and compass, to a better good than ours.

20-27. Questions that God Turns Around.—Already in vs. 19a Job has entertained the shadow of a thought that disturbs him (see Exeg.). Now, one after the other, he puts four Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdest me for thine enemy? (vs. 24). The word for enemy (מי) is probably a cognate of the name Job (יוֹב). The hero is stunned by the seeming hostility of the master of men. For this deeply consecrated believer all calamities—loss of wealth, children, health, friendship, and honor—are less excruciating than spiritual loneliness and the sense of abandonment by God. He could well ask with another, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” (Ps. 22:1). God hides his face when he is angry (Ps. 27:9; Isa. 54:8) or indifferent (Ps. 30:7), and his enmity is the more baffling since it follows so abruptly a long-enjoyed communion and favor.

Failing to find an answer to the second question, Job asks a third (vs. 25): He has now become a shadow of his former self. Is a driven leaf or dry chaff worth divine pursuit, or dangerous enough to warrant divine persecution? (See 7:12, 20). A fourth idea strikes his distraught mind. Is then his calamity due to the iniquities of [his] youth (vs. 26b; cf. Ps. 25:7)? He is desperately trying to “justify the ways of God to men” (Milton, Paradise Lost, Bk. I, l. 26). Since no sin of his manhood can explain his ill fate, is it conceivable that God should now make him bear the guilt of errors committed in his early youth? Notice that the word המיתו suggests “shy, early adolescence” rather than “exuberant, lustful, vigorous, and mature youth” (which would have been expressed by the word עון), and thus considerably minimizes the gravity of a “guilt” which could not be described as even “the sowing of wild oats.” The mystery of his present suffering thus remains almost entire. However irresponsible his behavior may have been when he was a youngster, surely the stringency of the penalty (vs. 27) remains out of all proportion to the vagaries of his early adolescence.

c) Fate of Mortal Man (13:28–14:22)

The third discourse of Job, and with it the first cycle of discussion, is brought to a close with a poem on human destiny which divides itself into four strophes: the first strophe paints the picture of man’s mortality (13:28–14:6); the second deals with the finality of man’s death (14:7–12); the third wildly imagines an afterlife (14:13–17); the fourth falls back upon the theme of man’s irrevocable fate of annihilation (14:18–22).

(1) Picture of Man’s Mortality (13:28–14:6)

Most exegetes recognize that 13:28 either is out of place or represents a marginal notation. The verse begins with And he, which obviously refers to man, although this Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble.
2 He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not.
3 And dost thou open thine eyes upon such a one, and bringest me into judgment with thee?
4 Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one.

Job 14:4

"Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble.
2 He comes forth like a flower, and withers; he fleeth like a shadow, and continues not.
3 And dost thou open thy eyes upon such a one and bring him into judgment with thee?
4 Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? There is not one.

* Gk Svr Vg Heb me word does not appear before the next line (14:1). According to several commentators its original place may have been after 14:6b, where the sequence of thought is rhetorically striking and the tenses of the verbs are in agreement (נָשָׁת, "he will enjoy," in 14:6b and הָלָךְ, "he will waste away," in 13:28). The reading of 14:6 and 13:28 together would then be as follows:

Look away from him, and desist, that he may enjoy, like a hireling, his day (14:6).

[But he] wastes away like a rotten thing, like a garment that is moth-eaten (15:28).

Other critics prefer to preserve the present order undisturbed, pointing out that the emphatic use of the pronoun אֲדֹהֵם at the beginning of 13:28a may easily stand for an original feminine (in English, neuter) אֵדֹהַם, meaning: "And it is like a rotten [tree which] wastes away." This comparison would then echo the image of the "driven leaf" in 13:25, and thus could stay at its present place. Yet the location of the line after 14:6 might just as well be defended on the ground that it prepares for the image of the tree in 14:7 ff.

14:1-3. Man...born of a woman: As in 7:1 ff., Job speaks for the whole of mankind ('ādhām), but the present train of his thought bears more heavily on life's brevity than on life's misery. In any case, man's insignificance does not justify God's sharp scrutiny (vs. 3; cf. 7:17-19). The shift of person from such a one (vs. 3a) to me (vs. 3b) shows once more that Job cannot dwell on the general without soon falling back on the particular. However, the LXX, Vulg., and Syriac read νασιμ, and...him (RSV), rather than the M.T. יָנָיו, and...me (KJV).

4. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one: Several exegetes consider this verse as a marginal note for three reasons: (a) it is an unusually short line; (b) it is missing in one Hebrew MS; (c) it introduces a note of sinfulness in a passage concerned echoing to the earth again. "What think ye?" "How readest thou?"

14:1-6. The Brevity of Life.—(Cf. Expos. on 7:1-6, 6.) Job makes the point that life is both short and troubled. It is like a flower...a shadow: the familiar similes of how many generations! Its end is decreed, its bounds are set (vs. 5). Surely, being short, it should be happy; but it is not. The only pleasure a man can possibly have in it is the pleasure a hireling gets out of his drudgery. Eliphaz has said (5:7) that trouble is somehow a part of man's primeval inheritance: he is both born to it and responsible for it. Job is interested here merely in stating the fact (see Expos. on 6:8-13) And in arguing from it that God should not add to its burden, but should show a little compassion, look away for pity's sake (7:19; 10:20), not hold people to such strict account; especially since everybody is unclean anyway—Job no more than the others—and nobody important enough (7:20a, 21a; 13:24-25) for God to stare at him so intently (see Browning's "Instans Tyrannus" and Blake's Illustration XI, the God of the cloven hoof). On the same premises it could have been argued (a) that the only sense to be
14:5  THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

5 Seeing his days are determined, the number of his months are with thee, thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass;
6 Turn from him, that he may rest, till he shall accomplish, as a hireling, his day.
7 For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease.

5 Since his days are determined, and the number of his months is with thee, and thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass,
6 look away from him, and desist, that he may enjoy, like a hireling, his day.
7 "For there is hope for a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that its shoots will not cease.

only with life's transitoriness. These are precarious arguments: (a) the Hebrew meter is not inflexible and often adapts itself to the abruptness of a poetic idea; (b) one MS may have an accidental omission; (c) in the same chapter Job is indeed concerned with his "sin," "transgression," and "guilt" (vss. 16-17). In addition, the idea of mankind's uncleanness may have been brought to the poet's mind by the formula of vs. 1, man . . . born of a woman, since the thought it represents is akin to that of Ps. 51:5 (cf. Ps. 14:3). Job, like Eliphez (4:17), acknowledges the universality of man's impurity and thus makes an implicit plea for God's understanding: his own case is not different from that of his fellow human beings. No more than the text of Ps. 51:5 does this line refer to any ritual impurity involved in the act of conception itself (against the paraphrasing of Vulg., de immundo conceptum semine); it merely points out the corporate solidarity of the human race and the deep connection of its sinful nature with universal death.

(2) Finality of Man's Death (14:7-12)

7-12. Religious rites and beliefs in the ancient Near East cultivated the hope of a resurrection alter the grave. Job polemizes bluntly against these attractive illusions: Man made out of trouble lies in the victory that can be won over it; and (b) that the brevity of life may conceivably underscore the urgency both of duty and love. W. Cosby Bell records the legend of Jubal: how in the days before death came, life seemed to be shallowing out. It "had neither gravity nor greatness." Tomorrow would do as well as today. Endless opportunity, endless boredom. Then suddenly there was an empty place by the fire. A footstep that had grown familiar would never be heard again. There might be no tomorrow—only today, and its infinitely dear and precious hours (see Expos on 3:17).

Human relationships took on a new depth and tenderness in the knowledge that not forever would they run on unbroken; and one day a man asked his life to save his friend from the leap of a beast, and that was the birthday of heroism in the world. So did death breathe into life the spirit from which came all things fine and great.8

7-12. When a Man Dies He Is Dead.—"If you are dead, then you are dead." In The Church's Witness to God's Design,9 prepared under the auspices of the World Council of Churches, this was listed by Emil Brunner as one of the axioms of modern man. He has an idea that he knows what kind of world he lives in. Death seems to him on the face of it fairly conclusive. Aldous Huxley said that he and his friends, in the years of their untrammeled youth, preferred it that way. Job of course is not speaking with any of the scientific or philosophical presuppositions of the twentieth century: the poet is having him speak out of the context of the Hebrew religion. This is precisely the popular Hebrew notion of the so-called "life" after death: it goes on as being, but it amounts to no more than a dreary sort of not-being (see Exeg. on 12:13-25; Expos. on 5:17). Even though the whole face of nature is changed, the dead will be forever the same (vss. 11-12; so Kissane).

What has to be said for Job in this connection is that he seems to understand how incongruous

8 Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground;
9 Yet through the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant.
10 But man dieth, and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?
11 As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up:
12 So man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep.
13 Oh that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me secret, until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me!
THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

14 If a man die, shall he live again? all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.

15 Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee: thou wilt have a desire to the work of thine hands.

that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me!

14 If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my service I would wait, till my release should come.

15 Thou wouldest call, and I would answer thee; reason for the faith that is in us as we are to give a reason for the doubt that tries to undermine it? And how closely do we scrutinize the "reasons"? There is much in the world to unsettle the doctrinaire, wherever he throws in his lot, with the "Yes" or with the "No" (read Wordsworth's "Intimations of Immortality"; see Expos, on 10:8-12, 13-17). What of birth, which must be to the infant very much as death is to us? What of the Resurrection, and the gospel that sprang out of it full-grown, as Minerva sprang from the head of Jove? What of the church which that gospel fashioned? Is all of it meaningless? Or is there still a whisper of God in the ear? Whisper or shout? (See Expos, on vss. 1-6, 13; 19:25.)

14b. The Sufferings of This Present Time.—Job says that if he could believe what he yearns to believe, he could go through with anything—both here and hereafter (on "waiting" see Expos, on 8:20-22). To what extent in actual fact does the faith we profess in the life that shall be change the aspect of the life that now is? In Eugene O'Neill's play Lazarus Laughed, the brother of Mary and Martha comes back to the world with a strangely inverted sense of values. Maybe the "great" things are small, and the "small" great. Maybe we ourselves are greater than we thought.

15. The God Beyond God.—In Blake's engravings, all through the prologue the figure of God appears right foot forward, symbol of spirit and good. In Illustration XI, as has been noted (see Expos, on 13:13-19), the left foot is a

(vs. 14a). Philosophical skepticism usually undermines in a negative way the acceptance of a positive dogma. Job's doubt, on the contrary, spurred by a prayer which will not let God go, undermines a negative certainty to prepare for an affirmative faith. The question of vs. 14a is not asked by a thinker observing the human situation but by a lover preimagining his partner's attitude: Thou wouldest hide me, . . . conceal me, . . . appoint me a set time ["make a date with me"], . . . remember me [vs. 15], call, . . . long for [lit., "become pale with the passion of desire," or "faint from delayed or thwarted expectation"]; cf. Ps. 84:2.

This is not merely the hope of an afterlife. It is the certainty of the unbrokenness, beyond physical death, of a communion which unites God and man on earth (cf. Ps. 73:24-26[?]). If Job knew that at the end of his service (vs. 14b) God would call (vs. 15)

Job's heart. Is it God's whisper? Is there still somewhere in this mysterious universe a love that will not let us go; that in a compassion on the other side of wrath will hide a man away, keep him in secret for a while, bring to an end too at some appointed time his sojourn there in Sheol (cf. vs. 5)? O God, remember me! With all the stored-up yearning of his soul he reaches out his hands for what his mind has forbidden him. Is the wish father to the thought, or is God father to the wish? "All the days of my service I would wait." Said an officer in World War I: "I have seen a captain send one of his men to certain death; and I have seen that man salute and turn on his heel to obey. Shall I not do as much, whatever God bids me suffer, wherever he bids me go?"

14. The Doubt that Unsettles Doubt.—(See Exeg, on vss. 13-17, and Expos, pp. 905-7.) Strahan quotes from Browning's "Bishop Blougram's Apology."

Just when we are safest, there's a sunset touch,
A fancy from a flower-bell, some one's death,
A chorus-ending from Euripides,—
And that's enough for fifty hopes and fears
As old and new at once as nature's self,
To rap and knock and enter in our soul, and adds that here it is not "a fancy from a flower-bell" but "a fancy from an old tree-stem, as good as dead, and yet, at the scent of water, shooting up again in green felicity." Perhaps it were better for us to doubt our doubts than to doubt our faith. Are we as ready to give a 2 Job, pp 185-84.

3 New York: Horace Liveright, 1927.
16 For now thou numberest my steps: dost thou not watch over my sin?
17 My transgression is sealed up in a bag, and thou sewest up mine iniquity.

16 For then thou wouldest number my steps, thou wouldest not keep watch over my sin;
17 my transgression would be sealed up in a bag, and thou wouldest cover over my iniquity.

then, not unlike Jacob serving for Rachel, he would gladly endure his present “forced labor” and would answer the divine invitation. The question of life eternal is not asked here or elsewhere in the Bible on philosophical or ethical grounds; it is raised by the love of man for God, and the response of man to God’s desire or longing for the work of [his] hands.

16. This verse is translated in two conflicting ways: (a) The KJV, followed by the ERV, ASV, Amer. Trans., and many exeges, considers that the initial words יִפְצֹל, “but now,” establish a brutal contrast between lyrical fantasy and present realities. Vs. 16a is thus rendered, For now thou numberest my steps: A pejorative expression, suggesting the sharp watchfulness of a spy (cf. 7:20b; 31:4; 37; 34:21). Vs. 16b, however, reads, lit., “Thou dost not watch over my sin,” which for the sake of consistency is either interpreted as an interrogative sentence (KJV) or corrected into an affirmative clause (by deletion of the negative נְ). The difficulty may not have been sensed by the translators of the LXX, for they read, “Thou dost not overlook any of my sins,” presumably presupposing such a verb as בָּנַצִּיר instead of M.T. רָשׁ. (b) The RSV and several modern exeges consider that vs. 16 continues the picture of intimate harmony with God delineated in vss. 13-15, and thus interpret the initial words of vs. 16a, יִפְצֹל, as referring to the future, For then. In this way the rendering of vs. 16b would be quite satisfactory: Thou wouldest not keep watch over my sin, but vs. 16a would have to be understood in a good sense: For then thou wouldest number my steps (with loving care), an interpretation which is not supported by other usages of the same idiom (see above). A possible way out of the difficulty would be to follow the reading of the Syriac (which introduces the negative נְ in vs. 16a) and to translate, “Then thou wouldest not number my steps.” On the other hand, if the present M.T. is correct one might follow Dhorme’s suggestion and suppose that vs. 16a refers to the present, while vs. 16b returns to the contemplation of God’s future favor: “Whereas now thou numberest my steps (then) thou wouldest not watch over my sin.” However, vs. 17 most probably indicates that Job’s turn of thought has already fallen back on the dark present, and consequently the first interpretation of vs. 16 (see above) seems definitely preferable.

17. This verse at first sight presents the same ambiguity as vs. 16, and many critics hold that its meaning depends on the latter’s interpretation. An opposite reasoning is just as tenable. Some translators and commentators (see KJV) believe that the sealing of a transgression in a bag (vs. 17a) refers to the maintenance of its memory for the purpose of eventual indictment. Others (see RSV) find in the same expression the assurance that Job’s transgression will be hidden from God’s sight and thus eventually forgotten. Likewise, in vs. 17b, some interpreters (see KJV) hold that the verb לְפָסַד means cloven hoof: “The God of Justice is only Satan, masquerading as an angel of light.” ^4 In Illustration XIII God answers Job out of the whirlwind, right foot forward once more. The artist-poet has caught the kaleidoscopic changes wrought in the mind of Job by the conflict between longing and resentment going on in his soul (see Expos. on 7:21c; 10:8-12, 13-17; see also 7:7-10, 21; 9:95; 17:3; 19:25-27). Job for a moment envisions the day when “the God of grace” will call him back again to life and to the restoration of that fellowship which “the God of wrath” has broken off. The eternal gospel casts its Shadow before (John 1:17; Rom. 8:1; yet see Exeg. on 16:18-22; Expos. on 16:19).

* Damon, Doctrine of Job, ad loc.

16. The Watcher of Men.—Cf. Exeg. on vs. 17; Expos. on 7:20a; 16:13; etc.
14:18 And surely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place.
19 The waters wear the stones: thou wastest away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth; and thou destroyest the hope of man.

"to glue over," "to smear," "to plaster," and therefore describes figuratively the process by which Job's guilt is carefully preserved and remembered. Other exegetes (see RSV) find in it an allusion to its "covering," not for the sake of its preservation, but on the contrary for its concealment and eventual disappearance.

Three considerations seem to have been overlooked. (a) The sealing of a transgression in a bag (vs. 17a) can hardly be done for the purpose of hiding and forgetting. The כיס הלחם is a purse or pouch used for storing and safekeeping (Gen. 42:35; Prov. 7:20). Even when figuratively used, the word is never connected with the idea of eventual loss, but reveals on the contrary the anxious desire to preserve (I Sam. 25:29; especially Song of S. 1:19). (b) Likewise, the verb כיס (vs. 17b) does not mean to cover in the sense of "passing over," "overlooking," or "forgiving," but is used with an evil intent in Job (18:4) as well as elsewhere (Ps. 119:69). (c) If Job were still thinking in vs. 17 of his future happiness in an afterlife, and explicitly believing in God's act of forgiveness, he would thereby acknowledge implicitly the validity of his friends' accusations; in other words, he would admit the reality of his guilt; he would recognize that his future life of communion with God would be possible only if God overlooked his transgression and covered up his sinfulness; in brief, he would plead guilty. Such an attitude is shown in neither the specific nor the general context of the dialogue: to the end (ch. 31) Job protests his innocence. For these reasons vs. 17 (and consequently vs. 16) should be understood as referring to the present tragic reality.

After having indulged for a few fleeting moments in the luxury of imagining an afterlife born of divine tenderness (vs. 13-15), the miserable creature is thrown back into his—our—world. Life is such that God appears to watch every step, ready to pounce upon man at the first intimation of sin. "Sealed in a purse is my transgression, and thou hast glued over my guilt." There is no divine intention of pardon. Furthermore, Job acknowledges his guilt as little here as in 13:23. He attempts only to explain the hostility displayed by God against him.

(4) Man's Irrevocable Annihilation (14:18-22)

18-19. These verses are absent in the Coptic Sahidic version; they are marked with asterisks in Jerome's recension and in the Syro-hexaplaric version; the present text of the 18 "But the mountain falls and crumbles away, and the rock is removed from its place; the waters wear away the stones, so thou destroyest the hope of man.

18-22. In Gorgeous Sweeps of Scorn.—See Expos. on 1:6-12; cf. Prospero's speech in The Tempest:

The cloud-rapp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep.8

As the slow process of time eats away at a granite cliff, so God prevails in the end (vs. 20). As waters wear away the stones, and torrents wash away the soil, so God brings over the face of human life the vacant stare of death (vs. 20).

If our being here is so important, why are we snuffed out so ruthlessly? If love and beauty are so precious, why does the whole created universe act as if they were the merest accident? It will take more than a flower or two of speech to cover that (see Expos. on vs. 13; 6:18-19). See vs. 20, he passeth; still a common enough euphemism for death. Says Strahan, "If Revelation consents to retain the word 'passeth,' she does so only on the condition that she shall be allowed to give it an entirely new content"; then quotes 1 John 5:14.8

8 Act IV, scene 1.
20 Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth: thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away.
21 His sons come to honor, and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them.
22 But his flesh upon him shall have pain, and his soul within him shall mourn.

15 Then answered Eliphaz the Temanite, and said,

LXX has been supplied from Theod.; the initial word ἀπεκαθιστάνει, "but on the contrary," indicates some disturbance of the original text. In spite of these difficulties, the general idea is clear: as the seemingly most endurable elements of nature—mountains, rocks, and soil—disintegrate under the various phenomena of erosion, so man's hope is destroyed little by little, drop by drop.

20-22. A dead man is unaware of the fate of his descendants (see 21:21). He may retain some kind of psychological consciousness (cf. in contrast Eccl. 9:5-6), but his preoccupation is confined to his own fate: "Only upon himself does his flesh ache and his soul mourn" (vs. 22). The use of the two words flesh and soul does not indicate a dualistic anthropology, for they are placed in poetic parallelism. The flesh in the grave is devoured by worms, or at least disintegrates, and thus "suffers" in the natural process of decay (vs. 20b). The soul, also in the grave, retains the sense of its identity, but is busily engaged in the intoning of an eternal dirge.

At the end of the first cycle of discussion Job has fallen into a slough of despond perhaps deeper than the pessimism of his initial lament. There he looked at death as a state of rest, perhaps of serenity (3:13 ff.); here he grimly faces an endless continuation of dull pain. There he was "half in love with easeful Death!"; here he stands alone before "the grisly terror."

C. SECOND CYCLE OF DISCUSSION (15:1-21:34)
1. SECOND DISCOURSE OF ELIPHAZ (15:1-55)

The friends have heretofore displayed a total lack of comprehension; yet they have honestly thought that Job was not beyond man's comfort and God's salvation. The proud way in which the sufferer reacted to their pastoral suggestions has steadily deepened the gulf that from the start had alienated him from them. The tone of the dialogue has now sharpened to such an extent that Eliphaz, who had at first observed the rules of Oriental civility with almost exquisite gentleness (4:2) now drops all circumlocutions of courtesy.

15:1-21:34. The Second Cycle.—In the first round of the conversation which goes on between Job and his three friends it becomes clear how chock-full his would-be comforters are of wise and helpful comments culled from experience, tradition, and the current theology—none of which fits Job's case. They try to bring him what solace they can, albeit with something of the condescension which too often turns the milk of human kindness sour (12:5), by sharing with him many a choice bit of wisdom. And the only result is that they irritate him. The poultice proves to be a mustard plaster. For the simple reason that all of them lack that quiet understanding and deep sympathy which would suffer with the sufferer, silently perhaps; for silence can be a balm when there are no words to utter. What they lack is love; what they have in irksome abundance is a collection of explanations that fail to explain, and exhortations based on them that can therefore incite to nothing but resentment. They try to take his mind off himself and direct it to God; which would have been all right if at the moment he had happened to 2 Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the east wind?
3 Should he reason with unprofitable talk? or with speeches wherewith he can do no good?

a) A THREEFOLD INDICTMENT (15:2-16)
(1) JOB'S SELF-INCRIMINATION (15:2-6)

15:2-6. The attack is abrupt. There are no conciliating preliminaries. Job had claimed that he possessed a wisdom of his own (12:3; 13:2), but should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the east wind (vs. 2)? A “science of wind” (vs. 2a) is without substance, foundation, or purpose (cf. 8:2). Not only is Job’s thesis without consistency and even empty, but it has within itself the germ of destruction and may be compared to the east wind (vs. 2b), a hot breath of death which dries up vegetation and suffocates man and beast. It brings only pain and sterility. Job’s reasonings are not only profitless (vs. 3), they are ruinous. “Thou even disruptest piety” (vs. 4a; cf. Moffatt, “You undermine religion”). Lit., “Thou breakest fear.” The verb means “to violate” (the covenant) or “to make ineffectual” (a counsel or a vow). Fear in gnomic Hebrew designates the pious forms of religion. Job is thus accused of exercising pernicious influence, presumably upon his friends themselves, who perhaps cannot help being impressed by his heroic courage and even bewildered and baffled by the mystery of his fate. The parallel line confirms this interpretation: He is hindering like God. They talk of holiness and justice and omniscience. But by this time Job has been so put upon by their insistent if somewhat veiled assumption of his guilt that he breaks out in rebellion against the kind of God who would deal with a man as they keep saying their God does. So the friends grow increasingly disagreeable. Job does too. They see nothing else for it now but that he is the very kind of wicked person they have been talking about. They quit making their glib promises of restoration (see Expos. on 17:12). He has despised the consolation of God; let him hearken to the terrors of the Almighty. His conscience has to be prodded wide awake. Head in the air then, feet on the ground: the wicked, with God at his back, must be compelled to behold the wicked’s fate. So in the three cycles do the areas of discussion converge to a point, like vertical cross sections of an inverted cone, from God to man to the sufferer himself.

Job does not at first seem to realize the enormity of what is going on. From the very start he has been lagging a step or two behind, unable to cope promptly with the hints and innuendoes that he has no desire to hear and refuses to entertain. As the drift of the argument sets in toward him more unrelentingly than ever and with even greater ruthlessness, he sees himself lonelier than he thought it possible for a human soul to be: no pity in heaven, and none on earth. His tortured mind comes back to it over and over again, pacing up and down, hardly hearing what anybody says, like a wild beast in a cage, just looking through the bars at the desolation that has somehow been wrought in his world. Until all at once it dawns on him that everybody has been mouthing the same old nonsense, building the same old house of cards: “The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish” (Ps. 1:6). And with one sweep of his arm (ch. 21) he scatters it to the winds. Anybody can look around and see for himself what ridiculous sophistry it is.

15:1-35. The Speech of Eliphaz.—Bildad was right (8:2). If you are a wise man, why do you talk like a windbag? There is no profit in it, it does no good. You are impious and upsetting (see Exeg. on vs. 4). You talk as you do because you are what you are (vs. 5a). Then you put a front on it (vs. 5b). You have condemned yourself out of your own mouth. Who in the world do you think you are? Older than anybody? Wiser than everybody? In what we have said God has tried to deal gently with you—and your eyes flash. Good heavens—even they are not good!—nobody on earth (vs. 14) can make such claims as you have made. Much less one who gulps down iniquity like water! Listen. Experience and tradition alike—before all these foreigners got in and corrupted it (vs. 19)—teach what you have had the effrontery to deny (cf. vss. 20-35 with 9:22-24; 12:6; etc.): that the 4 Yea, thou castest off fear, and restrainest prayer before God.
5 For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou choosest the tongue of the crafty.
6 Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I: yea, thine own lips testify against thee.
7 Art thou the first man that was born? or wast thou made before the hills?

meditation before God (vs. 4b). Eliphaz acknowledges, and not obliquely, that his apparent composure hides some deep disturbance. But not for long; he has sensed the attractiveness of heresy, and reacts the more swiftly to this beguilement which threatens his orthodoxy. Like any inquisitor, he thrusts in the sword of accusation: Your iniquity teaches your mouth (vs. 5a). Job reveals his own guilt (154) by his words. He has chosen the tongue of the crafty (vs. 5b), a word used for describing the snake in the story of universal man’s temptation to set himself as a judge of the Deity’s purpose by casting doubts upon the Deity’s motives (Gen. 3:1). Eliphaz may have intended the allusion. Now Job has offered, in his own defense, ground for incrimination, and Eliphaz spares himself the task and burden of pronouncing a verdict: Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I (vs. 6a). The echo may be heard across the centuries: “What further need have we of witnesses?” (Matt. 26:65).

(2) Job’s Self-Delusion (15:7-11)

7a. Since Job has conceded that “in old age is wisdom” (12:12), he must be very old indeed, for he claims monopoly of knowledge (cf. vs. 10). Irony leads Eliphaz to indulge in hyperbole: Art thou the first man that was born? (vs. 7a). This question does not necessarily refer to the myth of the primeval man brought forth into existence before the creation of the world, for it may be rendered, “Wert thou born the first of mankind [‘āḏāhām]?” In this case the allusion is to the biblical account of the garden, just as “the crafty” in vs. 5b may have referred to the snake (see Exeg. on vs. 2-6).

7b. This verse is almost identical with Prov. 8:25b, in which the personified figure of wisdom sings, “Before the hills was I brought forth.” Inasmuch as this line is the wicked are doomed. They are afraid even when they are well to do. Like you, they are filled with foreboding because they have defied the Almighty (vss. 25-26) and oppressed the poor (vss. 27-28). They will have their recompense. Did you ever see a withered vine? A dead tree? Childless homes? Dwelling places gutted by fire (vs. 34b)? And do you know what it means? It means paid in full (vs. 32).

4. Doing Away with Religion.—All those who do not think as convention does are likely enough to incur the charge. One great revolutionary after another—pioneers in science, economics, sociology, and religion—has been accused of it (see Exeg. on 18:21; Expos. on 23:2). Some of them have been put to death. Jesus of Nazareth was. God moves ahead with great seven-league boots; and we in bedroom slippers. It is “a dreadful thing” to fall into the clutches of a closed mind. Such a mind is not merely “closed for repairs”: it is closed! Pride had closed the mind of Eliphaz, and Job had wounded it (cf. vss. 2-3, 10). Tradition had closed Bildad’s. Using his brains without his heart had slammed the door of Zophar’s, and locked it. After that, no matter how right other men are—e.g., Job—they are wrong morally (vs. 5a), deliberately (vs. 5b), and obviously (vs. 6). Everything they say spells “guilty.” The only thing anyone has to do is to listen (see Exeg. on vs. 6a; Expos. on vss. 7-16).

7-16. The None Too Gentle Art of Disregarment.—Eliphaz is still confident of his privileged position. When you are where he was you cannot avoid stooping if you are to have any dealing at all with somebody who is where Job was. Well, the least said the soonest mended. Yet there is evidence that the aged seer has 8 Hast thou heard the secret of God? and dost thou restrain wisdom to thyself?
9 What knowest thou, that we know not? what understandest thou, which is not in us?
10 With us are both the grayheaded and very aged men, much elder than thy father.
11 Are the consolations of God small with thee? is there any secret thing with thee?

counterpart of its preceding (Prov. 8:25a) and belongs to a homogeneous poem (Prov. 8:22-31), the probability is that the poet of Job borrowed it from the gnomic literature. Does Job think himself to be a demigod, a suprahuman being, a hypostasis of the Godhead, a mythological hero, or even the prototype of humankind? Or did he derive knowledge from listening in the [secret] council of God (vs. 8a)? Is Job a prophet to whom is revealed the divine secret (cf. Amos 3:7), or a sage who violates professional etiquette by keeping for himself an esoteric kind of wisdom (vs. 8b)? In what way is he, a mere youngster (vs. 10), better informed (vs. 9a) or more perceptive (vs. 9b) than his friends? All three of them have spoken hopefully about God’s method of educating man (5:17-27; 8:5-8; 11:13-20), but Job has spurned their gently spoken words; he has belittled even the consolations of God himself (vs. 11).

been losing some of his composure (see Exeg. on vs. 2-6). What Job has been saying has succeeded in getting under his skin in more ways than one. Job has not been showing any of them proper respect—after they had come all that way to commiserate with him. And he has been delivering himself of certain sentiments that were calculated to annoy any truly pious man: they came too near the uneasy facts to be comfortable. Said a woman the first time she ever heard of Darwin’s theory “My dear! Descended from apes? How perfectly awful! Let us hope that it is not true. And if it is, let us pray that it may not become widely known.” All this sparring might very well turn out to be quite awkward. The gloves had to come off now, or things would get worse. The ground had begun to feel shaky enough. Who wants to lose an argument? (Cf. Expos. on 4:8-11.)

So—the “none too gentle art.” Begin with an unexamined assumption: (a) that with age is the secret of wisdom, and (b) that some people who claim to be God’s confidants are anything but . . . ; you know who is. Then inquire into the other man’s credentials, comparing them with your own. Tell him he has scarcely reached the years of maturity (vs. 7, 10). Ask him if he has a private listening post, and has overheard the counsels of the Almighty (vs. 8). If that is why he limits wisdom to himself—and will not permit you to have all of it. Never breathe a word of what you are doing; tell him he is doing it. Put it to him: Do you think you know any thing that we do not know? Some of us are older than your father. And we have been offering you the very consolations of God, straight from the source (see Expos. on vs. 11). Next, explain your opponent to himself (see Expos. on 22:12-20). Say he must indeed be out of his mind; at any rate what he is spouting out of his mouth is presumptuous and abominable (vs. 14-16). And quote what you have said before, while you are about it (4:17-19). Nothing could distress him more. You may wind it all up after that by telling him what he has to look forward to if he keeps on (vss. 17-35).

To such as Eliphaz it is the self that matters, all pretensions to the contrary: the self and what it sees as it looks out on the world. Of all things else, people matter least. And that, being against God and against man, is the destroyer of self! “Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me” (Matt. 25:40).

11. The Consolations of God.—Eliphaz preens himself on having merely hinted that Job was guilty of wrongdoing, and on having held out to him steadily the assurance that his suffering was a blessing in disguise and that everything would come right in the end (5:17-27). So with Biledad and Zophar, though not so considerably. But Job was not interested in either the approach or the prospect: he was interested in having somebody understand how it was with him. Analysis, warning, the promise of a happy issue one of these days—none of it was consolation.
12 Why doth thine heart carry thee away? and what do thy eyes wink at, 13 That thou turnest thy spirit against God, and lettest such words go out of thy mouth?
14 What is man, that he should be clean? and he which is born of a woman, that he should be righteous?
15 Behold, he putteth no trust in his saints; yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight.
16 How much more abominable and filthy is man, which drinketh iniquity like water?
17 I will show thee, hear me; and that which I have seen I will declare;
18 Which wise men have told from their fathers, and have not hid it:
19 Unto whom alone the earth was given, and no stranger passed among them.
20 The wicked man travaileth with pain all his days, and the number of years is hidden to the oppressor.

12 Why does your heart carry you away, and why do your eyes flash, 13 That you turn your spirit against God, and let such words go out of your mouth?
14 What is man, that he can be clean? Or he that is born of a woman, that he can be righteous?
15 Behold, God puts no trust in his holy ones, and the heavens are not clean in his sight:
16 How much less one who is abominable and corrupt, a man who drinks iniquity like water!
17 'I will show you, hear me; and what I have seen I will declare 18 (what wise men have told, and their fathers have not hidden, to whom alone the land was given, and no stranger passed among them).
20 The wicked man writhes in pain all his days, through all the years that are laid up for the ruthless.

(3) Job's Self-Assertion (15:12-16)

12-16. It is not merely a human agency of pastoral ministration that the sufferer has opposed: Thou turnest thy spirit against God (vs. 13a). The word רחם, "breath," "wind," spirit, may sometimes mean "wrath," "animosity" (θυμός, animus; cf. Judg. 8:3; 9:23; Prov. 16:32). His passionate boasting of innocence is the very proof of his spiritual rebellion. Eliphaz reiterates his own thesis of human depravity in more brutal terms than heretofore: man is abominable (lit., "disgusting"; cf. the cognate in 9:31) and corrupt (cf. Ps. 14:3; 55:8); he drinks "injustice" (נなんだ; cf. 5:16; 11:14) like water, i.e., with uncontrollable avidity. He "thirsts after sin, and finds delight in it" (Strahan, Job, p. 149).

b) The Evil Man's Destiny (15:17-35)

The sage now lets his eloquence run unbridled. He knows whereof he speaks, for he has learned it both from personal revelation (what I have seen [in a vision? the verb חזך is used of prophetic gazing; cf. רצה, "a seer") and a tradition of the wise men which is unadulterated by foreign influences (vs. 19). The evil man wills in pain all his days (vs. 20a), or if he lives in prosperity (vs. 21b), the destroyer will [suddenly] come upon him in the midst of his illusory "peace" (an obvious allusion to Job's prosperity in the prologue).

To call it so was to do away with religion in dead earnest (vs. 4). And that is exactly what it almost accomplished. When God consoles he enters into a man's solitude as a companion and a bearer of burdens (Gal. 6:2).

17-35 The Fate of the Wicked.—A vivid picture, quite without any hint of the sorrow that is in the heart of God—there was no sorrow in the heart of the God that Eliphaz was sure he served (see Expos. on 22:2-5, 12-20). Here is what the seer of visions has seen (4:8; 5:8), here is what he has learned from the fathers of long ago when the faith was pure (vs. 19). Much of it he undoubtedly still believes, with 21 Terrifying sounds are in his ears; in prosperity the destroyer will come upon him.
22 He does not believe that he will return out of darkness, and he is destined for the sword.
23 He wanders abroad for bread, saying, ‘Where is it?’ He knows that a day of darkness is ready at his hand;
24 distress and anguish terrify him; they prevail against him, like a king prepared for battle.
25 Because he has stretched forth his hand against God, and bids defiance to the Almighty, 26 running stubbornly against him with a thick-bosomed shield;
27 because he has covered his face with his fat, and gathered fat upon his loins, 28 and has lived in desolate cities, in houses which no man should inhabit, which were destined to become heaps of ruins;
29 he will not be rich, and his wealth will not endure, nor will he strike root in the earth;

m Vg: Heb obscure

22. He does not believe that he will return out of darkness: This verse does not refer to Job’s recent denial of resurrection (14.7 ff.), for it should be translated, “He does not expect [cf. 9:16; 39:12] to escape [cf. 33:30; Ps. 55:17] misfortune” (cf. vss. 23, 30; 19.8).
25-27. The evil man will receive his punishment because his crimes have primarily not an ethical but a theological origin. He is God’s adversary. “He plays the hero against the Almighty” (vs. 25b).
28-29. By implication Eliphaz accuses Job of having also practiced social and economic oppression.

a belief which his very misgivings have rendered violent; the rest of it he hopes is true. In any case, he pulls out all the stops. Job has said:

The tents of robbers are at peace, and those who provoke God are secure (12:6).

Rather is it for this very reason (vs. 25) they suffer out their allotted time (vs. 20)—and Eliphaz must have looked straightly at Job as he said it. They “hear things” (vs. 21; 22:10). In the very midst of prosperity dread premonitions of destruction at the hands of God (vs. 22b), visions of their dead bodies picked at by vultures (vs. 23a Kissane), disturb their fancied peace. They have grown rich (vs. 27) exploiting the poor (vs. 23 Kissane; cf. 20:19; 22:5-7); but their stubborn defiance (vs. 23) will have no dwelling place left, not even a tent in the desert (vs. 29b Kissane). Like withered trees blasted by the wind and the heat, evil shall come upon them by evil begotten (vs. 31; cf. 4:8).

This shall be their recompense in the midst of the years (vs. 32a; 22:16a), promise without fulfillment, flower without fruit (vs. 33; cf. 20:18). None shall come after them (cf. 1:18-19): only “the fire of God . . . fallen from heaven” (cf. 1:16), and the “affliction” that 30 He shall not depart out of darkness; the flame shall dry up his branches, and by the breath of his mouth shall he go away.
31 Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity: for vanity shall be his recompense.
32 It shall be accomplished before his time, and his branch shall not be green.
33 He shall shake off his unripe grape as the vine, and shall cast off his flower as the olive.
34 For the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery.
35 They conceive mischief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

Then Job answered and said,
2 I have heard many such things: miserable comforters are ye all.
3 Shall vain words have an end? or what emboldeneth thee that thou answerest?

16:30-35. Premature death (vss. 31-33) and lack of posterity (vs. 34) are the penalty of the godless. The dogma of retribution, delayed but certain, is upheld to the end.

2. SECOND REPLY OF JOB TO ELIPHAZ (16:1-17:16)

a) The Sorrow-Making “Comforters” (16:1-6)

16:2-6. Since Eliphaz has confused divine truth with the beliefs of his own class and has identified his soothing words with “the comforts of God,” Job retorts at once that his friends are comforters who inspire only “weariness and sorrow” (vs. 2). He could speak so if only he could exchange his pain for their ease (vss. 3-5). Whether he “cometh not forth of the dust” (vs. 85a; cf. 5:6a). Out of their own belly (vs. 2b) the lie (vs. 35b; Ps. 7:14) that dashes the cup from their lips.

It is all strangely reminiscent of the day when Tertullian pictured himself leaning over the battlements of heaven, rubbing his hands together and chortling with satisfaction over the torments of the damned (cf. 22.19). Job is there now—in the flames; and none to “dip the tip of his finger in water” and cool his tongue (Luke 16:24). There was another day when one who saw the multitudes had compassion on them.

16:1-17:16. The Answer of Job.—Windbag yourself! Why keep on at me? If you were in my place, and I in yours, I should not find it difficult to be the kind of word-mouthing comforters you are. With me it is all the same: the pain is no less whether I speak or hold my peace. Then let me speak. That strange God of yours has tormented me and made men sure of my guilt (vs. 8), so that they take off after me, panting along at my heels like wild beasts (cf. 9:12), making me the butt of all their insults (vs. 10). It is thou, God. Thou didst seize me by the throat (vs. 12), wound me with thine arrows (vs. 13). Thou dost storm at me with thy hosts of evil (vs. 14; cf. 10:17). All my gladness and my honor have gone from me (vs. 15). Yet, Eliphaz, I am not what you want me to believe (see Exeg. on vss. 12-17; cf. vs. 17a with 15:34; vs. 17b with 15:4). Let my death cry out to heaven for justice (vs. 18). Surely someone there will answer for me. God, I beseech thee (vs. 20b), uphold my cause somewhere, somehow! I am on the brink of the grave (16:22-17:1), with nothing but mocking on every side.
4 I also could speak as ye do: if your soul were in my soul's stead, I could heap up words against you, and shake mine head at you.

5 But I would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

6 Though I speak, my grief is not assuaged: and though I forbear, what am I eased?

7 But now he hath made me weary: thou hast made desolate all my company.

8 And thou hast filled me with wrinkles, which is a witness against me: and my leanness rising up in me beareth witness to my face.

9 He teareth me in his wrath, who hateth me: he gnasheth upon me with his teeth; mine enemy sharpeneth his eyes upon me.

continues the discussion or keeps silent, his pain remains (vs. 6): he will therefore speak bluntly.

b) The Relentless Hostility of God (16:7-11)

7-11. Nothing can explain the origin of his misery except the hostility of God, who is compared (he or thou in vs. 7-8) to a beast of prey which "tears" (נפץ), and to an adversary who detests, pursues relentlessly, and "persecutes" (the verb נפשי is probably akin to פי, a cognate of the word "Satan"). One might almost conjecture that the poet wished subtly to suggest that Job, although ignorant, of course, of "the Satan's" part played in the prologue, is on the verge of discovering the cause of his dismay (vs. 9). This impression is strengthened by vs. 11a, "God has delivered me into the hands [cf. use of the verb:auto in 11:10] of a knave" [הנני, lit., "irresponsible boy"; cf. plural שוננים]

(vs. 2). Strike hands with me thyself (vs. 3). Who else will? These friends of mine in their blindness? Let them not triumph over me (vs. 4; yet see Exeg.). Sycophants, calling me to account—may they be blind fathers of the blind (vs. 5: lit., "suffer misfortune")—helping to turn my life into a byword (like the life of the Jewish exiles). It is enough to stagger a saint and stir his wrath against the world's injustice (vs. 8). But it will not swerve him from his course—or me either. Come back, my friends (see Exeg.). You can only prove yourselves wrong (vs. 10) and the hopes you have held out to me false. I am filled with wretchedness and brokenhearted (vs. 11). You want me to think this is the dawn (cf. 5:17; 8:20; etc.,) and I know it is night (vs. 12). I am already blood-kin to the grave (vs. 14). What hope is there in that—except to take Death for my bride, and go down with her into the dust (vs. 16)?

4. If You Were in My Place.—Eliphaz knows what he would do if he were in Job's place (see Expos. on 5:8), and Job has not forgotten it. If the roles were actually reversed, he is sure he could make a better go of it than any of them. Kissane does not feel the irony of that, and takes all the rest of the passage (vs. 5-6) in sober earnest. But the mood of Job is bitter. That they show him no sympathy is bad enough; that they will not even play fair (15:7) is worse. They have turned religion into a hollow and meaningless thing on both counts. They would have done him more good if they had been less "pious." They might even have been more compassionate. So he gives back with interest what is sent. If only he could change places with one of them, it would be so easy for him to do as they had done: stringing words together, shaking his head, and saying fiddledeedee—a fig for your piety!—girding them all around with chatter, soothing their pain with platitudes (vss. 4b-5), "The consolations of God" indeed!
10 They have gaped upon me with their mouth; they have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully; they have gathered themselves together against me.

11 God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and turned me over into the hands of the wicked.

"If I were you" is usually the preface to a bit of unsolicited advice; "if you were I," preface to the implicit or explicit claim that very few have ever been so put upon or bewildered. "If you were in my place," what would you do? Not that it will necessarily make any difference. "If I were in your place," I could give you a few pointers on how to behave. Always that dream of turning the tables and coming out on top.

There have been men indeed who have done it—and suffered in the place of other men. God did it. A distraught father whose twenty-one-year-old son had been killed in an accident ran into a minister's study, took him by the lapels of the coat, shook him and asked, "Where was your God when my son was killed?" Quietly and promptly the answer came, "Just where he was when his own Son was killed."

10. The Lot of the Outcast.—It must be remembered throughout that Job is afflicted far more in mind than in body, which is precisely what adds such poignancy to human suffering. Both the spiritual dimensions of human existence are involved in it: his relationship to God and his relationship to his fellow men. These belong to the very substance of religion and life. When anything goes wrong with either, something goes dreadfully wrong with the integrity of the self. Witness the disintegration of selfhood in the modern world, and the manufactured substitutes for both God and community which are responsible in such large measure for the demonism of totalitarian regimes.

In the course of the second cycle Job's sense of alienation from God (note the feeling of distance implicit in the pronoun "he," vss. 7-8) is aggravated by the growing realization of the gulf that has yawned between himself and his fellow men. The very foundations of his being seem about to crumble. Again and again he reverts to the sheer human loneliness moving in upon him like some intolerable weight (see Expos. on 15:1-21:34, cf. vss. 20:21; 17.2, 6; 19:13-19). So it was all too often in the O.T., under the Deuteronomic Code. calamity argued unrighteousness (vss. 7-8). At the very moment when a man became most acutely conscious of his need he was taught to regard himself as the object of God's wrath. What then could the "pious" do in such a situation but take God's part, whatever the cost (see Expos. on 12:2-6; 13:8, 12), and keep themselves from any too close and contaminating association with the victim? To be "a friend of publicans and sinners" was for centuries to prove one of the gravest of risks.

One need hardly comment—cannot without fear and trembling—on our own treatment of the "outcast." It is Christendom's badge of infamy, worn in many a land with the specious sanctions of what goes by the name of religion. Did not God himself decree these differences of race and status? "The poor always ye have with you" (John 12:8). Is it not our bounden duty to be the enemy of the enemies of our faith? But ours is a faith in one whose word it was "I say unto you, Love your enemies" (Matt. 5:44). There is a fellowship of his Son which God has fashioned to the intent that men should come to their full stature in love of him and one another. What place in it has a story that originated during the last years of World War II? The graduating class in a high school was assigned as the subject for a composition. "What just punishment should be meted out to Adolf Hitler?" A Negro girl won the prize by developing the thesis that he should be put into a black skin and set down in the midst of a white community, "Whoso shall offend one of these little ones . . . , it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea" (Matt. 18:6).

11. An Enemy Hath Done This.—Cf. Exeg. on vss. 7-11, 12-17; see Expos. on 1:6-12; 9:2-10;
12 I was at ease, but he hath broken me asunder: he hath also taken me by my neck, and shaken me to pieces, and set me up for his mark.
13 His archers compass me round about, he cleaveth my reins asunder, and doth not spare; he poureth out my gall upon the ground.
14 He breaketh me with breach upon breach; he runneth upon me like a giant.
15 I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the dust.

12-17. Job felt acutely the sting in Eliphaz' oblique references to the sudden rupture of his "peace" (15:21) and the extinction of his progeny (15:38-54). He refers to these two disasters respectively in vs. 12a and 15b, which may constitute a further allusion to the events of the prologue. He has emptied the cup of bitterness and tasted the uttermost forms of humiliation. Then at the point of utter dejection the hero lifts his head, gathers up his pride, and renews his fight.

Although there is no violence in my hands, and my prayer is pure (vs. 17).

The double proposition has often been compared with that of Isa. 55:9b, "Although he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth." Job's innocence is directly linked to the integrity of his religion. Such a certainty remains as his last possession. He clings to it with the passion of a dying man. All is not lost so long as it endures.

10:1-22, 13-17.) Human experience comes to know the evil in the universe as more than a quality of things done or planned; as a power. Paul's word for it is lordship, dominion (see Expos. on 12:13-19). The threat to modern life is not superstition: at least one of the threats lies in not taking evil seriously enough. One need not be overdogmatic about either the existence or the nonexistence of a personal devil. Consult William Temple, Nature, Man and God; C. S. Lewis, Screwtape Letters; Denis de Rougemont, The Devil's Share. If "myth" he is, the myth says a great deal that it is better to bear in mind. Writes de Rougemont: "The Devil... says to us, like Ulysses to the Cyclops, 'My name is Nobody. There is nobody. Whom should you be afraid of? Are you going to tremble before the non-existent?" And so he vanishes in his success and his triumph is his incognito. Two of his questions in Scripture, the only two that he raises in person, are enough to make anybody tremble: "Hath God said,....?" (Gen. 3:1) and "Doth Job fear God for nought?" (1:9).

13. God's Target.—(See Expos. on 6:4; 7:20a, 23-2.) There had been a time when Job was sure that God's very special favor rested on him. It was no very far cry from that to the time when he was equally sure that he was the very special object of God's impalpable hostility. In both cases the self was at the center, which is life's fundamental and persistent "distortion." Many of our so-called religious problems have their origin just there: "answered" and "unanswered" prayer—who shall say which is what? "Why does God allow this to happen to me?" The whole doctrine of "election" can become thoroughly self-centered. What else was wrong with the conviction the Jews had of being the chosen people? It may well be that we are chosen not for shelter through time and eternity, but for peril in time, and only the God who is love can know about eternity. The old mountaineer revivalist was neger right than most. "Election?" he asked. "That is one of the easiest of doctrines to understand. God has one vote, and that is always for you. The devil has one vote, and that is always against you. And you have one vote. That vote decides the election." How many of the muddles in which we find ourselves are due to the fact that we think we are in the middle! To learn that we are not is a

1024
16 My face is foul with weeping, and on my eyelids is the shadow of death; also my prayer is pure.
17 Not for any injustice in mine hands: and my prayer is pure.
18 O earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

16 My face is red with weeping, and on my eyelids is deep darkness; although there is no violence in my hands, and my prayer is pure.
17 Not for any injustice in mine hands: and my prayer is pure.
18 "O earth, cover not my blood, and let my cry find no resting place.

This sudden recovery paves the way for both the outburst and the sublimity of the following strophe. "There is no hope more creative than that of the despairing [man]" (Miguel de Unamuno, The Agony of Christianity, tr. Pierre Loving [New York: Payson & Clarke, 1928], p. 37).

d) "My Witness Is in Heaven" (16:18-22)

18-22. The poet's sense of a new light is always subsequent to his fall into utter darkness. His picture of God the murderer, together with the awareness of his own innocence, combine to induce a state of such frenzy that he cries out:

O earth, cover not my blood, and let my cry find no resting place (vs. 18).

There is more here than the double use of personification. The blood spilled on the soil by malfeasance calls for vengeance (Gen. 4:10-11), and continues to do so as long as it is not covered with dust (Ezek. 24:7). Job summons the personified earth to come to his aid (cf. Isa. 26:21b); his cry, delivered from his own murdered self, will continue to rise without resting place and will pursue his murderer. For how long? There comes the sublime and unexpected certitude:

Even now, behold, my witness is in heaven, and he that vouches for me is on high (vs. 19).

tough lesson, and God sometimes has to use sinewy means to teach it. Frederick Norwood used to tell of a pious young preacher in Australia. During a prolonged drought he called on a ranchman who had never been known for his piety, and whose ranch was fairly burning up under the blistering sun. "Would you wish me to pray with you for rain?" the young preacher inquired after a while. "Come over here," said the ranchman, "and listen." They went over to the side of the house, and there heard the sound of sheep dying of thirst: "Ugh! Ugh!"—like a man coughing. "Can you pray like that?" the ranchman wanted to know. "And if you can, will the God who does not answer their prayer answer yours?" "Behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves. Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes" (Luke 10:3-4). "Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of?" (Mark 10:38; cf. ch. 15; see John 16:2).

16. The Shadow of Death.—According to Strahan, weeping and dimness of sight were among the symptoms of Job's disease. He sees in them the approaching shadow of death. Upon whose eyelids does it not rest (see Exeg. on 6:8-13; 14:1-6)? Job's only hope lies in his innocence (vs. 17), and in God's ultimate recognition of it. Is there a hint in this verse (cf. Isa. 53:9) that at least the sufferings of the children of Israel, if not indeed Job's, were regarded by the author as in some sense vicarious? Aside from that, note that when the transfer of the center is made from the self to God, hope changes its grip from the innocence which is Job's to the divine favor which is God's. Already in Job's mind that transfer is understood as essential (13:16). It is brought on toward completion for "the man in Christ" (see Exeg. on 15 13-19; 17:9).

19. The Witness in Heaven.—(See Exeg.; also Expos. on 7:21c; 9:30-35; 13:15; 19:25.) Kissane conceives of Job's "cry" as the witness, the advocate with God, pleading that the just man may hold to his way (17:9).1 Certainly, however, the notion that in heaven there is one who will vouch for him (an angel?) fascinates Job's mind. May his blood be not covered (Gen.

1 Job, p. 102.
19:19 Also now, behold, my witness is in heaven, and my record is on high.
20 My friends scorn me: but mine eye poureth out tears unto God.

Who is this heavenly witness of the shocking, wholly unjustifiable murder of Job which is about to be committed by God himself? Commentators generally do not hesitate to identify this mysterious figure with that same God who controls Job's fate, and they develop the thesis of a paradoxical contradiction in Job's conception of the Deity. They represent him as appealing from God to God, from the God of wrath to the God of grace. Such an exegesis ignores three facts: (a) For Job, God is already a witness and an accuser (vs. 8), a prosecutor and an adversary (vv. 12-14). How could a witness for the prosecution be sufficiently transformed to become at once, even now, before the crime is committed, a defense witness and the initiator (perhaps the executor) of the victim's avenging? (b) The witness of vs. 19 is the same figure who in vs. 21 will maintain the right of a man with God and who is ipso facto differentiated from that God. (c) The witness of vs. 19 is also to be identified with the "avenger" of 19:25 (note how the idea of the blood redeemer was introduced in the present passage by the apostrophe to the earth in vs. 18 and was suddenly aborted through a return of the poet's attention to the idea of witness). Now since the "avenger" of 19:25 is differentiated from God (see Exeg., ad loc.), it follows that the witness in this text is not God but someone else.

It seems therefore quite clear that Job has by now abandoned the idea of winning God's favor. He had once entertained the hope that some intermediary being could be found who would bring God toward him. But the mediator of 9:38a was a creation of desperate fancy, rejected almost as soon as conceived. The poet is now reattacking the divine unknown from a new angle: man may perish when an omnipotent monster fells him; yet there must be a nemesis for that kind of God. Thus, without any hope of salvation on this earth or of resurrection in the hereafter (cf. vs. 22), Job is satisfied to know that his innocence will be proclaimed in heaven, since someone vouches for [him] on high. The question should not be asked, "Why does not this witness, even now, intervene in Job's favor, while there is yet time?" The poet is not intent upon describing the nature of God, nor is he even concerned with the quest for theodicy; he is engaged in the task of portraying a miserable human being, buffeted and cornered, who battles no longer for his life but for his name and honor. Nevertheless, in so doing he is beginning to lift the veil from the mystery of the Godhead. He does not indicate whether the witness is a divine being, a "son of Elohim" (cf. 1:6), a "servant" or "messenger" (cf. 4:18), or again a "holy one" (cf. 15:15). By presenting the figure of the witness and by respecting the anonymity of that figure, he reopens the theme of the mediator (9:33), prepares the motif of the redeemer (19:25), and thus lays the basis for Christian meditation (see Sigmund Mowinckel, "Hiobs gö'ël und Zeuge im Himmel," in Karl Budde, ed., Karl Marti zum siebzigsten Geburtstage gewidmet . . . [Giessen: A. Töpelmann, 1925], pp. 207-12).

4:10) until there shall appear in the lists one who will defend him against both God and man! Note Tennyson's "Despair":

Ah, yet—I have had some glimmer, at times, in my gloomiest woe,
Of a God behind all—after all—the great God, for ought that I know;
But the God of Love and of Hell together—they cannot be thought,
If there be such a God, may the Great God curse him and bring him to nought! 8

At any rate, "the idea of mediation is essential to the biblical understanding of the relations between God and man," 9 whether the movement is thought of as from God to man (in the case of the prophet) or as from man to God (in the case of the priest). See Expos. on 5:1; Heb. 8:6: et passim. If Job is to hold fast any vestige of his old religion there has to be something that can correspond to it. The phoenix of a new faith is rising out of the ashes.

21 Oh that one might plead for a man with God, as a man pleadeth for his neighbor!

22 When a few years are come, then I shall go the way whence I shall not return.

21 that he would maintain the right of a man with God, like? that of a man with his neighbor.

22 For when a few years have come

I shall go the way whence I shall not return.

Vs. 20 appears to be a parenthesis which interrupts the sequence of thought. It may represent a momentary aside, reflecting the response of the interlocutors. To the outburst of vs. 18-19, the audience most likely reacts with expressions of mockery. Job is fully conscious of this reaction, and he therefore interrupts the course of his thinking to say, My friends [may very well] scorn me [for entertaining the idea of a heavenly witness; and I myself have no weapon, except the tears of bitterness which I shed before impending injustice. Thus] my eye pours out tears to God (vs. 20). He then continues, picking up the thread of vs. 19, "But let him"—my witness—maintain the right of man with God, like that of a man with his neighbor (vs. 21). There is no doubt that the poet is here referring again to the strange figure of vs. 19, someone who must necessarily be different from both God and man alike in order to plead with God on the behalf of man. At the same time, by the skillful use of the verb רזך, "let him argue the right," he summons the elusive person of the קרא, the "mediator," of 9:33 (notice the cognation of the two words). This time, however, the "mediating" third party will not intervene on the behalf of a doomed man, but will merely act upon the memory of a man who is unjustly brought to death.

It would be unexpected and unnatural to find that, after having spoken of his end as imminent, Job adds in vs. 22, When a few years are come, then I shall go the way whence I shall not return. Thus several commentators accept a conjectural emendment of the text and read, instead of מפרת עメイン, a few years, either (a) מפרת שנה, "the number of [my] years" (has come to an end); or (b) מפרת ג enviado, "the women of mourning" (are coming). These proposals are not satisfactory. At any rate, it would be anomalous if in vs. 22 death were envisaged as a somewhat distant event, when in the following strophe (17:1) the same prospect is faced as an imminent reality.

21. As a Man Pleadeth for His Neighbor.—
(Cf. Gen. 18:28-33; Exod. 32:11-14, 31-32; John 17.) In Hebrew the man of vs. 21a is the "hero," the "Titan," like Job (cf. Exeg. on 21:7-18); the man of vs. 21b is a "son of earth." Job thinks of himself as a prince (31:87) in his relation to God, and as a mortal with his fellow mortals: in both cases there is a right to be maintained, and he would have God himself to do it. There is nevertheless an almost irresistible suggestion in the mistranslation of the KJV. Interestingly enough, Kissane, from a slightly different point of view, supports it: Job's cry "is pleading for him before God as one man might plead for another before a human judge."* If instead of the endless recriminations there were such pleading! (See Expos. on vs. 19; 6:28-30.) Observe that over and over again Job still turns to God in prayer; and recall Browning's lines from "Instans Tyrannus":

* Loc. cit.
My breath is corrupt, my days are extinct, the graves are ready for me.

Are there not mockers with me? and doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee; who is he that will strike hands with me?

My spirit is broken, my days are extinct, the grave is ready for me.

Surely there are mockers about me, and my eye dwells on their provocation.

"Lay down a pledge for me with thyself; who is there that will give surety for me?"

e) Held Without Bail (17:1-5)

17:1. This verse is in a different meter from that of the context. It is composed of three short stichs, as if the rhythm itself suggested the state of breathless agony in which the dying man labors:

My breath is labored,
My days are extinct,
The graveyard is mine.

Vs. 1a is usually translated, My spirit is broken. The word ṛūḥ means either "breath" or "spirit" in the sense of vital principle (cf. 10:12; 12:10) but the rendering of ḥabbālah as broken is strained. This word is usually derived from ḫḥ II, and thus may refer to a broken yoke. Its Arabic cognate may mean "corrupt, "unsound," and if this sense could be found in Hebrew usage the phrase would indicate that Job is becoming aware of his mental undoing: "My spirit is deranged." More probably, however, the word may be derived from ḫḥ I, meaning "to bind," "to twist," hence, in the Piel voice, "to writhe in travail" (cf. Song of S. 8:5), and in the Pual, "to be halted," under the pangs of agony. This interpretation fits the immediate context: Job recognizes in his panting breath one of the prodromes of his death.

2. Witnessing the signs of Job's impending end, his friends refuse more than ever to consider his claim to innocence, and they persist in their attitude of provocation.

3-4. The hero, however, does not yield any ground and renews the fight directly with God himself in a prayer of defiance: Lay down a pledge for me with thyself (reading with Syriac, 'erbhōnī instead of 'orbēnī). Since God is acting as if he too considers Job as a criminal, let him accept a guarantee until Job's innocence is established. But who is willing to take such a risk? Who is there that will give surety for me? Lit., that will strike hands with me (KJV), i.e., that will give me now the assurance that he will appear before God on my behalf (cf. Prov. 6:1; 11:15; 17:18; 22:26) and provide bail until a trial may be arranged. No one will take such a risk, and Job is left alone in the midst of his friends, for God has closed their minds to understanding (vs. 4a). Divine enmity is responsible not only for Job's plight but also for his friends' misunderstanding.

17:3. The God Who Goes Ball.—(See Expos. on 14:15; 16:16, 19.) Lay down a pledge for me with thyself. No one else will do it, no one else can. Job is compelled to fall back on the same "impossible possibility" which keeps occurring to him: the God who is himself the judge must himself go bail, and when the case comes up, somewhere on the other side of death, see to it that all the wrongs are set right. Only in that way, by God's own gracious act, can the old relationship which has so mysteriously been broken off ever be restored, or better still, yield to another which shall be deeper and richer.

It is not that Job ever expects to be "justified" by reason of his "works"; he pleads for a justification that shall have its source in the very being of God. So it is in the N.T., becoming there the very mainspring of the Christian ethic. To Paul the whole of mankind is, in Job's figure of speech, out on bail, to be brought back into fellowship with God by faith and faith alone (Rom. 3:20-26; 11:52; etc.): "Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God" (Rom. 11:22). There is no question of tempering the divine justice with mercy: unless indeed one understands what tempering really means.
4 For thou hast hid their heart from understanding: therefore shalt thou not exalt them.
5 He that speaketh flattery to his friends, even the eyes of his children shall fail.

4 Since thou hast closed their minds to understanding, therefore thou wilt not let them triumph.
5 He who informs against his friends to get a share of their property, the eyes of his children will fail.

4. Therefore thou wilt not let them triumph: This translation is based on a correction of terōmēm ("thou shalt exalt") into either terōmēm or terēmēm (which provides the necessary direct object in the form of the pronominal suffix them). The sequence of thought, however, remains obscure. Dhorme, followed by Holscher, corrects התוספת לברך into התוספת לברך, and translates the clause, "No hand has been raised [in my favor]." The sense thus obtained fits the context, but the emendation is highly conjectural. One might respect the C.T. הרضح, vocalize terōmēm (Polal; cf. Ps. 66:17), and render the clause, "Therefore, thou shalt not be exalted." (The Polel is used with God; cf. Ps. 30:1: "I shall exalt thee, Yahweh!"") According to this interpretation, Job concludes his aggressive prayer by making another blasphemous statement: Since God has left Job destitute, surely he cannot expect praise from his victim! The Masoretes naturally would have preserved a reading more conducive to reverence, although it represented a non sequitur: "Therefore thou shalt not exalt," while the LXX merely omitted the difficult phrase. If the interpretation here proposed is correct, the prayer ends abruptly with a shocking invective. Tortured by his divine enemy and accused by his comprehending friends, the lonely titan scoffs at ingratiating softness. He has given up the hope of winning God by begging. He stands on his ground, bloody but unbowed. At the threshold of the grave he throws a taunting threat at the Godhead and almost viciously shouts: "Therefore thou shalt not be exalted!" It must be acknowledged, however, that this interpretation also is conjectural. The meaning of vs. 4b probably depends on the context following, and two possibilities remain: (a) If vs. 5 refers to Job's friends, then it is likely that vs. 4b alludes to them also, since this clause comes after vs. 4a, in which the allusion to the same men can hardly be denied. Thus the reading terēmēm (Hiphil of rūm with pronominal suffix of the third person plural) may be tentatively proposed as doing least violence to the M.T. Job's chain of thought would then be, "Therefore thou shouldest not let them triumph [by dispatching me to the grave]. It is true that they are unable to discern my innocence since thou hast thickened their minds [vs. 3]. But that is not a reason for offering them a vindication by the spectacle of my death. Thou shouldest now prove to them the outrageous error of their position by restoring me from death." (b) If, however, vs. 5 does not refer to the friends, then it is at least possible that Job has concluded his aggressive prayer in the mood of defiance described above.

5. This verse unfortunately is also obscure. Assuming that the text is not hopelessly corrupt, commentators have proposed five widely divergent interpretations: (a) He that speaketh flattery to his friends, even the eyes of his children shall fail.

It does not mean to tamper with, nor does it mean to water down. It means "to bring to a proper degree of hardness and toughness." The mercy of God is what gives his justice its cutting edge. Else why the psalmist's word, "But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared" (Ps. 180:4)? It is not the majesty of God or his wrath that works awe in the soul; it is his lovingkindness and tender mercy.

Rufus M. Jones, the great Quaker, has told of how that was brought home to him in his youth. His mother and father went out one hot
The RSV (cf. ERV, ASV, Amer. Trans., etc.) understands the verb 'denounces' (cf. Lev. 5:1; Josh. 2:14; Prov. 29:24; Jer. 20:10), and takes the word 'hêleq' as derived from פַּחַל, "to divide."

He who informs against his friends to get a share of their property, the eyes of his children will fail.

Such a translation is grammatically sound, and may support the view that the verse is a popular proverb quoted by Job. But in what way is the maxim applicable to the situation? How could Job suggest that his friends are greedy for his estate when the whole poetic discussion (let alone the prose prologue) shows that he is completely destitute? In addition, how could Job warn his friends with threats directed to their children when he himself (in 21:19) repudiates the doctrine according to which the sons receive retribution for the sins of their fathers?

(1) "He that denounceth his friends for the sake of flattering, even the eyes of his children shall fail." According to this rendering (American Jewish Translation), which combines elements of both (a) and (b) and skillfully avoids the grammatical difficulties raised by either one, Job states that the friends' hostility is motivated by their abject submission to God's capricious and immoral omnipotence, and they merely denounce Job in order to pay court to a divine tyrant. This interpretation, however, faces the same objection as that mentioned above (in connection with the threat of a punishment inflicted upon the children for the cruelty of the fathers), and it also contradicts the statement of vs. 4a, for it assumes that the friends are perfectly clear about Job's situation and inwardly know that he is innocent.

(2) "Somebody invites his friends to share [his goods] while the eyes of his own children are failing [from want]." Such a translation, which is accepted with minor variations by a great many commentators (Hitzig, Budde, Peake, Dhorme, et al.; cf. Vulg.), also suggests that Job quotes a gnomic saying: How can his friends teach him anything significant, offer him a share of their wisdom, while their own households are devoid of it? Physician, heal thyself! This rendering is grammatically possible, for the verb 'denounces,' usually followed by a preposition introducing a personal object, may be constructed in directly transitive fashion (II Kings 7:9; Ezek. 48:10; cf. especially Job 26:4; 81:37). However, the meaning "to invite" is not supported by parallel uses (as noted by Driver and Gray), and the construction of this verb with lehêleq, "for a share," or lêhalêq (pointing פַּחַל as Piel infinitive), "in order to share," remains highly hypothetical.

(3) Kissane follows the translation mentioned immediately above, but he holds that this verse introduces vs. 6 and refers to the Deity:

As one inviteth friends to partake,
While the eyes of his children languish...

Accordingly, Job likens God to some heartless and senseless man who bids his friends to a feast while allowing his own children to starve; and this comparison means that "God permits the wicked to prosper while the just suffer calamity" (Kissane, The Book of Job [Dublin: Browne & Nolan, 1939], p. 104). Such an exegesis is ingenious and attractive, for it would fit the present stage of Job's hostility toward God and even widen the cleavage between them, while implying a sarcasm and stressing a pathetic paradox. Yes,
6 He hath made me also a byword of the people; and aforetime I was as a tabret.
7 Mine eye also is dim by reason of sorrow, and all my members are as a shadow.
8 Upright men shall be astonished at this, and the innocent shall stir up himself against the hypocrite.
9 The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger.

Job's interlocutors are the friends of God, he admits, and their good fortune proves it! But he, Job, is a child of God! He was once standing closer to him than they are now, yet he is abandoned by his inhuman father. The validity of this interpretation cannot, however, be demonstrated. In view of the unsatisfactory or conjectural character of all proposed translations, the critic should provisionally accept the fact that the M.T. does not represent the original wording of the verse. In all probability the poet did not allude to "friends" in vs. 5a (for Theod. and Symm. both read the word בֶּן יָשָׁר, "friends," as the M.T. does, but as רְאֵית, "evil things"). In addition, the LXX (which omits vs. 5a) may have read in vs. 5b a text quite different from that of the Masoretes, for it renders, "and my eyes pined away for my sons." If this reading had any support, vs. 5b would constitute an appropriate climax for the whole passage. Job would realize that no one around him will offer a surety on his behalf (vs. 5). Some would have done it gladly, his own sons. But they are gone.

f) A Byword in the World (17:6-10)

6-7. So extraordinary is Job's fate that he has become a byword in the world (vs. 6a; cf. Ps. 69:11) and an object of abhorrence and curse (vs. 6b). His grief has dimmed his eye... and all his "thoughts" (reading with Syriac וַיְכַפְרְי as וַיְכַפְרְי) are like a shadow (vs. 7).

8-10. These verses seem to interrupt the development, and some interpreters (Duhrn, Peake, et al.) have attempted to solve the difficulty by transposing this passage into the second speech of Bildad (after 18:3). If the original order has been preserved in the present text, however, one may clarify the meaning by translating the verbs in the future tense. Job, aware that he will have proverbial significance for generations to come, knows that upright men shall be astonished at this (vs. 8a), and the innocent will find comfort in his example: he will stir up himself against the hypocrite (נָהֲנֶפ; cf. 8:13). Men like Job who are truly righteous and have clean hands will not by calamity or calumny be shaken out of their conviction of innocence. He himself will hold on his way, was sure he knew what was in store, and he had no word to offer in extenuation. He knew he deserved it. Silently she led him to his room; whereupon he was doubly sure. It always happened there.

But a miracle happened instead. Mother put me in a chair, kneeled down, put her hands on me and told God all about me. She interpreted her dream of what my life was to be. She portrayed the boy and the man of her hopes. She told God what she had always expected me to be. And then how I disappointed her hope. "O God," she said, "take this boy of mine and make him the boy and man he is divinely designed to be." Then she bent over and kissed me and went out and left me alone in the silence with God.

It is the human heart that somehow has to be broken before anything else can happen (Rom. 2:4).

9. With Head Bloody but Unbowed.—"Let God be true, but every man a liar." So Paul (Rom. 3:4). Job comes very near reversing it. Even if God is the kind of God Job is more than half afraid he is (10:13), the righteous man can still hold on his way; and more, be 10 But as for you all, do ye return, and come now: for I cannot find one wise man among you.

11 My days are past, my purposes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart.

12 They change the night into day: the light is short because of darkness.

10 But you, come on again, all of you, and I shall not find a wise man among you.

11 My days are past, my plans are broken off, the desires of my heart.

12 They make night into day; 'The light,' they say, 'is near to the darkness.'

He will persist in the assertion of his integrity and even be stronger and stronger in maintaining his righteousness. This interpretation is confirmed by the dramatic injunction which follows (vs. 10). Horrified by Job's insuperable pride (this could not be the case if vs. 8-9 constituted a tame acceptance of orthodoxy or were not in their original position), Eliphaz and his companions make as if to go, leaving their interlocutor to his mad obstinacy. Job is therefore moved to entreat them to stay (as he has already done in a similar situation; cf. 6:29). "But all of you, will you turn back? Come back, please!" (Vs. 10a). Note the alliteration in we'ullâm kullâm, "but indeed, all of them," instead of kullekhem, "all of you" (a reading which nevertheless appears in five MSS). Why should the sufferer call back his friends? He has no hope of convincing them. He knows that he will not find a wise man among them, yet such is the isolation of misunderstood misery that it clings to the shreds of time-honored friendships. True wisdom, so Job implies, is not to be discovered among its professionals. Perhaps we have here an anticipation of the thought expressed in ch. 28.

g) Communing with Worms (17:11-16)

11-12. Having had his bitter say, the hero now relapses, as is his wont at the end of his speeches (cf. 3:24-26; 7:21; 10:20-22; 14:18-22), into a quiet wailing over the approach of death. The Hebrew of vs. 11 presents several difficulties which are overlooked by the traditional translators. The punctuation of the M.T. favors the rendering, "My days are spent; my projects are broken, [even] the desires of my heart." However, while the first verb, "to pass over," may be used intransitively in the sense of "to pass by," it is stronger and stronger (see Expos. on 13:15; 23:10; etc.). F. W. Robertson, when assailed by doubt, was accustomed to budget what light he had, and rehearse in his mind against all the odds those things still most certainly true: that courage is better than impurity, that honor is better than dishonor, that truth is better than falsehood, and love better than hate. Said he:

In that fearful loneliness of spirit . . . I know not but one way in which a man may come forth from his agony scathless; it is by holding fast to those things which are certain still—grand, simple landmarks of morality. In the darkest hour through which a human soul can pass, whatever else is doubtful, this at least is certain. If there be no God, and no future state, yet even then it is better to be generous than selfish, better to be chaste than licentious, better to be true than false, better to be brave than to be a coward. . . . Thrice blessed is he who,—when all is drear and cheerless within and without . . .—has obstinately clung to moral good. Thrice blessed, because his night shall pass into clear, bright day.

A deeper question, however, asserts itself: Why are courage, and hope, and purity, and honor, and truth, and love better than their opposites? (Cf. Expos. on 14:7-12.) Can these things be cut free of God, like flowers from the stem? (See Expos. on 1:1, "Does Faith Matter?") It is for this reason, as Strahan points out,7 that vs. 8-10a have to some scholars seemed more appropriate in the mouth of Bildad (after 18:3), where they would mean that no matter how unjust Job is to his friends, they will stick to their course. If we take the verses in their present context, one may understand something of the pride which God seems to have in Job (cf. 1:8; 2:5; Expos. on 1:20-22; cf. also Matt. 7:21).

12. False Hopes.—(See Exeg.; Expos. on 11:16, 18; 13:13-19.) It has already been noted that in the first cycle each of the friends holds out to Job the prospect of ultimate restoration on condition of his repentance (cf. Expos. on 5:18, 23; etc.) In the second cycle they have given up the illusions they once cherished: Job

13 If I wait, the grave is mine house: I have made my bed in the darkness.
14 I have said to corruption, Thou art my father: to the worm, Thou art my mother, and my sister.
15 And where is now my hope? as for my hope, who shall see it?
16 They shall go down to the bars of the pit, when our rest together is in the dust.

13 If I look for Sheol as my house, if I spread my couch in darkness,
14 if I say to the pit, 'You are my father,' and to the worm, 'My mother,' or 'My sister,'
15 where then is my hope? Who will see my hope?
16 Will it go down to the bars of Sheol? Shall we descend together into the dust?"

unlikely that the word zimmāh could designate Job's "plans" or "projects," for everywhere else in biblical Hebrew (including 31:11), it refers to "evil devices" and especially to various acts of sexual immorality (cf. Lev. 18:17; 20:14; Judg. 20:6; Jer. 13:27; etc.). Furthermore, the position of the phrase the desires of my heart, its lack of connecting word or prefix, and the abrupt shortness of the meter (two nouns in construct relation are not sufficient here to form a colon) render the usual translations highly suspect. In addition, the LXX (ἐν βρόμῳ) considers zimmōthay not as the first subject of the second verb, but as the qualitative object of the first verb, and takes it to mean "uproar," "groaning" (apparently from the Aramaic root מָדַד). Finally, the hapax legomenon mōrāshē lebabhē, which is usually translated the desires of my heart (through the hypothetical derivation of the word mōrāshim from יָבָשַׁע; Akkadian, erēšu), can hardly fit in this case the concrete and physical meaning of the verb nitteqū, "are torn apart" (cf. תַּא אֶרֶבָא תִּחְסָע קַאְרְדָא in the LXX). One may therefore turn to an Aramaism (see the Syriac maršo; cf. "the walls of my heart" in Jer. 4:19), and the whole verse may then be translated, in full respect of meter, grammar, and lexicography:

My days are overfilled with my groanings:
The ligaments[?] of my heart are torn apart.

Job, aware of his physiological condition, is once more expressing the conviction that he cannot hope to regain his health.

Vs. 12 offers no difficulty of translation, but its meaning is quite obscure. They change the night into day. Who are they? Dhorme and others connect this clause with the last words of vs. 11 (thereby admitting the difficulty mentioned in connection therewith) and read, "The desires of my heart change the night into day" (vss. 11b, 12a); i.e., they produce insomnia (cf. 7:3-4, 13-15). However, in addition to the fact that vs. 11 forms a poetic whole (see above), there is an obvious parallel between night and day in vs. 12a and light and darkness in vs. 12b. For this reason the whole line is generally understood as referring to the friends of Job. They pretend—he exclaims in a despondent aside—that his night will soon be day (vs. 12a) and that "light is nearer than the presence of darkness" (vs. 12b; perhaps a delayed allusion, according to the poet's technique, to Zophar's speech in 11:17), but Job knows better than to delude himself.

13-16. His only hope is that Sheol will be his home. Observe the similar imagery in Ps. 139:8, where a cognate of the word yēqūdū, my couch, is used. Some details of translation are uncertain (e.g., the conjunction if in vs. 13a should not be repeated in vss. 13b, 14; cf. RSV), but the general meaning is clear. The friends have told Job to repent and to shake off his despair, and he retorts in the face of the inescapable imminence is definitely not planning to repent. Confident, therefore, that God has given him up to a reprobrate mind, they no longer dangle any bribe in front of his eyes: it is now only the threat of retribution they would have him envisage (see Expos. on 15:1-21:34). But the mind of Job still lingers behind. The friends are always blithely ahead of his anguish soul. Deliverance out of all his trouble! The very idea of it! There will be no such thing. "It is darkest just before the dawn." Is there no other ground more sure than that, on which a man's hope may Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,

2 How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? mark, and afterward we will speak.

Then Bildad the Shuhite answered:

2 "How long will you hunt for words? Consider, and then we will speak.

of death that any hope would be a delusion. Another touch of dark humor is here: "My hope and I," the lamenter remarks, as if he were speaking of a bride, shall we descend together into the dust? (vs. 16b).

3. Second Discourse of Bildad (18:1-21)

While Job is blazing a trail in a hitherto unexplored jungle and is moving thus toward a goal which still eludes him, the friends have already arrived at a conclusion. Arrived? They do not seem to have traveled one inch in any direction. By the words which he places in the mouths of his characters, the poet reveals a profound and intimate knowledge of religious men everywhere. Some, like Job, may be branded as heretics by a stable and therefore static majority; but their daring, in spite of its inherent danger and occasional folly, is constructive and prophetic in the true sense of the word. Others, like the friends, are pious and learned transmitters of well-tried formulas, who persist in perpetrating error in the face of some unquestionable truth. Thus, Bildad, speaking from the treasure of tradition, does not see that a "universal" law always admits of exceptions.

a) Disturbing the Natural Order (18:1-4)

18:2. The M.T. in this verse has plural verbs, and accordingly Bildad is addressing not Job but several auditors at once: either the other two friends or some hypothetical bystanders. Such a procedure, however, constitutes a departure from the pattern of the poetic discussion in which a friend always addresses Job and never his own colleagues, even less an unnamed and silent audience. Furthermore, the end of the strophe (vs. 4) is spoken directly to Job in the second person singular. Many scholars therefore follow the reading of the LXX, which has the singular in vs. 2 as well as in vs. 4. Nevertheless, while the plural שבועות in vs. 2b may easily be explained by dittography (מֵעָלָה), it is hard to imagine how a singular could have produced the plural משמע in vs. 2a. If the M.T. is correct, we have to admit that Bildad begins his discourse, not unlike Elihu (32:3), by rebuking his own friends. How long will you hunt for words? The RSV offers an attractive but not demonstrable rendering by relating the strange word to the Arabic ganaca, "to hunt," and by conjecturing for it the meaning of "snare" or "trap." If Bildad is speaking in the plural (M.T.) to his colleagues, then he is chiding them for not attacking Job's position more directly and forcefully. He continues in vs. 2b stand? That the issue, for example, if not the best as he sees it, will yet be the best as God knows it?

18:1-21. The Speech of Bildad.—The two of you should quit dealing with this man so gently. Come out with it. (See Exeg. It may be better to assume that Bildad addresses Job at once: How long are you going to keep this up? Shall we have to listen to you forever?) Stupid cattle you call us, you who are the only beast in the picture. God is not tearing at you, neither are we (16:9-10); you are tearing yourself in your anger. Do you think you can substitute your own ideas for God's, and turn the whole universe topsy-turvy so that you can get away with it? Not in a million years! In spite of all you say, the wicked man is doomed. The very stars in their courses fight against him. He is harassed on every side. Calamity yearns for him. Deadly plague marches him off toward death. Root and branch he is gone and forgotten, the horror of mankind (vs. 18, lit., "they shall drive"), with none to come after him, an abomination the world around (vs. 20). Your lot is no more than the common lot of the man who knows not God.

24. The Moral Order.—The speeches of the friends in the second cycle, Eliphaz in considerable measure, Bildad and Zophar in a manner still more pronounced, veer off from God, who Wherefore are we counted as beasts, and reputed vile in your sight?

4 He teareth himself in his anger: shall the earth be forsaken for thee? and shall the rock be removed out of its place?

Why are we counted as cattle?

3 Why are we stupid in your sight?

3 Wherefore are we counted as beasts, and reputed vile in your sight?

4 You who tear yourself in your anger, shall the earth be forsaken for you, or the rock be removed out of its place?

by bidding them to consider thoroughly the case which is before them, and he concludes, then we will speak. If, on the contrary, Bildad is speaking in the singular (LXX) to Job, he is derisively asking him to put an end to his rhetoric. Instead of looking for new forms of eloquence, Job should consider the situation, and then we will speak together, one with the other (in this case the verb רה ידוע should be vocalized as a Niphal rather than as a Piel). Other critics suggest that the word "טוע" is connected with the Akkadian qinu, "fetter," and they translate vs. 2a, "How long will you put restraint on words?" With this rendering, again, Bildad might address his colleagues, urging them not to tone down their rebuke of Job but rather to denounce his crime mercilessly. Or Bildad might be saying to the rebellious heretic, "How long wilt thou attempt to silence us?" Although this latter meaning would fit the context following (vs. 3-4), the exegete must confess that there is no objective clue to a correct translation, and thus no satisfactory interpretation.

3-4. Bildad now defends the knowledge and wisdom of his friends and of himself. Job had said in his reply to Zophar, "But ask the beasts, and they will teach you" (12:7), thereby inferring that even the lower creatures, such as the hippopotamus, have more intelligence than the professionals of learning and reflection. Bildad apparently felt the sting of the insult, for he now retorts, "Why should we pass for a beast, and be obtuse in thy sight?" (vs. 3). The M.T. has חסָיָא וּשְׁמִיָּא, "we are defiled" or reputed vile, but it is better to read with three MSS חסָיָא וּשְׁמִיָּא (netamnōnā), from the verb טָמוּנ, "to stop up" (cf. the LXX, "we are become dumb"). The thought of stupid animals suggested to Bildad a new invective. It is Job who is a beast, but of course not a silent one: "O thou whoarest thyself in thine anger ..." (vs. 4a). There is no need to conjecture that one line is missing here. Job has just accused God of tearing him apart (16:9). Bildad suggests that it is Job who stupidly, in a brutish fashion, is hurting himself. More than this, would Job faint be like the blind giant shaking the pillars of Dagon's temple out of their base and engulfing the crowd of his enemies within his own death (Judg. 16:30)? By the reiteration of his blasphemies would Job risk the catastrophe of an aroused divine wrath not only upon himself but also upon his community? Has he not lost all perspective in the complex of a monstrous egotism which prompts him to disregard the safety of others for the sake of his own vindication? Does the welfare of one man count more than the fate of the people? In brief, shall the earth be forsaken for you (vs. 4b)? In the next line, however, Bildad's thought seems to swerve in another direction: or shall the rock be... in the preceding chapters had been the constant focus of their argument, toward the constitution of the universe, the way things are (cf. Expos. on 19:6). To see that movement against the background of Israel's history is to see the first steps taken within the Hebrew-Christian tradition which were bound sooner or later to result in the depersonalizing of God and human existence. The tendency toward abstraction, the movement away from person in the direction of idea, is evident in the very names used for the Deity (cf. Expos. on 4:20b). It is now underscored by the shift from a justice personally administered to a justice arrived at in the nature of life itself—life human (vs. 18) and subhuman (vs. 10, et passim; cf. Judg. 5:20; Expos. on 8:4) Of course God is back of it all in theory, but he is "back of it." So it is that when the old prophetic faith, where God's immediate act was his direct word, seems in some excess of calamity to be no longer so naively tenable, recourse is had to more empirical sanctions. This encroachment of "philosophy" on religion in the years following the Exile, as in eighteenth-century Deism, is often enough reflected in the modern pulpit. The form the sermon takes is all too frequently somewhat as follows: (a) We stand at a fork in the road: on the left an antithesis, God or man; on the right, a synthesis, God and man. (b) We dare not choose "God or man"; removed out of its place? (vs. 4c). He may remember here Job's own allusion to the universal law of decay in the realm of nature ("and the rock is removed from its place," 14:18b), while satirically asking, "Do you believe that your little self is so important as to warrant a change in the order of the universe?"

Another interpretation is possible for both lines (vs. 4bc). Instead of directing the questions to Job himself, Bildad may be attempting to interpret his opponent's attitude, saying in effect, "According to your opinion, Job, does your own fate demonstrate that the earth is now forsaken by its creator? Has the rock been removed from its place?" In other words, Job is accused of practical atheism. Since the law of retribution is not verified in his own case, he probably concludes—so Bildad insidiously presumes—that God has left the earth, that the world of man has become a moral void, and that an insane confusion presides over the destiny alike of nature and mankind. This interpretation presents the advantage of introducing smoothly the second part of Bildad's discourse, which describes "the lot of him that knoweth not God" (18:21b).

b) Fate of the Ungodly Man (18:5-21)

After the thrust of his direct attack has been spent, Bildad seemingly turns to the didactic mode and paints with dexterity and gusto the picture of the resha'im, "evil men" (vs. 5). In fact, he pursues with remarkable skill his fixed intent, which is the undermining of Job's self-assurance. As the various details of the portrait of the wicked unroll, the sufferer cannot help recognizing there himself, with the inescapable disclosure that such a man is really godless.

(1) QUenching His Light (18:5-7)

5-7. Bildad admits that the wicked may for a while enjoy what appears to be happiness. This theme is familiar to him (8:11-19). But he maintains that soon comes a time when their lamp . . . is put out (vss. 5:6). Notice that he speaks from the point of view of a nomad accustomed to living in a tent (vs. 6a). The flame of the campfire (vs. 5), as well as the light of the lamp (vs. 6), are symbols of prosperity, warmth, good cheer, and even luxury. "I will banish from them the voice of mirth and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride, the grinding of the millstones and the light of the lamp" (Jer. 25:10). As a result of the ensuing darkness, the evil man is compelled to walk slowly and cautiously, and his strong steps are shortened (vs. 7a).

that way we run headlong into the moral order. Something, apparently, like the law of gravity.
(c) We must choose "God and man," the only choice with a promise. Whereupon the whole matter may be laid down with the benediction— all of it safely out of sight of either the O.T. or the N.T. Both Testaments understand that "God and man" plunges us at once into the profoundest of all dilemmas: "we must" and we cannot! The O.T. begins with that; the N.T. resolves it.

Yet of course there is truth in what Bildad says. To keep the partial truth in relation to the truth that makes it whole is the task that interpretation sets us—and life itself (see Exeg. on vss. 1-21; Expos. on vss. 5-21).

5-21. Hoist with His Own Petard.—It is a striking and lurid picture that Bildad draws, with much gilding of the lily. When there is little to say that has not already been said, take it all up in your hands again—he reverses freely to the speech which he first delivered himself (e.g., at vs. 14 to 8:15; at vs. 16 to 8:11-14, 16-17)—and decorate it with the air of a man who 8 For he is cast into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a snare.
9 The gin shall take him by the heel, and the robber shall prevail against him.
10 The snare is laid for him in the ground, and a trap for him in the way.
11 Terrors shall make him afraid on every side, and shall drive him to his feet.

Better, “the steps of his vigor,” or “his lusty steps” (Kissane), since the word נבז means more than strength, “force,” or “power,” but designates “manly vigor” (Gen. 49:3; Hos. 12:3). Perhaps Bildad is subtly alluding to the horror which was felt among the ancient Semites whenever a family’s name was in danger of extinction (cf. vs. 19). His own schemes throw him down (vs. 7b), or better, “make him stumble” (reading with LXX משיח instead of מִשְׁחַת). The hidden purpose of the evil man will sooner or later cause him to make a false move or take a wrong step. In darkness he will no longer be able to find the right direction. Worse, the evil character of his intentions will lead him to his ruin.

(2) Laying Snares About Him (18:8-11)

8-11. Such a man has a bad conscience: if he stumbles, it is because he feels surrounded by traps. More than this, he walks toward his own fall, he is cast into a net by his own feet (vs. 8). It is probably dangerous for the interpreter to seek a specific meaning is uttering great and momentous judgments. The similes trip each on the other’s heels, all of them meaning much the same thing. Only the emphasis is changed. Now it is not so much God who deals out the retribution: a kind of necessity inherent in the world itself has taken charge, surrogate of the Almighty (see Exeg. on vs. 2-4). For the wicked the fire at the door of his tent has died down (vs. 5), the light that hangs above his head is gone out (vs. 6; cf. 21:7). No longer is his stride vigorous and sure: it is his heart within (vs. 7b) that makes his feet to stumble (vs. 8). Everything is a snare and a trap (cf. Ps. 9:16), a pitfall and a noose. He cannot stay where he is (vs. 11a), he cannot go anywhere else (vs. 11b). Catastrophe gapes for him like a hungry monster, ruin holds out its arms waiting for him to stumble (vs. 12; cf. 12:5-6). So indeed the world seems to a man harried by his conscience (see Exeg. on vs. 8-11). Innuendo gives place now to images less remote (cf. Expos. on 22:12-20). One may almost observe the accompanying gesture, and trace back each successive item to the prologue. Disease (leprosy?) cats into his flesh. He is rooted out of his dwelling, where he thought himself secure (8:15), and bundled off toward death. One is reminded of W. Somerset Maugham’s story in Sheppey. Death says in Act III:

There was a merchant in Bagdad who sent his servant to market to buy provisions and in a little while the servant came back, white and trembling, and said, Master, just now when I was in the market-place I was jostled by a woman in the crowd and when I turned I saw it was death that jostled me. She looked at me and made a threatening gesture; now, lend me your horse, and I will ride away from this city and avoid my fate. I will go to Samarra and there death will not find me. The merchant lent him his horse, and the servant mounted it, and he dug his spurs in its flanks and as fast as the horse could gallop he went. Then the merchant went down to the market-place and he saw me standing in the crowd and he came to me and said, Why did you make a threatening gesture to my servant when you saw him this morning? That was not a threatening gesture, I said; it was only a start of surprise. I was astonished to see him in Bagdad, for I had an appointment with him to-night in Samarra.9

Strangers, goes on Bildad, dwell where he dwelt; his house is accursed. His life withers away (see Exeg. on vs. 16-18), his name is no more abroad (vs. 17b; “field” for street). Even his fellows will have nothing to do with him (cf. 17:6; the theme will be further elaborated by Zophar in ch. 20). His family is cut off. Wherever men are, they are appalled at the sight (see Exeg. on vs. 20). So secure (12:6) are the ungodly; so permanent their lot (cf. 8:13, 19)!

11. Conscience Does Make Cowards of Us All.
—Richard III, Macbeth, and Hamlet all bear witness to it. Whatever the origin of that voice within, whether from the ways of our mother 12 His strength shall be hunger-bitten, and destruction shall be ready at his side.
13 It shall devour the strength of his skin: even the firstborn of death shall devour his strength.
14 His confidence shall be rooted out of his tabernacle, and it shall bring him to the king of terrors.
15 It shall dwell in his tabernacle, because it is none of his: brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation.
16 His roots shall be dried up beneath, and above shall his branch be cut off.
17 His remembrance shall perish from the earth, and he shall have no name in the street.
18 He shall be driven from light into darkness, and chased out of the world.

12 His strength is hunger-bitten, and calamity is ready for his stumbling.
13 By disease his skin is consumed, the first-born of death consumes his limbs.
14 He is torn from the tent in which he trusted, and is brought to the king of terrors.
15 In his tent dwells that which is none of his; brimstone is scattered upon his habitation.
16 His roots dry up beneath, and his branches wither above.
17 His memory perishes from the earth, and he has no name in the street.
18 He is thrust from light into darkness, and driven out of the world.

* Ca: Heb it consumes the limbs of his skin for every one of the synonymous terms here employed: net and "lattice work" (vs. 8), gin and snare (vs. 9), rope and trap (vs. 10). Briefly, the enumeration is summed up in the statement that "from every direction terrors surround him" if he remains stationary, so that he is paralyzed with fright (vs. 11a), "and they pursue him close in his tracks" as soon as he resumes his journey (vs. 11b). Standing or moving, the evil man is overwhelmed by fear, and his outward happiness is thwarted by his inward disintegration.

(3) Marching Him to the King of Terrors (18:12-15)

12-13. Rather than His strength is hunger-bitten, the text of vs. 12a means, lit., "His calamity is hungry [for him]" (cf. La Sainte Bible), or with a slight correction, "Ruin is ravenous for him" (Moffatt), which provides an excellent parallelism to "and distress stands ready at his side" in vs. 12b. By disease his skin is consumed (reading with RSV וָרַע for רָע in vs. 13a) and the first-born of death, i.e., the plague or a similar epidemic visitation, consumes his limbs (vs. 13b).

14-15. As a result of this mortal sickness, "he is torn out of his tent, the refuge of his confidence," and "she [female personification of the plague?] shall march him to the king of terrors" (vs. 14). Another will occupy his dwelling after it has been disinfected with sulphur (vs. 15).

(4) Eradicating His Memory (18:16-18)

16-18. The image of the tree is familiar to Bildad since he has already used it in his first discourse (8:16-19). Job had regretted the fact that man, unlike a tree when it is cut off, has no capacity for rebirth after death (14:7-9). Thereupon Eliphaz had retorted that indeed, as far as the evil man was concerned, his shoots would be consumed and his blossoms blown away (15:80). Now Bildad stresses once again the truth of his colleague's pronouncement. The roots of the evil man dry up beneath, and as a consequence of his...
19 He shall neither have son nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings.
20 They that come after him shall be astonished at his day, as they that went before were affrighted.
21 Surely such are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

19 He has no offspring or descendant among his people, and no survivor where he used to live.
20 They of the west are appalled at his day, and horror seizes them of the east.
21 Surely such are the dwellings of the ungodly, such is the place of him who knows not God.”

inward desiccation, his branches wither above (vs. 16). While the righteous are held in everlasting remembrance (cf. Ps. 112:6), even the name of the wicked man is forgotten (vs. 17). In a word, he shall be driven out of the world (vs. 18b). The use of the word הבן, world, shows how complete will be his departure, or rather, his annihilation.

(5) A Frightful Wonder for West and East (18:19-21)
19. The evil man, Bildad concludes, is deprived of the most elemental hope: he shall have neither son nor descendent (notice the alliterative sounds), neither offspring nor descendant (cf. Gen. 21:23; Isa. 14:22). No survivor shall remain in the places of his sojourn: thus in finality his name shall utterly vanish from the face of the earth.
20. Before such a spectacle the whole of mankind is shocked: “The Westerners are appalled at his fate and the Easterners are seized with a shudder.” The ancient versions rendered שבתא a חלום and שבותי as “the last” and “the first,” i.e., the future and the past generations. But one may ask whether the former or the latter could be witnesses of the evil man’s end as described by Bildad. The dead might in some way hear of it in Sheol, but how could the men of the future be astonished if even his memory has been wiped out? Modern commentators generally, following Schultens, understand the verse as referring to both parts of civilized mankind, the Occidentals and the Orientals; cf. similar expressions in “the western sea” (Deut. 11:24; etc.), i.e., “the Mediterranean,” and “the eastern sea” (Ezek. 47:18; etc.), i.e., “the Dead Sea.” Thus in a paradoxical sense and in an indirect way Bildad is actually paying tribute to the exceptional stature of Job. At the beginning of his discourse he had been trying subtly to inject the idea that after all the sufferer is not the champion of suffering humanity or the unique target of God Almighty, but on the contrary a quite ordinary man belonging to the rank and file of humanity (cf. vs. 4). But now Bildad is offering oblique homage to Job’s stature. Such a fantastic fate must be explained by a fantastic crime. The speaker is now ready to make his final condemnation.
21. The evil man is the unrighteous man, the ungodly, one who deviates from the right course (רש, probably the same word as in 16:11); the cause of his ill behavior is the fact that he knows not God (cf. “all those who forget God” in 8:13a). Bildad is a deeply sincere religious man who happens to be right theoretically about the organic relation of religion and ethics. Indeed, in the face of Job’s hostile judgments on the intentions of much the feeling as the guilt? In the “pedagogical” stage, to be a coward is often the better part of valor; in the “punitive” stage, it is the Augean stables of the self that need cleansing.

21. The Truth that Is Half a Lie.—The exposition of every speech of the friends must reckon with the truth that is no better than half a lie. There are of course distortions aplenty in the mind of Job; but they are the reflexes of truth, so to speak, the involuntary reactions of a truth that has not lost its courage, and is indeed itself a very passion (see Exeg.). With Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar the case is different: their sincerity is no more in question than Job’s, their point of departure is. They proceed from systems to persons; and persons come first in God’s world (see Expos. on 2:11-13). The result is that their half lies come too near for comfort to being sneak lies, told consciously or unconsciously in order to buttress a “safe” truth. What they say about the inside of life is always truer than what they say about the outside; but even that is not unfailingly true. There are wicked men whose conscience seems no longer
Then Job answered and said,

19:2 How long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces with words?

Then Job answered:

19:2 "How long will you torment me, and break me in pieces with words?

God, one can understand Bildad's severity and even sympathize with the violence of his indignation. But for Bildad to infer that Job is one who knows not God constitutes the ultimate error. Job's personal acquaintance with God cannot be denied. Indeed, it is because the sufferer has been on intimate terms of trust, dependence, and hope with his Creator that he cannot help addressing him in arrogant and rebellious tones. Job's open hostility is the sign of his familiarity with the divine. He speaks to the Most High with the boldness of a son and the daring of a saint. This peculiarity of religious psychology has not escaped the attention of the poet, who at the same time creates in Bildad's character a model both of honor and of blindness.

The sensitive mind of Job has not missed the insinuations of Bildad's oration. He is now fully aware of his friends' total lack of comprehension (vss. 2-6), and this awareness intensifies the sense of his isolation: cornered by God (vss. 7-12) and ostracized by man (vss. 13-22), he is brought to such a paroxysm of misery that in the rebound of despair he dreams once more of a heavenly witness (16:19). Nay, he rises to heights beyond its comforting light, breaks the limits of his present condition (vss. 22-24), transcends the inevitable prospect of imminent death, and seizes in triumph upon the certainty of his ultimate vision of God (vss. 25-29).

a) The Unrighteousness of God (19:1-6)

19:2-3. Under Bildad's provocation Job smarts with anger and impatience. At the prosperous and pompous man's vilifying hints he is outraged and retorts without the trouble them at all. They either do not know or do not care. Certainly no such lurid descriptions as are given here can pass for realism. The moral aspects of God's rule have to be taken with a greater seriousness than any of which they are capable. Warning placards are not set up along the way that leads to death—not in any such profusion as this (see Expos. on 4:8); nor are any such obvious and vulgar inducements held out to the righteous (see Expos. on 1:6-12). The first step in any attempt to interpret the facts is to gather all of them. And who can? Prescription number one: humility. Even the Omniscience that has no need of knowing has shown itself quite capable of that! The second step is to face them. Prescription number two: honesty. Ultimately, however, it is not the interpretation that matters so much as the faith of one kind or another which is bound to do the interpreting. Prescription number three: "The fear of the Lord," which "is wisdom" (28:28; see Expos. on 21:5-6; 23:2).

19:1-29. The Answer of Job.—How long? you say. I say it too. How long will you go on driving at me, over and over again, wearing me down? Have you no shame? If I can be said to have done any wrong at all, even the slightest, it is over and done with (vs. 4, see Exeg.; or "I should certainly know about it myself"; perhaps, "It has worked you no harm," or "It is none of your business," as in 7:20). You want to puff yourselves up by taking me down (vs. 5). Well, I fling it back in your teeth (know them): you ask if the Almighty perverts justice (8:8b; see Exeg.). I am not afraid to answer, Yes, he does. God, and God alone, has twisted the truth about me all out of shape and sprung his trap on me (cf. 18:8). What else can you make of his silence, while I keep crying, "Help! Help!" (vs. 7)? Every time I try to move he stops me short, and whenever I try to see he cuts off my view (vs. 8). He has stripped me naked of all I had, my wealth, my standing, my honor (vs. 9). I am gone, like the rubble of a ruined house; the hope that grew in my heart has been rooted out as if it had been a tree. All his doing (vss. 9-10). His wrath beleaguered my little tent like an army throwing up its ramparts for the assault (vss. 11-12). Far and near, from fringe to center, he has made me a stranger (vss. 13-15). My very servants, who at the barest motion of my hand or eye used to run my errands, refuse to listen now when I beg them (vs. 16). I am loathsome even to my wife. Children make fun of me, and you men whom I loved shrink from me in horror (vss. 17-19). Look at me. I am nothing but skin and bones. I have lost everything (vs. 20). For God's sake (see Expos. on 3 These ten times have ye reproached me: ye are not ashamed that ye make yourselves strange to me.
4 And be it indeed that I have erred, mine error remaineth with myself.

forms of courtesy. His words hide a bitternes hitherto unspoken at the outset of his replies. As Bildad has done twice previously (cf. 8:2, 18.2), he begins with How long? . . . ? This may be a conscious or an unconscious attempt to mock the friend by imitation. How long will you torment me? or, better, “How long will you harrow my soul?” (Moffatt). The LXX reads ᾧ ἐφίλήσατε, “Will you weary . . .?” instead of יִשְׁחֲטֹת (M.T.), “Will you afflict . . . ?” The verb הָשָׂכָה (M.T.) has a powerful impact; its Arabic cognate refers to physical violence (wajayj, castravit; wajiyā, “to be abraded” [used of the foot]); it is commonly found on the tongue of the persecuted Judahites during the sixth century b.c. (Lam. 1:4, 5, 12; 3:32, 33; cf. Isa. 51:23). A term of similar force appears in the next line, “And how long will you crush me with words?” (vs. 2b; cf. 22:9; Lam. 3:34; Isa. 53:5). Moral torture is similar to physical torment and no less hurtful. Perhaps the friends by their attacks are attempting to bring Job to “contrition” (cf. the image of “crushing” in the root of the Hebrew word “contribute”: Isa. 57:15), but they succeed only in increasing his sufferings. These ten times, i.e., often, repeatedly (cf. Gen. 31:17; Num. 14:22), they have attempted “to bring him to complete humiliation” (vs. 3a). Are they not “ashamed of mistreating” him (vs. 3b)? The Hebrew word is uncertain; it has been variously translated by make yourselves strange to me (KJV), wrong me (RSV), etc. Ewald, followed by many modern commentators, has suggested that the Hebrew רָעֲשָׂה is related to the Arabic hakara, “to oppress,” “to torment,” “to torture.” The meaning of the word should be strong enough to match those which precede.

4. And be it indeed that I have erred [shāghīthī, cf. 6:24; 12:16], mine error [meshūghāthī] remaineth with myself: As in 7:20, Job is not making a confession of culpability. He is merely offering a conjecture for the sake of the discussion. Vs. 4b is susceptible of several interpretations. (a) “If I had erred (which I have not), my error would dwell with me and remain in my memory. I would remember it, but I do not; therefore, I have never violated the commandments of the Almighty, I have not made even a mistake." This exegesis is unlikely, since the word נאש and its derivatives appear to refer to an act of offense by ignorance, inadvertence, or default, e.g., in a state of intoxication and irresponsibility caused by drunkenness or the passion of love (Lev. 4:14; Num. 15:22; Ezek. 45:20; etc.) thus, Job might be accused of having been unconscious of his crime, a charge that he definitely denies.

(b) A second interpretation would be most attractive were it not based upon a wholly conjectural though slight emendation of the text. Following the suggestion of Richter, one might propose to read, instead of וָהָנָא, "in truth" (M.T.), וָהָנָא, "if as an adolescent" (I have erred; cf. 13:26; Ps. 25:7), and then to consider the subsequent clause as a question, "Should my error remain forever with me?" Not only is the proposed correction unsupported by the MSS or the ancient versions, but also the translation "remain forever" is hardly possible, since the verb יְרָד literally means "to sojourn for a night."

(c) A third interpretation might follow the lines already sketched in 7:20. Even if Job has lapsed into moral failure, surely he has hurt no one, neither God nor men. His error should not therefore bring upon him a punishment which is out of all proportion to a hypothetical peccadillo. This interpretation is possible, for although Job elsewhere (especially in ch. 31) shows that he is uncommonly scrupulous in matters of ethics and religious observance, he might conceivably maintain that a private and secret failure has no social consequences as long as it has not caused offense to another human being; and that in any case it should not affect the equanimity of God.

(d) The context following (vs. 5), nevertheless, suggests the possibility of a third meaning for vs. 4. Even if Job has committed a meshāghāh, this error or "mistake" (as opposed to a sin of intention) would be his own business and should not concern his friends. Some commentators believe that this thought is unlikely to have arisen in the mind of Job, who—as Eliphaz had appropriately remarked (4:3)—was always in the past eager to exercise his pastoral responsibilities toward others, and begged his would-be comforters to teach him what "errors" he had committed (6:24). But it will be observed that actually his relations with his "friends" have deteriorated so far that the ordinary canons of "friendship" no longer apply. This verse seems therefore to open up the theme of social isolation, which will be the object of a pathetically eloquent and even gripping description in the course of the next few lines.

(e) Following the LXX, which gave to the verb יָרֵד (vs. 4b) its literal meaning, one should probably render the verse as follows:

If in truth I had erred,
My error would have remained with me only for a night.

In other words, it would have been an aberration without any lasting effect. It would not offer a satisfactory explanation of Job's present misery. This exegesis is strengthened by the fact that the Greek translators include at this point two lines which are not found in the Hebrew text:

I have spoken words which should not have been spoken,
My sayings were in error, and they were not fitting.

This may very well represent the original, now accidentally dropped from the M.T. If this passage is authentic, then Job admits that he has made some utterances which were is not the hero's own consciousness of innocence that is decisive: it is God's verdict that counts (1:8; 2:3), and the fact that Job cannot be bribed into what for him would be sheer dishonesty (13:15). The friends may indeed seem to take sin more seriously than he takes it; but their very seriousness is morbid. About Job there is something of Luther's pecca fortiter. While it is possible for people to be "picayunish" about their own sins, nobody may make light of sin itself. Item by item, sin is precisely what all the interpretations would have Job saying it is 5 If indeed ye will magnify yourselves against me, and plead against me my reproach; out of order (perhaps an allusion to the curse on his day in ch. 3), but such an admission is comparable to the jettisoning of ballast which enables an aeronaut to climb to a higher level and to reach thereby a stronger and more secure position. The confession of an error in words, temporarily entertained, carries a denial of any graver guilt which would have permanently stained the record of the sufferer and would have been, according to the friends' thesis, the cause of his torments. Far from pleading guilty, Job turns to the offensive, and in the next lines delivers the thus-far mightiest blow of his encounter with the three antagonists.

6 Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with his net.

5-6. If indeed you magnify yourselves against me: Rather, "on my account" (vs. 5a). The sufferer understands that his "friends" reveal by the cruelty of their attitude an attempt to justify themselves as well as their ideas. Their rabidity is a sign of their insecurity. They reaffirm their self-esteem as they "try to prove [his] infamy" (vs. 5b). Bildad rhetorically asked in his first speech, "Does God pervert justice?" (8:3a). Job answers now in the affirmative.

Know ye then that it is Eloah who hath perverted my right,
And hath compassed me with his net (vs 6).

The rendering of 'iwwethānî is not easy, for the verb ḫw, used in the Piel, means "to falsify," "to bend," "to subvert," "to make crooked," and is here linked directly with the personal pronoun "me" instead of with a concrete object like "scales" (as in Amos 8.5) or an abstract substantive like "justice" (as in 8:3). In any event, the general meaning is clear, for Job is plainly and bluntly stating that God, the author of his plight, has willfully distorted the truth concerning him. It is a grave charge. Once more one of the devices of the dialogue technique used by the poet appears in full light. It seems that the hero has slowly and silently mediated upon the statement made by Bildad in the first speech. To the question "Doth the Almighty pervert righteousness?" (8:3b) Job did not immediately make open reply. But now, cornered like a hunted animal, he dares to utter the blasphemy: "I tell you, it is God who has falsified my case." James Strahan observes (Job, p. 171) that "Job stops short of saying that God needs to be forgiven, not, or vice versa: it is not a "temporary aberration"; it is everybody's business, for "no man sinneth unto himself"; it does hurt; it matters, for years and ages it matters, whether a man is conscious of it or unconscious. By as much as Job is wrong, so much the more right is he than any of the others. What he is really rebelling against is the doctrine of a meretricious retributive justice; he insists simply that no such explanation fits his case. A God like that would be an evil God. There is a profundity in the very contradictions that are waging their war inside his soul.

6. Calling God to Account.—Blasphemy it is, no less (1:11; 2:5). But nothing that Satan did is responsible for it (see Expos. on 1:6-12; 2:7-10). It is the blasphemy of a new faith in the agony of its encounter with the old (see Expos. on 7:21c; 10:13-17; 18:18-19). We are in the presence of a mind outraged by an antiquated idea of God and his dealing with human life; more important still, we are in the presence of a man whose heart will not follow where his mind has been driven. It is his picture of God that he hates, and that is perhaps the most deeply religious act of his life. When the heart denies what the mind affirms, the issue lies with the heart, where God is listening at the door.

Be it said to his credit, Job does not for an instant desert the ground on which he means to stage his controversy (see Expos. on 10:1-22). It is not the moral order that concerns him (cf. Expos. on 18:2-4); God concerns him (see Expos. on 21:5-6; 23:2). Even when he cries out Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard: I cry aloud, but there is no judgment.

He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass, and he hath set darkness in my paths.

He hath stripped me of my glory, and taken the crown from my head.

He hath destroyed me on every side, and I am gone: and mine hope hath he removed like a tree.

or of offering, with Omar Khayyám, to share with Him the responsibility, 'Man's forgiveness give, and take.'” Of course such an idea is entirely foreign to the poem. Nevertheless, Job's statement is exceptionally intrepid and borders on titanic usurpation of divine powers. By asserting that Eloah has distorted his right (cf. Rom. 3:5), he judges the Deity's conduct, motivation, and nature. He, the finite dwarf, the son of clay, the ephemeral moth, has lost the sense of his dependence upon God. Job denounces and rebukes his Creator. Man condemns God.

b) The Enmity of God (19:7-12)

In the second strophe Job rises to the stature of the noble damned by substantiating the charges he has just made against the nature of the divinity. However, he does not continue explicitly to accuse the Lord of the universe of acting unjustly. He concentrates on the task of offering evidence that God is not indifferent but hostile and malicious.

7-8. “If I cry ‘Violence!’ I do not receive any answer” (vs. 7a). The word נאל, as in Aramaic, means not behold but “if” (cf. 4:18; 11:11; 12:14; 13:15; etc.). The thought and the expressions are closely related to those of Hab. 1:2; Jer. 20:8. I call aloud [cf. vs. 7b; again Hab. 1:2], but there is no justice [cf. Lam. 3:8]. The silence of God could not be interpreted as a sign of his indifference. He has maliciously blocked all the exits (vs. 8a) and in addition has blinded his prisoner (vs. 8b).

9-12. The dealings of the Deity with his servant are graphically described. It is not readily apparent whether the words glory and crown (vs. 9) refer to the princely station which Job enjoyed in the midst of his community or suggest a spiritual quality which he prized more deeply than social distinction and political influence, viz., a state of proud dignity vis-à-vis God as well as men. Probably both categories are included here, as one could not easily then separate them. Once more the poet may be alluding to the to his friends for pity (vs. 21), it is of God he is thinking (see Expos.). He is obsessed with God. He is God-possessed. Ultimatey his blasphemy will prove to be nothing but the mask which faith can sometimes be tortured into assuming.

7. The Silences of God.—There are many times in life when a shut door seems to be the only valid symbol of reality. Knock on it ever so hard: whoever lives there—if anybody does—apparently pays no attention. A minister once had printed at the bottom of the paper he used for his correspondence the words “Prayer Changes Things”; but they failed to prevent his using that paper in order to write a friend how impossible it was for him and his wife to agree. There are things which prayer does not change. The one thing it can change is life itself. And that “answer” is not often the answer we want; nor are we always willing to wait for it. Job cried “Help! Help!” and nothing happened. Or did it? When God is silent it is not to be taken for granted that he is doing nothing. Even his silences, when they are not judicial (Luke 23:9) or an indication that matters have already got beyond speech (Mark 15:5), are creative. In the story of the Canaanitish woman (Matt. 15:21-28) it is recorded that Jesus “answered her not a word.” Was it because of something in her? She had no right to call him “Son of David.” It sounds almost like a pagan charm on her lips. Was it because of something in God?
11 He hath also kindled his wrath against me, and he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies.

12 His troops come together, and raise up their way against me, and encamp round about my tabernacle.

13 He hath put my brethren far from me, and mine acquaintance are verily estranged from me.

11 He has kindled his wrath against me, and counts me as his adversary.

12 His troops come on together; they have cast up siegeworks against me, and encamp round about my tent.

13 "He has put my brethren far from me, and my acquaintances are wholly estranged from me.

psalm which describes the majesty that God has bestowed on man in the universe: "Thou . . . hast crowned him with glory and magnificence" (Ps. 8:5; cf. Job 7:17). In contrast with his former status, the sufferer feels not only stripped (vs. 9a) but also marked for the final onslaught. According to the blunt colloquialism, "he is a goner" (cf. "I am gone," vs. 10a) and even his hope either of restoration before death or of resurrection afterward has been pulled up like a tree (vs. 10b). Such a treatment only demonstrates divine wrath (vs. 11a) and hostility: [God] counteth me unto him as one of his enemies (vs. 11b). This figure of speech is given poetic development. God is compared to a commander in the field, and Job to an isolated point of resistance. God's troops come on together (vs. 12a). Everything which has happened to the sufferer, the loss of his property, posterity, health, social standing, religious righteousness, and now his friendships, represents in military language the concerted effort of assailants getting ready to compel a fortress to surrender. The trials he has endured and now endures more sharply than ever are assaults directed against his own defense in the conviction of his integrity. They have cast up siegeworks against me (vs. 12b), preparing for the final attack. They encamp round about my tent (vs 12c), they are lying in wait for the propitious moment. My surrender is only a question of time. How long shall I be able to hold out?

c) The Hostility of Men (19:13-19)

13-19. God's enmity is the root of Job's torture, made the more bitter by the fact that the community of the tortured man recognizes it and glibly upholds what appears to be God's side. It is God who has spurred and wrought his enemy's social seclusion. Through a relentless and gradual tightening of the circles which close upon the hero to ensure thereby his utter loneliness, the strophe moves to its climax of desolation and horror. As in some symphonie fantastique, one can hear below and behind the musical phrasing, sustained by strings and winds, the haunting, growing, inevitably faster and faster rhythm of the percussion instruments. Here is more than a mere enumeration of terms or a sociological catalogue. Here is the poetic expression of an isolation which prepares...
14 My kinsfolk have failed, and my familiar friends have forgotten me.
15 They that dwell in mine house, and my maids, count me for a stranger: I am an alien in their sight.
16 I called my servant, and he gave me no answer: I entreated him with my mouth.
17 My breath is strange to my wife, though I entreated for the children's sake of mine own body.
18 Yea, young children despised me; I arose, and they spake against me.
19 All my inward friends abhorred me and they whom I loved are turned against me.

psychologically for the birth of hope told in the subsequent strophe (vs. 23-29). Observe the monotonous and yet progressive accumulation of words: My brethren, the men of my covenant (vs. 13a); not brothers in the strict sense: cf. vs. 17b, my acquaintances (vs. 13b), my kinsfolk and my close friends (vs. 14), the guests in my house, my maids (vs. 15), my personal servant (vs. 16), my wife (vs. 17a) and even my own blood brothers, the sons of my own mother (lit., "the sons of my [mother's] womb," vs. 17b), "little urchins" (vs. 18), and finally, as the worst of all forms of ostracism, the rejection wrought by my intimate friends, . . . those whom I loved, presumably Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar (vs. 19). The word I loved is reserved for the end of the list. Its strategic position makes all the previously mentioned degrees of relationship fade into comparative unimportance. "In this lyric of blighted affections the hardest word to utter—I loved"—is reserved to the last. The natural reward of a love so tender and true is a responsive love that overflows, instead of drying up, when the lover became a sufferer. The Book of Job was written [partly] against a theology which bred suspicion, soured the milk of human kindness, alienated bosom friends, and covered with infamy those who should have been crowned with honour and glory." (Strahan, ibid., pp. 173-74.)

As may be expected, critics do not agree upon the correct translation of these verses. It is commonly held, for example, that my brethren (vs. 13a) must be taken literally to mean Job's actual brothers rather than metaphorically the members of his "fraternal" consanguinity. Likewise, some scholars maintain that the expression "the sons of my womb" (in vs. 17b), instead of referring to "the offspring of my mother," i.e., "my uterine brothers" (Hitzig, Budde, et al.), signifies the sufferer's own sons (Dhorme, Moffatt, La Sainte Bible, et al.). It may indeed be argued that the word יָנוּשׁ, "womb," may in a popular way be used of a man's generative powers (cf. Deut. 28:53; Mic. 6:7 ["the fruit of my womb"], Pss. 127:3; 132:11); and this passage, thus interpreted, is used as a weapon by those who claim that the poet is not the author of the folk tale (in which the sons of Job have all died; cf. 1:18-21) and even that he was not aware of it.

suggests that the reason may well lie in the "sacramental" character of speech and its function in serving the interests of community. Certain it is that modern man, so vulnerable at the point of his faith in God, and finding himself so frequently isolated from his fellows by the very individualism with which he has sought to compensate for his dwindling stature in a world given over to science, to the mass, and to the
20. The Skin of Our Teeth.—The title of a play by Thornton Wilder: he sets down in 21 Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends; for the hand of God hath touched me.

(c) As a variation of the above procedure, one may follow the LXX, and transfer the word בשמים, my bones, from the first to the second line, and omit the word בשר, "in the skin of" from the latter (Dhorme), and thus read, "I am so lean that I can gnaw my bones with my teeth."

(d) By vocalizing ית as shēnī, "a second time," instead of shinnāy, my teeth, one may render, "I have escaped a second time [only] with my skin" (Hoffmann).

(e) By correcting בשריי בישננ into בשריי בישננ, some translate, "I have escaped with my skin [a synonym of flesh] in my teeth" (Lods, et al.).

(f) By correcting more boldly בשריי בישננ, one may render, "I have escaped with my flesh in my teeth" (a direct parallel in 13:14; Bickell [1st ed.], Budde, Driver and Gray, J. M. P. Smith, et al.).

(g) By correcting still more boldly, one may read vs. 20b as his teeth, "And my bones protrude in sharp points" (Kissane).

The extraordinary variety of these corrections (and of others which might easily be added to this list) reveals the wholly hypothetical nature of the attempt. Several scholars therefore assume that the Hebrew text has been correctly preserved and that the traditional translation, I have escaped by the skin of my teeth, represents an idiomatic expression, the precise meaning of which may only be guessed. (a) Some critics (i.e., Schultens, Rosenmüller, Morris Jastrow) maintain that the "skin of the teeth" designates the "gums"; thus Job is saying that he has lost all his teeth. (b) Others (Renan and Buttenwieser) observe that since teeth have no skin, Job is merely stating the hopeless prospect which faces him, saying, "I have not escaped at all; I am utterly lost." (c) Taking the expression skin of my teeth in the physical sense, one might argue in an entirely different direction. Although the teeth of an adult are not covered by skin, the teeth of infants are protected against lactate acids by a cutaneous tissue called Nasmyth's membrane, which wears out after the weaning process. If this fact had been known to the learned poet (who reveals throughout the book an astoundingly wide and accurate acquaintance with natural phenomena), one could suggest the following interpretation: The skin of his teeth is for Job the symbol of his childhood innocence. Although conscious of the extremely advanced stage of his pathological condition (vs. 20a), he adds in vs. 20b, "Let me escape [השת〉, it will be noted, is in the cohortative with my integrity intact!"

(d) Following the Vulg., one may argue that the skin of my teeth is an unusual way of saying "my lips." Job would thus declare, "And only my lips are left around my teeth." This statement in turn might mean, "Nothing is at my disposal except the possibility of speech" (Norbert Peters). (e) Job's enigmatic saying should be compared with that of 13:14a, "I will take my flesh in my teeth," which refers to the deadly risks taken by the sufferer in his blasphemy. Here Job refers to his bare survival; he is at the very brink of the great void, with a foot in the tomb. So far he has escaped the final fall, but now almost nothing, the skin of his teeth, keeps him on the brink of the bottomless precipice. He barely survives; he is more dead than alive. "He has escaped with the loss of everything" (Peake, Job, pp. 189-90; cf. Weiser). This is the traditional and most probable interpretation.

21-22. Having described in moving terms his dereliction (vs. 12-19) and reiterated in a swift comment that his physical dejection has reached the final stage (vs. 20), the dramatic form the hairbreadth escapes humanity has had through the ages, historic and prehistoric; and the jeopardy in which it now stands.

21. For God's Sake.—(Cf. 6:14, KJV and RSV; see Expos. on 6:14, 18, 21-27, 28-30.) Job implores his friends for pity, and (to motivate it) assigns the very consideration which prompts them to reject his appeal. They will give him no quarter whom God gives none. They dare not. Besides, to have done so would have necessitated 22 Why do ye persecute me as God, and are not satisfied with my flesh?

sufferer changes his tone as his defiance subsides. Under stress of agony the pride and anger which have prompted many of his invectives abate at last. He had previously refused, against the explicit advice he had received (8:5), to implore the grace, mercy, or pity of God (9:15). He has however come to implore—in vain—the pity of his own slave (19:16); and now in the depth of his distress he beseeches these three friends, who are still willing to remain with him, to speak and to listen to him: he begs, Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends (vs. 21a). This sudden break in the pride of the lone eagle offers another evidence of the profound incisiveness with which the poet probes into the recesses of human nature. Job is completely misunderstood by his friends, and he claims that they are entirely wrong in the judgment which they pass upon his case and are, even cruel in the way they treat him. Nevertheless he craves their approval. He cannot endure their contempt. He forswears defiance and throws himself on their mercy. He cannot yet bring himself to pray for the grace or the pity of God (cf. Ps. 123:3), because it is precisely the hand of God which hath touched him (vs. 21b; cf. the use of the same verb in the confession of the suffering servant in Isa. 53:4). This is the reason for which he appeals to the pity of his friends. Yet this appeal is “all the more hopeless that the reason he urges is the very reason why the friends will not respond. How should God’s sycophants succour him whom God has smitten?” (Peake, op. cit., p. 190.) As will be seen in the following strophe (vs. 25-29), Job is reaching the supreme moment of his theological adventure, as described in the poetic discussion, at least in the form in which it has been preserved. But he cannot poetically, emotionally, and spiritually, enter the land of discovery until all other possibilities have been exhausted. The friends are unable to help him, for they know as well as he does that his misery is wrought by the divine will. Nevertheless, their friendship should at least restrain them from outward aggressiveness. Thus Job asks, Why do ye persecute me as God? (vs. 22a). Men are apt to become as monsters just at the moment when they believe themselves to be divine. One of the friends has already linked his own consolations with those of God (15:11). Men easily delude themselves into believing that they are Godlike whenever they presume to speak in the name of God. In one sentence Job castigates all religious inquisitors who justify their inhumanity to man by the illusory claim of being divinely appointed to their task. “Yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service” (John 16:2). Are not Job’s interlocutors tired of making false accusations? “To an almost total revamping of their theology (see Expos. on 2:11-13); and that they either would not or could not face. Had it been otherwise, in the company of his friends Job might well have been led back into the companionship of the Almighty (see Expos. on vss. 6, 13-19). The three representatives of the orthodox Hebrew faith were zealous for God; but their zeal was without knowledge. They tried to justify the ways of God (see Expos. on 13:8) by discounting the hazards faith has to run (see Expos. on 12:2-6). The truest service they could have rendered God would have been to channel something of his compassion (cf. I John 2:11; 3:17).

22a. God, Men, and Monsters.—Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar were so sure they were spokesmen for the Almighty (15:11) that the ethical was on the point of disappearing in the theological, right living was about to find a substitute in right thinking, simple human kindness in sterile human virtue (see Exeg. on vss. 21-22). Austerity had taken the place of forbearance; magnanimity had given way to punitiousness. There is a morbid satisfaction to be had in the process, a kind of exhilaration. Decry the human in order to exalt the divine. Depreciate self “to the glory of God the Father.” “Oh, to be nothing, nothing! A broken vessel for the Master’s use!” So may men turn into beasts, and God into a devil. There have been saints “hell-bent for heaven.” God became man in order that man, in his effort to be God, may not become a monster (see Expos. on 23:2).

22b. Tearing a Good Name to Shreds.—To devour the flesh was to slander. The friends are 23 Oh that my words were now written! Oh that they were inscribed in a book!
24 Oh that with an iron pen and lead they were graven in the rock for ever!

eat the flesh of someone” is an Aramaic and Arabic idiom for “slandering” (Dan. 3:8; cf. Job 31:31).

23-24. Having recognized the futility of appealing to the pity of his friends, Job tries a different method. The present and the imminent future stand before him like a closed door. But the distant future remains an obscure possibility. If nobody vindicates him now, he will appeal to the verdict of posterity. Oh that my words were written! (Vs. 23a.) Like the psalmist (Ps. 102:19), the sufferer acquires for an instant the perspective of history; he trusts that if his words are preserved for the generations to come his honor will at last be proclaimed. If his story were inscribed in a book, i.e., “on a scroll of parchment” (vs. 23b), like a document in the official archives of some neighboring kingdoms, then an eventual reader, endowed with the wider outlook of a new era, would understand and declare his innocence to the world. But papyrus or parchment is too fragile and ephemeral a substance, because a long time would be required for the human race to overcome prejudices of this kind. Oh that with an iron pen and lead [my words] were graven in the rock for ever! (Vs. 24.) Some commentators observe that there is no progression from vs. 23 to vs. 24 because the verb כֵּסָה means “to engrave,” and thus the noun כַּסָּה, “scroll,” should be understood as a Hebrew equivalent of the Akkadian siparu, “brass,” “bronze” (cf. Judg. 5:14; Isa. 30:8[?]). This brilliant suggestion has found support in the discovery—near the Dead Sea—of two scrolls of copper inscribed with Hebrew characters (cf. William L. Reed, “Report of the Director of the School in Jerusalem,” Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 128 [Dec., 1952], p. 6).

In any event, the tormented sufferer is overcoming the limitations of the present time. He imagines his own case being inscribed on the side of a cliff with a hard metal stylus (manufactured with an alloy of iron and lead [cf. Ezek. 22:20]; the poet has perhaps seen such inscriptions left by great conquerors in Phoenicia or Egypt). Even this literary fancy, however, fails to satisfy his desire. He realizes that an eventual vindication in the distant future would be of no significance. More than a wish for recognition by posterity is needed. The fetters of his isolation, not only from men but also from God, must be broken now. Thus, pushed to the extreme limit of agony, he rejects the dream of a human verdict of acquittal in the centuries to come and enters the yet unexplored world of personal certainty: he looks for a defense and a vindication now and in the afterlife (vs. 25 ff.).

represented as not being content with their calumny, their false representations in the matter of Job’s once widely reputed piety: with no more than the shreds of his good name in their mouths they must yet hound him to death like God.

To give a dog a bad name has become a proverb. To give a man a bad name is to destroy one of his most precious possessions (see Expos. on Luke 19:2). And it can be done so readily: with a word, sometimes by the lifting of an eyebrow. Besides, the very doing of it ministers to one’s own self-esteem. There is more in a name than we think. The Hebrews knew that better than we. The “name” one has often enough determines the scope and opportunity one is given (see Rev. 3:12).

23-24. Strange Fulfilments—Job has indeed been permitted to plead his cause at the bar of how many generations then unborn! (Cf. Expos. on 6:1-7:21.) A great British statesman of years gone by, whenever his policies met with defeat in Parliament, would bow to the will of the majority, and fingering the flower in the lapel of his coat appeal to the arbitrament of the future. To be in the dangerous van of one’s own time is to wear the emblem of a pioneer in the time to come. Job longed for justification with man and reconciliation with God. The sincerest desires of his heart were granted; but in God’s way, not his.
25 For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth:

25 For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth;

e) "I Know that My Redeemer Liveth" (19:25-29)

25:27. The appeal to friends has failed (vss. 21-22). The entreaty to future generations is fanciful and in any case wholly inadequate (vss. 23-24). Thus the final plea to men makes room for the most momentous expression of faith which may be found in the poem and perhaps in the entire Hebrew Bible. For I know . . . (vs. 25a): Better, "But as for me, I know," since the pronoun is emphatically used and the conjunctive letter ו does not imply a link of logical sequence with the preceding verses, but on the contrary suggests an adversative sense. Earthly wishes are brought to vanity, but there is a knowledge to which Job now clings, My Redeemer liveth.

The word גואל represents (a) the man, usually next of kin, who is the avenger of the blood, i.e., of the blood which has been shed by murder (II Sam. 14:11); (b) the man, also next of kin, who has the right to buy or "redeem" the estate of a dead person or to raise up a posterity for him (Deut. 25:5-10; Ruth 2:20; 3:9; 4:4 ff., cf. Lev. 25:25; Num. 5:8); (c) by extension, the defender of the oppressed (Prov. 23:10-11), and especially therefore the defender par excellence, i.e., God. The verb גואל or the participial noun גואל is used for the Deity when (i) Israel is delivered from the Egyptian bondage (Exod. 6:6; 15:13; Ps. 71:2, etc.) and from the Exile (Isa. 41:14; 48:1; etc.); (ii) individuals are saved from oppression (Ps. 119:154; Prov. 23:11; Jer. 50:54), evil (Gen. 48:16), or death (Pss. 69:18; 72:14; 108:4; Lam. 3:58; Hos. 13:14). Which one of these meanings is intended by the poet of Job at this point?

It is generally agreed that the גואל in vs. 25 cannot be a human being since the hero's sons are dead and his relatives have deserted him. Thus commentators usually maintain that Job, through an outburst of passionate will to be vindicated, suddenly breaks through the wall of his isolation, passes from the stage of vain wish (vss. 23-24) into that of positive conviction, and declares his unshakable knowledge that God himself will be the vindicator of his innocence, the defender of his good name, and the restorer of his honor. It is pointed out that (a) the word הים, "alive," "living," is a common designation of the Deity (Josh. 3:10, Hos. 1:10 [Hebrew 2:1]; etc.) and is used also in the formula of the oath (Judg. 8:19; etc.; cf. Job 27:2); (b) the word אבשון, last, clearly describes the גואל (cf. Isa. 48:12; especially 44:6, "Thus saith Yahweh, the King of

25. Victory Through Defeat.—From his friends to the future, and back from the future to God. Read Ps. 130. Defeat is many a time necessary before victory is possible. There is in man a hard and outer shell that has to be broken. In the phrase "ultimate reliance" the word "ultimate" is not without meaning; every other reliance may have to be proved illusory; not in spite of defeat, by means of it. Certainly in the Christian gospel tragedy and triumph are inseparably related, death and life. To be obsessed with the tragedy and lose sight of the triumph is to become a pessimist whose worst fears are likely to be realized; to be obsessed with the triumph and lose sight of the tragedy is to become an optimist whose fondest hopes are little more than the paradise that fools live in. The world is not a place for whistling jaunty tunes; whistling may well be a sign of nervousness. It is not a place where every story has to end as we like. Since Jesus of Nazareth lived in it and died in it, it is a place where more clearly than ever before we can see how closely the tragedy and the triumph are interwrought.

With thy living fire of judgment
Purge this realm of bitter things;
Solace all its wide dominion
With the healing of thy wings.2

The fire and the solace, the purge and the healing, belong together now.

25. My Redeemer Liveth.—The sense in which Job uses these words must not be con-

2 Henry Scott Holland, "Judge eternal, throned in splendor," From The English Hymnal, by permission of the Oxford University Press.
Israel and his go'el, Yahweh of hosts, I am first and I am last ['aharôn ... ']; (c) the verb yâqûm, he shall stand (vs. 25b), or rather, “he shall rise up” (cf. 16:8), is the terminus technicus for the theophanies (Artur Weiser, Das Buch Hiob [Gottingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1951], ad loc.; cf. many parallels, e.g., “For the oppression of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise ...” [Ps. 12 6]): (d) the expression al-ăphâr, upon the dust (vs. 25b) is identical with that found in 41:33 (cf. 5:6; 8:19: 14:8): it indicates that God will come down from heaven and appear within the frame of history to take up the defense of his hero. According to this interpretation, Job recaptures his faith in “the living God” at the very moment when he gives up the illusion of defending himself. The poet reveals in the inner structure of the poem that he knows in its very essence the worship of the covenanted people. As Yahweh will appear at the eschatological time (“the last”) to save Israel in her extremity, so also will God appear to Job; and it will be his judgment, not that of men, which will constitute the final act of the drama (see ibid.).

Against this prevailing interpretation it may be argued that (a) the go'el cannot be God, for Job has heretofore consistently thought of the Deity as an implacably hostile being, and (much more important) continues to do so in the remaining part of the poetic discussion (cf. 27:2); (b) it is hard, if not impossible, to believe that Job, who has just declared that God persecutes him (vs. 22), at once would completely reverse his position and declare that God is his eternal vindicator (vs. 25); (c) those who hold the above interpretation assume that Job is, here as well as in 16:19, opposing God to God and appealing from God the enemy to God the defender; but it has been seen (cf. Exeg. on 16:18-22) that the witness in heaven is to be distinguished from God, and that therefore the identification of the go'el with God cannot find any support from the text of 16:19 ff.; (d) the words “living,” last, shall stand, and upon the earth may well apply to the mysterious being whom Job conceived for a moment as a “mediator” (9:33), and later recalled to his psychological consciousness not merely as the object of a fleeting fancy but as the heavenly person “who vouches for [him] on high and will maintain the right of man with God” (16:19, 21). Now that irrepressible confidence once more enraptures him, and at this climactic moment he shouts, “But I know that my defender lives! He will survive my unjust death, and over the dust of my grave [cf. the use of the word ăphâr in 7:21; 17:16; 20:11; 21:26: also 10:9; 34:15; Ps. 104:29] he will stand at the last instant. Through his intermediation, by his activity, he will summon God and me together, and bring me before the face of God!” Such an interpretation offers more than possibility, for it has two specific advantages over the others: (a) it enables the exegete to understand why at this point in the poetic discussion Job remains as far as ever from renewing his communion with a God who now seems more distant from him than before (cf. 23:3 ff.); (b) it overcomes the otherwise insurmountable difficulty raised by the fact that in the end of the poem, in spite of the weighty opinion of several critics to the contrary, God does not reveal himself as the go'el of Job but rather as the transcendent and holy Deity who, far from upholding the honor and integrity of the sufferer, casts him down into utter self-abhorrence and repentance (42:2-6). In this connection it is important to note that if this exegesis is correct, Job has indeed begun to abandon the hope of defending or justifying himself, but nevertheless remains adamant in the conviction of his innocence. His pride stands, exactly as it shows itself to the end of the poetic discussion (31:40).

fused with the sense in which the Christian uses them (see Exeg.). To “redeem” from the wrong done one's honor is far other than to redeem from sin and guilt. Job's sudden vision of one who even now stands between him and God—one who lives, and is not, as he is, to be accounted already dead—and stands there to vindicate him before the tribunal of God and man alike, is neither arrived at rationally nor grasped at frantically, a mere straw and trick of the fancy. Call it intuition, which to the man of faith is that something within set there to instruct and to lead. Call it “the soul’s invincible surmise” (see Expos. on 9:30-35; 10:1-7, 8-12, 13-17), but know that there is more of response in it than of mere divination.
A liturgical formula from the Ugaritic literature presents a verbal parallel to vs. 25a which may be either purely accidental or extremely important and significant, especially in the light of the above discussion. The worshiper declares in the course of a liturgical celebration of a seasonal festival,

\[ \text{wid' khy alyn b'l} \\
\text{kit zbl b'l ars} \]

And I know that the powerful baal liveth, Existent is the prince. Lord of the earth!

(Cyrus H. Gordon, Ugaritic Handbook [Roma: Pontificium Institutum Biblicum, 1947], p. 138; cf. Charles Virolleaud, I AB [iii:8-9], in “Un poéme phénicien de Ras-Shamra,” Syria, XII [1931], 212-13; Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 140.) This formula is repeated in the sequence of the Ugaritic text (I AB, iii:3-4, 8-9, 20-21), and appears to be a ritual rubric used in celebrating the festival of the dying and rising god. Its emphasis upon the life of the deity is thus an intrinsic part of the ceremonial. On the contrary, Job’s insistence upon the “living” character of his redeemer, in terms almost identical with those of the proto-Phoenician poem, is rather unexpected in its present context. Why has he not merely said, “I know that I have a redeemer”? Why has he chosen to contrast the “living” quality of his go’él with the fact of his own dying? Again, let it be made clear that it is not possible to demonstrate the play of the polytheistic influence of some ancient Semitic cult upon the Joban poet. Yet one can reasonably conjecture that the hero, forsaken of all men and separated from God, may have pinned his hope upon the existence of a heavenly being who would survive his own untimely death and bring about the miracle of a divine-human confrontation. “The parallel may merely be accidental. But it is equally possible that archaic religious terminology about a god who had been dead but was now alive (and therefore able to act decisively) comes to the surface in this formulation. The prolonged absence of divine help may well have led the poet to think of the situation that existed in the pagan world when a god had departed for the land of the dead, while the joyous moment of his restoration to life and the resumption of his accustomed helpful rôle is recaptured in the assertion that ‘he lives.’ If so the time-honoured interpretation which took 19:25 as a reference to the resurrection of Christ had in it a grain of truth.” (Emil G. Kraeling, The Book of the Ways of God [London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1939], p. 89. Used by permission.)

In any case, and although Job is in no way alluding to a Messiah, the passage foreshadows an obstinacy of faith which transcends the limitations of the original poem. Christian interpreters—as well as the innumerable hearers of Handel’s oratorio, The Messiah—have a right to find in this passage a prefiguration of the Christian experience of salvation.

Vs. 26a is in a state of textual corruption which defies the resources of exegesis. The Hebrew of the M.T. is syntactically incoherent. The words mean, lit., “And after” (preposition introducing a noun, or conjunction governing a verb) or “afterwards” (adverb), “my skin” (masculine noun), “they have stricken off” (Piel of ṣap̄; I; cf. Niphal in Isa. 10:34 and the Akkadian nakpu, “to mutilate”) or “they surrounded” (hypothetical Piel of ṣap̄II; cf. Qal in Isa. 21:1 and Hiphil in Job 1:5; 19:6; Ps. 22:17;

---

It has been said above (see Expos. on vs. 7) that love is acting when it seems most idle. Job’s salvation from the very beginning lay in the fact that in the mercy of God there is always a better self at work within the self. That better self never quite let go. It was never altogether quiescent. It never gave up. It would not quit. That was God, if Job had only known it. There was a man, who, though one of the bitterest of souls, continually raving at Providence, was yet one of the stanchest. At sixty-seven he was able to secure employment, as he had been at sixty-three and at sixty-five. He worked thoroughly, was honest, and loving, and beyond reproach. But God got no credit for any of it. It was his doing. God was doing nothing. Job’s fortunes <table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>19:26</th>
<th>THE INTERPRETER’S BIBLE</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>26 And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God:</td>
<td>26 and after my skin has been thus destroyed, then without my flesh I shall see God,\textsuperscript{a}</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

\textsuperscript{a} Or from \textsuperscript{a} The meaning of this verse is uncertain etc.), “this” (feminine pronoun). The ancient versions differ widely from the present M.T. and also among themselves; e.g., the LXX translates vs. 26a as a sequence of vs. 25 and reads,

For I know that he who is about to release me is eternal; (25a)
Upon earth may he raise up my skin (25b)
Which exhausteth [or “goeth through”] this ... (26a).

The Greek translators have therefore omitted רוחא at the beginning of vs. 26a, considered ירוי, “my skin” (Hebrew, vs. 26a), as the object of the verb יתפש (vs. 25b) which they read as a Hiphil instead of the M.T. ייש, and read רוחא as נגפשו instead of נגפפהו. Furthermore, instead of ירוי, “my skin,” LXX\textsuperscript{1} has μου τὸ σῶμα, “my body” (which may be an interpretation of “my skin”) while other Greek MSS have στέρμα, “posterity,” a word which may have been original rather than either δέρμα or σῶμα (cf. the Arabic version of the LXX, ed. W. W. Baudissin, Transliterationis antiquae arabicae libri Iobi [Leipzig: Doerfling & Franke, 1870]). On the basis of this reading one may suggest that the original Hebrew text had נעל instead of ירוי. Thus Job would have said in effect, “Although I have no longer any descendants, I know that my redeemer will survive me.”

The Vulg. has detached the clause of vs. 25b from that of vs. 25a and reads vss. 25-26a as follows:

\textit{Scio enim quod Redemptor meus vivit,} (25a)
\textit{Et in novissimo die de terra surrecturus sum;} (25b) \textit{Et rursum circumdabor pelle mea} ... (26a).

Thus the Latin translator read the word י.features, “he shall rise” (vs. 25b), as אס baiser, “I shall rise”; the words אמת, עלי, “and again with my skin”; the difficult בם מתקפת probably as נגפעתי; a hypothetical Niphal of וס (I).

Vs. 26a has also been translated, “and after my skin will have swollen, this shall be ...” (Targ.) and “these things surround and my skin and my flesh” (Syriac). The uncertainties of the text are revealed in the KJV which renders, And though after my skin worms destroy this body, and offers a marginal substitute, construing ירוי, my skin, as the construct infinitive of the verb ירוי, “to awake,” thus proposing to read, “And after I shall awake, though this body be destroyed.” The RSV, following the ERV, corrects את 대한 לנק and reads, And after my skin has been thus destroyed. . . . All textual emendations suggested by modern critics (and their number is high) represent skillful but wholly conjectural proposals. It is better to leave the clause of vs. 26a untranslated, allowing for the possibility that the idea expressed therein referred to violence and perhaps destruction.

The Hebrew of vs. 26b appears at first sight to be clear and well preserved, but its meaning is ambiguous, and the evidence from the ancient versions suggests the probability were laid waste; but there was One who stood guard in his soul. Was it not a whisper from this Other that even the dead might live again (see Expos. on 14:14)? Was it not a whisper from this Other that one day Job would see for himself of the travail of his soul and be satisfied (Isa. 58:11; the ideal Israel)? Plato gave his grounds for believing that this world is not the only world; Job could give none, except that injustice could not possibly triumph: the Greek by way of reason, the Oriental by way of agony. It was Job’s very weakness that led him to this display of strength, the weakness of his seeing faith as it gave way before the intensity of his of textual corruption here also. It reads, lit., “And from my flesh I shall see God.” The preposition א, however, may mean either “from within” or “from without.” Hence the conflicting translations, in my flesh (KJV) and without my flesh (RSV). Although the LXX has rendered, “For from the Lord all this was accomplished for me,” thus reading perhaps properly for εἰς τὸ πρόσωπόν μου and διὰ τὰ πρᾶγματα ἡμῶν, there is no valid reason for challenging the accuracy of the present M.T., since vs. 27 obviously indicates that Job expected to see God. Two questions remain: (a) Will this experience take place before his death or afterward? (b) If the answer to the preceding question is “afterward,” in what mode of existence will Job face the Deity—as a disincarnated spirit, or in a form of being which is described pictorially as in carne?

On the one hand, it will be observed that the preposition ה assumes a privative meaning not only with verbs of motion and separation (as is ordinarily the case), but also in spatially neutral contexts such as Num. 15:21; Judg. 5:11; Prov. 1:33; 20:3; Jer. 48:45 (other passages such as Job 11:15: 21:9; 28.4 which are often adduced in support of this meaning in 19.26 are not relevant parallels). On the other hand, there is no doubt that when used with a verb expressing vision or perception, the same preposition ה refers to the point of vantage, the locale from which or through which the function of sight operates. Thus “Yahweh looketh from [ה] heaven, . . . from [ה] the place of his habitation” (Ps. 33:13-14) or “My beloved looketh forth through [ה] the windows, . . . through [ה] the lattice” (Song of S. 2:9). It is therefore evident that 19:26 should be translated with the KJV, in my flesh shall I see God. This exegesis is confirmed (a) negatively by the fact that the idea of a bodiless mode of human existence is totally foreign to the Semitic mentality (as proved by the growth and development of the belief in carnal resurrection); and (b) positively by the subsequent and emphatic assertion, apparently needed to convince the astonished and even skeptical listeners (and exegetes?), that Job himself will see God with his own eyes (vs. 27).

Now if Job expects to be “in his flesh” when he confronts the Godhead, does he think that this meeting will take place on earth before he dies, or does he refer to a post-mortem experience? At first glance the former alternative appears to be defensible and is indeed held by a number of scholars, most of whom, however, correct the text in some way which supports their interpretation. It is claimed that the poet is here anticipating the theophany of Yahweh, through which God appears and meets Job face to face (38:1-42:6) while the sufferer is still alive upon earth. Against this view, and in favor of the post-mortem alternative, other exegetes strongly stress the fact that the sufferer’s consistent prospect in the whole poetic discussion up to this point has been that of his imminent and inevitable death. In addition, the thought of the go’el, especially when it is considered as a reiteration and development of the wish for a mediator (9.33) and of the hope in a heavenly witness (16:19), which in turn presupposes Job’s murder by bloodshed (16:18), points to the conclusion that vss. 25-26a, whatever their exact rendering should be, refer to the final, earthly, bloody act, which is death (Pascal). If so, Job faced a situation more paradoxical than ever: On the one hand, he was convinced that he would see God after his death, on the other hand, he knew that in Sheol human existence is no longer what might be called “life” (14:20-21) and that there is for a dead man no hope of returning to earth (7:10; 14:7-15), yet he believed that in some way that whisper which had already brought him to cry out for a mediator (9:33), someone to plead his cause before God, someone to stand between him and the Eternal, a daysman Job called him, an umpire? Surely nowhere does he come nearer the N.T. than at this moment, hammered out hot on the anvil of his despair (see Expos. on 18:18-19). It is as if all at once for his leaden pain he had got him vast wings: I know that my Redeemer liveth. Nowhere does he come seeking faith. Was it not some whisper in the soul that led him to keep knocking on the door of grace, desiring a conference with his Maker? Never mind that sometimes he left off knocking and took to kicking: maybe it is better to be overbold than to be overcautious. When no access seemed possible, was it not that same whisper in his soul which told him there had to be access, else there was no God, no God who could have any significance for man? Was it not 27 Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me.

27 whom I shall see on my side, and my eyes shall behold, and not another.

My heart faints within me!

* Or for myself

(possibly hinted at in the now corrupt vs. 26a) he would receive new flesh for the specific purpose of the divine-human interview. This flash of expectation has nothing to do with the Greek belief in the natural immortality of the soul, nor is it to be confused with the later Jewish-Christian belief in a bodily resurrection effecting entrance into eternal life. It is merely the dying thought that he, Job, in order to be enabled to plead his defense before God, will again be made fully alive, that his personality will be endowed with the concreteness, the substantial reality, the “carnal” vitality and vigor of complete existence of a man breathing upon earth, not the shadowlike tenuousness and impassibility of the dead in Sheol. As to the way in which this transformation will be brought into effect, the present text does not allow the interpreter to say with any degree of probability. Likewise the text is silent upon the result of the encounter between Job and God, but its certain expectation is there. It shines like a beacon light over the tumult.

27. The prospect of meeting the Deity is so portentous, and at the same time so stirring to the imagination of the hero, that he feels compelled to repeat his conviction (vs. 27ab); and he cannot repress a lyrical outcry of his impatience (vs. 27c). The translation Whom I shall see on my side (RSV, after Duhm, Budde, Driver and Gray, Kissane, et al.) is most unnatural. Such a rendering of the preposition and pronoun ָֽי, for myself, cannot be supported from texts like Gen. 31:42; Pss. 46:2; 56:10; 118:7; 124:2, where the preposition is constructed either with the verb “to be” or with a predicate which presupposes the verbal copula. It also disregards the Masoretic accentuation (מַגַּפֶּה and דגָּשֶׁה forte conjunctivum). The correct rendering is the traditional one, Whom I shall see for myself (KJV, RSV mg.), which recognizes in the word ָֽי a variation of the dativus ethicus, well known in biblical Hebrew (see not only the many examples with the imperative, but also the close parallels of Isa. 36:9; Gen. 21:16; 22:5; Exod. 18:27; Ezek. 37:11; Hos. 8:9; Pss. 120:7; 123:5; Job 6:19; 12:11; 13:1). Job says literally, linking vs. 27a to 26b, “Whom I, even I, shall see for myself.” Indeed, Job insists, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another (vs. 27b). He is overwhelmed by the utter novelty (should one say “modernism”) of his conviction. As if he needed to reassure himself while new doubts harass him, or perhaps because he perceives the bewildered incredulity of his listeners, Job insists that the man who will see God will not be “a stranger” (זָר), some dead being “estranged” from himself and not identical with his present personality—a mere shade of his present self—but on the contrary, the very same individual who is now passing through the travails of theological parturition. Such an insistence would be superfluous, and indeed incomprehensible, were the hero thinking of an earthly nearer the great high priest, touched with the feeling of our infirmities (Heb. 4:15-16). A “Yes” is beginning to thrust its way through the “No.” Reconciliation, when it comes, will spring from the very heart of that contradiction. It is not by the intellect that man wins through—though he may never leave what intellect he has at home. It is the heart’s logic that wins, and the heart has its own, always its own. Nothing else can ever find the jewel at the bottom of the cup of suffering (see Expos. on 6:8-13). Nothing else will ever bring a man home trembling but trusting into his Father’s arms.

27. Whom I Shall See for Myself.—We are out of the realm of theory now into the realm of persons; and the amazement of it is a shudder in the soul. Here, says Strahan, “is the everlasting individualism of faith.” * Job will not be satisfied “with this or that attribute [of God]—wisdom, justice, or even love—[only] with a beatific vision in which all attributes are forgotten.” * For one fleeting instant death seems no longer the end: God is the end, as he was and is the beginning, and man’s fulfillment to

* Job, p. 178.
* Ibid., p. 176.
28 But ye should say, Why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in me?

28 If you say, 'How will we pursue him!' and, 'The root of the matter is found in him'; and ante-mortem experience. His anticipation can hardly be contained: Though my reins be consumed within me (vs. 27c). According to the metaphorical use of the bodily organs which was common among the ancient Semites, the reins designate the most vital and intense part of the body, the seat of vigor, desire, and longing. While the verb means "to come to completion" or "to an end," and therefore may designate exhaustion and wasting away (7.8; 33:21; Ps. 73:26; etc.), it also means "to pine," "to languish with uncontrollable desire" (11:20; 17:5; cf. Jer. 14:6; Pss. 69:3, 119:82, 129; etc.). The word translated within me means, lit., "in my bosom" (see Akkadian $higu$, "embrace"), and is usually applied to females (Gen. 16:5; Ruth 4:16; II Sam. 12:3; etc.). Chiefly for this reason some critics wish to correct the Masoretic vocalization of $kâlô$ $kîlyôthay$ $behêqi$ into $kâlô$ $kullêthi$ $bhehuqqi$, and thus translate, "I am utterly exhausted in my appointed time," a suggestion which neither fits common Hebrew usage nor yields clarity of meaning. In fact, Job uses elsewhere (23:12) the word $hêq$ as an apparent synonym of $qârebh$, "inward being" (cf. I Kings 22.35; Eccl. 7:9). There is no compelling argument against the present form of the M.T. or against the authenticity of the line.

28-29. The strophe ends with a sudden outburst: a threat, presumably directed against the listeners, and anticipating their challenge. If the friends persist in persecuting Job (vs. 28a; cf. vs. 22), finding in the words he has just used a further pretext for their condemnation of him (vs. 28b), they should "truly be in dread of the sword" (vs. 29a), i.e., of the wrath [which] brings the punishment of the sword (vs. 29b). The text reads, lit., "because (the) iniquities of (the) sword (are) wrath." The use of the word sword in both vs. 29a and vs. 29b is not likely to be original, for the poet does not have the stylistic habit of identical repetition. Although commentators have proposed rendering עונת ת rekl "inquities worthy of the sword" (cf. the similarly obscure and doubtful expression in 31:11, 28, עונת קְלִ֣יָה, "inquities of [for?] judges"; see Exeg. ad loc.), the text of vs. 29b is highly uncertain. The end of the threat is equally difficult, that you may know there is a judgment (vs. 29c), even if one were to assume with some of the "enjoy him forever." Nothing is any longer possible but the theophany (38:1–42:6).

You say that I am dust.
Yet through my mind
Wild, unborn lightnings leap;
On my soul rolls vast, remembered music, like the spheres;
Deep in my pulses beats
The throb of coming sorrows,
Excess of joys long dead;
And on my ears
The tread of ghostly memories,
Frail wisps of hope that whisper as they pass,
The stealthy breathing of a fear.
I am more akin to thee
Than to the dust,
Thou God of all the past—
And this one swift hour
Which spans thy great forever! 8

28. The Root of the Matter.—The whole approach of the friends is increasingly anthropo-

8 Paul Scherer, "Dust and Divinity." Authorship acknowledged by request. Editors.

polological, verging off toward a kind of depersonalized automatism (see Expos. on 18:2-4): Job's is increasingly theological; he understands more profoundly than they do that the ultimate issue is God (see Expos. on 19:6). The former view tends to lower the level of human responsibility (22 2-3), even as it more successfully avoids the great, simple, primal human questions: the "answers" are to be sought on the horizontal strata of existence. The latter, while it involves itself in questions that have no "answers," lifts that threshold to its very highest (ch. 81). In its quest for the root of the matter the one inevitably becomes self-righteous and censorious; the other may break out into blasphemy, but its face is Godward. Churches have spires that point to heaven; but so do the world's riddles and its sin.

28-29. The Character of Job.—(See Exeg.) It is necessary at all times to remember that at no time is Job's mind normal. We should not expect it to be. Nobody in such a state should be asked to deal with that state calmly and objectively. It is not the hour either for logic or for 29 Be ye afraid of the sword: for wrath bringeth the punishments of the sword, that ye may know there is a judgment.

Then answered Zophar the Naamathite, and said, ancient versions that the Kethibh יָשָׁה should be read sheddin (although LXXA probably read יָשָׁה, "the Almighty"). The word יָשָׁה, judgment, is not found elsewhere in the poetic discussion, but it is a favorite of Elihu (35.14; 36:17; cf. 36.31); and this fact raises suspicion against the genuineness of the passage or against fidelity of its preservation. Nevertheless the general meaning is fairly clear.

Some interpreters find it hard to conceive that Job, "immediately after swooning at the anticipation of seeing God" (Strahan, Job, p. 178), should address his opponents with such vindictiveness. The fact is that Job in the poetic discussion is now neither the saint of the prologue nor yet the humbled creature of the epilogue who intercedes for his friends (42:8). Moreover, no one should expect that the hope of seeing God face to face would make Job an evangelical Christian (cf. Matt. 5:8)! In vss. 25-27 he desired to encounter the Deity in order to be able at last to defend his innocence and honor. This prospect filled him with an intense emotion, but its recital did not transform the antagonism of his friends into benevolent admiration. On the contrary, it may be presumed that the three wise men were more deeply shocked than ever before at the extravagance of Job's claims, and that possibly they threatened him with hostile gestures. If so, far from having "himself the heart of a persecutor," Job was replying to a threat by outspoken menaces. Such an attitude may or may not deserve to be called "theologically unsatisfying"; but it is psychologically true to the character of the hero (cf. 13:6-11).

5. SECOND DISCOURSE OF ZOPHAR (20:1-29)

Like Eliphaz and Bildad in the second cycle (chs. 15; 18), Zophar develops only one theme: the doom of the evil man may be delayed but it is inevitable. Much of what explanations. The explanation that one has brought it all on oneself (vs. 28b) is singularly inept. The preacher on occasion gives himself over to an analysis of the present situation. He diagnoses it up and down. The inevitable conclusion is that it is no less and no other than we deserve. But repentance is not always the upshot. Repentance comes not of understanding but of love—which last is now and then only part three of the sermon, and often the weakest part. Job is either at fever heat or lost in hopeless brooding. There is tumult in his words, as there is in his mind. Exaggeration, wrestlings unspeakable. His soul is a battleground, torn asunder by inward antagonisms, faith and hope, resentment and despair. And while the whole he is harassed by the thought of his own basic integrity, the one good which for him is worse than the good of a guilty conscience; yet the very throbs of his anguish become the birth pangs of truth. Through loneliness and bitterness he falls away into a sense of utter helplessness and injustice; then the flash of an appeal to God, with the hope that will not loosen its hold, and the fear that never allows any hope to be hope. There is no thought of renouncing God because of the loss he has suffered or the disease he has; he comes near renouncing God because God seems immoral. Like a Titan he hurls his challenge, then leaps after it with his heart in his mouth. He broods over God's cruelty, hates and loves, trembles and gibes, hides in the citadel of his own weakness and flings from it his taunts, only to be brought at last out of the maelstrom of that mad contradiction into the terror and the stillness of an eternal presence, where all his questions die stillborn. Perhaps to speak of his character is beside the point; one should rather speak of the tempest that rages in his soul, dying away, when its force is spent, into a peace that is not of this world (see Expos. pp. 905-7; also on 1:1, 20:22; 2:7-10; 8:20-21, 24; 6:8-13).

20:1-29. The Speech of Zophar.—You goad me into speaking (vs. 2a). I can wait no longer (vs. 2b), what with your insults, and the under-Therefore do my thoughts cause me to answer, and for this I make haste.

I have heard the check of my reproach, and the spirit of my understanding causest me to answer.

"Therefore my thoughts answer me, because of my haste within me.

I hear censure which insulst me, and out of my understanding a spirit answers me.

he says is true and forcefly expressed, but none of his views is relevant to the situation at hand. The issues raised by Job are ignored. Yet the moving appeal of the hero to the pity of his friends (19:21) may have made a dent in Zophar’s magnificent impassiveness. The opening words of this discourse indicate an element of anxiety which had not heretofore been detectable in the dogmatic assurance of any of the three wise men.

a) Expulsion of Anxious Thoughts (20.1-8)

20:2-3. The word therefore, is unexpected at the beginning of a discourse, for it usually refers to the words which precede. If the text has been correctly preserved, Zophar is at last breaking a silence which he has maintained with utmost difficulty. He is introducing his remarks in a direct repercussion to Job’s shocking statements. He confesses that he has entertained “disquieting thoughts” which easily might have led him standing I have of the whole thing (vs. 3). From the very beginning the triumph of the wicked has been only for a moment, and everybody knows it. A dunghill for his pride (vs. 6-7) ! He is gone like a dream (vs 8), vanished from sight (vs 9), only his children left to make what amends they can (vs. 10), while the vigor of his youth lies down with him like a bride in his death (vs. 11). He smacks his lips at the taste of his own wickedness, rolls it about surreptitiously under his tongue; and it turns to gall in his stomach (vs. 12-14). The wealth he has gorged God makes him to vomit up—all of it poison, and it kills him (vss. 15-16). No milk and honey in his books; never in his wills! He enjoys the fruit of his toil (vss. 17-18; cf. 15:31). The way he has treated the poor, the insatiable greed of his mouth—everything comes home to roost (vss. 19-22). God gives him his belly . . . full (vs. 23). When he tries to get away, strike him dead (vss. 24-25). Fire from heaven, vengeance from earth (vss. 26-28), he has it coming. And as you say—it comes from God (vs. 29).

1-29. Ignoring the Issue.—Whether or not vss. 1-11, as Kissane holds, are the rebuke of the spirit which Zophar, a bit shaken by what he has heard, claims for a mentor, while vss. 12-29 constitute his own interpretation of its chiding, makes little difference. There can be no doubt that the speech as a whole is inconsequential, and therefore irrelevant and immaterial. Zophar has been unable to make heads or tails out of Job’s reply to Bildad. If the words with which he launches out into his present effort mean anything at all, they mean that his mind is disturbed, and he hardly knows where to lay hold of the argument (see Exeg.). He cannot fit into his ready-made scheme of things such undisciplined imaginings, or what would come of them if they were true. So he puts together his jigsaw puzzle with the pieces that make sense to him—the kind of sense he can labor with all his might—and pays no attention to the others, simply lays them over to one side. The trouble is that the other pieces are the key pieces: his bewildered friend’s innocence, the obvious inequities of human existence, and the incredible madness toward which the tortured soul of Job is being driven (19:25; refer to 16:18, 19, and note Zophar’s reference in vs. 27).

Manifestly, the technique is ready at hand for all comparable situations. Dismiss what you cannot manage, turning a deaf ear to the very heart of the matter if you cannot still its beating. Then fight back with all the vehemence you can muster. Do it as fiercely, if need be even as coarsely (vss. 7a, 15), as you can. Elihaz, who is himself not undisturbed (see Expos. on 15:7-16), and Bildad both find it difficult to improve on Zophar at that point. Answer insult with insult. Bite like a mad dog every chance you get. As Strahan suggests,* there is indeed such a thing as “dogmatic rabies,” and Zophar’s speech is a vivid instance of it. In no case confront the God that is That way lies humility. Fashion him in your own image. Never re-examine a premise. How can you possibly be wrong? And never widen a view to make room for troublesome exceptions. What quails you may have had “shall melt with fervent heat” (II Pet. 3:10).

2-5. Haste Lays Waste.—(See Expos. on 8: 1-7.) Job is never in any great anxiety to defend himself. He is dealing with vaster issues (see Expos. on 23:2). Not so the friends. They have

* Job, p. 181.
4 Knowest thou not this of old, since man was placed upon earth, to skepticism. The word 'משׁת, my thoughts, refers to anxious reflections which prompt a man to waver in his convictions, to suspend his judgment, and to hesitate at a theological crossroad (cf. I Kings 18:21; Ps. 119:113; cf. also Job 4:13; Pss. 94:19; 139:23). Etymologically, the word suggests a branching out in two directions, a cleavage between conflicting considerations, and in some cases a double-mindedness which verges upon a dichotomy between intellectual and moral activities. Zophar implies that Job's latest discourse, with its amazing hope against hope, has penetrated deeply into his own being and has slightly unsettled his position. "Therefore my disturbing thoughts are causing me to a retort, on account of the agitation which is within me" (vs. 2). Quickly controlling his incipient doubts, he rejects them swiftly by adding, I have heard the check of my reproach, and the spirit of my understanding causeth me to answer. However, the LXX appears to have read, instead of the difficult ḫוּר מַסְכַּת, "and a spirit from my understanding," the words ṭוּר מַם מָעֵן, which offer a good parallel to the preceding line and may be translated, "and a wind without intelligence." It is worth nothing that Bildad and Eliphaz have begun some of their attacks by comparing Job's eloquence to an empty wind (8:2; 15:2). Zophar offers the spectacle of a dogmatic believer who dismisses disturbing thoughts as soon as they hit the well-ordered citadel of his mind. The insulting tone he adopts against the sufferer itself indicates his own insecurity.

b) EVANESCENCE OF GODLESS JOY (20:4-29)

After a brief introduction (vss. 2-3), Zophar proceeds to reaffirm the familiar belief in individual retribution (vss. 4-29). The body of this speech cannot be divided into a sequence of strophes: it is a tirade fifty-seven lines long.

4-10. Is not Job in possession of the common knowledge of mankind, according to which the triumph of the wicked is short lived? Even if the apostate (חננֶל; cf. 8:13; 19,29) no time to waste, but much ground to lose. When you insinuate a doubt into the mind of a fanatic, prick the arrogant assurance with which he has been accustomed to "view the landscape o'er," he may well deliver himself into camp, bag and baggage. In his headlong rush he is likely to expose both flank and center, only to take his stand at last so far out of touch with reality that the very possibility of retreat is cut off. Zophar, with the haste born of wounded vanity (vs. 3a?) and conscious insecurity, plunges ahead of the front line of defense and renders the whole position which the friends have taken in the second cycle utterly untenable. He bitterly resents what Job has said about them (12:2; 17.4), and the scorn with which the culprit has been responding to the pious sweat of their brow (16:2; 19.2). The warnings in 13:10; 19.29 have not added to his composure. In a spirit that can scarcely be called a spirit of understanding (vs. 5b), he mistakes his hurt pride for righteous indignation—the two are easily confused—and limns out against the sky a God who is little more than Zophar in a hurry, hardly able to wait until Saturday night in order to settle accounts: it is not altogether clear whose accounts—Zophar's or God's.

Breathlessly he pulls up, and stops short with a jerk: the joy of the godless [is] but for a moment (vs. 5). Nothing could be more vulnerable (see Expos. on 4:8; 12-26). Job lays hold of it with both hands and makes rubble out of everything all three of them have said (ch. 21).

The tempo in Ps. 37.2, 10, 35-36 is very much the same, while Ps. 73 moves with considerably more deliberation, meditating in the sanctuary on the end of the wicked (vs. 17). Strahan aptly points the difference, and enriches the reference with his comment: "The great discoverers in nature and grace alike have brooded and experimented long before they have dogmatized. Had Zophar taken time to observe and reflect, he would have said, 'Some sufferers are saints'; had he taken still more time, he might even have added, 'and some are saviours.'" 7 It was the patience that wrought the transformation in Job (see Expos. on 3:24): "In quietness and in confidence . . . strength" (Isa. 50:15). "Let patience have her perfect work" (Jas. 1:4).

4-11. The Joy of the Godless.—At least Zophar understands the wicked well enough to know that they get a kind of pleasure out of their wickedness. His point is that the pleasure
JOB

5 That the triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment?

6 Though his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the clouds;
7 Yet he shall perish for ever like his own dung: they which have seen him shall say, Where is he?
8 He shall fly away as a dream, and shall not be found: yea, he shall be chased away as a vision of the night.
9 The eye also which saw him shall see him no more; neither shall his place any more behold him.
10 His children shall seek to please the poor, and his hands shall restore their goods.
11 His bones are full of the sin of his youth, which shall lie down with him in the dust.
12 Though wickedness be sweet in his mouth, though he hide it under his tongue; etc.) seems to be happy, he enjoys life but for a moment (vss. 4-5). Although he may grow proudly like a tree which touches heaven (vs. 6), he shall perish for ever like his own dung (vs. 7a) and be seen no more (vss. 7b-9). His sons will have to pay an indemnity or give a compensation to his victims (vs. 10a, cf. the meaning of the verb נWebHost, not to be confused with ויWebHost; Lev. 26: 34, 41, 43), and their hands (reading חWebHost for ויWebHost, his hands) will be compelled to restore his wealth to its rightful owner (vs. 10b).

11-16. The lustful vigor of youth may now fill his frame, but it [lit., “she”] will lie down with him like a lover, not on a couch of delight but in the dust of the grave (vs. 11).

5 that the exulting of the wicked is short, and the joy of the godless but for a moment?

6 Though his height mount up to the heavens, and his head reach to the clouds, 7 he will perish for ever like his own dung; those who have seen him will say, ‘Where is he?’
8 He will fly away like a dream, and not be found;
he will be chased away like a vision of the night.
9 The eye which saw him will see him no more, nor will his place any more behold him.
10 His children will seek the favor of the poor, and his hands will give back his wealth.
11 His bones are full of youthful vigor, but it will lie down with him in the dust.
12 “Though wickedness is sweet in his mouth, though he hides it under his tongue, make for failure. But Zophar, with a good idea, falls a prey to it, lets it carry him away. The dilemma of the wicked is not as inevitable as he pictures it. The denouement does not always come about so promptly. Indeed, it does not always come about! Dramatically he puts it: magnificence on a rubbish heap—it could have been said that politely if he had wanted to—a dream that vanishes, an empty place (cf. 7:8-10; 8:18), beggared children (?)—finished! The godless, where is he? A rhetorical question that may have been taken from Job’s own mouth (14:10); but so desperately twisted now that Job has no difficulty supplying the answer (21: 17-18).

12-16. Bittersweet.—(See Exeg. on vss. 17-29; Expos. on vss. 4-11.) Zophar is of half a mind that “to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season” (Heb. 11:25) is no enjoyment at all: the 13 Though he spare it, and forsake it not, but keep it still within his mouth;
14 Yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him.
15 He hath swallowed down riches, and he shall vomit them up again: God shall cast them out of his belly.
16 He shall suck the poison of asps: the viper's tongue shall slay him.
17 He shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter.
18 That which he labored for shall he restore, and shall not swallow it down: according to his substance shall the restitution be, and he shall not rejoice therein.
19 Because he hath oppressed and hath forsaken the poor; because he hath violently taken away a house which he builded not;
20 Surely he shall not feel quietness in his belly, he shall not save of that which he desired.
21 There shall none of his meat be left; therefore shall no man look for his goods.

"Though evil taste sweet in his mouth" (vs. 12a) and be well savored (vss. 12b-13), it will turn sour within him (vs. 14), and he will have to disgorge the riches he has gulped (vs. 15). "The figure of God administering the emetic is coarse and powerful" (Peake, Job, p. 199), and it helps Zophar to stress the conviction that ethics cannot long be flouted even under the cover of aesthetics.

17-29. The images are not altogether consistent (contrast, for example, vs. 15 with vs. 18), and the rhetorical developments suggest that Zophar is wavering ambiguously in the face of ultimate uncertainty." * The author of Job was acutely aware of the "ultimate uncertainty." What begins as "mystery with meaning," in the phrase of Reinhold Niebuhr, ends for him as "meaning with mystery." * Zophar is allowed to speak truth; but his truth, oversimplified and misapplied, becomes untruth.

17-18. The Future that Never Comes.—Here is a man looking forward to a comfortable old age. He is laying up against the time of his retirement. But while he lives in the future, the end of all his dreams comes in the present. The lumber he is using keeps the building from completion.

18. The Fruit of His Toil.—(Cl. 5:5; Expos. on 15:17-85.) He has to give it back without *b Cl. Discerning the Signs of the Times, pp. 152-73.

22 In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits: every hand of the wicked shall come upon him.

23 When he is about to fill his belly, God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him, and shall rain it upon him while he is eating.

24 He shall flee from the iron weapon, and the bow of steel shall strike him through.

25 It is drawn, and cometh out of the body; yea, the glittering sword cometh out of his gall: terrors are upon him.

26 All darkness shall be hid in his secret places: a fire not blown shall consume him; it shall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle.

27 The heaven shall reveal his iniquity; and the earth shall rise up against him.

22 In the fulness of his sufficiency he will be in straits; all the force of misery will come upon him.

23 To fill his belly to the full God will send his fierce anger into him, and rain it upon him as his food.

24 He will flee from an iron weapon; a bronze arrow will strike him through.

25 It is drawn forth and comes out of his body, the glittering sword comes out of his gall; terrors come upon him.

26 Utter darkness is laid up for his treasures; a fire not blown upon will devour him; what is left in his tent will be consumed.

27 The heavens will reveal his iniquity, and the earth will rise up against him.

* Heb he

° Cn: Heb in his flesh

between an insistence upon the brevity of a pleasure which has been wrongfully obtained (vss. 17, 21b) and the awareness of the fact that hedonism does not truly satisfy (vss. 20, 22). In any case, the ultimate destiny of the evil man is certain. God will indeed fill his belly to the full (vs. 23a) and rain upon him the arrows of his wrath (vss. 23b-25a). Then the “terrors of death” (‘ēmēm) will suddenly come over him (vs. 25b; cf. 9:34; 13:21), and with the threefold image of utter darkness (vs. 26a), fire (vs. 26bc), and flood (vs. 28 KJV), the finality of his fate is proclaimed as the heritage decreed for him by God (vs. 29).

In accord with the poet’s technique of delayed reaction, Zophar replies not to Job’s latest speech (ch. 19), which he ignores completely, but to a statement in Job’s preceding discourse. There the hero had been bold enough to address the earth as an ally (16:18) and to declare that his witness was in heaven (16:19). Zophar makes the retort that the most vicious. Follow through the dictionary these synonyms: satiate, sate, surfeit, cloy, glut, gorge.

23. God Require Him!—If this is not an imprecation in form, as the RSV would indicate it to be, it certainly is in substance. Zophar’s prayer is his “soul’s sincere desire.” Strahan notes the “indecent enthusiasm” of the whole speech. The vehemence is revelatory. Zophar worships a wish (contrast Luke 15; 19:9).

24-25. The Target of Wrath.—(See Expos. on 6:4; 16:13.) Death hounds the man’s very efforts to escape. He avoids the spear and is struck through with an arrow; he draws it forth, thinking it will be better so—and in a moment the terrors of death are upon him. Job is permitted, not to say compelled, to draw his own conclusions.

28 The increase of his house shall depart, and his goods shall flow away in the day of his wrath.
29 This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God.

21 But Job answered and said,
2 Hear diligently my speech, and let this be your consolations.

heaven shall reveal his iniquity; and the earth shall rise up against him (vs. 27). Thus in the midst of his peroration, the third friend unmistakably links his obstinate interlocutor with the godless or profane man whose doom he has just depicted. As if anticipating a charge of irrelevant didacticism, the speaker subtly intimates that his portrait fits the case now at hand in a double way: Let Job take warning and discover his guilty self! Let him also recognize that this universe (as well as the life of the individual) is governed by the decisions of a righteous Deity!

6. SECOND REPLY OF JOB TO ZOPHAR (21:1-34)

While the poet depicts Zophar and the friends generally as developing their theme in an amorphous, almost haphazard way, Job is usually shown as a meticulous speaker who respects the conventions of poetical rhetoric, formulates his arguments according to a plan, and develops them within a rather strict strophic structure: (a) aroused by Zophar's either willful or irresponsible distortion of the facts of experience, Job prepares himself to reply and his friends to listen (vss. 2-6); (b) what he has to say stands in direct contradiction to the pious affirmations which have again been rehearsed: against the stultified dogma of retribution he observes the prosperity and apparent impunity of evil men (vss. 7-15); (c) such a glaring display of divine injustice is not made acceptable, nor is it righted, by the subsidiary belief in the children's solidarity with the guilt of their fathers (vss. 14-21); (d) furthermore, death is the lot of both the just and the unjust (vss. 22-27); (e) even in death, however, the wicked obtain upon the earth the immortality of a fame which survives them and which they do not deserve (vss. 28-34).

(a) COURAGE OF HONESTY (21:1-6)

21:2-3. Job has opened one of his previous discourses by stating that his friends were "miserable comforters" (16:2), since they were rash or stupid enough to identify their own clumsy and self-righteous attempts with "the consolations of God" (15:11). He had been any wrong to be seen, the eyes of the wrongdoer would have been blinded with resentment. Nathan's method was completely disarming; David's conscience was given an unimpeded chance to condemn itself: then the thrust (see Expos. on 6:24-27). Zophar, with his own dogmatic ax to grind and no compassion for Job, listens at the threshold of his own spirit; Nathan, for love of David, and in the fear of God, has listened to another voice, both just and merciful.

21:1-34. THE ANSWER OF JOB.—Your "consolations of God" (15:11)! Listen to me. I will show you what they really are. Then, my good friend Zophar, you may mock on (vs. 3). My contro-3 Suffer me that I may speak; and after that I have spoken, mock on.
4 As for me, is my complaint to man?
and if it were so, why should not my spirit be troubled?
5 Mark me, and be astonished, and lay your hand upon your mouth.
6 Even when I remember I am afraid, and trembling taketh hold on my flesh.

now bids them, Hear diligently my speech, and let this be your consolations (vs. 2). According to the common interpretation of this verse, Job asks for the benevolent attention of his friends. Their silence would constitute the best kind of consolation they could offer. However, the pronoun נא, this, refers to מילה, my speech, rather than to the whole clause in vs. 2a. Thus it is better to understand that Job is here again speaking ironically, saying, "You offer me strange comfort when you tell me that the apostate always meets his fate, and that I am one! The words I am going to utter will show you the true nature of your consolations!" Bear with me for a while, and after I have spoken, mock on (vs. 3). The M.T. reads the last imperative in the singular, as if Job singled out one of his friends, probably Zophar. The LXX has the plural and the negative, "do not ye mock," and some critics correct the Hebrew text accordingly. Nevertheless the M.T. makes good sense and should be preserved (cf. 16:2-3).

4-6. As for me, is my complaint against man? (vs. 4a): Since Job has a quarrel with God, why should his friends be impatient with him? At least they might understand that he has the right to be angry (vs. 4b). However, what they have heard so far has been comparatively mild and harmless. Now let them brace themselves in anticipation of a thunder clap! (Note the image which lies behind the word astonished in vs. 5a.) They are going to be truly speechless at the intrepidity of his blasphemy (vs. 5b). He himself is already shuddering at the thought of his own recklessness (vs. 6).

versy is with God. Unlike you, I have a right to be impatient (vs. 4). Mark my word. Let the very sound of it stop your mouth. I tremble to think of it myself (vs. 5-6; so Kissane,* but see Exeg). What the three of you have said is simply not true. Everything is exactly the other way about. The wicked do not die as you would like to have them die. That much is obvious. They live and prosper. And I want to know why (vs. 7). They see their children settle down, their houses are safe, their cattle multitudinous, the air is filled with merrymaking and music. And at the end of their days (cf. 5:26) they die in peace (vss. 8-18). What matter that they have had nothing to do with God? They leave him out (vs. 16b) and still get what they want and hold on to it (vss. 14-16). The lamp of the wicked is put out? Does calamity wait at their side (18:5-12)? How often? How often does God destroy them (vs. 17c; make them suffer)? All of you have said it. How often are they "like the chaff which the wind driveth away" (Ps. 1:4; see 18:25)? No use telling me he visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children. Let him visit the iniquities of the fathers on the fathers! They are the ones that need to know. What earthly good is it after they are dead (vss. 19-21)? Your God who judges even the angels (15:15; see Exeg) needs to be told how it works out down here (vs. 22). I can inform him: happy or unhappy, wicked or not, all are alike in death (vss. 23-26). I get the point of your insinuations (vss. 27-28). But just ask anybody who has ever stepped outside his own front door (vs. 29): the wicked man gets off. The evidence is all around (vs. 29b). Who charges him with what he has done, or holds him to account (vss. 30-31)? When he dies, he is buried in pomp. His grave is "in perpetual care" (vs. 32). The earth lies softly upon him. He is a shining example for multitudes to follow (vs. 33). What comfort is there in that? Take the sum of what you have said and set my facts over against it. What is then left is nothing but sheer, malicious fraud.

5-6. Facing the Facts.—In both the first cycle and the second, when Zophar speaks Job seems to rouse himself, like a slumbering giant out of a nightmare, to the full use of his powers. Suddenly now it dawns on him what all of them have been trying to prove. They have been say-

*Job, p. 192.
b) IMPUNITY OF CRIMINALS (21:7-13)

7-13. Zophar has declared that the joy of the godless is soon vanished (20:5 ff.), but this declaration is contradicted by the observable facts. These are so eloquent that Job does not need to appeal to a knowledge common to the whole of mankind from the most distant antiquity. He takes for granted that his picture is obvious; indeed, nobody could miss it who takes the trouble to observe the human scene. Thus he does not need to state that the wicked live; he immediately accepts as evident this fact, and asks the reason why: Wherefore do the wicked live, become old, yea, are mighty in power? (vs. 7).

Where are those so-called misfortunes which, according to Zophar, soon wipe out the profane from their tents? Those sinners, far from being short lived, grow old happily, and their physical vigor is not abated but increased with their substance, wealth, influence, and authority. (Note the use of the verb gāḇḥar, "to be strong," from which is derived Job's favorite appellation for man and especially for himself, i.e., gēḇḥēr, "strong man," vīr, almost gīḇbōr, "hero," "man of valiance"; cf. "Gabriel," the name of the archangel who transmits God's power in the Jewish and Christian literature.) Such "he-men" live long enough to see their seed ... established with them in their presence, and their offspring before their eyes (vs. 8), and Job insists on this cardinal aspect of happiness, since what he misses more than wealth and health is his posterity. Who dares to speak of a divine justice when, in full view for all the world to see, such individuals and their houses are safe from fear, neither is the rod of God upon them (vs. 9)? Not only do they and their household prosper, but their own livestock appear to be unfailingly fertile (vs. 10), and the whole

7 Wherefore do the wicked live, become old, yea, are mighty in power?
8 Their seed is established in their sight with them, and their offspring before their eyes.
9 Their houses are safe from fear, neither is the rod of God upon them.

7 Why do the wicked live, reach old age, and grow mighty in power?
8 Their children are established in their presence, and their offspring before their eyes.
9 Their houses are safe from fear, and no rod of God is upon them.
10 Their bull gendereth, and faileth not; their cow calveth, and casteth not her calf.
11 They send forth their little ones like a flock, and their children dance.
12 They take the timbrel and harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ.
13 They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave.
14 Therefore they say unto God, Depart from us; for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways.
15 What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? and what profit should we have, if we pray unto him?

10 Their bull breeds without fail; their cow calves, and does not cast her calf.
11 They send forth their little ones like a flock, and their children dance.
12 They sing to the tambourine and the lyre, and rejoice to the sound of the pipe.
13 They spend their days in prosperity, and in peace they go down to Sheol.
14 They say to God, ‘Depart from us! We do not desire the knowledge of thy ways.
15 What is the Almighty, that we should serve him?
And what profit do we get if we pray to him?’

Community, especially the little ones (םֵיתָןָה, the mischievous, teasing, and attractive urchins), run around barefooted “like kids,” singing, dancing, and playing upon the tambourine, the lyre and the flute (vss. 11-12). In a few strokes Job sketches the traditional idyl of the patriarchal circle, where there is not only life and food in abundance, but also security; and therefore room for a gaiety and a careless freedom which some observers might call superfluous (cf. Zech. 8:5; Matt. 11:16-17). The whole passage, with its concrete charm and picturesque traits, reveals by contrast the inward pathos of the man who speaks it, a bereaved, destitute, isolated, and condemned individual. He does not lower himself to formulate his envy, his resentment, or his bitterness; but he forcefully clinches his argument by concluding that the wicked “live out their days in happiness and in peace” (cf. LXX, ἐν ἀπελευθέρωσει, confirming this special meaning of the word יַעַר in Jer. 6:16; cf. also Targ.); or “in an instant [i.e., without the crippling infirmities of old age and the slow disintegration of an incurable disease] they descend into the grave” (vs. 13).

c) Profitlessness of Prayer (21:14-18)

14-16. In these verses Job skillfully shows that the majestic monotheism of the friends, with its emphasis upon the dogma of individual retribution, is not essentially different from the practical atheism of the evil men who justify their willful ignorance of God by stating from experience that religion does not pay. Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar affirm that integrity always brings increase, and conversely that an ill-late is the punishment of irreligion. In so speaking they associate themselves with “the Satan” of the prologue who asked, “Doth Job fear God for nought?” (1:9). Wealthy and unscrupulous men who wallow in their ease may not actually say, Depart from us!

We do not desire the knowledge of thy ways.

by far too many exceptions, so many that they can scarcely be said to prove the rule (note the Exeg. for the sweep and power of the poet’s canvas). Obviously, therefore, we have to accept the corollary: that religion is about something deeper. Job is being driven to it, step by step (see Expos. on 16:13; 22:21-80). That something else may involve suffering—which is precisely what the Jews could not understand about Jesus. A good man on a cross? The Son of God there? It was blasphemy. And it must have troubled the saints. How could one reconcile the grin on the face of a lion in the arena with the smile on the face of God in heaven? It has been pointed out that a friendly and favoring universe would indeed abolish the problem, but somewhat after the manner in which death abolishes disease. Is it possible that God is still 16 Lo, their good is not in their hand: the counsel of the wicked is far from me.
17 How oft is the candle of the wicked put out! and how oft cometh their destruction upon them! God distributeth sorrows in his anger.
18 They are as stubble before the wind, and as chaff that the storm carrieth away.

16 Behold, is not their prosperity in their hand?
17 How often is it that the lamp of the wicked is put out?
18 That they are like straw before the wind, and like chaff that the storm carrieth away?

(Vs. 14; contrast Ps. 25:4, “Show me thy ways, O Lord.”) But their behavior testifies to such a mode of thinking. They have expelled godly concerns. They have observed the poverty, the oppression, the sufferings of the pious, and have concluded that religion is useless.

What is the Almighty, that we should serve him?
And what profit do we if we pray to him? (Vs. 15.)

By assigning these words to the prosperous, Job is indirectly making a devastating critique of the friends’ position. Bildad has twice described what he believes to be ineluctably the fate of those “who do not know God” or “who forget God” (18:21; 8:13). Job replies that on the contrary there are men who ignore the Deity and yet are prosperous. Do they receive their riches from God? Behold, is not their prosperity in their hand? (Vs. 16a, cf. Isa. 5:18-19; Ps. 73:3-12.) Their estate is not a demonstration of the dogma of divine justice. They are the authors and the masters of their prosperity. They possess their happiness (cf. 12:10). Zophar has maintained that the prosperity (גֶּבר) of the godless does not last (20:21). Job replies that their prosperity (גֶּבר) is held secure within their power. Following the LXX (ἐν θεῷ), one should probably read at the end of vs. 16b, ὑπέρθε, instead of ὑπέρ, and thus translate, “The counsel of the wicked is far from him” (i.e., God). Such a thought is more fitting to the context than the banal and irrelevant statement of the traditional versions: it admirably completes the sequence of Job’s reasoning. The evil men live far from God (vs. 14) since they do not need him (vs. 15). Their earthly successes are the product of their own achievement, and they have complete control over the enjoyment of their work. Their plans do not concern God and do not take him into account. They are the proprietors of their destiny. They work out their own salvation. They are saved by their own works. And God is silent.

17-18. To Bildad’s objection that “the light of the wicked shall be put out” (18:5), and that “calamity is ready for his stumbling” (18:12), Job objects that this is rarely so.

How often is it that the lamp of the wicked is put out?
That their calamity comes upon them?

(Vs. 17; cf. Prov. 13:9; 20:20; 24:20.) He implicitly concedes that such events seldom occur, but this fact cannot obscure the overwhelming and contrary observation of their 19 God layeth up his iniquity for his children: he rewardeth him, and he shall know it.

20 His eyes shall see his destruction, and he shall drink of the wrath of the Almighty.

21 For what pleasure hath he in his house after him, when the number of his months is cut off in the midst?

22 Shall any teach God knowledge? seeing he judgeth those that are high.

impunity. The “righteous” judge does not usually intervene. “How many times does he [God] destroy the wicked in his anger?” (Vs. 17c.) The word מַרְאֵם, usually rendered by pains or sorrows, refers to the pangs of labor in childbirth and is rather unexpected in this context. Dhorme suggests a cognate of the Akkadian habbihu, and understands the verb יְחֵלָלָה, ordinarily translated distributeth, in the light of the Akkadian idiom מַחַלְלָה, “one who destroys, who causes to perish.” It may not be an accident that vs. 18 is strongly reminiscent of Job’s description of his own fate in 13:25.

d) IMMORALITY OF HEREDITARY GuILT (21:19-27)

19-21. Undoubtedly the wise men in general and Job’s friends in particular may attempt to defend the thesis of divine justice in the government of the world by arguing that if the wicked die in peace, God stores up their iniquity for their sons (vs. 19a), but Job objects cogently to this line of reasoning by maintaining that such a view reveals a strange and wholly unsatisfying conception of divine morality. Let him [God] recompense it to themselves, that they may know it (vs. 19b). It is the guilty man himself who must know the wrath of the Almighty (vs. 20), for when he is dead he does not really care about the fate of his descendants (vs. 21; cf. 14:21; Jer. 31:29, 30; Ezek. 18).

22. It is difficult to relate satisfactorily this verse to its context. (a) Some critics believe that Job is satirically suggesting that the friends are guilty of a grave sin of presumption when they interpret God’s actions according to the requirements of their Procrustean dogma. Job may thus refer ironically to Zophar’s pious appeal to humble agnosticism (11:5 ff.) and to Eliphaz’ opinion on the imperfections of the heavenly beings (4:18; 15:15). Since no man can pretend to know divine motivations (cf. Isa. 45:14), why should the friends claim that they understand the meaning of Job’s situation? They cannot teach any lesson of God. (b) Other interpreters think that Job is here interrupting his own critique of the divine government of the world by asking whether he has indeed the right to proceed in developing this theme. (c) Still other commentators reject the verse as a marginal annotation representing the pious reaction of an early (vs. 15; see Exeg.). Dignus vindice nodus. It takes God to manage. Steadily we move toward the theophany (I John 4:19).

19. The Sins of the Fathers.— (See 5:4; 8:16-19; Expos. on 4:8; cf. Jer. 31:29-30; Ezek. 18.) The solidity of human existence is an empirical fact. Life channels both good and evil, the blessing and the curse man puts into it. Facts, however, may not be converted into dogmas in order to bolster the theory of retributive justice, and Job will not permit it. Thank God that the good is communicable! One would find it difficult to suppose, under the circumstances, that the evil is not. But this is a far cry from contending that God, in lieu of punishing the wicked, stores up the punishment for their children. The deepest moral intuitions of the human soul, which are the broken lights of God in us, cry out against that (see Expos. on 8:24). Though the innocent may suffer with the guilty, it is the guilty that need to know their guilt; if there is suffering to be
21:23  THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

23 One dieth in his full strength, being wholly at ease and quiet.
24 His breasts are full of milk, and his bones are moistened with marrow.
25 And another dieth in the bitterness of his soul, and never eateth with pleasure.
26 They shall lie down alike in the dust, and the worms shall cover them.
27 Behold, I know your thoughts, and the devices which ye wrongfully imagine against me.
28 For ye say, Where is the house of the prince? and where are the dwelling places of the wicked?

23 One dies in full prosperity, being wholly at ease and secure, 24 his body full of fat and the marrow of his bones moist.
25 Another dies in bitterness of soul, never having tasted of good.
26 They lie down alike in the dust, and the worms cover them.
27 "Behold, I know your thoughts, and your schemes to wrong me.
28 For you say, 'Where is the house of the prince?
Where is the tent in which the wicked dwelt?"

The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain

reader who thereby intended to condemn Job's attitude. (d) In all probability the hero is here speaking of himself in anticipation of the subsequent part of his discourse. He grants for a moment that God indeed judges even those that are on high, and a fortiori the human creatures who are upon the earth. In a tone not of anxious humility and doubt, but on the contrary of courageous defiance, he declares that God needs to be taught a lesson. He will reveal to him what actually happens in the world of men. God must be told. Job will offer him some knowledge. According to this exegesis, vs. 22 is an introduction to vs. 23-26.

23-26. Death comes indiscriminately to all men alike. One dieth in his full strength (vs. 23) with his vigor still intact (vs. 24); and another dieth in the bitterness of his soul, without ever having tasted happiness (vs. 25). The same mortal fate awaits them both (vs. 26). Here is the situation which apparently God willfully ignores. The fact of death reveals less the equality of all men than the injustice of their destiny, and consequently the irresponsibility of God.

e) Testimony of the Travelers (21:28-34)

28-34. If the friends object that the wicked disappear without leaving a trace (vss. 28-29), Job appeals to the observations of world-wide travelers (vs. 29). They all know that far from being spared (vs. 30) or even confronted with their deeds (vs. 31), notorious done, they of all others need to suffer. And they do not. So Job says. One can almost feel the problem projecting itself beyond this life into another (see Expos on 10:8-12). The doctrine of a final judgment has to do not alone with the preservation of moral values; it has to do with the being and nature of God. Writes P. T. Forsyth:

Truly we cannot exaggerate the love of God, if we will take pains to first understand it. But we have been taught to believe only in a beneficent and not in a sovereign God, in a tender God in no sense judge, in an attractive God, more kindly than holy, more lovely than good—the God of the children, or of the evangelist, or of the honourable, successful man with the delightful home, the agreeable circle, and the generous hand—a God whose purpose of love became incredible unless it was pursued by winsome ways, and published in fine and tender discourse.

. . . Such a habit of mind, now that the lid is off hell, is suddenly struck from us only perch, feels taken in, and asks if such a world as we see can be the means to a loving end, if it could ever be made to contribute to a Divine Kingdom . . . .

I shall venture to suggest that a call has come to the Church to . . . show some deeper sense of the real moral problem—the problem within God, the problem of judgment as atonement . . . . to rise above its cowardly dread of depth . . . ; to win from God's answer in Christ at least some profounder sense of the world problem and some higher sense of the one and eternal morality.

26. All Alike to All?—In an unpublished sermon, George A. Buttrick—his text Eccl. 9:2, his subject "Good and Bad Alike?"—points out that there are areas in life where things are

22:1

29 Have ye not asked them that go by the way? and do ye not know their tokens, 30 That the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction? they shall be brought forth to the day of wrath.
31 Who shall declare his way to his face? and who shall repay him what he hath done?
32 Yet shall he be brought to the grave, and shall remain in the tomb.
33 The clods of the valley shall be sweet unto him, and every man shall draw after him, as there are innumerable before him.
34 How then comfort ye me in vain, seeing in your answers there remaineth falsehood?

22 Then Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said,

22 Then Eliphaz the Temanite answered:

criminals receive honorable funerals (vss. 32-33). Observe the Hebrew equivalent (vs. 33a) to the Latin phrase, Sit tibi terra levis! Job concludes that his remarks are based upon a generally accepted truth, and that consequently the opinions of his friends are vain and cannot comfort him. There is nothing left in their replies but deceit (rather than falsehood, vs. 34; cf. vs. 2).

D. THIRD CYCLE OF DISCUSSION (22:1-27:23)

1. THIRD DISCOURSE OF ELIPHAZ (22.1-30)

While Job began the discussion with the curse upon his life (ch. 3) and seems to have regained throughout the first two cycles a certain degree of emotional equilibrium,
2 Can a man be profitable unto God, as he that is wise may be profitable unto himself?

Surely he who is wise is profitable to himself.

Eliphaz and his two colleagues, on the contrary, who had started in a comparatively cool and composed manner, appear to have lost in the second and especially in the third round of the rhetorical exchanges all sense of courtesy. Thus they dispense altogether with customary formulas of introduction. Eliphaz plunges into his third discourse with intertemperate abruptness (vss. 2-5), and he gives substance to his new accusations with plain lies (vss. 6-10). Yet he not only hopes that Job will not follow the ancient road (vss. 11-20), but even invites him to make his peace with God and to be saved (vs. 21-30).

a) GOD DOES NOT NEED MAN (22:1-5)

22:2. Eliphaz fails to reply to the main arguments presented by Job in ch. 21, but he should not be accused of ignoring them deliberately, since the scandalous illustrations of injustice which the hero has cited present no problem to a dogmatist for whom prosperity is only an appearance whenever it adorns a godless man. Eliphaz, however, singles out one strain in his opponent’s defense which outrages his own conception of the divine majesty. Job has not only said (21:22) that God needs to be told by man of the injustice of the human situation, but he has also implied all along that God owes him—an innocent man—justice and vindication. Eliphaz therefore begins the third cycle of discourses with a lofty description of God’s transcendence. He maintains that the Deity dwells beyond the reaches of man’s activity, and that the divine calmness is not affected by the ripples of human frenzy. Can a man be profitable to God? (Vs. 2a.) Can a gebher, the most vigorous specimen of manhood, be useful to God? Can even a thinking and reasonable, learned human being—professional in wisdom, who deserves considerably more respect than a gebher—be of any service to the Almighty? Eliphaz hastily brushes aside such a ludicrous possibility. He is too much a theologian of transcendence to entertain even fleetingly the idea of God’s dependence upon man. Surely he who is wise is profitable [only] to himself (vs. 2b). Three ideas are here implied. (a) There is no possibility for man, a limited creature, to infringe upon the absolute freedom of God. Job’s attacks against the way in which the world of men is governed amount to a practical denial of man’s finitude and of God’s infinity. (b) Man is wrong if he declares that God

25), except for anybody who may have had to listen to it. Job is represented as contradicting himself outright, notably in 24:18-24; 27:7-23, and Zophar does not come forward at all. A tentative reordering of the material is suggested in the Intro. (p. 888), and will be followed in the Expos. Consult the summaries of the individual discourses.

22:1-30. Eliphaz.—The God of heaven and earth is scarcely to be thought of as deriving any benefit from man’s righteousness, or for that matter as suffering any harm from his wickedness. He has no stake in any of it. Why should he be anything but impartial? The “root of the matter” (19:28) is not in him but in you: not his inequity, but your inequity (vss. 2-4). You have been exacting (vs. 6) and without compasion (vs. 7), tyrannous (vs. 8; see Exeg.; the man with power may be Job himself) and cruel (vs. 9). No wonder calamity has overtaken you (vss. 10-11; cf. 18:8-11). I know what happened: You said in your heart that God is far, far off, and knows nothing. The wicked have always thought that, and brought on themselves fire and flood (vss. 16, 20). Your recipe is “Leave God out if you want to make a go of it” (vss. 17-18; cf. 21:14-16; Kissane considers vss. 8, 12-14, and 18 as quotations from Job; yet see Exeg.). The kind of “go” that causes decent people to applaud and break into song (vss. 19-20; cf. Expos. on vss. 12-20). Do as we say, take warning from what has happened to you, and you can still get free of all this (vss. 21-22). Have humility enough to repent; love God, not gold, and all will be well (vss. 23-26). Your prayers will be answered, you will be under the glad necessity of redeeming your wrong to the Almighty, and everything you do will prosper (vss. 27-28), thanks to clean hands and a pure heart (vss. 29-30).

2.5. The Immutable God.—The God of Eliphaz (see Expos. on 4:20b) is so high and lifted up that he is quite out of reach. He walks in no garden in the cool of the day, calling.
3 Is it any pleasure to the Almighty, that thou art righteous? or is it gain to him, that thou makest thy ways perfect?
4 Will he reprove thee for fear of thee? will he enter with thee into judgment?
5 Is not thy wickedness great? and thine iniquities infinite?

Is it any pleasure to the Almighty if you are righteous, or is it gain to him if you make your ways blameless?
4 Is it for your fear of him that he reproves you, and enters into judgment with you?
5 Is not your wickedness great? There is no end to your iniquities.

is responsible for the punishment of the innocent or the reward of the evildoers, since God derives no advantage or profit from man's behavior. (c) Man is equally wrong if he believes that his religion is useless. A wise attitude toward life is profitable. "If thou art wise, it is for thyself that thou art wise!" (Prov. 9:12.) Consequently, whenever man finds life unrewarding, he must not accuse God but look within him to recover the reason for his profitless destiny. Thus Eliphaz is stressing the gulf which separates man from God in order to achieve two goals at once: he wishes to undermine Job's worldly skepticism as it is revealed by the preceding discourse and to convince Job of sin-consciousness. By these words, however, he merely proclaims again his belief in the self-interestedness of religion, and thus unwittingly ranges himself with "the Satan" of the prologue (1:9).

3-5. In the next verses Eliphaz continues to court both truth and error at the same time (cf. Exeg. on 4:18-21). He appears to exalt the majesty of God when he asks, Is it any pleasure to the Almighty, that thou art righteous? or is it gain to him, that thou makest thy ways perfect? In effect, Eliphaz proposes a concept of the Deity which is utterly foreign to Hebraism and may represent an ancestral formulation of Islamic theism and philosophical deism. The idea of an impassive Deity is contradicted by the whole Bible with the exception of Ecclesiastes. To say that God does not find pleasure or gain in man's struggle toward perfection is a half-truth which turns into a flagrant error unless one remembers at the same time the testimony of the prophet, "As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee" (Isa. 62:5) and the words of Jesus, "Joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth" (Luke 15:7). The acknowledgment that men are useless and unprofitable servants (Luke 17:10) does not entail the belief that God is eternally unconcerned and immutable. Moreover, Eliphaz contradicts himself when he proceeds from his high-sounding declaration on the self-sufficiency of God (which is aimed at invalidating Job's charge that God is unjust in his dealing with men) to ask ironically, "Is it on account of thy piety that he corrects thee?" (vs 4b).

"Adam! Adam! Where art thou?" The exigencies of the argument have brought the aged seer to a position which is theologically quite untenable. Job's contention that God is unjust is abhorrent to him. In view of the disturbing facts marshaled against him, the only way finally to refute the charge is with one hand to rid God of all moral responsibility in the matter of rewards and punishments, while holding on with the other to the doctrine of retributive justice. It is a neat gymnastic problem, and Eliphaz attempts a solution of it by way of exalting still farther his already lofty conception of God; this time to the place where God, having nothing to gain and nothing to lose, becomes for all practical purposes totally uninvolved (see Expos. on 15:17-85) in a process which he himself initiates and continues. If he is not concerned, why does he concern himself? That question seems never to arise (cf. vss. 2-3 with vss. 4, 29-30). The syllogism is all that matters. The first attempt—sin incurs suffering; you suffer: therefore you have sinned—has been met by Job's vehement denial of the conclusion, and his troublesome refutation of the major premise. The second attempt—God is not to be blamed, having no ax to grind; yet this calamity has been inflicted on you; therefore you are to blame—constitutes a theology which succeeds in defending God to the degree in which it succeeds in eliminating him. The God of Eliphaz—is he in a vacuum where no love is, the God of Bildad in a system where no man is (see Expos. on 19:2-4)? Surely their God is Zophar's too—6 For thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought, and stripped the naked of their clothing.
7 Thou hast not given water to the weary to drink, and thou hast withheld bread from the hungry.
8 But as for the mighty man, he had the earth: and the honorable man dwelt in it.
9 Thou hast sent widows away empty, and the arms of the fatherless have been broken.
10 Therefore snares are round about thee, and sudden fear troubleth thee;
11 Or darkness, that thou canst not see; and abundance of waters cover thee.

Eliphaz maintains in one breath that God is not interested in Job's efforts toward righteousness (vs. 3) while yet rebuking him for his irreligion (vs. 4). The dogmatist is unable to understand the deeper meanings of suffering either in man or in God; in his protracted attempt to explain the fate of Job, he is thrown back upon the old cliché which has been repeated by the friends throughout the poetic discussion, clothed in various garbs, There is no end to your iniquities (vs. 5b).

b) Catalogue of Job's Iniquities (22:6-11)

6-11. The sufferer is harried by reason of irreligion (vs. 4). But how can Eliphaz prove the validity of this inward, negative assumption? He must postulate that Job has corrupted his heart through a series of unethical deeds. The list follows. Job has not exercised mercy toward the destitute (vs. 6-7; cf. Exod. 22:25-26; Ezek. 18:7; Isa. 58:7), and he has been the accomplice of the man with power (vs. 8) so that with his tacit or perhaps active approval the weak members of his community have been oppressed (vs. 9; cf. Exod. 22:21; Deut. 24:17). These are the reasons why a sudden terror has overwhelmed him (vs. 10; cf. 1:13 ff.).

in a hurry (see Expos. on 20:2b, 4-11). Every man's God an uneasy reflection of himself?
Job is far better off than any of them. It is not his mind that has plunged him into ambiguity, it is his heart. Let God be what God is, but a Vindicator stands somehow astride Job's poor, defeated life. The N.T. spells it out (Heb. 8:6; cf. the Patripassian controversy).

6-11. Homemade Facts.—No doubt much of what is here said represents current rumor. Stories spread when a man is down, and rumor is readily interpreted as fact. Everybody says such and such, and where there is so much smoke there must be fire. One needs only put two and two together. Better not speak disparagingly of the mighty; but the once mighty are anybody's field day. Everyone knows very well that something was wrong. What happened to them was not for nothing; that much is certain (see Expos. on 19:22b). One is not surprised that Eliphaz indulges in more than a little exaggeration, with perhaps a dash of venom. Seriatim, before the curtain is rung down on the dialogue, Job will enter his disavowal (cf. vs. 6 with 31:19; vs. 7 with 31:16-17; vs. 9 with 29.13; 31:16). There is a way of dealing with facts that have not been manufactured. That never seems to occur to the friends. "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted" (Gal. 6:1). To accuse is not to restore. Restoration involves identification. That necessity weighs upon God himself.
12 Is not God in the height of heaven? and behold the height of the stars, how high they are!
13 And thou sayest, How doth God know? can he judge through the dark cloud?
14 Thick clouds are a covering to him, that he seeth not; and he walketh in the circuit of heaven.
15 Hast thou marked the old way which wicked men have trodden?
16 Which were cut down out of time, whose foundation was overflown with a flood:
17 Which said unto God, Depart from us: and what can the Almighty do for them?
18 Yet he filled their houses with good things: but the counsel of the wicked is far from me.

12-16. Eliphaz knows that Job agrees with him on the cardinal dogma of divine transcendence.

Is not God high in the heavens?
See the highest stars, how lofty they are!

But the insidious speaker misquotes his opponent in order more easily to refute him.

Therefore you say, "What does God know?
Can he judge through the deep darkness?"

Actually Job has used this language only when he was describing the practical atheism of the prosperous men who go unpunished in spite of their arrogance (vs. 14-15). Eliphaz, deliberately as it would seem, confuses his adversary by associating him with wicked men of antiquity (vs. 15 ff.), and reminds him that they were snatched away before their time (vs. 16a).

17-18. These verses are almost verbally identical with 21:14-16, and several modern commentators are led by the observation of this fact to excise them as an accidental gloss. However, Eliphaz is really misquoting this passage from the preceding development (cf.

12-20. The Way of the Ungodly.— (See Expos. on 4:8; 8:11-19; 15:17-55; 18:5-21.) Eliphaz does not put himself in Job's place (see Expos. on 5:8; 16:4), but he does essay to read Job's mind (Exeg.). In 21:14-16 Job was contending that the wicked feel themselves quite secure (see Expos. on 21:1-84) from God's meddling in their affairs, and prosper mightily in spite of it. The implication of course was that they were quite right: God knows nothing and cares nothing about it. One might almost think that he had taken his cue from Eliphaz' own notebook (vss. 2-5, 12). Eliphaz, however, argues from remoteness to impartiality (cf. Zophar's use of the doctrine, 11:7-10): here he accuses Job of arguing like the wicked from remoteness to ignorance. Admitting Job's prety (vs. 4; cf. Expos. on 4:6), he suggests a quasi-religious explanation of Job's irreligion (see Expos. on 15:7-16). The inevitable results follow. As it was in the days of Noah (vs. 11b[?], cf. Gen. 6-8) and in the days of Lot (vs. 20[?]; cf. 1:16; Gen. 19.24), so with Job. It shall not be with him as he thought (17:8-9). The righteous [shall] see it and [be] glad (Ps. 107:42). They shall raise the old familiar song of triumph (vss. 19-20).

The mind of the sinner, the issue of his sin,
22:19  THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

19 The righteous see it, and are glad: and the innocent laugh them to scorn.

20 Whereas our substance is not cut down, but the remnant of them the fire consumeth.

21 Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace: thereby good shall come unto thee.

vs. 13), and perhaps he continues to misquote in order to refute. This indeed he does in vs. 18, which is not a mere repetition of 21.16. (Read with LXX at the end of vs. 18b, “from him” instead of from me.) The wicked were ungrateful; they did not recognize that their happiness came from God, their counsel was far from him, and for this reason they have been cut off.

19-20. Thus when the just witness the demise of such men, they are glad, and the innocent laugh them to scorn.

a) A New Call to Conversion (22:21-30)

21-30. Eliphaz does not end on a note of condemnation. Nothing yet is irretrievably lost for Job. He can still seek reconciliation with God and be at peace (vs. 21a), and by the response of the righteous: how wrong can a man be when he takes up the cudgels for the Almighty (see Expos. on 13:8)? If Eliphaz had entered on the first point with understanding, on the second with discretion, and on the third with the love of God in his heart, some good might have come of it. “There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth” (Luke 15:10).

21-30. Exhortation and Promise.—It is extraordinary how futile exhortation is, and promise as well. When there is question of redemption, fact is what redeems, not advice; deed, not declaration. “Please” is a polite word, with its hat in its hand; it is not puissant. “Must” and “ought” and “should” are mercenaries, hired to do another’s job; and they take to their heels at the first show of opposition. Eliphaz, whose theology becomes sounder as his heart grows warmer—a not unusual phenomenon—speaks now in a gentler, kindlier tone: a man must indeed be made to want what you offer. The trouble is that promises change neither the mind nor the heart nor the will. Besides, Job has heard enough of them (cf. Expos. on 5:18; 8:20-22; 11:18; 17:12). Here, ironically enough, so many of the phrases seem to be pointed phrases, complete with all “the barbs of good intention.” In vs. 21 is the reconciliation which is precisely what Job longs for and cannot accomplish. God must bring it about. In vs. 22 is the suggestion that he should be a more apt pupil in the school of suffering which is God’s school (Elihu will soon elaborate the point), where Eliphaz is headmaster, with Bildad and Zophar as assistant masters (cf. 15:11; 12:2-8). In vs. 24-25 is the utterly gratuitous assumption that he has cared more for gold than for God (cf. 31:24). In vs. 26 is the promise of rapture for present bitterness, of confidence for present shame (cf. 10:15; 11:15). In vs. 27-28 are answered prayer (19:7), security instead of ruin (as in the prologue), instead of darkness (19:8) light. No longer shall Job be reckoned among the proud, but among the lowly and innocent. By the very cleanliness of his hands shall even the sinner be saved (vss. 29-50; cf. 42:7-9; yet see Exeg.). All of it is the deepest desire of Job’s heart; none of it is in his power, and in his anguished, twisted way he knows that. Eliphaz is not within hailing distance of his tragic dilemma. Says Strahan:

Nothing could well be finer than [this] picture of a religious life in days of prosperity—the righteous man delighting himself in God, lifting a free and open face to Heaven, praying and being heard, paying his vows, laying his plans and getting them successfully executed, walking always in the sunshine. It is a religious life in the shadow that Eliphaz cannot understand; . . . and [so] does injustice to those who are most in need of sympathy.4

Once more (see Expos. on 20:12-16) it would be instructive to recall the situation in which the Jews found themselves after the Exile—always in the poet’s mind—and to imagine the effect which these “consolations of God” from the storehouses of orthodox religion would have had on them.

21. Acquaint Thyself with God, and Be at Peace.—The RSV is more accurate. It is reconciliation of which Eliphaz is speaking. But the 22 Receive, I pray thee, the law from his mouth, and lay up his words in thine heart.

23 If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up, thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles.
24 Then shalt thou lay up gold as dust, and the gold of Ophir as the stones of the brooks.
25 Yea, the Almighty shall be thy defense, and thou shalt have plenty of silver.
26 For then shalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty, and shalt lift up thy face unto God.
27 Thou shalt make thy prayer unto him, and he shall hear thee, and thou shalt pay thy vows.
28 Thou shalt also decree a thing, and it shall be established unto thee: and the light shall shine upon thy ways.
29 When men are cast down, then thou shalt say, There is lifting up; and he shall save the humble person.
30 He shall deliver the island of the innocent: and it is delivered by the pureness of thine hands.

receive instruction from his mouth, and lay up his words in your heart.
If you return to the Almighty and humble yourself, if you remove unrighteousness far from your tents, if you lay gold in the dust, and gold of Ophir among the stones of the torrent bed, and if the Almighty is your gold, and your precious silver; then you will delight yourself in the Almighty, and lift up your face to God. You will make your prayer to him, and he will hear you; and you will pay your vows. You will decide on a matter, and it will be established for you, and light will shine on your ways.
For God abases the proud, but he saves the lowly.
He delivers the innocent man; you will be delivered through the cleanliness of your hands.”

KJV has endeared itself to many generations. Certainly it is true that while the estrangement continues, there can be no deep and lasting peace for Job or for any man. "Thou hast made us for thyself, and our hearts are restless till they find their rest in thee." More than for anything else Job longs for the re-establishment of the old relationship. He has taunted God with the memory of it, defied him in the ruin of it, pleaded with him for the restoration of

Augustine Confessions 1. 1,
Then Job answered and said,

Even to-day is my complaint bitter:
My stroke is heavier than my groaning.

Then Job answered:

“Today also my complaint is bitter,
His hand is heavy in spite of my groaning.”

2. THIRD REPLY OF JOB TO ELIPHAZ (23:1–24:25)

In characteristic fashion the sufferer ignores the arguments of the discourse of Eliphaz which immediately precedes (22:1–30). Instead of replying to the false accusations which have just been put forward against him (cf. especially 22:6 ff.), he drives directly to the fundamentals of his situation. God forever thwarts his attempts to secure an encounter (23:2–17) just as he refuses to hear the prayer of the oppressed (24:1–25).

There appears to be a marked contrast between the first cycle of discussion and the third with regard to Job’s conception of, and practical attitude toward, God. His theological assumptions are no longer those of hostility toward God. In aggressiveness there is a kind of rapport, however unsatisfactory; in hatred there is a mutuality of interest, a reciprocity of attention. But in God’s indifference there is only the vacuum of alienation. In the first cycle Job compared God to a hunter (6:4; 10:16), a soldier (7:12), a kidnapper (9:12), a murderer (13:15), but now he intimates that God is totally unconcerned. He charges the Deity no longer with enmity, but with apathy. There the hero was convinced that God paid too much attention to him (7:17 ff.; 9:11, 18; 10:16, 20) and he indulged the dream that the old intimacy—a dialogue of love (7:21c; 14:15)—could someday be renewed and the delights of communion with the creative artist be restored; here the gulf has deepened and widened so much that no dialogue is even possible. There prayer came upon the lips of the sufferer with the ease or the survival of a happy consuetude (even though embittered and defiant, Job could not for long speak of God without soon speaking to God [6:8 ff.; 7:17–21; 10:2–22, 13:24–14:6, 13]); here the poison of physical and spiritual torture and of social isolation appears to have numbed his ability to pray. In the first cycle he prayed five times, in the second only once (17:5–4), and at that his last word of precatory utterance was probably a kind of imprecatory threat, “Thou shalt not be exalted!” (17:4b; cf. Exeg., ad loc.) ; but in the third cycle he prays not at all.

a) “Oh, that I knew where I might find him!” (23:1–17)

I A NEW PLEA FOR AN AUDIENCE (23:1–7)

Today also my complaint is bitter: This is the only place in the poetic discussion where an allusion is found to an indication of time. If the word today is to be taken

23:1–24:1–7, 22–23, 25. Job.—I will not humble myself (cf. 22:23a). You are right. I am a rebel still. It is of no use trying to hold it all in. I have done my best. If only I knew where I could find him. I would lay my case before him, and listen to all he has to say (23:5). He would no longer crush me. He would give heed. I am not guilty, and he would have to admit it. But east, west, north, south, he avoids me (23:8–9), though he knows very well that in life and heart I have kept his law (23:10–12). He has made up his mind. He does what he likes, and will go through with it (23:13–14a). Nor am I the only one. Never think it! He has other plans too, and they are much the same (23:14b)—fire and hurricane and flood. It terrifies me. Not the blight on me, the blight on him (23:17; see Exeg.). It may be indeed that what goes on is hidden from him (24:1a; cf. Exeg., and see 22:13). Is that why there is no sign of him anywhere (24:1b)? The landed gentry go on stealing from the poor (24:2–3), depriving them of their rights (24:4a), huddling them off by themselves as if they amounted to nothing at all (24:4b), snatching infants from their mother’s breast in payment of a debt (24:9). So that people with no place to eat or sleep roam about like wild asses, looking for work, trying to manage a little for their children, living on scraps (24:6), naked, drenched to the skin (24:7–10a), hungry in the midst of plenty, thirsty while they toil in the vineyards of the rich, trampling out the wine (24:10b–11). So in the city—only worse! The wounded and the dyliterally, the poet indicates that the discussion has been in progress for at least several days. However, the expression may simply mean “now” (cf. I Sam. 9:27; Isa. 58:4). The rendering bitter represents a correction of the M.T. (cf. Targ., Syriac, Vulg.) since the word בהזה, “to be bitter,” but from בהזה, “to be rebellious.” Job is saying, “Even today my complaint is a revolt” (cf. Amer. Trans., “defiant”). Job is aware of the fact that his attitude has drifted into open rebellion. Far from humbling himself, as Eliphaz advised him to do (22:25a), he cannot follow any other course than that of obdurate opposition to the thesis of his guilt. In vs. 2b, the RSV follows the LXX and the Syriac, reading His hand is heavy in spite of my groaning although the M.T. has “My hand [םיד rather than יד] is heavy upon [not in spite of] my groaning.” To be sure, the text presupposed by the LXX and the Syriac makes sense; but parallelism between vs. 2a and vs. 25 favors the Hebrew text. The sequence of thought is clear enough: Job

2. A Rebel Still.—That is manifestly what Job’s friends think him to be, and he will go on being it. Whenever wrong is entrenched, and the status quo has to be challenged if there is to be life and not death, the challenger wins himself the accolade of rebel. He is subversive. He is “an enemy of the people.” He undermines privilege, flies in the face of tradition, destroys the social order, upsets “our way of life, a way we are proud of, and others envy.” How imminently it has happened! Luther was a rebel. Political freedom was won by rebels. Religious freedom was won by rebels. In the realm of economics, in the realm of race relations, the man in front is a revolutionary (see Expos. on 15:4).

When the book of Job was written, an old faith was dying (see Expos. on vs. 8), a new was struggling to be born (see Expos., pp. 905-7). Traditional doctrines were having to yield under the assault of bewildered minds and unrelenting facts (see Expos. on chs. 9-10; 11:5-6, 7-18, 19). The friends retreated to their Maginot Line and dug themselves in. “The old-time religion was good enough for father, and it’s good enough for me.” Better not ask embarrassing questions. But if the asking of embarrassing questions is precisely the opening wedge of every discovery and every revelation mankind has made or received—what then? Critics and philosophers have asked embarrassing questions about the Bible, about life and religion. Many of them have been condemned as heretics. Some of them were. But what is a heretic?
3 Oh that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat!

is conscious of his revolt not only against the beliefs of his friends, but also against his own attempts to remain silent. He has tried to restrain himself from complaining, but his sighs could not be contained.

3-7. Oh, that I knew where I might find him! This sterile wish opens one of the most powerful descriptions of man's search for God in the whole Bible. There is no technique available to the finite creature whereby the infinite Absolute can be summoned and experience what it means; and when at last he returns home, he finds the button-molder ready to melt him down as waste into raw material. Only the pure love of the maiden Solveig redeems him. Obsession with others can indeed be one of the gateways to redemption, but itself needs redemption. There is still a missing dimension, and for lack of it many a man intent upon the "good" of his fellows finds a self only to lose it again. Job's obsession is with God (vss. 13-17; 24:1; yet see Expos. on 19:22a). It was God who occupied the foreground. The insults (22:5-20) could wait. They always can. Jesus of Nazareth was never hurt by them. He made them take their place in a larger context. The life that does the wrong is the hurt life that needs healing (42:8-10).

3. The God Who Hides.—(Cf. vss. 8-9; see Expos. on 9:2-10; 24:1; 37:1-13; 38:1-42:6; 38:1.) It is not so much that Job cannot find God as it is that he cannot find the God he is looking for. There are times when the reason for what we call our forsakenness is very simple: the God we are looking for does not exist. The God Job was looking for was the God of the faith that was dying (see Expos. on vs. 2); in the death of that faith the God of the new faith was revealing himself. The old God seemed to be hiding on purpose, avoiding every approach that Job tried to make, knowing very well that the man was innocent, but refusing to come into court with his knowledge. He was the God who was not. The God who was broke silence at last, had in his own way been breaking it all along (see Expos. on 19:7, 25).

Yet Job's cry is the anguished cry of all troubled human life; and for reason. There is a sense in which God hides himself. Sometimes it is because we are looking for him in the wrong place (see Expos. on 11:7): back in some yesterday, while he stands here beckoning toward tomorrow; or among things that we can see, such as "answers" to prayer, until one dull morning we seem to lose him entirely because he refuses to do our bidding. Sometimes it is because we carefully avoid looking for him in the right place. Over and over again he is where we are quite sure he is not. We live in a world where our conclusions are not final and our arrange-ments are anything but permanent. The temple is destroyed; God! The church is split wide open in the Reformation: God! The economic order breaks under a hammer called communism: God—who then breaks the hammer! Is he saying nothing, doing nothing? Read John 8: "He that is of God heareth God's words." "If a man keep my saying . . ." "Before Abraham was, I am." Did he mean that for such folk, whatever happened or when, if they would look up, they would find his face there?

One of Tolstoy's stories is about Martin, a cobbler who lived in a tiny basement room, with one window looking out on the street; and about how a voice came to him in his sleep, "Look for me tomorrow, for I shall surely come." But from morning to night the next day no one came. There was an old soldier clearing away the snow; and a mother with a shivering child in her arms leaned for a moment against the wall. Martin opened the door and motioned for them both to come in and sit by the fire and have a cup of tea. Nothing in the afternoon. Only a poor apple woman, with a bag of chips on her back. Martin with his own eyes saw the ragged urchin from down the block run up and snatch an apple, saw her catch him, heard her screaming at him, and went out. There was little you could do about it. You could pay for the apple—that was little enough. And you could kneel in the snow with your arm around the lad until through his tears he stammered out at last that he was sorry, and please, would she like him to carry the chips for her? Martin watched them as far as the corner, then took off his shawl and sat down at his table. He always read a while in the dusk. Under the dim glow of the lamp the Gospels fell open, as they have a way of doing, to the passage he had fingered most and smoothed out so often. "I was shrunken, and ye gave me meat" (Matt. 25:35). He glanced up through his spectacles at the dark and lonely room, and smiled. "Look for me tomorrow," the voice had said, "for I shall surely come."

"Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself" (Isa. 45:15). God hidden—and revealed! Revealed in his very hiddenness.

3. God and Man in Search of One Another.—The human race has always been making pil-
I would order my cause before him, and fill my mouth with arguments.

5 I would know the words which he would answer me, and understand what he would say unto me.

6 Will he plead against me with his great power? No; but he would put strength in me.

7 There the righteous might dispute with him; so should I be delivered for ever from my judge.

I would learn what he would answer me, and understand what he would say to me (vs. 5);

yet this reveals not a true state of humility, but only a concession to the omnipotence of the divine judge. Job is so much aware of God's might that, as on previous occasions when he expressed the wish to meet his Sovereign face to face, he feels an elemental dread of annihilation (9:34; 13:21). Would he contend with me in the greatness of his power? (Vs. 6a.) Casting out this fear with a vehemence which indicates its pressure, Job replies to his own question, No; he would give heed to me (vs. 6b), or better, "he would be convinced by me" (יָשָׁבֵל). Many interpreters discover in this passage evidence of the fact that Job believes now in divine clemency and hopes that a gracious God will welcome him with love, but such an exegesis is not borne out either by the words of the text or by the implications of the immediate or general context. Indeed, Job continues by musing, There an upright man could reason with him (vs. 7a), since he knows that only a godless man would fear to come before him (13:16). Job adds most significantly, And I should be acquitted for ever by my judge (vs. 7b), or better, "I would recover forever my right" (following the LXX, which reads the word mishpāṭi, to χρημα μου, "my judgment of acquittal," instead of mishəphēti, "from my judge"). In other words, Job is more than ever convinced of his own righteousness; he has such an exalted and persistent conception of it that even the unjust God who has perverted his right would in the end recognize its validity and yield to the law of ultimate justice.
8 Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him:
9 On the left hand, where he doth work, but I cannot behold him: he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him:

8 “Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him;
9 on the left hand I seek him, but I cannot behold him;
I'm turn to the right hand, but I cannot see him.

(2) The Elusiveness of God (23:8-14)

8-9. In his desperate effort to find the judge and obtain a hearing, Job describes himself as the lonely and wandering traveler who goes to the four corners of the earth in a vain attempt to find someone who is not there. He is the pilgrim of the horizon, for his pilgrimage has no center. In vs. 9a, the RSV, following the Syriac, corrects הבשחח, "where he works," into ויחישה, I seek him, which offers a satisfactory sense and a good parallelism, provided a further emendation is also made in vs. 9b, again on the basis of the Syriac (cf. Vulg.), נמנים, I turn, instead of the M.T., הָיָה, he hideth himself (KJV). Inasmuch as the four expressions of direction in vs. 8-9 refer to the four points of the compass, beginning with מִדֶּרֶךְ, forward, i.e., "east," and since the ancient myths associated the gods' activities with the mountainous and glacial regions of the north, the text should be probably rendered as a quatrain of geographic and perhaps cosmic significance:

If to the east I go, he is not there,
And to the west, I perceive him not (vs. 8).
To the north, where he is at work, I behold him not.
He hides himself in the south, and I see him not (vs. 9).

Job unwittingly betrays the high—perhaps extravagant—opinion in which he holds his own person. He is not only alone in the vast world, a subject of wonder for the ages to come (cf. 18:20, where Bildad describes the type of evil man at whom the west and the east are appalled), but he goes poetically across the whole terrestrial stage in an effort to reach his elusive antagonist. Job is actually implying that God is fleeing him, not merely that God is safely and transcendentally out of reach! The sufferer is on the verge of suggesting that such a God is a coward who takes advantage of his infinite power and of the puniness of his victim, and therefore succeeds in ignoring the rights of man only by evading man. God's cosmic migrations, however, constitute an oblique tribute to the gigantic quality of the hero.

Phemes that fall from Job's lips. They are complaints and blasphemies that in rejecting the God-that-is not honor the God-that-is (see Expos. on 19:25). It is in the N.T. that the two ways meet in the person of one who is here so strangely foreshadowed (see Expos. on 7:7-10; cf. 10:13-17; also Luke 19:5).

Into the woods my Master came Forspent with love and shame.
But the olives they were not blind to Him;
The little gray leaves were kind to Him;
The thorn-tree had a mind to Him,
When into the woods He came.

Out of the woods my Master came,
Content with death and shame.
When Death and Shame would woo Him last,
From under the trees they drew Him last,
"Twas on a tree they slew Him—last,
When out of the woods He came.

It must be added that Job's motives were wrong (vs. 4-5), and the condition he wanted to lay down was wrong (vs. 6; cf. 9:34-35; Expos. on 38:1-42:6); but he at least desired to meet his great Adversary, and it made the friends shudder even to think of such a thing. In the very way Job begged him not to, in that way God came, and for a purpose far other, and to an end far higher.

6 Sidney Lanier, "A Ballad of Trees and the Master."
10 But he knoweth the way that I take; when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.

11 My foot hath held his steps, his way have I kept, and not declined.

12 Neither have I gone back from the commandment of his lips; I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food

13 But he is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth.

10-12. Such a God cannot plead ignorance. He refuses to meet his pursuer, "for" (rather than But) he knows the way that I take (vs. 10a). When at last I shall succeed in capturing his attention, and he has tried me, I shall come forth as gold (vs. 10b). The trial I am now already enduring; he is now testing my metal. Dross, dirt, impurity? I have none! My behavior has always been without deviation from his norm. I have not been out of step (vs. 11; observe the possible irony involved in the fact that the word רַומָּא, "step," is a cognate of רָומָא, "happiness of . . ."). I have fulfilled the law (vs. 12a) not only in outward obedience but also in my bosom (vs. 12b; RSV, following the LXX and the Vulg., emends מִלַּת into מַשָּׁת), i.e., in the very core of my being (cf. 19:27c). The M.T., however, if correct, may be rendered, "I have preserved the words of his mouth more than my own resolves" (cf. Judg. 5:15); cf. "I have bent my own will to the words of his mouth" (Segond, Crampon, et al.). Here is the picture of a man who holds fast to his avowal of integrity and declares his perfect obedience to divine law. His situation is horrible, and is made more so by the fact that God appears as if he were not bound by his contract. God refuses to do his part when man has done his. Man by obedience may expect from the Deity the fulfilling of the law, the rendering of what is due (cf. Rom. 7:6 ff.; etc.). But God flouts the law. His omnipotence overshadows his justice.

13-14. The expression דְּדוֹת אֲשֶׁר which opens vs. 13a is difficult since it literally means, "But he is in one," hence, But he is in one mind (KJV). The idea of divine immutability (cf. RSV) is neither expressed nor implied in the text. Following the paraphrasing of the LXX, εἰ δὲ καὶ οὐτός ἐκρίνει οὖτος, one might render, "But he has decided" or "He has fixed his resolution." Perhaps the M.T. represents a corruption from הָדוֹת, "he has chosen" (cf. 7:15; 9:14; 15:5; Ps. 132:13). No one can make him change from that decision, and what he desires, that he does (vs. 13b). The same thought

10. The Shield of Integrity.—It is a shield that can blunt many a weapon and ward off many an assault (see Expos. on 17:9; 27:2-6; cf. Expos. on 36:8). Few descriptions of the "righteous" can match this for sheer beauty; few breathe a loftier confidence in the ultimate righteousness of God, in spite of that taunt which provides the context (see Exeg.). There is a gold that comes forth from the assayer's fire; there are feet that hold to the way which God appoints; there are lives that, far and away beyond any prompting which comes of their will, cherish what they know of his. But to rely on any of it, when all the accounts are in and the books are opened, is to hold both life and God in debt to the self. Read II Cor. 11-12.

The Christian has fallen heir to another kind of boldness (I John 4:17).

13. The Changeless Decree.—The steadfastness of God may feel to the touch like faithfulness (I Cor. 1:9; 10:18)—or like obstinacy. Perhaps one of the most useful lessons to be learned from the book of Job is that what to one may sound like a blessing may to another sound like a curse (cf. Expos. on 5:17; 22:21). From the underside there always seems to be a kind of ambiguity about God's dealing; the interpretation is not of logic but of faith. Job in his present mood dwells only on the sovereignty of God, and the decree becomes more than changeless: it becomes dreadful (see Expos. on 10:13-17). It was of the sovereignty-in-love 14 For he performeth the thing that is appointed for me: and many such things are with him.
15 Therefore am I troubled at his presence: when I consider, I am afraid of him.
16 For God maketh my heart soft, and the Almighty troubleth me:
17 Because I was not cut off before the darkness, neither hath he covered the darkness from my face.

24 Why, seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty, do they that know him not see his days?

is developed in the subsequent line, enlarged in order to include the whole of the human tragedy. "He will therefore accomplish the decree which he has made over me, and he will even conceive many others like it" (vs. 14). Who knows whether the case of Job is an isolated exception? The poet introduces here a skillful anticipation of the second part of the discourse (24:1 ff.) and makes a transition from the discussion of a personal fate to that of all conditions of men.

15-16. The awareness of the unknown in God leads to an incommensurate fear. Therefore I am terrified [even] at his presence (vs. 15b). The mystery of God is so complete that Job is now again a prey to doubt. He is no longer certain that an encounter with the judge will be sufficient to establish his rights and win his acquittal (cf. vss. 4 ff.).

17. This verse is a crux interpretum. The negative in vs. 17a is absent in one Hebrew MS (Kennicott 48), and the RSV therefore translates, for I am hemmed in by darkness. However, the Niphal of הֶסֶנ may mean, "to be speechless" (cf. Arabic cognate) and the sufferer probably said, "I did not keep quiet in spite of the darkness." The M.T. may yield another, and profound, meaning: "Because it is not on account of darkness that I am annihilated nor is it the shadow which covers my face." In other words, God's decree is darker to me than my fate. His inescrutable mystery is more terrifying than my misery. There is still the possibility that יֶסֶנ, "from before me," in vs. 17b represents a corruption of the original text, through a scribal repetition of יֶסֶנ, "by reason of," in the middle of vs. 17a. More probably, the construction of the clause in vs. 17b is elliptical, and the second יֶסֶנ stands for נָסַע יֶסֶנ, "from the fact that ..." (cf. Exod. 19:18; Jer. 44:23; see G. R. Driver, "Problems in Job," The American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures, LII [1955-56], 161).

b) "God Pays No Heed to Prayer" (24:1-25)

From the consideration of his own destiny Job is now ready once more to broaden (see Expos. on 9:2-10) that Robert Grant was thinking when he wrote:

The earth, with its store of wonders untold, Almighty, thy power hath founded of old; Hast stablished it fast by a changeless decree, And round it hath cast, like a mantle, the sea.7

15. Like Madness in the Brain.—(Cf. 9:35; Expos. on 10:1-22, 1-7, 8-12, 13-17, 34:7-9; also Expos., pp. 905-7.) For Job, cowed by the thought of the majesty and power of God, be-

7 "O worship the King, all-glorious above."
2 Some remove the landmarks; they violently take away flocks, and feed thereof.
3 They drive away the ass of the fatherless, they take the widow's ox for a pledge.
4 They turn the needy out of the way: the poor of the earth hide themselves together.

the field of his meditation. Developing the theme suggested by 23:14b, he asks the all-inclusive question of every man's suffering.

(1) Burden of Human Pain (24:1-12)

24:1. The RSV brings sense out of an obscure and probably corrupt text, but its rendering remains highly hypothetical and even goes against the normal meaning of the expression מַלְאָכֵי אֲלֵילִי, “to be hidden from” (Jer. 16:17; cf. Job 17:4). The main possibilities are three:

(a) Some critics suggest that the M.T. did not originally have the negative ו in vs. 1a, and they read, “Why are times [events] hidden from the Almighty?” A pious scribe, according to this conjecture, transformed the meaning of the question by inserting the word “not.” However, vs. 1b literally means, And why do those who know him never see his days? The sequence of thought thus appears to require for vs. 1a some parallel meaning. It is possible that the hero is taking for granted the loss of belief in God’s omniscience. This is the only way by which at this moment he is able to explain the power of injustice over the world of men. His statement is the equivalent of an apology for the Deity.

(b) Other critics respect the M.T. and suppose that vs. 1a is related to vs. 1b as a subordinate clause of restriction. Thus the whole verse might be translated, “Why is it that (although) times are not hidden from the Almighty, those who know him do not contemplate his days (of judgment)?” (cf. ERV mg.) Such a query would provide a fitting preface to the discussion of unrequited evil which is found in vss. 2 ff.

(c) Another interpretation may be obtained if one considers vs. 1a as the main question and vs. 1b as a causal or consecutive subordinate. “Why are not times hidden from the Almighty, since those who know him are unable to see his days?” In other words, the hero wishes that some events were concealed from God because he could then explain the evil of this world without involving the participation of the Deity.

2-12. The categories of earthly existence seem to be utterly unrelated to a just God. The world of man is studded with acts of foul injustice. Men remove landmarks (vs. 2a), a crime which is severely condemned by the ancient codes (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; cf. Hos. 5:10; Prov. 22:28; 23:10). “They kidnap the flock and its shepherd” (vs. 2b, following taking seriously what Elihu suggested in 22.13-14 (see Exeg.). At any rate, the days on which God holds his court and executes his justice seem in no hurry to put in an appearance; and Job, who undeniably thinks of himself as among those who know him, to the exclusion of the friends, wants to know why—which is precisely the question to which the whole book addresses itself (see Expos. on 1:12; 5:17; 9:2-10; 21:7-18; 23:2, 8). God deals seriously with man’s freedom. What he desires is an unprejudiced relationship between himself and the human soul.

Perhaps one might now address Job and say to him: “Job, the kind of world this is does not mean that God has no love for it. The gospel is that he loves it in spite of the kind of world it is. But you could not have known that—not fully—not as we know it. He loves the world for what his love can make of it. He loves it enough to give himself for it, not in some safe and distant sympathy for its pain, but with a love that comes in and shares. That knowledge, in its fullness, must wait until Mark takes up his pen to write; and Matthew and Luke and John. Your lights at their best are broken lights. But they are lights. In their fitful shining something momentous is getting itself done.”

2-12. Man’s Inhumanity to Man.—The poet draws for his generation—as for ours—not the 5 Behold, as wild asses in the desert, go they forth to their work; rising betimes for a prey: the wilderness yieldeth food for them and for their children.

6 They reap every one his corn in the field: and they gather the vintage of the wicked.

7 They cause the naked to lodge without clothing, that they have no covering in the cold.

8 They are wet with the showers of the mountains, and embrace the rock for want of a shelter.

9 They pluck the fatherless from the breast, and take a pledge of the poor.

10 They cause him to go naked without clothing, and they take away the sheaf from the hungry;

11 Which make oil within their walls, and tread their winepresses, and suffer thirst.

12 Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out: yet God layeth not folly to them.

5 Behold, like wild asses in the desert they go forth to their toil, seeking prey in the wilderness as food for their children.

6 They gather their fodder in the field and they glean the vineyard of the wicked man.

7 They lie all night naked, without clothing, and have no covering in the cold.

8 They are wet with the rain of the mountains, and cling to the rock for want of shelter.

9 (There are those who snatch the fatherless child from the breast, and take in pledge the infant of the poor.)

10 They go about naked, without clothing; hungry, they carry the sheaves;

11 among the olive rows of the wicked they make oil; they tread the wine presses, but suffer thirst.

12 From out of the city the dying groan, and the soul of the wounded cries for help; yet God pays no attention to their prayer.

LXX, perhaps an allusion to 1:15, although the word הֶזָּא יָדוּ used here in vs. 2 refers generally to sheep and goats (cf. Gen. 29:2). Deeds of ruthlessness are especially perpetrated against the defenseless members of society, the fatherless and the widow (vs. 3), the needy and the poor (vs. 4), whose condition is pictured in a series of concrete and shocking scenes (vss. 5-11). In the city is human pain at its worst (vs. 12ab): there (observe the point of view of a poet who espouses the cultural outlook of a nomadic or seminomadic society) the dying groan, and the soul of the wounded [LXX, “little children”] cries

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Hebrew word</th>
<th>English equivalent</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>נָשִּׁית</td>
<td>widow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>נָשִּׁי</td>
<td>child</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

mind’s picture alone, but the heart’s picture too, of what it is that “makes countless thousands mourn.” * In vss. 22-23 that inhumanity seems to become the project of the Almighty himself (see Expos. on 9:24). In vs. 25, on the basis of what was originally perhaps a much more severe indictment, Job defies anybody to contradict him. The facts are less one-sided than he represents them; but such as they are, only God can controvert them—by deed, not by word.

12c. How Far from Helping?—Yet God pays no attention to their prayer. Thomas Hardy in one of his poems tells about a messenger sent one day to remind God of the human race, and God cannot remember. He cannot remember a thing! More than once a man feels that he has been set down to live his life on an abandoned farm, with its weeds and broken fences, the doors of the house gaping wide open, cobwebs and great chunks of fallen plaster littered all over the place. Somebody lived there long ago— as God lived here—and the rooms then breathed. There were footsteps in the hall and on the stairs. But no more: just the creaking floor now, and echoes, and a wind stirring the

* Robert Burns, “Man Was Made to Mourn.”

* “God-forgotten.”

1086
for help. And the culminating thought, which gives significance to the whole development, comes sharply and is swiftly formulated: yet God pays no attention to their prayer (vs. 12c; RSV, following the Syriac, reads the word נַאֵנָה as תַּפְלָלָה, prayer, rather than תַּפְלָלָה, folly (KJV), or “unseemliness,” “obscenity,” “infamy” (cf. 1:22). Vs. 12c offers support to the third interpretation of vs. 1 (cf. Exeg., ad loc.). God does not answer prayer because he does not hear it. God does not pay heed to the groans of the dying and the cries of the wounded: is it not that he is unaware of what goes on? There are few queries in the whole Bible as pathetic as this one. Here the problem of theodicy is faced not by a cold formulator of creeds or a polished academician, but by a profoundly religious man who takes to heart the mystery of human suffering and, ignorant of the message of the Cross, rams his head against a closed gate in an effort to excuse the Deity from responsibility for moral evil.

rotten curtains. It is one of the universal moods of the human soul.

The reasons for it? Partly because life is born to a certain loneliness. In Eugene O’Neill’s Lazarus Laughed, Tiberius Caesar sits on his throne, staring at the dead body of a woman he has poisoned and trying to tell Lazarus the tragic story of his own fear-bound life.

I know it is folly to speak—but—one gets old, one becomes talkative, one wishes to confess, to say the thing one has always kept hidden, ... though [if] one were to cry it in the streets to multitudes, or whisper it in the kiss to one’s beloved, the only ears that can ever hear one’s secret are one’s own! And so I talk aloud . . . . I talk to my loneliness! 1

Proof enough, no doubt, that man was made for God, and never will be at home anywhere else. Then there is sin, hanging on like grim death, to make people feel desolate. And misfortune. Somebody dies. Something cracks up. Life tumbles in, while the wrong out there in the world keeps piling higher and higher, until nobody can see over it, and only an optimist can think that the future is uncertain. A reporter asked a marshal of France what he would have done if he had been in Pilate’s place. The answer was: “I wouldn’t have waited for Jesus to infect the crowds in the capital with his seditious poison. I would have put him before the firing squad in his home province, up north in Galilee.” It is exciting, is it not, to see God go down for the third time in such a welter of things as ours?

So are there times when we shut out God. But there are other times when there seems to be no particular rhyme or reason in his turning his back on us and holding his peace, pulling down the blinds of heaven and locking the door. In any case, the past always has something to say. It says, for one thing, that God is often most where he seems to be least. Ps. 22, for instance, was written during or shortly after the captivity. There they were, praying for deliverance, with everybody laughing at them. Fear stalked around naked. Their hearts were like wax. Yet out of those bitter, bitter years came the world’s most precious heritage: this human faith in the God of human history. It grew up into its own under the heel of a conqueror, marched through fire, and was clean. Against the oncoming centuries it set itself, against the ravages of war, and blazed the way to Christ. God forsaken? God controlled! He had been in front of them, and behind them, and all around them—helping them most when there was no help. Or take Jesus himself. Where was God that last week of his life? God was at home on Calvary to the whole wide world. Never anywhere so much as there. Daniel Webster said of the Great Stone Face: “Men hang out their signs indicative of their respective trades: shoemakers hang out a gigantic shoe; jewelers, a monster watch; and the dentist hangs out a gold tooth; but up in the mountains of New Hampshire, God Almighty has hung out a sign to show that there He makes men.” 2 He hung out a sign on a little hill, beyond the walls of Jerusalem, to show that he would keep faith. And he does. The past has that to say. What if one had the grace to apply it every time the present turns ugly and forbidding? Bunyan in Pilgrim’s Progress has Christian and Hopeful taken prisoner by Giant Despair, and thrown behind the bars of Doubting Castle. When all at once, a little before day, Christian, as one half amazed, broke out into passionate speech: “What a fool,” quoth he, “am I, thus to lie in a stinking dungeon, when I may as well walk at liberty!” And without waiting another moment, he took from his bosom the key he had forgotten. It was called Promise, and with it he unlocked the door into the castle yard, swung back the iron gate, and they were off on the King’s highway again. It can be done readily enough—with the key. God’s word was not given at Versailles or at Munich. It was given on Calvary (see Expos. on 38:1).

1 Act IV, scene 1, pp. 150-51.

2 The Old Man of the Mountain.
13 They are of those that rebel against the light; they know not the ways thereof, nor abide in the paths thereof.
14 The murderer rising with the light killeth the poor and needy, and in the night is as a thief.
15 The eye also of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, saying, No eye shall see me: and disguiseth his face.
16 In the dark they dig through houses, which they had marked for themselves in the daytime: they know not the light.
17 For the morning is to them even as the shadow of death: if one know them, they are in the terrors of the shadow of death.
18 He is swift as the waters; their portion is cursed in the earth: he beholdeth not the way of the vineyards.
19 Drought and heat consume the snow waters: so doth the grave those which have sinned.
20 The womb shall forget him; the worm shall feed sweetly on him; he shall be no more remembered; and wickedness shall be broken as a tree.
21 He evil entreateth the barren that beareth not: and doeth not good to the widow.

13 "There are those who rebel against the light, who are not acquainted with its ways, and do not stay in its paths.
14 The murderer rises in the dark, that he may kill the poor and needy; and in the night he is as a thief.
15 The eye of the adulterer also waits for the twilight, saying, 'No eye will see me'; and he disguises his face.
16 In the dark they dig through houses; by day they shut themselves up; they do not know the light.
17 For deep darkness is morning to all of them; for they are friends with the terrors of deep darkness.
18 "You say, 'They are swiftly carried away upon the face of the waters; their portion is cursed in the land; no treader turns toward their vineyards.
19 Drought and heat snatch away the snow waters; so does Sheol those who have sinned.
20 The squares of the town forget them; their name is no longer remembered; so wickedness is broken like a tree.'
21 "They feed on the barren childless woman, and do no good to the widow.

13-17. The mention of the city leads the poet to expatiate on the dark doings which commonly occur there. The murderer and the adulterer (vss. 14-15) are used as illustrations of those who perform the deeds of night (vss. 16-17) and therefore rebel against the light (vs. 13a).

18-24. These lines present a grave problem of interpretation, for they describe the dogma of delayed (vs. 22) but certain (vs. 23) retribution. Although the text has been poorly preserved and is obscure at many points, the general meaning is clear enough for the interpreter to conclude that Job was not the original speaker of this passage. The translators of the RSV, apparently making the same observation, surmise that we have here a quotation of the friends' opinion, and thus introduce vs. 18 with the words You say (which are not in the text), followed by quotation marks. Against this 13-17. Denizens of the Dark.—(Cf. John 3:19-21; Rom. 13:12; I Pet. 2:9; I John 1:5; 2:8.) The gospel is summons, not advice; revolution, not reformation. Before the will can be touched, the desire has to be changed.

1088
JOB 25:2

22 He draweth also the mighty with his power: he riseth up, and no man is sure of life.
23 Though it be given him to be in safety, whereon he resteth; yet his eyes are upon their ways.
24 They are exalted for a little while, but are gone and brought low; they are taken out of the way as all other, and cut off as the tops of the ears of corn.
25 And if it be not so now, who will make me a liar, and make my speech nothing worth?

Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,
2 Dominion and fear are with him; he maketh peace in his high places.

22 Yet God prolongs the life of the mighty by his power; they rise up when they despair of life.
23 He gives them security, and they are supported; and his eyes are upon their ways.
24 They are exalted a little while, and then are gone; they wither and fade like the mallow; they are cut off like the heads of grain.
25 If it is not so, who will prove me a liar, and show that there is nothing in what I say?"

Then Bildad the Shuhite answered: 2 "Dominion and fear are with God," he makes peace in his high heaven.

Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,
2 Dominion and fear are with him; he maketh peace in his high places.

There is serious objection. Job does not protest against the opinion allegedly quoted by him, but on the contrary endorses its validity with vehemence (vs. 25). It is therefore preferable to follow the hypothesis proposed by many modern critics, and to consider vss. 18-24 (with the possible exception of vss. 22-23) as editorially removed from another context and placed in the mouth of Job in order to make him appear as accepting the orthodox thesis. Indeed, it is easy to recognize in vss. 18-24 the style and ideas of the friends (cf. 15:20-35; 18:5-21; 20:4-28). It will be seen that in 27:13-23 also Job makes (for him) very strange assertions. Moreover, there is a close sequence of thought and style between the two passages. By placing them together one obtains an excellent sequence: (a) The fate of the evil men described in 24:18-24 is summed up in 27:13; and (b) there follows naturally the picture of the sons of the evil man in 27:14-23. Inasmuch as Zophar does not speak a third time, one may entertain with a great degree of probability the conjecture that parts of his original third discourse have been uprooted from their context and placed in the mouth of Job in an editorial effort to reconcile the views of the hero with the traditional dogma of individual retribution (cf. Intro., p. 888).

3. Third Discourse of Bildad and Job's Reply (25:1-27:12)

In the present M.T. the third discourse of Bildad is reduced to a doxology of a few verses (25:1-6). However, an analysis of ch. 26 shows that it contains a passage now your integrity (cf. 28:3-7). You may well wish there were an escape (14:13), but there is none, either in hell beneath or in heaven above. "The earth, with its store of wonders untold" (see Exeg. on 23:13), the vastness of all creation, the mysteries of rain and cloud, of light and darkness—from end to end they are his, the barest fringe of his glory, the merest whisper of his power.

26. Right Made Wrong.—The poet sets up no straw man to be buffeted about. Job is not engaged in shadowboxing. Some of the most stately passages of the book are set on the lips placed in the mouth of Job (vss. 5-14) which in all probability continues Bildad's discussion (see Exeg., ad loc.) . Thus the present text may be the result of an editorial shifting in an attempt to tone down the blasphemous statements of the hero. As conjecturally reconstituted, the speeches or fragments thereof may be attributed to Bildad and to Job respectively in the following fashion: (a) Bildad lyrically describes the majesty of God in order to emphasize the smallness and the impurity of man (25:1-6); (b) Job replies that such assertions are of little help to him (26:1-4); (c) Bildad returns unperturbed to the theme of divine omnipotence and continues by extolling divine omniscience (26:5-14); (d) Job retorts by reaffirming his own integrity (27:1-12).
3 Is there any number to his armies? and upon whom doth not his light arise?

a) [BILDAD] God's Greatness and Man's Impurity (25:1-6)

25:1-3. No more than Eliphaz in 22:2 ff. does Bildad address his opponent directly. Job has just spoken of the indifference and perhaps of the ignorance of the Deity (cf. 24:1, 12). Bildad does not offer a counterargument. Instead, he proposes to raise the level of the rhetorical exchange by extolling the greatness of God. He is so reverently conscious of God's all-inclusive realm that he does not even mention the divine name. In the style of all doxologies, he refers to the Godhead with the help of a masculine singular pronoun and a series of participles. Dominion and fear are with him; he maketh peace in his high places (vs. 2). It is the power of the Almighty which produces fear, not only on this earth, but also in heaven. No one is able to count his armies (vs. 3a), i.e., the hosts to which Job has already alluded in full recognition of divine omnipotence (19:12). The Hebrew text of vs. 3b introduces an idea of great beauty and significance: Upon whom doth not his light arise? The light of God is more than the brightness of the sun and of the celestial bodies (cf. Heb. 4:13). It penetrates beyond the farthest recesses of the cosmos, therefore illuminates all darkness and sharply reveals the impurity of the friends. Bildad, far from being exhausted as Strahan suggests, gives a new and clever twist to the argument. Not only does he repeat, of what Eliphaz and Zophar have said (see Exeg. on vss. 4-6), that to which Job has himself assented, but he borrows from Job's own mouth the words which he hopes now will carry conviction with them (cf. 15:6). His theme was one of Abraham Lincoln's favorites: "Oh why should the spirit of mortal be proud?" a From height to depth he ranges, laying the whole universe under tribute, that the spirit before him might be struck from its lofty place and made to grovel in the dust where it belongs, rotting flesh, crawling worm (see Expos. on vs. 2). The premise is right: every conclusion drawn from it is wrong. God is great (the Moslem's allahu akbar). Right! Conclusion number one: therefore man is nothing and sinful to boot. Wrong! (Cf. Expos. on 1:1; 4:19-21; 9:14-19; 26:5-14.) Conclusion number two: therefore God is holy and unimpeachable. Wrong! (Cf. Expos. on 9:2-10, 8-13.) Conclusion number three: therefore Job has no reason to talk as he does. Wrong! (Cf. Expos. on 10:1-22, 1-7, 8-12, 13-17.) The whole discourse, as a result, serves but to illustrate, not only (a) the theological ineptitude of the speaker, but (b) his moral insensitiveness as well, plus (c) his abysmal failure to plumb the depths of Job's real anguish (see Expos. on 23:2). So easily can right be made wrong. Recall how often the Bible has been pressed into the service of evil: to justify slavery, poverty, uncharitableness, and isolationism, both individual and national. The recipe is always the same: it was Bildad's, and he handled it expertly, with lyrical enthusiasm, after the manner of one singing a doxology.

2. Dominion and Fear.—True piety, unfortunately, is not inevitably the human response to divine majesty (see Expos. on 26:5-14). God may be able to quell all the discords of heaven (vs. 26) marshal his numberless hosts (vs. 3a; Isa. 40:26; with us too "the heavenly host" may mean either stars or angels; yet see Exeg.), search out with his light the hidden things of darkness (see Expos. on 24:13-17); but it does not follow that a man's awe will thereby necessarily be transformed into love (cf. Expos. on 9:2-10, 8-13; 88:1).

3b. God Is Light.—The word for arise is scarcely to be understood of the rising sun. Here is the light which God speeds on its way to reveal (see Exeg.), to guide, and to infuse with warmth and life (cf. John 1:9; Expos. on 29:3).
4 How then can man be justified with God? or how can he be clean that is born of a woman?
5 Behold even to the moon, and it shineth not; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight.
6 How much less man, that is a worm? and the son of man, which is a worm?

4 How then can man be righteous before God? How can he who is born of woman be clean?
5 Behold, even the moon is not bright and the stars are not clean in his sight;
6 how much less man, who is a maggot, and the son of man, who is a worm!"

even of the angels. This idea introduces the subsequent development (vss. 4-6). The LXX translates ἀνέβηκε παρ' άφρος, “his ambushed” (having read perhaps instead of ἀνεβήκε, the word ἀφρός. Some critics prefer this reading for the sake of respecting a satisfactory parallelism with vs. 3a, “And against whom does not his ambush stand?” Others suggest ἀλφρός, “his word” (cf. Ecclus. 48:10). The traditional rendering, however, may very well be correct, for it provides a revealing glimpse into the speaker’s mind and it offers an idea which fits the context. The greatness of God suggests his glory and his purity. This translation furnishes transition to the next passage.

4-6. Here Bildad is pursuing a theme which is the favorite of Eliphaz (4:17 ff.; 15:14-16) and Zophar (11:5-12), to which Job has once signified agreement (9:2; cf. 12:9-25; 14:4). But the renewal of this theme at this point is more significant than mere repetition. Job has spoken of the impurity of those “who rebel against the light” (24:13), and Bildad refuses to follow the lead, although he apparently feels the force of his opponent’s argument. He shrewdly twists the thread of reasoning by concentrating his thought not on the general spectacle of injustice in the world, but on the particular case of Job’s guilt. He rightly feels that here is another opportunity for him to make Job yield. How then can man be justified with God? (Vs. 4a.) Observe the use of the preposition δι', with, “beside” (rather than the prefix ὑπ' in 4:17). Can man obtain a righteousness independently of God? If even the moon and the stars are neither bright nor clean in his sight (vs. 5), no human creature should be brash enough to claim integrity, innocence, and perfection, especially when this human creature is “mortal man” (נְשָׁוֶת), one born of a woman (cf. 14:1), “the son of clay” or “of Adam” (בְּנוֹ יָד, an expression found only here and perhaps in 16:21), fit to be compared only—as Job well knows—to a maggot (cf. 7:5; 17:14; 21:25) and to a worm (Ps. 22:6; Isa. 14:11; 41:14). Thus Bildad does not merely repeat the statements of his friends: he introduces a vocabulary which has already been used by Job himself and thereby attempts to maneuver Job into assent.

From the praise of God’s majesty the thought runs smoothly to the acknowledgment of God’s glory, effulgence, and holiness, and thus sharply underscores the insignificance of man. But is it fair to argue from man’s puny limitations to man’s moral and theological impurity? Bildad does not at all suspect that such a line of reasoning introduces some highly dangerous and utterly false implications. He almost stumbles into the fantastic idea that as man’s finitude is the cause of his corruption, so also God’s omnipotence is at the basis of God’s perfection. Bildad reveals himself to be at this moment, like Eliphaz (cf. 22:2 ff.), one of the forerunners of Islamic monotheism. He ignores the categories of good and evil, he misunderstands the inner life of Job, and he fails to grasp the nature

6. How Much Less!—In the Bible man is a paradox of dust and divinity (cf. Ps. 8; Expos. on 7:17-18; 9:14-19; 16:5; 19:22a). Bildad would whittle Job down to insignificance, and argue from his limitations to his sinfulness (see Exeg.). The secret lies rather in man’s rebellion against his limitations, and therefore in the dreadful potentialities of the human will: not so much in the fact that he is rigidly circum...
26:1-4. Cold Comfort.—(See Expos. on 27:1-12. Strahan treats these verses as the introduction of Bildad’s third speech. The irony seems to fit better in the mouth of Job.) This is not the first time Job has delivered himself on the subject (see 13:12; 16:2; cf. Expos. on 6:18, 21-27; 13:1-12, 8; 19:2, 21). Perhaps it would better fit his frankly sarcastic mood, as well as his continuing self-assurance, to suppose that, far from confessing even by implication his own weakness and lack of understanding (vss. 2-3), he is taunting the friends with the air of superiority they have assumed toward him; as if to say, What do you take me to be (vs. 4a; see Exeg.)? You have an idea that I am a puny, ignorant sort of person, uncouth and unlettered (vs. 4b; see Exeg.). What a magnificent contribution you have made! (See Expos. on 25:5-14; they have given him a stone for bread; and instead of a fish, a serpent.) There is, however, back of it all, a wistful yearning for the very power and wisdom that try to cover up their deficiencies in irony. What he so desperately needs they could have given him (see Expos. on 6:14; 19:13-19). Consolations of God indeed! (See Expos. on 15:11; cf. 21:2.) Such consolations as theirs may have had another source (see Exeg.)!

b) [Job] The Futility of Helping a Powerless Man (26:1-4)

26:1-4. Vss. 2-4 are correctly attributed to the hero by the editor of the book (vs 1). When Bildad eloquently celebrates the divine omnipotence (25:2-6) Job readily agrees, of course, but he reflects with sad irony upon the total irrelevance of such an allocation. The help he needs is power and wisdom (vss. 2-3). Read in vs. 3b, labbur (ולבר) instead of lorobh (לרוב) (cf. Kennicott 82) and translate, “Practical wisdom to the ruffian [uncultivated person] thou hast revealed!” Job is on the verge of accusing his friend not only of failure but also of malicious intent. Bildad does not know what kind of man Job truly is. “With whom art thou spilling words?” (Vs. 4a.) Another interpretation, respectful of the parallelism, could be, “With whom hast thou conversed, and whose spirit hath issued forth from thee?” If this is the correct rendering of the verse, Job is suggesting satirically that Bildad, in spite of the loftiness of his sermon, has actually been moved by an evil spirit. Kissane (Job, p. 168) maintains the view that vss. 2-4 form a part of Bildad’s third discourse, for, except in 16:2 ff., where the use of the second person singular is justified, Job never speaks to his friends separately, but always addresses them en bloc in the second person plural. On the contrary, the friends quite naturally address Job in the singular. If vss. 2-4 were pronounced by Bildad, the line of thought would be somewhat as follows. Bildad, like Eliphaz (cf. 4:3-4), remarks over Job’s long habit of exercising pastoral responsibility over others. Has not Job succored those who had no strength (vs.}
5 Dead things are formed from under the waters, and the inhabitants thereof.
6 Hell is naked before him, and destruction hath no covering.

5 The shades below tremble, the waters and their inhabitants.
6 Sheol is naked before God, and Abaddon has no covering.

2a) Has not Job given advice to those who were deprived of wisdom (vs. 3a)? What has happened within the personality of this pastor and teacher which explains his present state of mind? Is he not animated by a spirit of evil? Has he not communed with a demon? Such an exegesis, whatever its validity may be, does not provide a satisfactory link with the Bildad context (25:2-6); it is therefore better to accept the heading of 26:1 as correct and to ascribe the passage to the hero.

c) [BILDAD] Man's Inability to Grasp the Power of God (26:5-14)

The theme of divine omnipotence is not foreign to Job's frame of mind. This is precisely the reason why in the first and second cycles he has accused the Deity of persecuting him without cause. But in the third cycle Job is no longer concerned primarily with the limitless power of the Deity. He charges God with indifference, aloofness, apartness, and unconcern for human justice (chs. 21; 28). Although the present section cannot be declared a priori to be an utter impossibility in the mouth of Job at this time, the exegete must recognize that there is no bond of thought between this passage and the lines which either precede (vss. 2-4) or follow (27.2 ff.). Moreover, these verses continue the theme inaugurated by Bildad in 25:2-6, and they furnish a normal, expected, and almost inevitable sequence to it. There the speaker used the motif of God's greatness in heaven in order to disregarde man's mortal and moral state on earth; here the speaker uses the motif of God's sovereign control over the underworld to stress the fact that nothing in the created world escapes the power of his will; and this idea slowly builds up into his final utterance on man's inability to understand God's ways (vs. 14).

5-6. After considering heaven and earth (25:2-6), the poet turns to hell. The shades (lit., "the Rephaim"; cf. Isa. 14:9; 26:14; Ps. 88:10) do not survive in a state of quiet serenity (contrast Job's musing in 3:15 ff.), but they tremble (vs. 5a). The waters of the underworld and their inhabitants "are in dread" (vs. 5b; the verb is now missing, but the meter as well as the syntax requires its presence; it may have been רנל, dropped by haplographic accident after the word תבלי, below, which belongs to the end of vs. 5a).

No part of the universe lies beyond the eyes of the Godhead. Sheol is naked before him, and even Abaddon, the lowest hell, has no covering (vs. 6). Job has expressed the wish to be hidden in Sheol in order to escape the attention of his Creator (14:13; cf. Ps. 139:8b, 11-12), but even there he would lie open to the gaze of the eternal persecutor. Observe the parallelism of naked and no covering, as in 24:7, where the same words are found. The thought that Sheol is within the range of God's jurisdiction and interest is an unusual one for the Hebrew mind (cf. 12:22; Ps. 139:7; Prov. 15:11; Amos 9:2).

Kissane 4 takes these verses as part of Bildad's third speech, to be followed at once by 27:7-23, assigning ch. 25 and 26:5-24 to Zophar. In that case Bildad is asking Job (and the you of vs. 2 is in the singular; except for 16:2, Job always addresses the friends in the plural), very much as Eliphaz had asked him (4:3-4), how it comes that he who has consoled so many is now comfortless, implying in 26:4 that he too had been accustomed to rely on both tradition and revelation while picturing for the wicked the destiny that awaits them (27:11, 12, 7-23). A clear instance of the difficulties—and plausibilities—that hound the steps of the interpreter through this cycle of the poem.

5-14. The Hem of His Garment.—What troubles Job, of course, is that he seems unable any longer to think of God as good. Bildad has nothing to offer for remedy but the very fact which for Job renders the problem insoluble. If God can do anything he likes, how can he be good? (Cf. Exeg. and Matt. 7:9-10.) "Almighty" is a word which is flung about too casually. There are times when more downright help is to be had of dwelling on what God cannot do, if man is still to be man, and God God. He cannot settle quarrels until we are ready to

4 Job, p. 164.
7. As in 25:2b, and in all doxologies of the Hebrew Bible, the praise of the Creator begins and continues with the use of verbs in the participle. He stretcheth out the north over the void [תֹּהֵו as in Gen. 1:2; cf. Jer. 4:23, Isa. 34:11; 45:18] and hangeth the earth upon nothing (cf. the parallelism between void and nothingness in Isa. 40:17, 23). This amounts to a poetic description of creatio ex nihilo. The northern regions of the earth are connected in a special way with the sojourn of the gods (cf. 23:9; also Isa. 14:13; Ezek. 1:4). Possibly the north designates here the Stella Polaris on which the constellations appear to circumambulate. Although the poet's cosmogony is geocentric, he fully understands that the earth rests upon nothing and receives its stability only from the will of the almighty Creator.

8-13. The waters above are kept securely in reserve (vs. 8), and God's throne (rather than moon, the eclipses of which have no relevance in this context) is properly veiled from human sight (vs. 9). He has described a circle [read שֶׁרְכֶנ as חָק-ָרוֹ] at the boundary between light and darkness (vs. 10). As in Prov. 8:27, God has set a limit to the forces of chaos. Traces of ancient mythological belief in a cosmic fight are visible in the background of the poetic development (vss. 11-13; cf. 3:8; 7:12; 9:13), but the motifs of pagan dualism are absorbed within the overwhelming monism of the theologian. God rules unchallenged. He is truly omnipotent.

---

7 He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing.
8 He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds; and the cloud is not rent under them.
9 He holdeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth his cloud upon it.
10 He hath compassed the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end.
11 The pillars of heaven tremble, and are astonished at his reproof.
12 He divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth through the proud.
13 By his Spirit he hath garnished the heavens; his hand hath formed the crooked serpent.

7 He stretches out the north over the void, and hangs the earth upon nothing.
8 He binds up the waters in his thick clouds, and the cloud is not rent under them.
9 He covers the face of the moon, and spreads over it his cloud.
10 He has described a circle upon the face of the waters at the boundary between light and darkness.
11 The pillars of heaven tremble, and are astounded at his rebuke.
12 By his power he stilled the sea; by his understanding he smote Rahab.
13 By his wind the heavens were made fair; his hand pierced the fleeing serpent.

---

7. As in 25:2b, and in all doxologies of the Hebrew Bible, the praise of the Creator begins and continues with the use of verbs in the participle. He stretcheth out the north over the void [תֹּהֵו as in Gen. 1:2; cf. Jer. 4:23, Isa. 34:11; 45:18] and hangeth the earth upon nothing (cf. the parallelism between void and nothingness in Isa. 40:17, 23). This amounts to a poetic description of creatio ex nihilo. The northern regions of the earth are connected in a special way with the sojourn of the gods (cf. 23:9; also Isa. 14:13; Ezek. 1:4). Possibly the north designates here the Stella Polaris on which the constellations appear to circumambulate. Although the poet's cosmogony is geocentric, he fully understands that the earth rests upon nothing and receives its stability only from the will of the almighty Creator.

8-13. The waters above are kept securely in reserve (vs. 8), and God's throne (rather than moon, the eclipses of which have no relevance in this context) is properly veiled from human sight (vs. 9). He has described a circle [read שֶׁרְכֶנ as חָק-ָרוֹ] at the boundary between light and darkness (vs. 10). As in Prov. 8:27, God has set a limit to the forces of chaos. Traces of ancient mythological belief in a cosmic fight are visible in the background of the poetic development (vss. 11-13; cf. 3:8; 7:12; 9:13), but the motifs of pagan dualism are absorbed within the overwhelming monism of the theologian. God rules unchallenged. He is truly omnipotent.

---

settle them. He cannot keep the wickedness of evil men from hurting the innocent, or bombs from bursting where little children are. "God's Weakness and Man's Might" is the tragic theme of history, brought only on Calvary and Easter to its great reversal (I Cor. 1:25). Strahan's comment that "the greatest thing in the world is not greatness" reminds one inevitably of Henry Drummond's exposition of I Cor. 13.6

The description that Bildad gives, however, of God's majesty is almost incomparably beautiful: the trembling of the dead in Sheol (giants? Gen. 15:20; Deut. 2:11), beneath the waters that support the dry land; the nakedness of the abyss to his piercing sight; the heavens that rest on nothing, and the earth that hangs from it; the miracle of the filmy clouds heavy with water but not breaking; the hiddeness of his throne (vs. 9); the circle he has drawn between the light and the darkness; the trembling of the mountains; the stilling of the sea, that daily conquest of all the powers of chaos; the clearing of the skies, the rift on the horizon as the storm passes or the day dawns—and all of it hardly the edge of his royal vesture, nothing but a murmur in the ear compared to the thunder of his power. Granted that one may discern here some drift toward a kind of pantheism (see Exeg. on 25:4-6), note nevertheless that God is still sovereign. Neither nature nor man can

---

5 Job, p. 283.

1094
14 Lo, these are parts of his ways; but how little a portion is heard of him? but the thunder of his power who can understand?

27 Moreover Job continued his parable, and said,

Lo, these are but the outskirts of his ways; and how small a whisper do we hear of him!

But the thunder of his power who can understand?"
2 As God liveth, who hath taken away my judgment; and the Almighty, who hath vexed my soul;

3 All the while my breath is in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils;

4 My lips shall not speak wickedness, nor my tongue utter deceit.

5 God forbid that I should justify you: till I die I will not remove mine integrity from me.

6 My righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go: my heart shall not reproach me so long as I live.

7 Let mine enemy be as the wicked, and

2 “As God lives, who has taken away my right, and the Almighty, who has made my soul bitter;

3 as long as my breath is in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils;

4 my lips will not speak falsehood, and my tongue will not utter deceit.

5 Far be it from me to say that you are right; till I die I will not put away my integrity from me.

6 I hold fast my righteousness, and will not let it go; my heart does not reproach me for any of my days.

7 “Let my enemy be as the wicked,

2-6. By one of the most extraordinary oaths of the Bible Job affirms once more the sincerity of his protest. God, he maintains, has disregarded his right (vs. 2a), and the Almighty has plunged his soul into bitterness (vs. 2b; cf. 3:20; 7:11; 10:1; 21:25). Job still swears by the life of this God. Nevertheless it must be recognized that the formula of oath requires the use of the name of the Deity, and that vs. 2 therefore may represent little more than colloquial habit.

Until death Job will maintain his integrity (tummāh; cf. 2:3). No compromise with his essential conviction will ever be possible. I hold fast my righteousness, and will not let it go (vs. 6a). The egocentric position of the battered giant remains entire and unshaken. Note the twelve uses of the first personal pronoun in the Hebrew text of vss. 2-6. He has once more searched his past, but he does not remember a single instance of untowardness. My heart does not reproach me for any of my days (vs. 6b).

7-10. Some commentators believe that this passage does not belong to the discourse

2-6. The Last Line of Defense.—As has already been said (see Expos. on 7:11, 19:6), Job’s mind is in danger of becoming godless; his heart never is. Again and again he tries to reconcile the two (see Expos. on 9:30-35; 14:13-15; 16:19; 19:25). He swears now by the God he loves before the God who has deprived him of the peace that was his due. And to this effect: (a) he is not lying (vs. 4; cf. 6:28), nor will he be either cajoled or browbeaten into agreeing with them (vs. 5); (b) he is guiltless, so help him God (vs. 6; cf. vs. 6a with 2:9; Luther translates vs. 6b, “My conscience bites me not in respect of my whole life”). True enough, as the Exeg. points out, the old self-centered confidence seems here as unshaken as ever. It is grimly, categorically, and insistently avowed: my right, my soul, my breath, my nostrils; my lips, my tongue, my integrity, my righteousness, my heart, my days (see Expos. on 23:10). Yet it must have something of what James Strahan calls heroic egocism. Says he:

† Quoted in Davidson and Lanchester, Job, p. 218.

Job is bribed by the promises, and bullied by the threats, of his friends to make confession of sin; he has the orthodox sentiment of a nation against him; and his body is wasted by disease. The temptation to see what can be done by humility is almost irresistible. But with a solemn oath—as if he required to do himself some violence—he flings it from him... He will never purchase human, nor even divine, favour by forgoing his integrity, re-nouncing his righteousness—an act of insincerity by which he would corrupt his conscience, destroy his manhood, and—strangest thought of all—incur the wrath of God.

(Cf. Expos. on 1:6-12; 8:20-22; 9:14-19; 13:1-12; 17:9.) With reference to all quid pro quo religion (see Expos. on 21:7-18; 31:24), note the words, “The temptation to see what can be done by humility.”

7-12. What Are the Facts?—If this passage (with the exception of vss. 11-12) is attributed he that riseth up against me as the unrighteous.

8 For what is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul?
9 Will God hear his cry when trouble cometh upon him?
10 Will he delight himself in the Almighty? will he always call upon God?
11 I will teach you by the hand of God that which is with the Almighty will I not conceal.
12 Behold, all ye yourselves have seen it; why then are ye thus altogether vain?

and let him that rises up against me be as the unrighteous.
8 For what is the hope of the godless when God cuts him off, when God takes away his life?
9 Will God hear his cry, when trouble comes upon him?
10 Will he take delight in the Almighty? Will he call upon God at all times?
11 I will teach you concerning the hand of God; what is with the Almighty I will not conceal.
12 Behold, all of you have seen it yourselves; why then have you become altogether vain?

of Job, and they assign it to one of his interlocutors, preferably Zophar, who does not speak a third time according to the state in which the poem has now been preserved in the extant Hebrew MSS and versions. It is argued that these verses cannot be ascribed to Job because they imply that he is again reconciled with God and has recaptured his ancient trust, and this is held to be irreconcilable with his previous (27:2) and subsequent (30:20, 23; 31:35-37) pronouncements. Vss. 7-10, however, do not at all indicate such a reconciliation. Without forcing the text, the interpreter may easily consider this passage as the sequence of vss. 2-6, and especially as the transition to vss 11-12 (which must be ascribed to the hero, since they are addressed to a plural audience). Let us trace the probable line of thought. Job once again has declared himself to be utterly innocent (vss. 5-6). In the concrete style of the ancient Near East he declares himself opposed to the wicked, the unrighteous (vs. 7), and especially to the hăněph or godless man (vs. 8a). He vigorously separates himself from such classes of men. As in 13:16, when he had said, “This will be my salvation, that a godless man [hăněph] shall not come before [God],” he declares that he cannot be accused of sin and therefore must not be confused with criminals. To be sure, there is a difference between this mood and that of utter skepticism as previously expressed (cf. especially 24:12c). He no longer states that God refuses to listen to any prayer. He now says that God does not hear the cry of the godless. The chief point of his argument seems to be this: How can the friends advise him to implore God when they maintain at the same time that he is a sinner?

11-12. These verses are probably the introduction of a development which is now lost. Job launches upon a new description of God’s in moral behavior. He will teach his friends, he will not conceal a truth which they themselves know by experience: Behold, all of you have seen it yourselves (vs. 12a). Why do they ignore those facts of universal observation? Why then have you become altogether vain? (Vs. 12b.) Indeed, the reader expects to find here another of Job’s discourses on the themes of God’s silence, the suffering of the just, or the prosperity of the wicked. The verses which follow (vss. 13-23), however, restate the old dogma of individual and collective retribution. The only possible conclusion is to conjecture that Job’s original discourse was editorially censored and replaced to Bildad or Zophar, as some suggest, it is to be understood as part of another straightforward delineation of the fate of the ungodly. In the mouth of Job (see Exeq.) it is another attempt to get at the real facts (see Expos. on 12:2-6; 21:5-6; cf. 18:21). After vehemently dissociating himself from the wicked (vs. 7), Job points out a glaring inconsistency in what the friends have been saying. The non sequitur appears in 22:5-20, 21-30. Why hope for recovery, when for his ilk there is no hope? Why pray, when God pays no heed to such as he? In the hour of death (vs. 8), in the day of trouble (vs. 9), all the life long of the godless man, there is no sanctu-
13 This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage of oppressors, which they shall receive of the Almighty.

14 If his children be multiplied, it is for the sword: and his offspring shall not be satisfied with bread.

15 Those that remain of him shall be buried in death: and his widows shall not weep.

16 Though he heap up silver as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay;

17 He may prepare it, but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver.

18 He buildeth his house as a moth, and as a booth that the keeper maketh.

19 The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered: he openeth his eyes, and he is not.

20 Terrors take hold on him as waters, a tempest stealeth him away in the night.

21 The east wind carrieth him away, and he departeth: and as a storm hurleth him out of his place.

“"This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage which oppressors receive from the Almighty:

14 If his children are multiplied, it is for the sword;

15 Those who survive him the pestilence buries,

16 Though he heap up silver like dust,

17 he may pile it up, but the just will wear it,

18 The house which he builds is like a spider’s web,

19 He goes to bed rich, but will do so no more;

20 Terrors overtake him like a flood;

21 The east wind lifts him up and he is gone;

it sweeps him out of his place.

\[\text{\textsuperscript{a}}\text{ Cn Compare Gk Syr: Heb He builds his house like the moth} \[\text{\textsuperscript{b}}\text{ Gk Compare Syr: Heb shall not be gathered}\] by a section borrowed from what was at first the third discourse of Zophar who, as has already been observed, does not in the present text speak a third time (see Intro., p. 888).

a) Fate of the Wicked Man’s Sons (27:13-23)

13-23. The portion of a wicked man with God is not described in the immediately following verses, which deal with the fate of “his sons” (vs. 14a) and of those who survive him (vs. 15a). It is therefore probable that vs. 13a is not the introduction to this passage but rather the conclusion of another, which may very well be 24:18-24 (see...
22 For God shall cast upon him, and not spare: he would fain flee out of his hand.
23 Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place.

Exeg., ad loc.). Those two fragments are today commonly ascribed to Zophar, who in the present text is deprived of a third discourse. This conjecture receives strong support from the fact that not only the ideas, but also the language and style, show the same characteristics as Zophar's. Vs. 13 is closely similar to an undisputed instance of Zophar's manner (20:29), and at least two passages in the fragment now under discussion evince Zophar's rhetorical habits (cf. vs. 20 with 20:25, 28 and vs. 21 with 20:23).

b) Job's Reply to Zophar's Third Discourse [7]

Inasmuch as the poetic discussion presents a threefold cycle and the poet offers a structural pattern which reveals complete mastery and skill, it is reasonable to conjecture that Job originally made a reply to the third discourse of Zophar (see Intro., p. 888). In all likelihood the editor who has placed the latter's utterances in the mouth of the hero is also responsible for deleting Job's reply, probably because it contained statements too shocking for a pious Jewish audience. In its stead the text now includes the "Hymn on Wisdom" (ch. 28).

E. Hymn on Wisdom (28:1-28)

There can be little doubt that this magnificent poem on the inaccessibility of wisdom to man does not belong to the discourses of Job (see Intro., p. 888). It is not written in his style; it is not connected with the Joban context (either 27:2-6 or 29:1 ff.); if Job had uttered it, the rebuke of Yahweh to him (chs. 38-41) would be either considerably weakened or even completely uncalled for. Some critics incline toward the opinion that one of the friends may have been the speaker, and it must be admitted that there is some argument in favor of this view. Bildad has spoken of the omnipotence of God in heaven, on earth, and in the underworld (25:2-6; 26:5-14); and the author of the hymn likewise is making a quest in all the parts of the cosmos in an effort to find wisdom. Zophar in his first discourse has shown that man cannot "find out the deep things of God" (11:7), and he wishes that the secrets of wisdom were revealed to Job (11:6). However, the link, if it exists, is of the most tenuous nature. Actually Zophar in ch. 11 is not speaking of wisdom in the same sense as that of the poet of the hymn;
2 Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass is molten out of the stone.
3 He setteth an end to darkness, and searcheth out all perfection: the stones of darkness, and the shadow of death.

for he has in mind the cognitive virtue of introspection which God may impart to some men in order to help them understand the meaning of their own situation as well as discover a sense of responsibility and, if the case need be, of guilt (11:6); whereas the poet of the hymn affirms that wisdom is possessed by God alone and is never placed at the disposal of man. One might perhaps entertain the hypothesis that one of the friends is singing an ancient hymn which does not exactly represent his own views—the words of hymns do not always fully or adequately express the singers' creed—but which might at least inspire a humble and reverent kind of agnosticism in the rebellious, proudly certain, and innocence-protesting hero. As it now stands, it provides a musical interlude between the poetic discussion properly speaking (chs. 4–27) and Job's peroration (chs. 29–31). It also foretells in some subtle way the thesis which is unfolded in the discourses of Yahweh (chs. 38–41), and it seems to signify that both Job and his friends have made vain claims to discern the ways of God with men.

It must furthermore be observed that several details of the hymn are closely paralleled in the discourses of Yahweh: (a) An Egyptian atmosphere is unmistakable in both pieces; the mines of 28:1–11 are in all probability those of the Sinaite peninsula, especially those of the Wadi Maghāra and of Serabit el-Khadim, which were exploited by the Egyptians; while there is no mention of mines in chs. 38–41, we find there several Egyptian motifs, such as the descriptions of the crocodile and the hippopotamus (chs. 40–41); (b) the association of “the deep” and “the sea” (28:14) reappears in 38:16; (c) more specifically, the unusual idiom, ניב נחש, “the sons of pride,” in the sense of “proud beasts” (28:8), is found again in 41:34 (Hebrew 41:26); (d) the rare expression,ODYAULLV, “and a way for the lightning of the thunder” (28:26b, sic) is found identically in 38:25b; (e) the peculiar phrase, תהלתכלישה, “under all the skies” (28:24), occurs also in 41:11 (Hebrew 41:3); (f) the whole passage on the control of God over the wind, the waters, the rain, and the lightning (28:25–27) finds its equivalent in 38:7 ff. (cf. Dhorme, Le livre de Job, p. lxxvi). In view of all these facts, one can affirm with a reasonable degree of certitude that the poem of the hymn is also the poet of the discourses of Yahweh, and probably, therefore, the author of the major part of the book (see Intro., pp. 891–92).

The hymn divides itself into three parts: (a) a man digs underground but cannot find wisdom (vss. 1–13); (b) the deep and the sea do not know wisdom (vss. 14–22); (c) God alone understands the way to wisdom (vss. 23–28).

1. SCIENTIFIC TECHNIQUE FAILS TO FIND WISDOM (28:1–13)

28:1–13. The achievements of man are truly stupendous, especially in the domain of what might be called technology. He needs metals, like silver, gold, iron, and copper (vss. 1–2), and he knows where to find them. He crawls even inside the bowels of the dawn which all along is trying to break through the black darkness of Job's soul (see Expos. on 8:23; 7:11; 9:30–35; 10:8–12; 12:13–19; 14:14; 16 19; 19:7, 25). Is he beginning to understand as never before the mysteries of godliness (see Expos. on 21:7–18; 31:2–4; Luke 19:8)? He knows now, with a dreadful knowledge, that there is a good to be had; but it is not the kind of good he thought (see Expos. on 1:6–12). If only he can have again some fellowship with the God who fashioned him! It will not be what it used to be.

It will be dissociated from much that once seemed bound up with it. It will be a queer mixture of things: sunshine and shadow, rough places and smooth, joy and sorrow, tears and laughter. They will all have their place: the tree by the rivers of water, the lamb among wolves; maybe wealth, maybe poverty; maybe peace, surely struggle; a glory somewhere, a conflict everywhere. Eugene O'Neill in Days Without End has his hero fall down at last 9 New York: Random House, 1934.

4 The flood breaketh out from the inhabitant; _even the waters_ forgotten of the foot: they are dried up, they are gone away from men.

5 _As for_ the earth, out of it cometh bread: and under it is turned up as it were fire.

6 The stones of it _are_ the place of sapphires: and it hath dust of gold.

7 _There is_ a path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen:

8 The lion's whelps have not trodden it, nor the fierce lion passed by it.

9 He putteth forth his hand upon the rock; he overturneth the mountains by the roots.

10 He cutteth out rivers among the rocks; and his eye seeth every precious thing.

---

JOB 28:10

4 They open shafts in a valley away from where men live; they are forgotten by travelers, they hang afar from men, they swing to and fro.

5 _As for_ the earth, out of it comes bread; but undereth it is turned up as by fire.

6 Its stones are the place of sapphires, _and_ it has dust of gold.

7 "That path no bird of prey knows, and the falcon's eye has not seen it.

8 The proud beasts have not trodden it; the lion has not passed over it.

9 "Man puts his hand to the flinty rock, and overturns mountains by the roots.

10 He cuts out channels in the rocks, and his eye sees every precious thing.

---

* Or _lapis lazuli_

---

In front of a crucifix and pour out his heart in anguish for a sick wife. The peril of that prayer was that she got well. Religion is not for that. One prays desperately for some dear desire and takes the fulfillment as a token of God's love. It may well be, or may not. But Paul prayed too, and desperately, about a thorn in his flesh (II Cor. 12:7-9). And God loved him too. To stand then on the perilous edge of things, and be God's man for weal or woe—who cares, if something of the eternal splendor comes to dwell in his face?

But there is another foregleam of the dawn that is breaking. At the precise moment of his own direst need Job is learning, as he had never known it before, the role that human compassion plays in human life. He has not been lacking in sympathy (ch. 51); but as Blake would seem to indicate (Illustration V depicts even at 50:25 a left-handed charity; see Expos. on 50:25), one has the feeling that his largess had been dealt out in the fear of the Almighty (51:23) from a kind of dais lifted above the common herd, was in very fact a giving of bounty to those with whom the giver had never sat, whose hunger had never gnawed at him, for whose tears he had shed none of his own. Not so now. His piteous cries for tenderness, for the warmth...
11 He bindeth the floods from overflowing; and the thing that is hid bringeth he forth to light.
12 But where shall wisdom be found? and where is the place of understanding?
13 Man knoweth not the price thereof, neither is it found in the land of the living.
14 The depth saith, It is not in me: and the sea saith, It is not with me.
15 It cannot be gotten for gold, neither shall silver be weighed for the price thereof.
16 It cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, with the precious onyx, or the sapphire.

11 He binds up the streams so that they do not trickle, and the thing that is hid he brings forth to light.
12 "But where shall wisdom be found? And where is the place of understanding?"
13 Man does not know the way to it, and it is not found in the land of the living.
14 The deep says, 'It is not in me,' and the sea says, 'It is not with me.'
15 It cannot be gotten for gold, and silver cannot be weighed as its price.
16 It cannot be valued in the gold of Ophir, in precious onyx or sapphire.\(^{\dagger}\)

\(^{\dagger}\) Gk: Heb its price
\(^{\ast}\) Or lapis lazuli tradition of erudite teachers. It is not obtained by observation or even experience. It is a capacity to live and to fulfill human destiny which transcends man's natural endowments.

Man does not know the way to it, and it is not found in the land of the living (vs. 13).

The poet is a pessimist about man, and he separates himself deliberately from all humanist optimists. He no longer believes that the secret of living lies within man's reach, at the disposal of man on this earth, accessible to an unaided, independent, autonomous, human being. Yet his pessimism is not his last word. It is merely a step in his adventure toward the truth which he intends to impart.

2. Religious Technique Is Equally Futile (28:14-22)

14-22. Since homo faber is unable by himself to become homo sapiens, is there no method whereby to approach and unlock the secret of human existence? Where will man turn in his anxiety to find a secure, enduring, and wholly satisfying fulfillment? He will ask tehôm, the deep, and yâm, the sea (vs. 14). Is this merely a poetic adornment, or does the poet refer by these words to the cultic practices of ancient Egyptian and Semitic polytheism? The exegete is unable to find in the text a clear demonstration of the latter hypothesis, but an inquiry into the purposes of the poet makes it likely. Here is universal man—not the member of the Hebrew covenant—in search of something greater and far more important than the golden fleece or the philosopher's stone. He is willing to pay an immense price for its purchase. Since the conquest of the natural world, expensive as of a friend's presence, for the gentleness of a friend's understanding, that longing for some man who might look into his eyes and know all that was behind them (see Expos. on 6:14, 18, 28-30), that longing for God which was like thirst to parched lips—will he forget it in days to come? Will there be scars now on every gift of his hand, the print of passion on his face, as there was on that other face which looking down on Jerusalem wept over it? Life calls not for sentiment, lofty though it may be, but for costly human compassion, making its way deliberately and with reverence into the center of another's condition, and bowing its head there. Wrongs are not righted by distant chatter, or by the finger tips of charity. They are righted by yearning hearts and steadfast journeys.

Is there even more? Is job learning, or beginning to learn, the answer to the poet's question: Where shall wisdom be found? and where 17 The gold and the crystal cannot equal it: and the exchange of it shall not be for jewels of fine gold.
18 No mention shall be made of coral, or of pearls: for the price of wisdom is above rubies.
19 The topaz of Ethiopia shall not equal it, neither shall it be valued with pure gold.
20 Whence then cometh wisdom? and where is the place of understanding?
21 Seeing it is hid from the eyes of all living, and kept close from the fowls of the air.
22 Destruction and death say, We have heard the fame thereof with our ears.

it is, remains of no avail, he will use that conquest, or the fruits thereof, to pursue his quest. He will turn to the cults and rites which from immemorial ages have channeled the efforts of man courting the infinite. The poet was not ignorant of the importance of religious practices in the ancient Near East. He knew what an immense amount of energy and treasure, such as gold, silver, onyx, sapphire, coral, crystal, pearls, topaz (vs. 15-19), was devoted to the exercise of piety, from Mesopotamia to the valley of the Nile and throughout the Fertile Crescent. It may therefore not be a literary accident that the mention of the deep and the sea (vs. 14) is followed immediately by the list of precious metals and stones (vs. 15-19). The forces of the abyss and of the primeval ocean were not only personified but also deified. Ancient man worshiped them as divine beings, and in a ceaseless effort to secure their favor and to obtain stability upon the earth he consecrated to the deities of the great abyss, under many names and circumlocutions, fabulous riches. He spent in their honor incommensurable hoards of wealth not only for the erection and ornamentation of shrines, but also for the seasonal celebrations of festive pageantry and ritual. Man paid a heavy price in order to commune with the universal forces or to be protected from them. Quite naturally man might ask of them the coveted prize—wisdom! He might seek access even to the deities of the underworld, Abaddon and Death. There may be a touch of irony in the fact that while the deep and the sea categorically reply to the seeker of wisdom, It is not in me, . . . it is not with me (vs. 14), Abaddon and Death tantalizingly but elusively declare, We have heard a rumor is the place of understanding? Certainly there is little in the Bible which is lovelier than this poem—far more than a grandiose nature poem—or more exquisitely wrought out. Jastrow calls it “one of the most impressive bits of literature in the entire Old Testament.” Wisdom, it says, that wisdom which is behind all created things, is not hidden in the earth, that men might dig for it, as they dig for silver and iron. Here is the mine where they are at work: man setteth an end to darkness, delving away into its farthest recesses with his shafts and his lamp. There is he forgotten of the foot that passes by; he hangs far from the crowd, swing-23 God understandeth the way thereof, and he knoweth the place thereof.

24 For he looketh to the ends of the earth, and seeth under the whole heaven;
25 To make the weight for the winds: and he weigheth the waters by measure.
26 When he made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder;
27 Then did he see it, and declare it; he prepared it, yea, and searched it out.

"God understands the way to it, and he knows its place.
For he looks to the ends of the earth, and sees everything under the heavens.
When he gave to the wind its weight, and meted out the waters by measure;
when he made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder;
than he saw it and declared it; he established it, and searched it out.

of it with our ears (vs. 22). Religious techniques, as well as scientific achievements, are futile of themselves in the domain which matters most for human existence.

3. GOD ALONE UNDERSTANDS THE WAY TO WISDOM (28:23-28)

23-28. When all human efforts have failed, and only then, is man ready to come to himself and to acknowledge that the God who created the cosmos and remains still "the faithful Creator" (vs. 24-25), understands the way to [wisdom] and . . . knows its place (vs. 23). For wisdom is the supreme possession of God. The poet does not say that God created it (cf. Prov. 8:22-31; Ecclus. 1:9), but he insists in his climactic verse that God, at the moment of his creative activity, took cognizance of its reality:

then he saw it and declared it:
he established it, and searched it out (vs. 27).

A careful progression is observed in the succession of the verbs used here: God first perceives the existence of wisdom (בְּרֵאשִׁית) and thereupon he measures it and computes its significance (בְּרֵאשִׁית); then, after he has tested its value, he fixes and settles it, or sets it up, thereby ensuring its stability and its duration (בְּרֵאשִׁית); finally he scrutinizes and explores it to its ultimate consequences (בְּרֵאשִׁית).

Most commentators think that the hymn originally ended with vs. 27, for they maintain that here the word הָוֹקֵם designates a metaphysical type of wisdom, hypostatized and divine, which remains forever inaccessible to finite man, whereas vs. 28 refers to practical wisdom, a way of life fully accessible to man, which is summed up in the twofold program, the fear of the Lord, and to depart from evil.

This exegetical position may very well be correct. It is true, in addition, that the word יִרְשָׁם, the Lord, is not found elsewhere in the book of Job. Nevertheless a case may be made for the thesis of the inevitability and therefore the authenticity of vs. 28. What who pour out their treasure in the market place or to the gods (see Exeg.). It cannot be gotten for gold or silver, onyx or sapphire (lapis lazuli; its appearance is referred to in vs. 6b) or glass (a precious thing grown common, not elsewhere directly referred to in the O.T.).

God alone understandeth the way thereof, it is he that knoweth its place (vs. 23). From the beginning of time he knoweth it, measureth it, exploreth it, God and none other. As for man, never shall he know it as God knows it. All that he may have in its stead is the fear of the Lord. For him, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom (see Exeg.).

Do these verses then belong precisely where they are? Were they written or inserted by somebody who knew where to put them? They are not the words of Job. They are the words of one who looks on, who has listened to everything that has been said, and understands. They are set here now at the end of the long debate, face to face with the impenetrable mystery of the divine. Is Job learning that? Is he learning that there is no "answer" to what he asks, no grasp of eternal principles, not with men, only with God? Is he learning that for him the only thing which can supply the place of an "answer" is the fear of the Lord, the love and the awe— not the "simple, homely piety" of which Strahan speaks—that could be like balm to his anguishd soul? Is the only answer—God?

Job, p. 289.
28:28 And unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding.

is the fear of the Lord? Is it merely an easy and familiar obedience to the rules of piety? And what is the avoidance of evil? Is it merely an easy and familiar obedience to the rules of ethics? In other words, is man able to obtain wisdom? If so, this wisdom is not the divine knowledge which belongs only to the Creator of the cosmos, but a practical attitude of human behavior. If such is the case, there is an irreducible discrepancy between vs. 24-27 and vs. 28. Yet two observations must be made. (a) The hymn begins with man's quest for wisdom, and the two refrains (vss. 12, 20) stress the fact that he cannot find it by his own endeavor. This stress does not mean that the reality he is pursuing is a divine, hypostatized wisdom, but only that wisdom is the possession of God, and that God therefore is free to dispense it to whomever he pleases. (b) Again, the wisdom of vs. 28 is not the result of an achievement of man. It may elude his grasp as much as the wisdom of vss. 24-27. How can man truly fear his Creator and truly depart from evil? The question remains unanswered. That is precisely the motif of the whole book. The hero claims that he is able to reach human perfection precisely in terms of utter devotion to the divine and of freedom from evil (1:1). The poet, however, slowly takes his audience into his confidence and prepares them to hear Job's discovery of a need for repentance (42:6). In the light of the total theme the exegete may well maintain that man in vs. 28 is unable to discover wisdom precisely because its price—the perfect fulfillment of the law—remains beyond his reach.

The choral interlude bears the reader aloft and subtly prepares him for the higher level of the theophany (38:1-42:6).

28. Man's True Wisdom.—Job's was a troubled soul; and that is worse than a sick body. There was no use "going to the shore," as we might advise, with shallow mind. He was not looking for "a complete rest, with plenty of salt air, and good, wholesome food." For what ailed him, he needed wisdom. He could scrape his boils, but he could not still the tumult within or appease the deepest hunger of his being. The man who goes to the shore has to take the tumult and the hunger with him. During a week or two at high prices he discovers that the ceaseless roll of the waves comes curling in on the beach only to slither back again in a dismal sort of futility—the twentieth-century equivalent, no doubt, of that profound futility of which the poet spoke, "The sea saith, It is not in me" (see Exeg.). Perhaps after a while he begins to wonder why people are so often passionately intent on treating sick bodies when it is the sick soul that needs treatment.

Take one or two modern "problems," modern only in the sense that so many of them have been given modern names. They are all as old as the hills, and just as real as mumps or measles, with a fatality curve that makes appendicitis and pneumonia look now like innocent bystanders. Fear: What was done yesterday was almost certainly the wrong thing. Something else would have been better. What has to be done tomorrow will turn out to be impossible. There is no doubt about it. And always the job. Perhaps illness. Frustration: The might-have been, if it had not been for—whatever it was! Hemmed in by circumstances, and making up for it by being offensive Conflict: The evil at war with the good, the real with the ideal, hopes for the future with the failures of the past—all of it slipping down into the subconscious and raising its mischief out of sight. There is little profit to be had out of trying to forget about it, or playing golf, or occupying oneself with something else.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased; Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow; Raze out the written troubles of the brain And with some sweet oblivion antidote Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff Which weighs upon the heart? *

The author of Job, whoever he was, far back on the other side of the centuries, was sure that the process had to begin in the place which he called "the place of understanding." No psychologist has ever got any farther. As we ap-

* Shakespeare, Macbeth, Act V, scene 3.
Moreover Job continued his parable, and said,

And Job again took up his discourse, and said:

F. Job's Peroration (29:1–31:40)

Some commentators maintain that Job in chs. 29–30 addresses the friends and perhaps even makes the missing reply to the third discourse of Zophar (see above, p. 1099). Such does not appear to be the case, for the hero is here summing up his past and present, and he depicts his own situation in a way not paralleled elsewhere in the extant parts of the third cycle. In fact every element of chs. 20–30, as well as each detail of ch. 31, shows that the debate is over. Job does not once speak to the friends in the second person plural, as he customarily does throughout the rhetorical exchange (see 27:5 ff.). He does not even utter one phrase for the friends' ears, or one word which might be construed as answering their arguments. Just as the discussion began with a soliloquy (ch. 3), it ends with a monologue, destined to emphasize the hero's dereliction. He rises above the level of disputation. He ignores his interlocutors as useless. He is alone.

Before Job completes his oration and returns to silence he recollects his former happiness (29:1–25), contrasts it with his present misery (30:1–31), and makes his final oath of clearance (31:1–40).

I. Remembering Happier Things (29:1–25)

With the sure touch which only a great artist possesses, the poet lets his hero reflect upon the days which are no more. Thus the nomadic ideal of quiet happiness, social proach the climax of the book, God himself will move over into the picture, and the hope and despair which have been making of Job's soul a battlefield will lay down their arms. The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom. And over the poor, scarred life that has been lifting its face to heaven, will spread, like the dawn of a clear day, the peace of God.

Leslie Weatherhead in Psychology in Service of the Soul* has told of a young girl who came to him on the verge of a nervous breakdown. Natural love for a friend and acquired hate had set her soul in opposite camps until Christ's answer to Peter's question was whispered back, "seventy times seven" (Matt. 18:22), and the ugly chapter in her life came to an end. Knowledge of self, forgiveness, courage, strength, these are "the mighty gifts" of God—when instead of merely looking at the idea of his presence, the mind is allowed to receive it. This sounds easy. But there is nothing easy about it. Desultory prayers, idle reading between the covers of a family Bible, singing hymns, running after cults that gather in hotel ballrooms—none of it will do. Doors have to be thrown open. Who can swing them back on their rusty hinges? Nature can be conquered, but who can conquer self? Flags have to be run down. Swords have to be surrendered. To depart from evil is understanding. Can anyone manage, unaided and alone? A lifeboat was launched one day on pounding seas from the "Washington." It pulled toward five men who were clinging to a wrecked plane.

There was a call for volunteers to swim the remaining distance with a line. Two of the sailors were out of the boat on the instant, plowing through the waves. In moments of high devotion, the preacher tells us—devotion of body, mind, or soul—there is little time left for that perilous stuff

Which weighs upon the heart.

But are moments enough when what is at stake is lifelong? Read John 14:15–27. Then, with Calvary past, hear the risen Christ, "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you" (John 20:21; cf. Matt. 13:46).

29:1–25. Sorrow's Crown of Sorrow.—The unrequited lover in Tennyson's "Locksley Hall" would make an interesting character study. A psychologist could hardly avoid such words as sadism, masochism, projection, egocentrism, etc. Certainly the hero is much given to sentimental brooding and self-pity. Why should "sorrow's crown of sorrow" be "remembering happier things"? Strahan* cites Boethius, Dante, and Chaucer. What they have to say, one by one, may be paraphrased somewhat as follows: "In every misfortune the worst is to have been happy once." "There is no greater woe than in wretchedness to recall times of felicity." "Fortune's sharpest adversity is to have the halcyon days of old keep running through the mind when all of them are gone." But why? Why not in the shadow remember the sunlight as a bless-

* Job, p. 242.
2 Oh that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; 2 “Oh, that I were as in the months of old, as in the days when God watched over me; responsibility, and gracious nobility, is re-created in a page which has no equal in, or perhaps outside, the Bible. To state that Job was a model of manhood (1:1, 8) is far easier than to describe him. Yet this is precisely what the poet has succeeded in achieving. Still more, he has made his hero offer a self-portrait which embodies the purest ideals of piety and morality, thus offering a convincing background for the final expression of pride—“Like a prince I would approach [God]” (31:37).

a) Bounties of God’s Presence (29:1-6)

29:2-6. The days when God watched over me: At once we learn the origin of the hero’s happiness. The months of old were filled with joy simply because a friendly God cared (vs. 2). His providence was like the shining of a lamp, the symbol and source of ing? (Cf. Expos. on 1:20-22, 2:7-10.) A man whose son had died at twenty-one was asked one day by his minister, in the quietness of deep friendship, “As between having him for twenty-one years, or not having him at all, which would you have chosen if the choice had been offered you?” Must the storm cloud forever blot even the memory of the noon? (See Expos. on 3:20-21.)

In ch. 30. as in many other passages, some of the reasons appear: First, a misapprehension of the nature of God. Job had not lost him; nor, what is more important, had he lost Job (see Expos. on 28:1-28). Second, a preoccupation with self (see Expos. on 16.18). Third, a misinterpretation of the present as hopeless (see Expos on 19.7; 30:1-31, 9-15; 31:1-40).

Sorrow’s royal crown was worn on Calvary by “a man of sorrows, ... acquainted with grief”; but the sorrow was not for himself, nor was the grief (Isa. 53:4). In prosperity Job was not unmindful of others (29:15-17); but in adversity the thought of them served only to deepen the gloom (7:11; 24:1-12). There have been those who have heard the cries of human life and responded. On a day when the news came that the social reforms he had so passionately championed had been defeated, Walter Rauschenbusch was found by his students in a classroom sitting at his desk with his head on his arms, sobbing. Instance the story of John Bright. Three days after his young wife died of tuberculosis, Richard Cobden called on him, and after some words of condolence said, “When the first paroxysm of your grief is past, I would advise you to come with me, and we will never rest till the Corn laws are repealed.” “I accepted his invitation,” added Bright, “and from that time we never ceased to labour hard on behalf of the resolution which we had made.”

* Article “John Bright” in Encyclopaedia Britannica; 14th ed.; IV, 148.

of William Wilberforce and the slave trade; the Emancipation Bill, culmination of his lifework, was passed in August, 1833, a month after his death. Elizabeth Fry and prison reform, first at Newgate, then on the Continent. Florence Nightingale and her work at the Scutari barrack hospital: in February 1855, the death rate was 42 per cent; in June of the same year, 2 per cent. Recall the lines in F. W. H. Myers’ Saint Paul:

Only like souls I see the folk thereunder,
Bound who should conquer, slaves who should be kings,

Hearing their one hope with an empty wonder,
Sadly contented in a show of things,

Then with a rush the intolerable craving
Shivers throughout me like a trumpet-call,
Oh to save these! to perish for their saving,
Die for their life, be offered for them all!”

2-20. The Blessedness of the Righteous.—The poet pictures in detail and with exquisite beauty the ideal life of the righteous man. Some would say there is nothing lofter in literature, before or after the N.T. Many a commemoratory tablet bears witness to the unforgettable loveliness of its phrasing (vss. 13, 15, 16). At the height of his fortunes, in the days of his maturity, remembered now with the infinite pathos of vs. 2 (cf. Expos. on 7:20a), vs 3 (cf. 18:6), vs 4 (cf. vs 4b with Expos. on 3:28), and vs 5 (see Expos. on vs. 5), Job would make his way to the city gate. At his approach the young men would withdraw, the aged would rise and stand, the princes would lay their hand on their mouth (cf. 40:4). Of all men he was blessed; for he had delivered the poor ... and the fatherless. ... him that was ready to perish, and had caused the widow's heart to sing for joy. He had been eyes to the blind, ... feet to

* Sts. xci-xcii.
3 When his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness:

4 As I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle;

5 When the Almighty was yet with me, when my children were about me;

6 When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil;

7 When I went out to the gate through the city, when I prepared my seat in the street!

8 when his lamp shone upon my head, and by his light I walked through darkness;

9 as I was in my autumn days, when the friendship of God was upon my tent;

10 when the Almighty was yet with me, when my children were about me;

11 when my steps were washed with milk, and the rock poured out for me streams of oil!

12 When I went out to the gate of the city, when I prepared my seat in the square, felicity (cf. 18:5-6; 21:17). In the light of God's presence Job saw light (cf. Ps. 36:9), even while he walked through darkness (vs. 3). He lived then in the days of "fruit gathering": a season which for the ancient mind did not suggest the late maturity that ushers in the old age, but rather the time when nature yields her increase and the early rains revive the parched soil and fill man with the energy of triumphant adulthood (RSV unfortunately suggests in the word autumn an idea which does not correspond with the intention of the poet).

Vs. 4b is difficult. When the friendship of God was upon my tent (RSV) is an attractive translation which disregards the difficulties of the text and the witness of the ancient versions. This construction of the word ח بدا, secret, "confidential and intimate circle," "familiar converse," hence friendship (cf. 15:8; 19:19), preceded by the preposition ה, "in," and followed by the preposition ק, upon, is hardly possible. Moreover, the LXX, Symm., and the Syriac read וָנִים instead of וָנִים. Thus the rendering of the phrase easily becomes "when God protected my tent" (cf. 1.10). The joy of God's presence (vs. 5a) is increased as well as manifested by the playful gathering of the hero's children (vs. 5b; lit., "my youngsters") and the opulence of his living (vs. 6).

b) Satisfactions of Social Esteem (29:7-13)

7-13. Job not only lived in the blessing of God as it gave him health, posterity, and wealth (vs. 2-6); he also enjoyed the satisfaction of being approved by men because he the lame, and father to the poor, searching out beyond all custom even the cause of the stranger. Little wonder that he expected "goodness and mercy" to follow him all the days of his life: counselor to the mighty (vs. 21-24) and friend to the weak (vs. 25c).

Observe that (a) his blessedness had its source in God. This was not the kind of philanthropy that comes of mere involvement in the common lot of humanity; cf. Sam Walter Foss's none-too-profound little poem, "The House by the Side of the Road":

Let me live in my house by the side of the road
Where the race of men go by;
They are good, they are bad, they are weak, they are strong.
Wise, foolish—so am I.
Then why should I sit in the scorners seat,
Or hurl the cynic's ban?
Let me live in my house by the side of the road
And be a friend of man.

(b) His piety was a true piety, Godward and manward (vs. 14). The righteousness that was of God clothed itself with him (cf. Judg. 6:34); the justice that marked his dealing with others was the habit of his life, as native to him as robe and... turban (see ch. 31; Expos. on 1:1, 2-3). (c) His position carried with it not only the enjoyment of privilege but the weight of civic and social responsibility. He was the champion of the wronged and the helpless, even at danger to himself (vs. 17). He moved far beyond the natural area of kinship (vs. 16; 8 cf. Matt. 12:48, 50). Observe too the notes that are lacking: Matt. 5:4, 6, 10, 11; 11:6; 13:16; 16:17; Luke 6:21, 22; 10:23; 11:28; 19:38; John 20:29.

3. The Light that Never Fails.—(See Expos. on 25:3b.) Nothing is more evident throughout the book than this, that for Job the light of

8. The young men saw me, and hid themselves: and the aged arose, and stood up.
9. The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand on their mouth.
10. The nobles held their peace, and their tongue cleaved to the roof of their mouth.
11. When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me:
12. Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him.
13. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me: and I caused the widow’s heart to sing for joy.
14. I put on righteousness, and it clothed me: my judgment was as a robe and a diadem.
15. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame.
16. I was a father to the poor: and the cause which I knew not I searched out.

fulfilled with ease and earnestness the civic duties which naturally fell upon him. As a seminomad, he lived under a tent during the grazing season (cf. vs. 4b) but settled down in a town in winter; and at the gate of the city (note the use of the Canaanite word תֵּחָן; cf. Prov. 8:3; 9:3; 11:11) not merely young men but even the aged behaved toward him with utmost respect (vss. 7-8). Incidentally, this trait indicates that the poet did not conceive of his hero as an old man, but rather represented him as a young adult in the full possession of his powers. Even the princes and the nobles in deference to the wisdom of his judgments and the high sincerity of his moves and motives were speechless in his presence (vss. 9-10). Job’s happiness, however, did not elicit envy: his fame as a benefactor spread abroad and brought him nothing but congratulations and approval (vs. 11; the verb נָשָׂא, “to pronounce happy,” is a cognate of the word נשא used in the biblical beatitudes, Ps. 1:1; etc.).

c) Claims of Righteousness (29:14-20)

14-20. Job’s harmonious family life and social pre-eminence were due to the fact that his righteousness belonged to him as genuinely as a well-fitting and well-worn vestment. He walked clothed in his justice as felicitously as in his robe and turban (vs. 14). His awareness of doing right with men was coupled with the certainty of living in a right relationship with God. His ethics was the flower of his religion (cf. Exeg. on 1:1). Not only was he eyes to the blind, feet to the lame, a father to the poor, but also he searched out the cause of him whom [he] did not know (vss. 15-16). His more biblical, to reverse the order” (see Expos. on 19:25).

15. Eyes to the Blind, Feet to the Lame.—To help men see what they cannot see unaided, to help them achieve what they cannot achieve alone (see Expos. on vs. 24). Vision—of the world, of others, and of self—and power, these are key words in the epic of every soul that knows where it stands: at the point of intersec-
17 And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth.

18 Then I said, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand.

19 My root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch.

20 My glory was fresh in me, and my bow was renewed in my hand.

21 Unto me men gave ear, and waited, and kept silence at my counsel.

22 After my words they spake not again; and my speech dropped upon them.

23 And they waited for me as for the rain; and they opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain.

24 If I laughed on them, they believed it not; and the light of my countenance they cast not down.

17 I broke the fangs of the unrighteous, and made him drop his prey from his teeth.

18 Then I thought, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand,

19 my roots spread out to the waters, with the dew all night on my branches,

20 my glory fresh with me, and my bow ever new in my hand.'

21 "Men listened to me, and waited, and kept silence for my counsel.

22 After I spoke they did not speak again, and my word dropped upon them.

23 They waited for me as for the rain; and they opened their mouths as for the spring rain.

24 I smiled on them when they had no confidence; and the light of my countenance they did not cast down.

social compassion led him to investigate the cases of oppression everywhere to the point of risking trouble with the oppressors (vs. 17). Such an extraordinary pursuit of good deeds led him to believe that he had earned the right to a long and happy life in the midst of his own descendants (vs. 18-20). The expression אֲשֹׁר יִקְדֹּשֵׁנִי, I shall die in my nest (vs. 18a), is peculiar since the preposition יָבֹא means "with," "in the company of." In addition, the ancient versions differ widely from the M.T. Although the exact meaning is doubtful, the general sense is clear enough. (It is possible that instead of nest and sand one should translate "reed" and "palm tree." ) Job expected to live to an advanced age (vs. 18b). The comparison with a tree growing in a well-watered land is a familiar one (vs. 19; cf. 8:16-17; 14:7-9; 18:16). Furthermore, a good case may be made for the pointing of בָּשָׁם, sand, as הָצֹל, "phoenix," a word which brings a startling image and fits the traditional idea of the nest in vs. 18a. In any case, Job hoped that even at the end of his years he would still be in full possession of his youthful energy (vs. 20; the bow is a symbol of manly strength, cf. Gen. 49:24; Jer. 49:35).

d) Prestige of Integrity (29:21-25)

21-25. According to most modern interpreters, these verses are now displaced, for they depict once again (as in vs. 7 ff.) the deference paid to the hero by the men of his community; and they are introduced not by nouns but by verbs in the masculine plural which presuppose the plural nouns of vs. 8-10, "the young men," "the aged," "the princes," "the nobles." (Observe that the versions insert the word Men at the beginning

24. The Ministry of Faith.—If the RSV gives us the correct meaning of this obscure passage (see Exeg.), an interesting, though somewhat hazardous exposition suggests itself. One must not be misled by the patriarchal setting, but rather picture to oneself the condition of the postexilic Jews (cf. Expos. on 20 12-16). In days when uncertainty and fear lie like a pall over the landscape we are to see a man whose inner resources are unfailling (vs. 24b). He is not merely an optimist who insists that every cloud has its silver lining, and is ready at the drop of a hat to rip out the lining and throw the cloud away. Carlyle once accused Emerson of that kind of dishonesty; said he was like a chatty fellow away up on a beach, throwing a cheery word or two to poor souls battling in the great dark deeps, with the thundering billows

1110
25 I chose out their way, and sat chief, and dwelt as a king in the army, as one that comforteth the mourners.

25 I chose their way, and sat as chief, and I dwelt like a king among his troops, like one who comforts mourners.

30 But now they that are younger than I have me in derision, whose fathers of vs. 21 in order to make the phrase intelligible.) In all probability vs. 21-25 should come between vs. 10 and vs. 11. As Job said that silence fell when he made his appearance at the city gate (vss. 9-10), he continues by recalling that silence was maintained as he spoke (vs. 21) and even after he had finished speaking (vs. 22), for his advice carried with it the weight of final authority. Indeed, his companions waited for [him] as for the rain (vs. 23a)—a powerful image in the ancient Near East, where life at the end of summer is at a standstill until the first thundershower “renew the face of the soil.” Job’s opinions, however, were even more pregnant than the autumnal rain. They brought decision to maturity, as the spring rain in March or April brings the young shoots to fruition (vs. 23b). Born and accustomed to be a leader, Job restored with a smile the confidence of his colleagues whenever it wavered (vs. 24a). Such is at least the possible meaning of a difficult text (cf. RSV). It is true that the wording of the sentence seems to support the interpretation of the traditional Jewish commentators, “When I smiled at them, they did not even dare to believe it” (cf. 9:16). But vs. 24b means and the light of my countenance they did not cast down, and the parallelism requires complementary ideas in the two lines. In other words, Job was not only able to instill into the men of his community a spirit of confidence when they lacked it (vs. 24a), but his own serenity and power of decision were never undermined by their want of courage, vision, or faith (vs. 24b). The sequence of thought in vs. 25 confirms this exegesis. Job traced the course of his fellow citizens and they followed it faithfully. Thus he was for them more than a chief or a king (vs. 25ab): he was like one who comforts mourners (vs. 25c), i.e., he had a sense of pastoral responsibility. There is no need to correct the text on the ground that the idea of consolation for mourners is out of place here. The sense is quite plain. Job sums up his relationship with all classes of society: the public figures, the statesmen (vs. 25a), the people at large (vs. 25b), and the weak members of the community (vs. 25c).

2. The Suffering of this Present Time (30:1-31)

As an abrupt contrast with the idyllic picture of an irretrievable past, Job offers the concrete and circumstantial description of the calamities he now endures. The present text of ch. 30 offers many difficulties in its details. In addition, the sequence of thought is far from smooth, and it may be that the material which is gathered here is of quite heterogeneous origin; e.g., vss. 2-8 may have belonged to another poem, or they may have been displaced accidentally from another context (such as 24:5 ff.). At any rate, the threefold use of the expression נַפְלֶה, But now, in vss. 1, 9, 16, and that of the word knocking the breath out of them (cf. Expos. on 3:20-21). It was not Job’s temperament but his faith that would not desert him; not even in his own direst distress (see Expos. on 28:1-28). He was wroth with one he had loved. Madness, not doubt, assailed him, as the old gave way before the new. Moral and intellectual integrity may have to wrestle for a foothold at “the removing of those things that are shaken” (Heb. 12:27); but out of the wrestling, as from nothing else, comes the psalmist’s assurance, “Thou hast set my feet in a larger room” (Ps. 31:8). “As for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well-nigh slipped. . . . Until I went into the sanctuary of God” (Ps. 73:2, 17).

Only such a one has it in his power to restore the confidence of others (vs. 24a). There is a contagion not only of evil but of good (see Expos. on vs. 15; cf. vs. 23, the rain which refreshes, restores, and brings to maturity). For the Christian the center from which it spreads is Christ himself (Matt. 9:2; 14:27; John 16:33).

30:1-31. How to Reckon the Sufferings of This Present Time.—(See Expos. on 29:1-25.) To
I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock.

2 Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was perished?

3 For want and famine they were solitary; fleeing into the wilderness in former time desolate and waste:

4 Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper roots for their meat.

5 They were driven forth from among men, (they cried after them as after a thief,)

6 To dwell in the cliffs of the valleys, in caves of the earth, and in the rocks.

7 Among the bushes they brayed; under the nettles they were gathered together.

8 They were children of fools, yea, children of base men: they were viler than the earth.

whose fathers I would have disdained to set with the dogs of my flock.

2 What could I gain from the strength of their hands, men whose vigor is gone?

3 Through want and hard hunger they gnaw the dry and desolate ground;

4 they pick mallow and the leaves of bushes, and to warm themselves the roots of the broom.

5 They are driven out from among men; they shout after them as after a thief.

6 In the gullies of the torrents they must dwell, in holes of the earth and of the rocks.

7 Among the bushes they bray;

under the nettles they huddle together.

8 A senseless, a disreputable brood, they have been whipped out of the land.

Heb ground yesterday waste

יָא, "surely," in vs. 24, indicate four main developments: (a) the irreverence of worthless men (vss. 1-8); (b) the hostility of society (vss. 9-15); (c) the cruelty of God (vss. 16-23); and (d) the misery of dereliction (vss. 24-31).

a) Irreverence of Worthless Men (30:1-8)

30:1-8. Job complains that now the sons of men who were not even good enough to be set with the dogs of [his] flock make sport of [him] (vs. 1; cf. 19:18). The expression צֵאשׁ רֹאשׁ פֶּסֶן לוֹזֵים, “more insignificant than I in days,” suggests once again that Job considered himself as a young man (cf. 29:8). The idea of vs. 2 is surprising in the mouth of a man who claims to have been “eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame” (29:15). Job is here presented as saying that he has nothing but disdain for men whose “rugged vigor” (cf. 5:26) has prematurely vanished: the strength of their hands would have been profitless to their employer. The thought seems to be even more strange when the subsequent context (vss. 3-4) makes clear that their physical weakness was the result of their hunger, which in turn was due to the fact that they had been expelled from society (vss. 5-7). Moreover, clear justification of their ostracism is not offered, except that they are described as נָעֻר כֹּרֶא פָּתִים, “sons of fools,” “senseless or ignoble men” in a moral and religious rather than in a purely mental sense (cf. 2:10; II Sam. 3:33; Ps. 14:1), and “sons of no name” or base men (KJV), a disreputable brood (RSV).

reckon means either to enumerate or to estimate. In both senses one encounters many an unexpected difficulty when the reckoning has to do with what Paul calls in one place “the sufferings of this present time” (Rom. 8:18). All too often the very enumeration itself is made in the mood of self-pity, with the resulting exaggerations, frustrations, and distortions (cf. the “four main developments” indicated in the Exeg.). These last may even serve to explain, in some measure at least, the contemptuous tone of vss. 2-8 (cf. 24:5-8, 10-11; 31:15; yet see Exeg.). If not in self-pity, then by way of excuse, in order to avoid responsibility. No such motive, of course, can be assigned to Job—unless indeed there is a modicum of truth, after all, in the suggestion that aside from the judicial and the punitive, human suffering has also probative (so the friends) and educative (Elihu) aspects. Sure it is, in any case, that enumeration alone, without any attempt at appraisal, is fraught with danger. When the talk is of estimating, the difficulties increase by leaps and bounds (see Expos. on vss. 9-15). Three things are note-9 And now am I their song, yea, I am their byword.
10 They abhor me, they flee far from me, and spare not to spit in my face.
11 Because he hath loosed my cord, and afflicted me, they have also let loose the bridle before me.
12 Upon my right hand rise the youth; they push away my feet, and they raise up against me the ways of their destruction.
13 They mar my path, they set forward my calamity, they have no helper.
14 They came upon me as a wide breaking in of waters: in the desolation they rolled themselves upon me.

9 "And now I have become their song, I am a byword to them.
10 They abhor me, they keep aloof from me; they do not hesitate to spit at the sight of me.
11 Because God has loosed my cord and humbled me, they have cast off restraint in my presence.
12 On my right hand the rabble rise, they drive me forth, they cast up against me their ways of destruction.
13 They break up my path, they promote my calamity; no one restrains them.
14 As through a wide breach they come; amid the crash they roll on.

| Heb my feet | 1 Cor: Heb helps | 2 Cor: Heb is he |

b) Hostility of Society (30:9-15)

9-15. Whatever the significance of the preceding verses, there is little doubt that in the present passage Job is developing the familiar theme of his own social isolation. He explains it as a result of his physical exhaustion which even the lowest samples of humanity interpret as an act of God (vs. 11). The persecutions he endures from men (vss. 12-14) confirm the fact that he has lost his "nobility" and "salvation" (vs. 15bc; cf. the "spirit of nobility" and the "joy of salvation" in Ps. 51:12).

worthy about Paul's attempt: the pride he took in his infirmities (cf. vs. 15bc with II Cor. 12 9); his determination (cf. vs. 20 with II Cor. 4:8:10, 15-16, 6:4:10); and his ultimate assurance (cf. vs. 28 with II Cor. 4:17-18; Rom. 8:18). God had his own plans and they were good. To live, then, not for the goodness of the plan but for the love of the Planner and his purpose (Rom. 5:10).

9:15. Listing Liabilities.— (See also vss. 23, 24-31.) The trouble is, who knows what liabilities are? They may be assets, and the assets may be liabilities. On what side of the ledger to make the entry? (Cf. Expos. on 7:1-6; 21:26.)

The apostle Paul had a hale and hearty way of keeping his accounts. There was never any question as to the color of the ink when it came time to strike the final balance. It would be black, not red. No matter what happened, God would get into it and throw it all over on the credit side, he was sure of that; and because he was, he was never quite sure in which column to set down the separate items temporarily. "Thrice was I beaten with rods." In his mind, which side was that on when it happened? Credit or debit? "A night and a day I have been in the deep." What was he using that night and that day, a plus sign or a minus sign? "There was given to me a thorn in the flesh." Was he subtracting at that point or adding? (See II Cor. 11:25; 12:7.) What would it be like to be like that? To put a finger on whatever it is that seems to stand in the way, then look up into God's face, and all at once be actually unable to tell any more where to enter it? A genius for mathematics. Where will a man enter that? It can ruin him. Ill health? In what column will he set that down? It can be the making of him.

Laozze tells of an old Chinese whose one horse strayed off and was lost. His friends in the village toiled up the hill to offer their condolences; but the old farmer looked at them and smiled. "How do you know this is bad luck?" he said. Soon the lone horse came back and brought with him a whole drove of wild horses. Whereupon the friends toiled up once more, this time to offer their congratulations. But the farmer asked them, "How do you know this is good luck?" In a week or two his son, who with so many horses about had almost learned to ride, fell and broke his leg. Again the pilgrimage, the condolences, and the question, "How do you know this is bad luck?" The next month war broke out, and his son by reason of the injury.
15 Terrors are turned upon me: they pursue my soul as the wind: and my welfare passeth away as a cloud.

16 And now my soul is poured out upon me; the days of affliction have taken hold upon me.

17 My bones are pierced in me in the night season: and my sinews take no rest.

18 By the great force of my disease is my garment changed: it bindeth me about as the collar of my coat.

19 He hath cast me into the mire, and I am become like dust and ashes.

20 I cry unto thee, and thou dost not hear me: I stand up, and thou regardest me not.

21 Thou art become cruel to me: with thy strong hand thou opposest thyself against me.

15 Terrors are turned upon me;
my honor is pursued as by the wind, and my prosperity has passed away like a cloud.

16 "And now my soul is poured out within me;
days of affliction have taken hold of me.

17 The night racks my bones, and the pain that gnaws me takes no rest.

18 With violence it seizes my garment;
 it binds me about like the collar of my tunic.

19 God has cast me into the mire, and I have become like dust and ashes.

20 I cry to thee and thou dost not answer me;
I stand, and thou dost not heed me.

21 Thou hast turned cruel to me;
with the might of thy hand thou dost persecute me.

\(^1\) Gk Heb my garment is disfigured \(^n\) One Heb Ms and Vg: Heb lacks not

c) Cruelty of God (30:16-23)

16-23. The physical pains that Job endures are indeed due to the direct will of the Deity (vs. 19). So for the last time Job addresses his divine tormentor and utters his accusation against him (vss. 20-23). Not only does God refuse to answer his proud prayer (notice the possible implication of the verb I stand up in vs. 20b), but he also intensifies his strokes (vss. 21-22) until death comes (vs. 23).

was exempt.\(^9\) It is hard to say to what lengths the story might have been extended! Besides, whatever happens, it has to pass through the alembic of the human soul (see Expos. on 3:20-21). Out of how much weakness has come strength; and vice versa (cf. Expos. on 20:4-11; see also Expos. on 29:1-25; 31:2-4; 34 9)! Nobody has to stop anywhere and say: "That's how it is. If I'm to make the least bit of headway, I've got to use the other stuff I have and let that go." Nothing needs to be let go. If anything—this side of what—is mere wastage that cannot be used, life is an idiotic game of chance. Psychologists talk about accepting the self. They mean that people need not fret and fume, grow peevish and resentful, because they are not Alexander the Great or Helen of Troy. They never have to accept the self and sit down beside it and eat an apple. The whole Christian gospel keeps saying over and over that nothing is refuse. No one has to brush his hands and be rid of anything before he can even start. He can start with it. There is something in this universe that makes it possible for good to come not only in spite of evil, but straight out of it. This is what came straight out of Paul's black heap of failure and disappointment: "Blessed be God, even... the God of all comfort; who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God" (II Cor. 1:3-4). It is reminiscent of another desolate place, where the gentlest life the world has ever seen hung spread-eagled on its two beams of wood, halfway between the heaven he was and the hell men made to answer it. How straight out of that came the N.T. to lift up a man's head and set his feet where God's feet are, with all the broken heart of the Eternal to make him whole again! All God means is beyond. He took to changing minus signs into plus signs the day he made a cross.

22 Thou liftest me up to the wind; thou causest me to ride upon it, and dissolvest my substance.

23 For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living.

24 Howbeit he will not stretch out his hand to the grave, though they cry in his destruction.

25 Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? was not my soul grieved for the poor?

22 Thou liftest me up to the wind, thou makest me ride on it, and thou tossest me about in the roar of the storm.

23 Yea, I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living.

24 "Yet does not one in a heap of ruins stretch out his hand, and in his disaster cry for help?"

25 Did not I weep for him whose day was hard?

Was not my soul grieved for the poor?

Ca: Heb obscure.

---

d) Misery of Dereliction (30:24-31)

24-31. The Hebrew of vs. 24 is most obscure, but the rendering of the RSV is not impossible. Like any other man in a heap of ruins, Job had cried for help (vs. 24); and he expected an answer, since he had in the past responded to the calls of men and women in distress (vs. 25; cf. 29:11-17). But nothing came except evil and darkness (vs. 26).

"justice" fills Job with terror (vs. 15; cf. 21:6; Expos. on 23:15). It must always be remembered, however, that the God whom he accuses is the God of the old faith, and that a new faith is being born (see Expos. on 14:13-15). For the terms of the indictment see Exeg. (cf. vs. 11 with 29:20b). If only the God of the old faith would write as clearly (31:35c). For the emergence of the new see Expos. on 16:19; 19.25, 27.

24. The Cry for Help.—(Cf. 19:7; 24:12; 27 9.) If this verse is to stand as in the RSV, one may comment on the pathos of that cry, and on the instinctive nature of it. It is not a cry to man but to God. Whether in profound gratitude or in deep distress there is the outstretched hand. Said Sir Leslie Stephen, as he wrote of his second wife after she had died, recalling all the tenderness of her love, "I thank—" and suddenly ran headlong into the tragedy of his own faith, adding lamely, "—something—that I loved her as heartily as I know how to love." So with Swinburne:

From too much love of living,
From hope and fear set free,
We thank with brief thanksgiving
Whatever gods may be
That no life lives for ever;
That dead men rise up never;
That even the weariest river
Winds somewhere safe to sea.

In a recent novel a man has leaped overboard in the night to rescue a friend. They both cling to a buoy as the yacht circles round and round unable to locate them. Finally, as their strength is ebbing, together they watch the lights disappear on the horizon. Says one to the other, when the last hope has flickered out, "I suppose, for somebody like me, who hasn't prayed for years, there's no use praying now." And the other answers, "No. Better go on as we have come." Farther down than the denial, the affirmation; under the "No" the "Yes". As for God, he is not proud. If disaster is the only thing that can drive us to him, it was shame to come; but greater shame not to (cf. Matt. 11:28; Luke 15:18-19; Expos. on 19:7; 24.12c; 35:9-16; 38:1). It is interesting to note that in Blake's Illustration I, the evening prayers in which Job's family are engaged are being read from books, while the musical instruments of spontaneous praise hang silent upon the tree."

25. Putting God Under Obligations.—Again there is obscurity. It is, however, quite possible that Job is thinking of the compassion which he himself has shown (see Exeg.), and suggesting that on God's side there ought to be, in all decency, something comparable. He has kept his part of the bargain, and so has given God reason enough for living up to his. This is to misunderstand not only the nature of the good (cf. 4:17-19), but also the ground of the obligation (cf. 22:8). On both counts, if Eliphaz had not pressed his premises to the wrong conclu-

2-"The Garden of Proserpine," st. xi.
3 Damon, Doctrine of Job, ad loc.
26 When I looked for good, then evil came \textit{unto me}: and when I waited for light, there came darkness.

27 My bowels boiled, and rested not: the days of affliction prevented me.

28 I went mourning without the sun: I stood up, \textit{and} I cried in the congregation.

29 I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls.

30 My skin is black upon me, and my bones are burned with heat.

31 My harp also is \textit{turned to} mourning, and my organ into the voice of them that weep.

31 I made a covenant with mine eyes; why then should I think upon a maid?

The frustration brings a new wave of utter exasperation (vs. 27a; lit., “my bowels are made to boil”; cf. Lam. 1:20; 2:11). His disease has disfigured him (vs. 28a); and although he stands up \textit{in the assembly}, crying for help (vs. 28b), he remains as far apart from man as if he were \textit{a brother of jackals, and a companion of ostriches} (vs. 29; cf. Mic. 1:8). The wailing and the howling of the animals, which can be heard at night almost everywhere in the Near East, sound like the bitter music which soon will be heard at the time of his death. In that prospect, his \textit{lyre and his pipe} turn into funeral instruments, ready to accompany the professional weepers (vs. 31). The suggestion that Job now becomes the mouthpiece of all those who weep is attractive, but not likely.

3. \textbf{Final Oath of Innocence (31:1-40)}

The happiness of the past (ch. 29) has been swallowed up in the sorrow and shame of the present (ch. 30). There is no future to contemplate except death, and therefore nothingness (30:23, 31). Nonetheless, Job still asserts his righteousness. So he ends his soliloquy with the most solemn and elaborate protest of innocence that he has ever tried sions, he would have been nearer right than Job (cf. Expos. on 25:2-6). The obligation is not in what man does, but in what God is—and therefore does (see Expos. on vs. 24; 31:1, 2, 4; 40:6-42:6). Note Blake’s Illustration V, of the moment when Satan goes forth from the presence of the Lord (1:12); Damon writes of it as follows:

Job is sharing his last meal with a beggar. He does this for the same reason that he had done everything—because it is the correct thing to do, not because he naturally wishes to do it, as a man would share his last meal with a starving friend. Such charity as Job’s can only be given—and taken—with the left hand; for the true sympathy is absent. . . . Yet . . . Job wants to do the best thing, even if he cannot do it in the proper spirit. Therefore angels still minister to him.

Therefore also God still keeps his seat by clinging to the book of Law; though, with a dimmed and sinking halo, he is dragged down on the material side It is through Job’s very virtues that he sins; the flames that robe the angels are the same flames flowing into Satan’s hand. . . . The margin is filled with flames and thorns, and below is the serpent, at last fully revealed, though not to Job.\footnote{Illustrations of the Book of Job, invented and engraved by William Blake; interpreted by S. Foster Damon, The Doctrine of Job (New York: United Book Guild, 1950).}

With reference to a man’s sharing “his last meal with a starving friend,” note what Schiller once said of Goethe: “I could never love him; for with all his giving, he never gives himself; he gives like a god.” What god?

31:1-40. \textbf{Making One’s Own Memories.}—To live in the past is often enough to be plagued with memories (see Expos. on 29:1-25); to live in the future is to give hostages to time (cf. Expos. on 20:17-18). Why is it that in one way to express. For this purpose he examines a series of more than sixteen concrete hypotheses of sinful acts, each one beginning with the conjunction “if” (vss. 5, 7, 9, 13, 16, 19, 20, 21, 24, 25, 26, 29, 31, 33, 38, 39), and he clears himself of any deed—or even intention—of religious or ethical turpitude, thereby revealing in exquisite terms the highest moral conscience to be found in the O.T. With a clean past and a clear mind he declares himself ready to face his judge, proud of an honor still intact and of a record unblemished (vss. 35-37).

Most commentators agree that vss. 38-40 have been accidentally inserted at the end of the chapter and that vss. 35-37 form the hero’s ultimate challenge to the Deity (but see Exeg., ad loc.).

a) A Covenant of Inward Purity (31:1-4)

31:1-4. The lack of transition from ch. 30 is somewhat confusing, but one would not improve the literary abruptness by suggesting that vss. 1-4, which are not in the LXX, have been inserted in the Hebrew text at a later time; for the same incoherence would appear in 30:31-31:5.

I have made a covenant with my eyes; how then could I look upon a virgin? (Vs. 1)

Cf. Ecclus. 9:5, “Do not look upon a virgin.” There is no valid reason for correcting the word הבזלה, virgin, into הבזלה, “impiety,” or הבזלה, “calamity.” Job is or another man is so thoroughly bent on discounting the present, which is all he has? And that all is brief enough—it scarcely reaches from the m to the t as he pronounces the word “moment.” Yet precisely on that knife edge between what has been and what is to come, while the second hand moves steadily around the face of the clock, we are making the memories which in hours of crisis will help either to defeat or gird us. In ch. 29 these memories, like enemy troops, march across Job’s soul; then back again in reverse order, through ch. 30, leaving the landscape desolate. So is many a warrior beaten before the battle (cf. Julius Caesar, Act IV, scene 3; King Richard III, Act V, scene 3). In ch. 31 they are mustered like strong battalions for the defense (see Expos. on 23:10; 27:2-6). 1.

Purity of Soul.—(Cf. also vss. 7, 9, 24, 27, 29, 33, 36.) The bold-faced heading is one of Kierkegaard’s titles. By it he means “single-mindedness” (cf. Matt. 6:22-24; 18:8-9). Job knows very well that out of the heart “are the issues of life” (Prov. 4:23). By way of final response to everything Eliphaz has said in 22:22-20, and to all the imputations of guilt, implicit or explicit, in the speeches of Bildad and Zophar—these men who, in worse sense than Shakespeare meant, had taken “upon [themselves] the mystery of things, as if [they] were God’s spies”—he disavows not so much sin (13:26) as transgression, in thought, word, or deed. He has brought under tribute to his integrity eye (vs. 1) and heart (vs. 7b), hand (vs. 7c) and foot (vs. 5b). Nowhere else in the O.T. is there set such a lofty standard of ethical conduct. In every case but one (vss. 8, 22, 40—note the violent emotion which is responsible for the omission after vs. 34) the imprecation calls down the self-punishment suited to the crime (see Expos. on vss. 38-40). Interestingly enough that punishment, except in vs. 11 (and in vs. 28, if that verse is to be retained), is not at man’s hand but at God’s (as in vss. 2 [see Exeg.], 8, 10 [where it seems to fall on the innocent, but perhaps assumes the death of the guilty, certainly the ruin of his home], 12, 14, 40). The great Ruler of the universe still rules, and for Job he is yet somehow just, with an ultimate justice (vs. 14; see Expos. on 13:1-12). Observe too the consistency with which the motivation is not only assigned but elaborated (vss. 3 [yet see Exeg.], 11 and 12, 14 and 15, 23, 28). Study these motives. Differentiate between fear of retribution and “the fear of the Lord” (vs. 23a and vs. 23b). Note especially vs. 15 (see Exeg.) and vs. 28b. What could better portray the conflict and confusion in the human soul? The N.T. understands that conflict far more profoundly (read Rom. 7). It might be said that Job’s “impiety” was only relatively less heinous than the “pity” of the friends. To work out one’s own salvation and yet at the same time not to be able to work it out (Phil. 2:12-15) is the paradox with which Christian faith concerns itself—the “faith which worketh by love” (Gal. 5:6), and is the gift of God (Rom. 1:5; 5:1-5:6:2; 10:3-9). For one who has set out on the road that Job has been doing his magnificent best to travel, if there is no answer to Paul’s 2 For what portion of God is there from above? and what inheritance of the Almighty from on high?

3 Is not destruction to the wicked? and a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity?
4 Doth not he see my ways, and count all my steps?
5 If I have walked with vanity, or if my foot hath hasted to deceit;
6 Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity.
7 If my step hath turned out of the way, and mine heart walked after mine eyes, and if any blot hath cleaved to mine hands;
8 Then let me sow, and let another eat; yea, let my offspring be rooted out.
9 If mine heart have been deceived by a

SELECTING SENSUALITY as the most typical form of his temptation. This trait agrees with the many allusions which he has made in the course of the discussion with his friends as to the virility of his temperament. Since he knew, centuries before Jesus, that covetousness of the eyes penetrates to the very core of sensual motives (cf. Matt. 5:28), he made a pact with himself to keep free not only from deeds of incontinence, but also from any glance which might undermine his ideal of inward purity.

Job used to believe in those days that divine retribution would have followed swiftly upon his misbehavior (vss. 2-3), and that God watched closely all his actions (vs. 4). According to another interpretation, the questions which are asked in these verses betray the present doubt of the former moralist. It is a skeptic who asks: "What should then have been my portion from God above, and my heritage on high? Should not calamity befall the unrighteous, and disaster the workers of iniquity? Is it that he does not see my ways, and fails to number my steps?" (Vss. 2-4.) The implication is that morality, even of the highest order, is futile.

b) SELF-MALEDICTIONS (31:5-34)

5-8. The speaker is now ready to proceed with his last self-examination. If he has been guilty of falsehood, greed, and uncleanness (vss. 5-7), let him perish in hunger (vs. 8).

9-10. If he has committed adultery (vs. 9), let his own wife belong to another man (vs. 10), and let him perish in the fire (vss. 11-12).

Exeg.: You see what my portion is. What should it have been? (See Expos. on 30:25.) You say that calamity befalls the unrighteous: see for yourselves what happens to the righteous! Can it be that God is blind (vs. 4; cf. 24:1)?

It would seem then, to follow through with the argument, that there is indeed no profit in the service of God (see Expos. on 1:6-12; Luke woman, or if I have laid wait at my neighbor's door;
Then let my wife grind unto another, and let others bow down upon her.
For this is a heinous crime; yea, it is an iniquity to be punished by the judges.
For it is a fire that consumeth to destruction, and would root out all mine increase.
If I did despise the cause of my maidservant or of my maidservant, when they contended with me;
What then shall I do when God riseth up? and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him?
Did not he that made me in the womb make him? and did not one fashion us in the womb?

13-15. The idea that slaves have rights (vs. 13) is one of the most remarkable in this chapter, and even more astounding is the further statement that those rights are established by the Creator for all men. Did not he who made me in the womb make him? (Vs. 15a.) This awareness of the equality of birth among men is as high as the ethical level of the N.T.

19:8). If he had but known it, the very tumult in his soul was "profit" (see Expos. on 28:1-28; 30:9-15). Whatever there is of Christian virtue in the world is not for hope of reward or fear of punishment, though neither the hope nor the fear can ever be stricken from the record (see Expos. on Luke 19:17, 18, 24). Goodness is response-in-love to the goodness of God; it is God's own re-created image in the soul.

Teach us, good Lord, to serve thee as thou deservest: To give and not to count the cost; To fight and not to heed the wounds; To toil and not to seek for rest; To labor and not ask for any reward Save that of knowing that we do thy will.\(^*\)

13-15. The Rights of the Dispossessed.—(Cf. Expos. on 9:14-19; 16:10.) There were certain covenant ameliorations of the lot of the slave among the Hebrew people (Exod. 20:10; 21:2-11, 26-27, 32; Lev. 25:39-55); but little if anything in the whole scope of the O.T. can compare with this for loftiness of thought or expression. God will inquire of those whom he fashioned in the womb as he fashioned us (see Eph 6:9; Col. 4:1; especially Philem. 16). Wrote Mark Rutherford:

The races to whom we owe the Bible were cruel in war; they were revengeful; their veins were filled with blood hot with lust; they knew no art, nor grace, nor dialectic, such as Greece knew, but one service they at least have rendered to the world. They have preserved in their prophets and poets this eternal verity—He that made me in the womb made him—and have proclaimed with divine fury a divine wrath upon all those who may be seduced into forgetfulness of it. In discernment of the real breadth and depth of social duty, nothing has gone beyond the book of Job.\(^*\)

There is indeed an equality of birth before the God of all creation. Differences in status and endowment are for use in trust (see Expos. on Luke 19:12-27). But there is more. There is God's second creation (cf. Expos. on 14:7-12). There is the Christ in man and for him: the seal of a higher dignity and a truer brotherhood.

If I have withheld the poor from their desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail;
Or have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof;
(For from my youth he was brought up with me, as with a father, and I have guided her from my mother's womb;
I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering;
If his loins have not blessed me, and if he were not warmed with the fleece of my sheep;

"If I have withheld anything that the poor desired, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail, or have eaten my morsel alone, and the fatherless has not eaten of it (for from his youth I reared him as a father, and from his mother's womb I guided him);
if I have seen any one perish for lack of clothing, or a poor man without covering;
if his loins have not blessed me, and if he was not warmed with the fleece of my sheep;

16-23. Job now turns to sins against charity, and he indirectly sets forth the most comprehensive program of social responsibility. If I have withheld anything that the poor desired, . . . or have eaten my morsel alone (vss. 16-17). He has exercised more than justice in his dealings with his fellow men. He has not turned away the poor even—if the words are to be taken literally—when their demands were immoderate. He has not enjoyed advantages without sharing them with those in need. “The simplest words become revolutionary when they touch the heart or the conscience of humanity; and this line of an ancient drama, magnifying the negative virtue of self-restraint and the positive of thoughtfulness for others, has perhaps had more power to slay the sins of the epicure and the egoist than a hundred ancient sumptuary and modern socialistic laws” (Strahan, Job, pp. 260-61). This pregnant comment, however, with its touch of modern polemics, should be understood in the light of nomadic or seminomadic conditions of social life, which were those of Job, and not taken literally by those who would attempt to apply “biblical” ethics to a sedentary and industrial society. Yet their impact of judgment remains. In any case, Job shows by his words that his philanthropy was animated by a true understanding of the sufferings wrought on human flesh by the evils of poverty. He fed the hungry and he covered the naked, for he had experienced hunger

16-23. Ye Have the Poor Always with You.—Under the conditions of a society such as that to which Job belonged, face-to-face dealing with those in need was not only possible but doubtless a matter of daily occurrence. The very frequency and regularity of it might well have dulled the edge of his compassion. In a society highly organized and almost incredibly complex there are two grave perils that have to be faced and dealt with: the peril of remoteness, and the peril of oversimplification. The poor in the twentieth century are often the fatherless and the widows who have been robbed by some clever manipulation of the stock market. They are represented by bits of gilt-edged paper called bonds, readily sold, or exchanged, or transferred from one portfolio to another. There was a widow in New York whose eyes looked in vain (vs. 16b) for help, for they looked to a corporation in Detroit that had “milked” her life’s savings without even knowing her name. It is not hard to withhold what the poor desire when the poor are nameless, faceless folk who live halfway across the continent. Or perhaps they are the “displaced persons” one hears of, or share croppers one has never met, or whole nations starving, while at home food products are destroyed in order to keep prices up. The conscience a modern man needs has to be infinitely more sensitive than Job’s. How many are even comparatively as tender? There are so many facts that have to be taken into account. It is possible to pauperize the poor, and who wants to do that? Organized charities—how are they administered, and what is their overhead? The only thing that has never changed is the will of God (Deut. 15:7-11). The horizons are broader, and the ingenuity necessary is greater;
JOB

21 If I have lifted up my hand against the fatherless, when I saw my help in the gate:
  22 Then let mine arm fall from my shoulder blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone.
  23 For destruction from God was a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I could not endure.
  24 If I have made gold my hope, or have said to the fine gold, Thou art my confidence;
  25 If I rejoiced because my wealth was great, and because mine hand had gotten much;

and cold. He possessed the memory and the imagination of love. He could not enjoy the warmth of his tent if he knew that a poor man . . . was not warmed with the fleece of [his own] sheep (vs. 19-20). Always, however, at the spring of his social conscience lay his deep commitment to the will of a God who cares for all men (vs. 23; cf. vs. 15). It was religion which justified, supported, explained, and made possible his morality.

24-28. This last consideration brought him to drive deeper his introspective search from the realm of social relations to that of his own allegiance to God. Job understands the profound meaning of idolatry and polytheism. He meditates on the theological implications of trust and confidence (vs. 24). In the same breath, therefore, he repudiates his worship of gold. He has never desired riches in place of God. Likewise, he has resisted the subtle and alluring attraction of the astral religions. It is almost impossible for the modern mind to grasp the power exercised upon biblical men and women by the worship of the sun and of the moon (vs. 26-27) as it was practiced everywhere around them from the valley of the Nile to the plains of Mesopotamia. Quasi-material communion with the forces of life in the universe was the essential aspect of ancient Egyptian and Semitic polytheisms. The basic instincts of man for security from want and for sexual fulfillment but the center is the same (vs. 18 is read by some, "For as a father he [God] brought me up from my youth, and was my guide from my mother's womb"; cf. also vs. 23b, and Expos. on vs. 1; 30:25), illuminated now by the light of the Christian gospel (Luke 18:22; I Cor. 13:8).

24-28. No Other Gods.—Job disavows not only the idolatry of the bended knee but the idolatry of the yearning heart (yet see Expos. on 1.4-5). "That ye present your bended knee but the idolatry of the yearning heart" (Rom. 12:1)—to what? It is the directional drive of the mind and heart and will that is in question, the one decisive allegiance of the soul. To suppose that idol worship is the superstitious practice of a primitive mentality is to come pitifully short of Job in both insight and apprehension. The very word superstition itself implies a standing in awe by the side of something which never works. Superstition always enters at the door by which religion takes its leave. Perhaps in part for that reason the twentieth century, which prides itself on having driven out superstition in company with her sister ignorance, is of all centuries one of the most superstitious. To say nothing of its horoscopes, its astrologers, mediums, and undisguised fortunetellers—in the United States the business runs into unbelievable millions—it has its own fifty-seven species of the genus lie (vs. 28b) to stand in the place of the God it has lost—science, power, the state. Let each one count them off on his own fingers:

If I have made [?] my trust, or called [?] my confidence;
if I have rejoiced because my [?] was great, or because my hand had gotten [?];
if I have looked at the [?], or the [?] . . . , and my heart has been secretly enticed, and my [hand] has kissed my [mouth—Hebrew]; this also would be an iniquity . . ., for I should have been false to God above (see Exeg. on 28:14-22; Expos. on 28:28).

An advertisement kept appearing in magazines during the last years of World War II. It 26 If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness;
27 And my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand:
28 This also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge; for I should have denied the God that is above.
29 If I rejoiced at the destruction of him that hated me, or lifted up myself when evil found him;
30 (Neither have I suffered my mouth to sin by wishing a curse to his soul.)

found in the cult of the fertility forces (of which the sun and the moon were the most obvious and insistent symbols) an economic, aesthetic, and mystical satisfaction. Biblical Hebraism throughout the centuries was in constant danger of dilution and corruption, because it is more difficult for man to place himself in worship at the disposal of a Deity who transcends the forces of nature than to yield to a cultic technique which claims to enlist for human use the service of these same forces (cf. II Kings 21:3 ff.; 23:5; Jer. 8:1-2; 44:25; Ezek. 8:16; etc.; see Henri and H. A. Frankfort, et al., The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1946], pp. 23-26). Job reveals his strength of decision and endurance when he indirectly describes the exquisite appeal which paganism exercised upon him. But there could not be any compromise between his faith and the practices of his environment, however delightful these might be to his deepest impulses, for the slightest accommodation of his fidelity to any kind of religious eclecticism would have meant a denial of the God that is above (vs. 28).

29-30. While other parts of the O.T. display the emotion of Schadenfreude or "malignant joy" before the spectacle of the punishment of the wicked or the fall of enemies (cf. Judg. 5:24-31; Isa. 14:12 ff.; the so-called imprecatory psalms), Job rejects both such a natural and cheap psychological reaction and also the desire to curse his enemy.

was the picture of a father and a son standing in a field, pointing to the sky: on the whole a hopeful posture; but the reader knew what they were really looking at. He could not see, but he knew. It was a plane turned out by an American factory: salvation on the wing, riveted by —— and Co. The future was safe! They used to make idols in Babylon, and there was a prophet who pointed to them and laughed at them. "You take an oak, and you burn part of it to warm yourself, or you bake bread with it; the rest you make into an idol. The carpenter marks it out with a line and gets his chisel. The smith hammers and molds until he is ready to drop. Then you fall down in front of it, and worship it, and say, Deliver me; for you are my god! And nobody has wit enough to pull himself up with a jolt and declare, I'm a fool. It's a lie in my hand" (Isa. 44:14-20).

29-30. Dealing with the Enemy.—To deal with the enemy is too often taken in the sense of making a deal with him: which is either treach-ery, or what is regularly called appeasement, usually by way of a bargain—which just as usually turns out for both parties to be a bad bargain, as bargains not infrequently do—and so is sneered out of court. There are ways of dealing which have nothing to do with making deals, and the Bible runs the gamut of all of them, from ruthless vengeance (I Sam. 13:2-8) to imprecation (Ps. 109), from "malignant joy over the fate of the wicked" (Exeg; cf. Expos. on 9:20-24; 15:17-35; 20:23; 22:12-20) to Job's repudiation of it (vs. 29); and more (vs. 30; cf. Prov. 24:17), from a ministry of mercy (Prov. 25:21-22; Rom. 12:20—noting the omission) to the ministry of love (Matt. 5:43-48). Observe that in this passage Job rises to heights of which 31 If the men of my tabernacle said not, Oh that we had of his flesh! we cannot be satisfied.
32 The stranger did not lodge in the street: but I opened my doors to the traveler.
33 If I covered my transgressions as Adam, by hiding mine iniquity in my bosom:
34 Did I fear a great multitude, or did the contempt of families terrify me, that I kept silence, and went not out of the door?

31-32. Passing from a negative to a positive attitude, the reciter now touches upon the sacred Arab custom of hospitality (cf. 19:14-15; Exod. 22:21; etc.). When Job referred to his own fare, he spoke of “his morsel” (of bread; vs. 17), but he now says that the guests praised him for offering luxurious meat, a festal fare.

33-34. The hero now repudiates the sin of hypocrisy. He declares that he has never worn a mask of personal and social integrity while concealing within himself transgressions too dark for the public eye. It is generally thought that the traditional rendering, like Adam, is not probable, for the story of the garden represents Adam as concealing his transgressions not from men but from God himself (Gen. 3:8). The expression ἄνεμος may mean like Adam or “in the manner of man,” like men (cf. Hos. 6:7; Ps. 82:7; see Exeg. on vs. 40). Job has never needed to hide or dissimulate a sin in his bosom (vs. 33; the fold of the mantle above the belt, where the Arab carries his goods and just as easily a weapon), and this is the reason for which he has never developed an antisocial attitude (vs. 34c). Inasmuch as Job, however, is bringing his series of self-defensive oaths to a apparently the friends have never dreamed; he is indeed better than the God of his own imagining (9:23)—which last is for him quite intolerable. When the N.T. takes up the refrain its eyes are not on the self (Prov. 25:22b) or on the enemy, as if love were a strategy for serving its own ends (cf. the so-called “good neighbor policy,” and Dale Carnegie’s extraordinarily popular book, How to Win Friends and Influence People*), but on God (Matt. 5:45).

31-32. The Grace of Hospitality.—In the East “grace” would scarcely be an adequate word; in the West perhaps it will have to suffice. There hospitality was not only a necessity, it was a kind of sacrament, a very covenant of friendship (cf. Ps. 41:9; Ezra 4:14, lit., “we are salted with the salt of the palace”); here it is one of the amenities of life, to be observed or not, according to taste and condition. Among the Hebrews, traditions that reached back into the mists of history were associated with it, as of the day when Abraham and Lot entertained angels unawares (Gen. 18:1-5; 19:1-3); and memories of their own sojourn in a land of strangers, and of the Lord who had brought them out (Exod. 22:21; Ps. 146:9). In the early church, to be “given to hospitality” (Rom. 12:13) was one of the Christian virtues (see Did. 11:3-6; the “apostle” who outstayed his time, or went about looking for better accommodations, was a false prophet), with its sanction farther down in the life of God than men had dreamed (Matt. 25:31-46; Rom. 15:7). There are but a few sad relics left of that high and ancient practice. The host now still has his obligations as the guest has his; but good manners will cover most of them. Paying off social debts is one of the degenerate scions of a noble house, vestis vestigia flammeae (cf. Luke 14:12-14).

33-34. What Do People Say About You?—There was nothing in Job’s life that called for concealment, nothing he had to keep to himself, after the manner of most men (see Exeg. on vs. 83a); but the multitude refused to put up with 35 Oh that one would hear me! behold, my desire is, that the Almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book.

35 Oh, that I had one to hear me! (Here is my signature! let the Almighty answer me!)
Oh, that I had the indictment written by my adversary!

Close, and is getting ready to make his final plea for a divine hearing, he may quite understandably think of Adam running away from God in fear. By contrast, he may be reflecting on his own attitude and so decide that he would not try to hide himself among the trees of the garden, were God coming to him and asking, "Man, where art thou?" The reference to Adam in vs. 33a may reveal a subconscious process in the mind of the hero and thus constitute a psychological prologue of the proud and almost defiant request for a divine audience (vss. 35-37). "This passage [vss. 33-34] would seem to constitute the transition from 'The Oath of Clearance' to 'The Great Challenge.' It was probably not originally intended as a denial of the habit of secretiveness in guilt and of cowardly failure to confess sins openly because of the fear of public opinion. It was rather a strong asseveration that there was nothing that need be kept back and nothing that Job could not lay bare with undisturbed conscience before the judgment seat of God." (Robert A. Aytoun, "A Critical Study of Job's 'Oath of Clearance,'" The Interpreter, XVI [1919-20], 297-98.)

c) The Ultimate Challenge (31:35-37)

35-37. Job has now rehearsed the events of his past. He has found nothing in his outward deeds, in his daily attitude, or in his heart which could in the most remote fashion be related to his present tragedy. Confirmed in his certainty of innocence, he is making the last plea in the form, not of a begging for mercy (forgiveness he needs not, and pity he wants not!) but of a princely challenge to meet an equal in honorable encounter.

Oh, that I had one to hear me! (vs. 35a): This is the passionate wish which has been expressed again and again throughout the discussion.

I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to argue my case with God (13:3).

Man is of no avail, and there is thus no one but God, even a hostile God, whom the hero could hope to approach. "I will defend my ways to his face" (13:15b). Job proposes an alternative.

Call, and I will answer;
or let me speak, and do thou reply to me (13:22).

But God has consistently eluded him (23:3-9; 30:20). Job now imagines that at last he is before the court of his Judge. Here is my signature! let the Almighty answer me!

him, and the important people (vs. 34b) held him in contempt. The conduct of his days was an open book. Anybody could read it and welcome. Hypocrisy, which for the Hebrew was not the playing of a part, but sheer impiety or lawlessness, is a modern substitute for, and a studied tribute to, conscious integrity. Job was under no such compulsion to cover up. To

Have regard for public opinion is a mark of good sense; to be swayed by it is a mark of weakness, the seal of a hypocrite or a coward. In II Cor. 6:8-10 Paul was busy opposing fact to rumor. In that there is release. In I Cor. 4:5-4, to man's judgment he opposes God's. In that, and in the love with which God's judgment is instinct, is "the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free" (Gal. 5:1).

35-37. The Final Challenge.—Job has but one last recourse (Ps. 73:25). In the uttermost depths of despair, not because of what has hap-36 Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me.
37 I would declare unto him the number of my steps; as a prince would I go near unto him.

(Vs. 35b.) “My taw,” which the RSV translates my signature, refers to the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet which had in the biblical period the shape of an X or cross, and which was written at the bottom of official or legal documents as a sign of approval or assent. By using this phrase, does Job refer to an actual writing? Is he not rather speaking dramatically, as if he were portraying himself at the supreme court of heaven? Then he describes in vs. 35a his plea for a hearing, and perhaps alludes to the defense he has just now finished uttering (29:1–31:34, 38–40). This defense, however, is actually a challenge, for it requires a reply. Let the Almighty answer me! In vs. 35c, a new idea seems to take shape in his mind. Oh, that I had the indictment written by my adversary! The Hebrew word תֵּלֶשׁ, translated by the RSV as indictment, is, lit., a book, “a written statement,” or “a letter,” sometimes used in a juridical context, hence “a bill,” “a deed,” or “a contract” (cf. Deut. 24:1, 3; Isa. 50:1; Jer. 32:11-12, etc.). After having obtained an audience, the hero continues in imagination to anticipate the trial and now expects to hear the charges which God has made against him. The phrase עַדֵּנָי, means, lit., “my opponent” (cf. Isa. 41:11; also Exod. 23:6; Deut. 21:5, Judg. 12:2), but does not necessarily designate a human adversary. In this context it obviously refers to God. Kissane, apparently uneasy over the presence of the word שָׁאֵנ, “man,” in the idiomatic expression תֵּלֶשׁ עַדֵּנָי, suggests the correction of the final letter (י instead of ו), thus obtaining a pronominal suffix of the third person. The line might then be read, “His [God’s] opponent has [already] written a defense,” and would thus refer to Job. It would be strange, however, for the hero to speak of himself suddenly in the third person in a context which has consistently used the first person. In all probability the expression עַדֵּנָי was idiomatic and did not refer specifically to “a man” but to “the adverse party.”

Job is in perfect control of his emotions. He does not feel in the least apprehensive over the charges which are going to be officially pronounced against him. He is so certain of his innocence that he not only will have no sense of fear or shame before the public disclosure of his indictment, but he will also do it and wear it as a trophy or as a crown (vs. 36). He knows confidently that he can refute point by point “the bill of accusation,” for nothing in his life needs to be dissimulated. I would give him an account of all my steps (vs. 37a). The poet concludes his portrait of the self-righteous man with uncommon brilliance. Job will dispute with the Almighty Judge and argue his case without any sense of moral limitation, let alone guilt (cf. 40:2). The psychological “build-up” reaches its climax in the last sentence: like a prince I would approach him (vs. 37b). The pronominal suffix in the phrase עַדֵּנָי, “I would present myself to him,” designates God, not the indictment, as in the parallel construction, יָאִישׁ, “I would reveal to him” (vs. 37a). Therefore there is no ground for the common translation, “I shall present it,”...
38 If my land cry against me, or that the furrows likewise thereof complain;
39 If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money, or have caused the owners thereof to lose their life:

38 "If my land has cried out against me, and its furrows have wept together;
39 if I have eaten its yield without payment, and caused the death of its owners;

i.e., "my bill of accusation." In addition, the Piel of the verb יָנָה has here an intransitive meaning (cf. Ezek. 36.8). A prince (יוֹעֵד) is a leader, one who is accustomed to march in front of others. The expression is commonly applied to the kings of Israel, especially to David and Solomon (I Sam. 13:14; I Kings 1:55; etc.), and it implies an ingrained sense of social responsibility, authority, and power. The poet could not have chosen a better word to suggest the inward self-confidence of his hero. Never does man in the Bible or elsewhere in the ancient literature of the Near East approach the deity as a prince (contrast Isa. 6:5; Mic. 6:6; etc.). The Semitic rulers called themselves "slaves" and used other self-deprecating terms in a frantic display of abjectness before their gods and goddesses. The hero, tortured by God and condemned by men, has not any sense of human finitude, or at least is not aware of the holiness of God. He faces the prospect of the divine presence with the assurance and dignity of an Arab sheik, ready to accost an equal. Thus the poet allows the unbowed sufferer to keep one possession in an outwardly destitute state: the pride of self-righteousness (cf. 32:1). Some critics do not discern here any evidence of impious audacity. Note, however, Peake's observation: "Defiant the tone may be, but why should the poet have shrunk from letting his hero brave God, in proud assurance of his integrity? It is noemasculated pietist whom he has chosen for his protagonist in this titanic struggle." (Job, p. 273.) In fact, the poet is thus able to introduce the theological problem of the relationship between God and man in the sharpest possible delineation. God's self-disclosure (chs. 38–41) will come as unexpectedly as a thunderbolt in the blue sky of ethical self-satisfaction.

d) One Further Self-Imprecation (31:38-40)

38-40. Most modern commentators think that these verses are now accidentally displaced and should be transferred between vss. 34 and 35. "It is disastrous," writes Peake, "that after the splendid close in verses 35-37 a dislocation of verses should have brought verses 38-40 into their present position, where they ruin the effect" (ibid.). Other critics likewise maintain not unreasonably that after Job has imagined the picture of his expected audience before the sovereign Judge, "to bring him down again to thistles and cockle is indeed an anti-climax" (Strahan, Job, ad loc.). The biblical student, however, must be extremely cautious in tampering with the text. There is no evidence whatever, either from Hebrew MSS or from those of the ancient versions, to support the thesis of a textual disorder at this point. Indeed, those scholars who agree on the conjecture of the dislocation are in wide disagreement when they suggest a reconstruction of the "original" order. N. Peters places these verses between vss. 8 and 9; Budde, between vss. 12 and 13; Hontheim, between vss. 14 and 16; Kennicott, between vss. 25 and 26; Merx, Duhm, Dhorme, and Kissane, between vss. 32 and 33; Driver and Gray, as well as many other critics, between vss. 34 and 35. One must bear in mind that Aristotelian canons of logic should not be applied to the processes of thinking which are common to Oriental (or

38-40. Cursed Is the Ground.—It has been observed (see Expos. on vs. 1) that in the imprecations which Job calls down upon himself the punishment is conceived of as bearing close relation to the crime itself. Parents might learn something from reading this chapter. People who by their greed fashion dust bowls might conceivably profit. There is a strange corre-
40 Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley. The words of Job are ended.

32 So these three men ceased to answer Job, because he was righteous in his own eyes.

Occidental!) poets. Furthermore, the poet of Job himself appears to favor the device of the afterthought (cf. 3:16; 9:32; 14:13; etc.), and he also gives the impression of deliberately placing a climax not at the end but just before the end of a development (cf. 3:23; 7:20; 10:20; 14:15; etc.). He may be unconsciously following a method not unlike that of the Greek tragedians or Shakespeare, for he is wont to terminate the discourses of his characters not with a climactic display of violent emotion, but with a subdued and almost monotonous phrasing which ends and yet does not end in some unfinished suspense of quietness and melancholy (cf., e.g., 10:21-22). The result—if not the conscious intent—of such rhetoric may be a relaxing of the tension which has been produced on the auditors or readers and a subsequent return to a kind of emotional normalcy.

The “soil” ("adhāmāh") sown by the hero would have cried out... and its furrows [would] have wept together (vs. 38), if it had been acquired illegally or murderously (vs. 59). Job may here again remember the myth of the Garden of Eden (cf. Gen. 3:17), in which the "soil" ("adhāmāh") is cursed on account of man ("ādēhm") Elsewhere in the Hebrew scripture it is not the land but the blood shed upon it which cries out for vengeance (cf. 16:18; Gen. 4:10; also I Kings 21:1 ff.). Job knows that if he had obtained his fields in criminal fashion, he like Cain would have been “cursed from the ground” (cf. Gen. 4:11-12).

III. Discourses of Elihu (32:1–37:24)

These chapters introduce a new speaker who has not yet been mentioned either in the prologue or in the poetic discussion, and who is likewise ignored in the discourses of Yahweh and in the epilogue. Thus they raise a number of literary problems (see Intro., pp. 890-91).

The plan of the Elihu speeches is indicated in the present text by a series of introductory formulas which appear in 32:6; 34:1; 35:1; 36:1. In addition, there seems to be a spondeance between deed and destiny (see Expos. on 18:5-21; 20:4-11). Here the very land cries out against the usurper, and the furrows weep for thought of the slave labor that plows them (vs. 58a, 59b). Kissane locates these verses after vs. 52;—though Davidson and Lanchester suggest that the poet’s taste may not have coincided with ours, and they perhaps better be left where they are—and cites Deut. 24: 14-16; Jas. 5:4.

It was not unnatural that among nomadic tribes the tilling of the soil was once regarded as a hard necessity laid on man as a curse (Gen. 3:17-19; 4:12n). Many a time, in twisted mind, it has been made so; with results that Oliver Goldsmith, among others, once recorded:

* Job, p. 208.
* Job, p. 255.

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey, Where wealth accumulates, and men decay; Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade; A breath can make them, as a breath has made; But a bold peasantry, their country’s pride, When once destroy’d, can never be supplied.*

Ruthless efforts to destroy, periodic attempts to conserve and reclaim, with a nature forever healing her own wounds under the beneficent hand of God (Matt. 5:45): the long story of the ages has profound implications for all human life.

32:1–37:24. The Speeches of Elihu.—These four speeches (chs. 33; 34; 35; 36–37; see Exeg. for analysis), on the whole labored and wordy, yet not without their flashes of imagination and clear division in 33:1 and again in 36:26. Chs. 32–36 may accordingly be analyzed as follows: A. Preface in Prose (32:1-5); B. Poetic Introduction (32:6-22), in which Elihu addresses the three friends and the bystanders in an attempt to justify his intervention; C. First Part (33:1-35:16) in which Elihu refutes (1) Job’s charge that God reveals his injustice by his silence (33:1-53); (2) Job’s attack on God’s retribution of good and evil (34:1-87); and (3) Job’s conviction of innocence (35:1-16); D. Second Part (36:1-37:24), in which Elihu constructively (1) describes God’s use of human suffering (36:1-25); (2) praises God’s transcendence over the universe (36:26–37:13); and (3) admonishes Job to acknowledge with humility the divinity of God (37:14-24).

* “The Deserted Village,” 1. 51.

Whatever the literary origin of these discourses may have been, they undoubtedly offer a significant transition from the last words of the hero (31:40c) to the discourses of Yahweh (38:1–42:6). The opinion has often been expressed that they lessen the dramatic power of the book, but one may also observe that they constitute a kind of “gradual” to the divine theophany.

A. Preface in Prose (32:1-5)

1. Silence of the Friends (32:1)

32:1. The expression these three men indicates a stylistic departure from the habit of the poet who speaks of “three friends” (2:11 ff.; 42:10; cf. 19:21). It is found in Ezek. 14:14, 16, where it designates Noah, Job, and Daniel. The construction of the verb נָשַׁב with the preposition נ and the infinitive (ceased to answer; lit., “rested from answering”) may be a reminiscence of the prophetic style (Jer. 31:36; Hos. 7:4). Job’s confession and oath of clearance (29:1–32:40) have at last persuaded Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar that he is a hopeless case: He was righteous in his own eyes (vs. 16). The LXX, Symm., and the Syriac read יֵשָׁב לְפָנָיו, in their eyes, instead of יֵשָׁב בְּפָנָיו, in his own eyes, and this rendering is favored by several commentators on the ground that the friends were all aware of Job’s self-righteousness. The same view is held by other critics on the assumption that Job’s passionate peroration finally convinced the friends of his innocence—a conviction which would easily explain the ire of Elihu (vs. 2). But nothing in the text allows the exegete to think that the friends have been won over to Job’s side. On the contrary, it is obvious that the antagonism which separates them from Job throughout the poetic discussion has grown deeper and deeper. In addition, Elihu’s anger is not aroused by the friends’ avowal of Job’s innocence, but rather by their silence which might easily lend itself to a wrong interpretation (see vs. 3b), and also by the belief that Job “justified himself before God” (see Exeg. on vs. 2b). It is therefore necessary to preserve the reading of the M.T. in vs. 1b. The statement thus accepted is not in disagreement with the poet. Indeed, Job has maintained throughout the discussion that he is certain of his own righteousness; and the poet, though in warm sympathy with the hero's plight, has never given the impression that he condoned human pride, even that which is provoked and intensified by physical and mental tortures.
2 Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram: against Job was his wrath kindled, because he justified himself rather than God.

2. Presentation of Elihu (32:2a)

2a. The name Elihu means "My God is he," and it is used for several Hebrew individuals like the grandfather of Elkanah (I Sam. 1:1), a Manasseh soldier (I Chr. 12:20), a Levite (I Chr. 26:7), and a brother of David (I Chr. 27:18). The name Barachel means "Bless, O God!" or "Bless God!" or more probably "God blesses" (cf. Barakhi in the Business Documents of Munash Sons of Nippur, ed. H. V. Hilprecht of them is the mind of a man who is himself angry. The word is repeated four times in five verses. He is angry because the debate, which never should have been allowed to conclude as it does, has left Job in complete mastery of the situation (vs. 1a). He is angry at Job for making himself out to be in the right before the face of God, even hinting that he was better than God himself (24:12; 30:25). He is angry at the friends, because they could not make any adequate reply. If "their own eyes" were to be read in vs. 1 (with the LXX and Syriac; yet see Exeg.), and "God" instead of "Job" in vs. 5b, his case against them would be considerably strengthened. In fact and in short, he is angry (vs. 5). And there is little ground for supposing that he was alone among those of "the younger generation" into whose hands the poem came in its earlier form. It offended them too, as the friends were offended, and with all due deference where not too much deference was due (vs. 9; cf. 12.12), they had a word to say that would illumine the matter and make it quite unnecessary to call in God (vs. 15).

Always when youth essays to play its part it begins with impatience, and often rightly so. It was not born to a mold, and much that comes down to it is warped and twisted by the past. But impatience is one thing, and true indignation another. There is room enough for righteous indignation. Luther has been called Germany's angry man. Sweeping condemnation is still another thing (vs. 9, 12). It is never necessary to clear the board and start over. The baby should only on occasion be thrown out with the bath. Said a sophomore in a woman's college: "I have heard a good many preachers, and read a good many religious books; now I have made up my mind that all of it has to go. I must begin for myself, and begin at scratch." It would never have worked in a chemical laboratory.

Yet Elihu is no laughingstock, and would better not be treated so. Untrammeled by the traditions that bound his elders, he is in a somewhat better position to discern the truth than any of the friends, certainly than either Bildad or Zophar. If he has any affinity, it is with Eliphaz, to whom he frequently though for the most part indirectly refers. He too is a kind of seer, profoundly in earnest, heir of all that has been, and indeed prophet of things to come (cf. Exeg. on vs. 25a). Measure the strides he has taken. To others the spirit of God may be as "the blast of his anger" (see Expos. on 4:9-11) that consumes the wicked, or as the wind that makes the heavens fair (26:13), to him it is not only the breath that gives him life (33.4), as it gives life to all men (34:14-15), it is the breath . . . that makes him understand (vs. 8; cf. Prov. 20:27). To others God may be slowly disappearing in the vastness of a moral order (see Expos. on 8:4); but not to Elihu. When there are delays it is God's inexhaustible patience that waits (33:14-18; cf. 20:5); when chastening comes it is God's compassionate love that chastens (33:19-20). He understands the nature of sin better than any of the friends (cf. Exeg. on 34:5-9) and knows that in God's dealing with it justice never does tell the whole story; there is something back of justice, deep in the nature of God.

"Youth must be served." Perhaps. But to what extent? Far more pointedly, it has to be listened to (Luke 10:21).

2b. Can God Be Wrong?—It never occurred to Elihu or to the friends that the God of their 3 Also against his three friends was his wrath kindled, because they had found no answer, and yet had condemned Job.

4 Now Elihu had waited till Job had spoken, because they were elder than he. justified himself rather than God; 3 he was angry also at Job’s three friends because they had found no answer, although they had declared Job to be in the wrong. 4 Now Elihu had waited to speak to Job because and A. T. Clay [Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1898], Tablet 73, line 4, etc.) . Inasmuch as Elihu was the son of a Buzite, he was also a fellow countryman of Job, because Buz was a brother of Uz (Gen. 22:21; cf. Job 1.1), and thus the new speaker was more closely related to Job than the three friends were. Furthermore, although Buz was a son of Nahor and thus an Aramaean (Gen. 11:26; 22:20; 24:10), the family of Ram was associated with the tribe of Judah (cf. Ruth 4:19; I Chr. 2:9-10). Moreover the appellation Buzite may refer to a locality mentioned in Jer. 25:23 after Dedan and Tema, and the name “Buz” is probably the same as Bāzu in the Akkadian inscriptions (see Dhorme, Le livre de Job, p. xx). Thus Elihu is represented as coming from the same region as Job and the three friends, at the juncture of the territories of the Edomites, the Aramaeans, and the Arabs, but as more directly linked with the Hebraic groups. This latter detail may symbolize or explain the peculiar emphasis of his theological outlook.

3. Reasons for Elihu’s Intervention (32:26-3)

26-3. The anger of Elihu is directed against Job because he justified himself rather than God (vs. 26); lit., “he justified his nēphesh,” i.e., “his life with its desires and ambitions.” The translation rather than, however, is not probable, for the verb is used here in the Piel (cf. the Hiphil in 27:5) as in Jer. 3:11; Ezek. 16:51, 52, where the comparison is not between man and God but between Israel and Judah (cf. also Job 33:32). Moreover, in the book of Job generally the preposition ה constructed with the name of the Deity means not “more than” but “before,” “in the presence of” (cf. 4:17; 35:2). Thus Elihu’s attitude is provoked by the spectacle of Job’s theological and spiritual arrogance. It is more than an intellectual pride displayed in an argument about God: Job “showed his life to be righteous before God.” The phrase points to an existential rather than to a purely academic situation. Actually Job by his attitude had made himself appear even more just than God.

Elihu was irritated also by the three friends because they had found no answer, although they had declared Job to be in the wrong (vs. 5). The RSV attempts to make sense out of the traditional M.T. (cf. the yet of KJV), but the true rendering is elsewhere, since the word בִּיאָ נ, Job”—as attested by the tradition itself—constitutes one of the eighteen Tiggâné Sôpherim (cf. Vol. I, p. 51) and represents a substitution for the word בִּיאָ נ, “God.” The scribes could not bring themselves to write as offensive a clause as “and they condemned God.” Fortunately the meaning of the original text is clear. Elihu interpreted the silence of the friends as equivalent to a condemnation of God. This does not mean at all that they did not hold Job to be in the wrong. But the fact remains that they did not speak after Job’s final claim to self-righteousness, and to Elihu their silence appeared to be an acquiescence. Hence the kindling of his wrath.

4-5. Elihu’s anger exploded the more violently because he had to contain himself during the discussion on account of his inordinate youth. Vs. 4a is either corrupt or rather 5 When Elihu saw that there was no answer in the mouth of these three men, then his wrath was kindled.

6 And Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite answered and said, I am young, and ye are very old; wherefore I was afraid, and durst not show you mine opinion.

7 I said, Days should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom.

8 But there is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding.

9 Great men are not always wise: neither do the aged understand judgment.

awkward, for it literally reads, “Elihu waited for [?] Job with words” (see KJV), but the meaning is not in doubt (see RSV). The observation that the three friends and Job were older than he does not indicate that they were advanced in age. It rather emphasizes the youthfulness of Elihu (cf. vs. 6). The proximity of vs. 5 may be intentional.

B. Poetic Introduction (32:6-22)

1. Spirit, Not Age, Is the Source of Wisdom (32:6-10)

6-10. The new speaker reveals a remarkable mixture of timidity and boldness. On the one hand, he acknowledges that he has kept silent because he felt the restraint of his youth (ץור, “little,” “insignificant,” “puny,” hence young; vs. 6; Gen. 43:33; etc.; cf. Judg. 6:15; Ps. 119:141); on the other hand, he was not lacking in יד (a late word), opinion or “knowledge,” “science,” “definite conviction” (vs. 6b; cf. vs. 10, 17), and there is an undertone of persiflage or even sarcasm when he confides,

I said, “Let days speak, and many years teach wisdom” (vs. 7).

This appears in his next statement more explicitly. Age does not in itself produce wisdom, i.e., the capacity to understand what is right (vs. 9; it is the spirit (רוח) which is in a man, i.e., the breath of the Almighty, that gives discernment (vs. 8; cf. Ps. 119:130). Elihu alludes to divine inspiration, not to a “spiritual” element in human nature (as well recognized by Targ. which rendered נְפֶשׁ הַבָּ录像, “the spirit of prophecy,” and by Symm. who translated πνεῦμα θεοῦ, “the spirit of God”). Job and his friends spoke of a human “spirit” (6:4; 7:11; 15:13) but only in the sense of man’s emotional, intellectual, or volitive faculties (as a parallel term to נפֶשׁ); and when they refer to the spirit of God, they hardly distinguish it from the stormy wind or the manifestation of divine judgment (4:9; 26:13). Elihu, on the contrary, thinks of the divine spirit or breath in 6). Even then the self cannot be utterly rid of self, or of the self’s distortions. What wonder that “the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner” (Luke 18:10)? Is there anything else for one who knows how it is with the human soul? Meanwhile the “impious” often are possessed of a piety denied the “pious.” How often the “saint” is proved a heretic, and the “heretic” is revered as a saint!

6-8. Arriving at a Conviction.—(Cf. Expos. on 12:2-6; 18:21; 21:5-6.) Elihu seems to have come to his task with something more than dogmatically conceived presuppositions (cf. Expos. on 2:11-18). It is not “wisdom” of which Therefore I say, 'Listen to me; let me also declare my opinion.'

"Behold, I waited for your words, I listened for your wise sayings, while you searched out what to say. I gave you my attention, and, behold, there was none that confuted Job, or that answered his words:

Lest ye should say, We have found out wisdom: God thrusteth him down, not man.

Now he hath not directed his words against me: neither will I answer him with your speeches.

terms of creativity (33:4; 34:12-15; cf. Gen. 1:2; 2:7) and of prophetic revelation (vss. 18 ff.; cf. Num. 27:18; II Kings 2:15, Isa. 29:10, Mic. 2:11). Life, wisdom, and understanding are the gifts of God, not the natural endowment of man. Nevertheless, Elihu is not characterized by the humility and the reverent agnosticism of the prophet. He claims a possession of the divine spirit and for that reason insists on declaring his opinion (vs. 10).

2. Failure of the Professionals (32.11-14)

In the second part of his exordium the new discoursor no longer explains his previous silence on the basis of his youth. I waited . . . while you searched out what to say (vs. 11). His deference has given place to definite rudeness. Those ancient worthies, so he implies, have done their best in trying to "dig" (ךוס:ר) from the treasury of the past, the wealth of experience, and—as moderns might say—the depths of the subconscious, but behold, there was none that confuted Job . . . among you (vs. 12). Elihu uses the same participial form (ךוס:ר, "convincer," "rebuker") as Job did in 9:33, but in a different sense which is shown by the parallel word הננס, "answerer" (vs. 12b). The sequence of thought between vs. 13a and vs. 13b is slightly elliptical. Beware lest you say, "We have found wisdom; [but we must admit now that we have failed with Job. Obviously, God alone, not any human being, can convince him of his guilt.] God may vanquish him, not man." In other words, Elihu says to the three friends, "How can you claim to have discovered wisdom while you admit defeat in this case?" Some commentators interpret vs. 13a as an ironical statement: "In Job we have found wisdom personified." But the words clearly refer to the friends' claims for the validity of their own position (cf. vss. 7, 9). Inasmuch as the word יפרץ, thrusteth him down, lit., "drives him away," appears in one Hebrew MS as יפרץ, "persecutes him" (see Graetz et al.), the text of the Masoretic tradition is not certain. Dhorae therefore is willing to emend the word יפרץ to יפרץ, "has instructed us," thus bringing vs. 13 into agreement with the preceding context. In probability, however, the M.T. is correct, but the special nuance of the jussive must be brought out forcefully: "Let God drive him out!" The meaning of the verse now becomes obvious. Elihu is startled by the friends' apparent defeatism. He therefore admonishes them, "Do not say, 'We have found wisdom (and he speaks (vss. 6, 10, 17), neither sentiment nor theory, but "knowledge." He has listened and set his mind to work on what he has heard (vss. 6-7, 9, 11-12). There is evidence that he has allowed his heart to speak (33:23-24, 29-30; 35:10-11; 37:19). Add to that not pride (see Expos. on vss. 1-22) but humility (see Expos. on vs. 2b), not presumption (vss. 21-22) but courage; then give it the brooding, yearning, restless love of Paul and you have a man who has long been at home in the one Presence on this earth where the words of Elihu can come 15 They were amazed, they answered no more: they left off speaking.

16 When I had waited, (for they spake not, but stood still, and answered no more,) 17 I said, I will answer also my part; I also will show mine opinion.
18 For I am full of matter; the spirit within me constraineth me.
19 Behold, my belly is as wine which hath no vent; it is ready to burst like new bottles.
20 I will speak, that I may be refreshed: I will open my lips and answer.
21 Let me not, I pray you, accept any man's person; neither let me give flattering titles unto man.
22 For I know not to give flattering titles; in so doing my Maker would soon take me away.

33 Wherefore, Job, I pray thee, hear my speeches, and hearken to all my words.

15 "They are discomfited, they answer no more;
they have not a word to say.
16 And shall I wait, because they do not speak, because they stand there, and answer no more?
17 I also will give my answer,
I also will declare my opinion.
18 For I am full of words,
the spirit within me constrains me.
19 Behold, my heart is like wine that has no vent;
like new wineskins, it is ready to burst.
20 I must speak, that I may find relief;
I must open my lips and answer.
21 I will not show partiality to any person or use flattery toward any man.
22 For I do not know how to flatter, else would my Maker soon put an end to me.

33 "But now, hear my speech, O Job, and listen to all my words.

3. INNER COMPELION TO SPEAK (32:15-22)

15-22. In the third part of his preamble Elihu continues his reflections in the style of soliloquy, perhaps in order to indicate his contempt for the impotent professionals. Of course it is because these men have found no answer to Job that he will now speak (vss. 15-16) and reveal his opinion (vs. 17). He is so full of words that he cannot contain them, and the spirit within [him; lit., "his belly"] constrains him (vs. 18). Like Jeremiah (20:9), this would-be prophet is ready to burst (vs. 19). He must speak in order to be refreshed (a euphemistic translation; vs. 20; cf. I Sam. 16:23). The sense of his own creatureliness will prevent him from giving titles to any man (vss. 21-22; cf. Isa. 44:5). Elihu speaks with the tactlessness of a sincerity not mellowed by love.

C. FIRST PART: REFUTATION OF JOB'S DEFENSE (33:1-35:16)

The speaker now attempts to succeed where the friends have failed. In order to reach his aim he will address first Job (ch. 33), then the friends (ch. 34), and again the hero (ch. 35).

most deeply true: It is ... the breath of the Almighty, that makes him understand.

18-20. UNDER CONSTRAINT.—The pressure has become intolerable. Elihu can hardly breathe.

He is ready to burst with it. The holding back (vss. 6, 11-12), the conclusion to which he has been reluctantly (?) forced (vs. 9), the impulse far away underneath it all which he is confident
2 Behold, now I have opened my mouth, my tongue hath spoken in my mouth.
3 My words shall be of the uprightness of my heart: and my lips shall utter knowledge clearly.
4 The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life.
5 If thou canst answer me, set thy words in order before me, stand up.
6 Behold, I am according to thy wish in God's stead: I also am formed out of the clay.
7 Behold, my terror shall not make thee afraid, neither shall my hand be heavy upon thee.

1. Meaning of Endurance in Suffering (33:1-33)

a) A Discussion from Man to Man (33:1-7)

33:1-7. The speaker protests his utter candor (vss. 1-3) and then invites Job to listen to him without fear and to take [his] stand (vs. 5) since they are both equals in their created humanity (vss. 6-7). I am toward God as you are (vs. 6a). It is not necessary to recognize here an implied criticism of the poetic discussion and especially of the theophany Elihu merely reassures the hero who had repeatedly expressed his fear of the Deity (9:32, 34; 13:21; etc.).

must be assigned to a source beyond himself (vss. 8, 18b): the time has come to speak out. So like—and yet unlike—the daily burden of another life, in debt to God (II Cor. 5:14) and man (Rom. 1:14-16; cf. Expos. on 29:1-25).

33:6-7. I Am Toward God as You Are.—In his first reply to what Job has been saying, Elihu, after a kind of exordium, addresses himself (a) in general to the charges of unjust treatment which Job has brought against God (vss. 8-11; see Exeg.), contending simply that no man has any right at all to judge God on the basis of his own ideas of what is right and what is wrong (vs. 12c); and (b) more particularly to Job's oft repeated assertion that God pays no attention (cf. 19.7), pointing out that it is indeed quite otherwise, as Job himself should know from his own experience. God speaks not only in dreams (cf. 7:14), to turn man away from his sin and to keep him from destruction (vss. 15-18), but also in affliction, sending his angels of instruction (vs. 25), and restoring the penitent to praise and thanksgiving (vss. 24-30).

The introduction (vss. 1-7), far less offensive to the Oriental than to the Western ear, stresses again his sincerity (vs. 9), and while perhaps once more subtly suggesting that the theophany of the original poem was wholly unnecessary (cf. 32:18b), attempts to undercut Job's insistence that a fair trial of the case in hand was impossible (9:3, 14-16, 20, et passim). Elihu is a man as Job is, formed of clay (cf. 10:9), given life by the spirit of God (reading vs. 4 after vs. 6)?; no need to be terrified of him (cf. 13:21; 23:15), his pressure [hand] will not be heavy. The in God's stead of the KJV is an attractive mistranslation. Job had wanted (according to thy wish) somebody to play that role (9:33; etc.). But the point Elihu is making is rather that he stands where Job stands, on the same, created, mortal footing, sharing a common lot, bearer of a common light (32:8), albeit in some uncommon measure. Except for that last intimation, which runs through everything he has to say, he would have been a model for all expositors. Not once had the friends admitted in so many words that they too were subject to human frailties. They had spoken abstractly, as from a great height (cf. Expos. on 2:11-13; 4:1-5:27; 8:3; 11:2-6); from that height Elihu comes at least part way down (see Expos. on 5:8)—as all men must who undertake either comfort or counsel, who wish to make difficult the all too ready defense of conscious inferiority or helplessness, or to take away the refuge of uniqueness and estrangement. In the very words one draws nearer and nearer to the mystery of the Incarnation, and to what Job required that God should 8 “Surely, you have spoken in my hearing, and I have heard the sound of your words.

1134
9 You say, ‘I am clean, without transgression; I am pure, and there is no iniquity in me.’
10 Behold, he finds occasions against me, he counts me as his enemy;
11 he puts my feet in the stocks, he marketh all my paths.
12 Behold, in this thou art not just: I will answer thee, that God is greater than man.
13 Why dost thou strive against him? for he giveth not account of any of his matters.

b) Implications of Job’s Claims (33:8-12)

8-12. In order to argue with Job, the new interlocutor is compelled to quote from the hero’s earlier statements (vss. 8-11, cf. 9:21, 10:7; 16:17; 23:10-12; 27:5-6; 31:1 ff.; cf. especially vs. 10b with 13:24b, vs. 11 with 13:27a), and in some cases to attribute to Job some words which are not found in the poetic discussion (i.e., יָדוּעַ, innocent, “immaculate,” in vs. 9 and והֵן, which should be read והֵן, occasions, in vs. 10). On the whole, however, Elihu does not misrepresent Job’s repeated plea, except that he quotes words without understanding the depth of the hero’s pain and sorrow. After recalling Job’s claim to integrity, he merely confines himself to declaring negatively, Behold, in this thou art not just (rather, right), and positively, I will answer thee, that God is greater than man (vs. 12). Before pursuing this theme, however, he must raise an issue which Job has held to be fundamental.

c) Self-Disclosure of God to Man (33:13-14)

13-14. The hero has complained that God does not answer man’s questionings, and more specifically that God does not recognize man’s innocence (vs. 13; cf. 9:2-8). It is not necessary to correct with the LXX, דביווי, his words (RSV mg.), into דביווי, my words trying to make it out. Zophar has already spoken of how inscrutable God is (see Expos. on 11:7), but there the undertone was judgment; for Elihu here the undertone is grace (cf. Isa. 55:6-13; Rom. 11:33-36). God is beyond man’s thought in this, that man cannot conceive of his lovingkindness and tender mercy. The author of these speeches understands that what has been needed all along, by the friends and Job alike, is a greater God than any they have been able to imagine. It is what is needed when evolution is suggested as a substitute for the Almighty, when men are frightened out of their dignity by interstellar space, when the world’s evil piles so high that nothing human or divine seems a match for it—not another God, but a greater God. What the author of Elihu’s speeches does not For God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not.

In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumberings upon the bed;

Then he openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction,

That he may withdraw man from his purpose, and hide pride from man.

He keepeth back his soul from the pit, and his life from perishing by the sword.

He is chastened also with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain:

So that his life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat.

For God speaks in one way, and in two, though man does not perceive it.

In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falls upon men, while they slumber on their beds, then he opens the ears of men, and terrifies them with warnings, that he may turn man aside from his deed, and cut off pride from man;

he keeps back his soul from the Pit, his life from perishing by the sword.

"Man is also chastened with pain upon his bed, and with continual strife in his bones; so that his life loathes bread, and his appetite dainty food."

(RSV), since the third person pronoun refers to the מָן, "man," in vs. 12. To the statement that God remains silent Elihu replies that God speaks in one way, and in two [cf. 40.5], though man does not perceive it (vs. 14). Job is wrong in thinking that God is deaf to his appeals, for Job thereby implies that there is no difference between infinity and finitude, creativity and creatureliness, and he forgets that "God is greater than man" (cf. vs. 12 which thus constitutes a transitional link between vss. 9-11 and vss. 14 ff.). The voice of the Almighty is clear to everyone who has ears to hear it.

d) God's Techniques and Man's Response (33:15-30)

(1) Warnings in the Night (33:15-18)

15-18. In the first place God sends his warnings (vs. 16) to men in night visions (cf. vs. 15b with 4:13b) while they slumber on their beds (vs. 15), and his purpose is always of a high ethical nature: (a) that he may turn man aside from his deed (vs. 17a); (b) and cut off pride from man (vs. 17b; read אֲנָשָׁה, cut off, "prune away" [cf. Isa. 33:12], instead of מָנָשָׁה, hide); and thus (c) preserve him from untimely death (vs. 18).

(2) Chastening of Pain (33:19-22)

19-22. In the second place God chastens man by physical pain (vs. 19), which produces fasting (vs. 20) and thus a leanness (vs. 21) and awareness of mortality (vs.

understand is that only in the place of meeting between God and man can Job's anguish be resolved. An interesting series of studies could be worked out on the God of Eliphaz (see Expos. on 4:20b), of Bildad (see Expos. on 8:4), of Zophar (see Expos. on 11:7; 20:2b), of Job (see Expos. on 14:13-15), and Elihu (see Expos. on 32:6-22). "It is not the old that are wise" (32:9a).

14-30. God's Answers.—The implication is, of course, that the answers were there all the time (cf. Expos. on 17:3; 19:7; 24:12c; 35:9-16; 38:1-42:6; 38:1, 3), and Job did not perceive them (cf. 9:11; 19:7; 23:3); which is often the case.

He had made mention of his dreams, and he had bitterly complained of his afflictions; they were both God's beneficent messengers. God comes in dreams (7:14) not so much, as with Eliphaz, to reveal (see Expos. on 4:12-21), but rather to turn man aside from his deed, and prune away his pride, that his soul might be kept back from the Pit, and his life from perishing under the judgments of the Almighty. God comes in suffering (cf. vs. 20 with 6:6-7; vs. 21 with 19:20), that by some celestial visitant (see Exeg.) Job might be made "wise unto that which is good" (Rom. 16:19), and so, delivered and restored (cf. II Kings 5:14), come again 21 His flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen; and his bones that were not seen stick out.
22 Yea, his soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers.
23 If there be a messenger with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to show unto man his uprightness;
24 Then he is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit: I have found a ransom.

22). Elihu concedes, however, that neither dreams in the lonely hours of the night nor bodily ailment carries in itself the word of God to man. Suffering is not the instrument of divine revelation but only its possible channel. It merely prepares man to listen.

(3) INTERVENTION OF A MEDIATOR (33:23-25)

23-25. Thus in the third place Elihu brings forth in a passage of great beauty and of even greater theological impact the image of the angel or mediator. This latter word, מְשֶׁרֶן, means here “interpreter” (cf. Gen. 42:23; also Isa. 43:27), and it is quite remarkable that the Targ. translates it with the Greek word παρακλητός, i.e., παρακλήτης, the “Paraclete” or “Comforter,” a name which became in Hellenistic Judaism and in Christianity one of the appellations of the Holy Spirit (John 14:16, etc.). This angel-mediator is one of the thousand messengers of God’s judgment and grace, who at his bidding speed

And post o’er land and ocean without rest (Milton, “On His Blindness”).

The function of this being is twofold: first, he is sent to declare to man what is right for him (vs. 23b), for man needs not only to interpret his suffering but also to discern where his “duty” (yōsher) lies (cf. 6:25), and to do that which makes him and keeps him “upright” (yāshār). Second, inasmuch as man is not paying heed to this disclosure of his obligations, the angel-mediator truly mediates not only the will of God to man but with joy into the presence of God, recounting to all men his salvation, and singing his songs of redemption.

Elihu is not accurate in his reading: the trial in Job’s case is not on God’s initiative but on Satan’s (see Expos. on 1:6-12; 2:7-10); its purpose, if deliberate purpose it can be said to have, was more probative (1:8-12), as Eliphaz and Bildad had at first suggested (4:6; 8:20), than disciplinary. But it must be remembered that these speeches sprang out of a deep and growing dissatisfaction with the original poem, especially with its insistence on the hero’s integrity (1:8) and on the final encounter between Job, goaded by his inept comforters, and the God whom he had challenged with such impious assurance. So difficult and dangerous is it, where God’s “answers” are concerned, to make any attempt at identification. The pattern of life is far too complex and ambiguous for any man to go about lugging with him a faith which never grows up, has to be kept bundled tightly like a papoose in God’s “answers” to his questions and God’s “answers” to his prayers, cannot be set down to stand on its feet in the hurly-burly of a world where success may be a curse and failure a benediction. What Elihu perceives is that God does answer, answers in his own strange way, and answers in love (see Expos. on 1:6). Enough surely to justify the worship (vs. 26b) and the witness (vs. 26c; cf. II Kings 7:9), in the joy of a grateful heart (vs. 27-28), companioned (vs. 26a), secure (vss. 29-30), and lighted with the light of life (vs. 30b mg.).

24. I Have Found a Ransom.—It seems most likely that the mediator of vs. 23 is speaking: something makes it possible to satisfy God’s mercy without any infringement of God’s justice. Here it is the sinner’s repentance, his reorienta-
25 His flesh shall be fresher than a child's: he shall return to the days of his youth:
26 He shall pray unto God, and he will be favorable unto him: and he shall see his face with joy: for he will render unto man his righteousness.
27 He looketh upon men, and if any say, I have sinned, and perverted that which was right, and it profited me not;

25 let his flesh become fresh with youth;
26 Then man prays to God, and he accepts him, 27 and he sings before men, and says:
'I sinned, and perverted what was right, and it was not required to me.'

also the weakness of man to God: he is gracious to the evil-thinking, evil-doing, and thus evil-tortured creature, and he presents him before God in order to intercede on his behalf (vss. 24-25). The mediator is therefore also the intercessor (cf. Isa. 43:27). He not only prays for the deliverance of man from death (vs. 24b), but he also says, I have found a ransom (vs. 24c), i.e., the price of his atonement (יָדֶה; cf. Exod. 21:30; etc.; also Prov. 13:8). The ransom is not described any further, but one can easily recognize here the language of the prophets and psalmists (cf. particularly Isa. 43:3). It is possible that Elihu belonged to a group of wise men who had been in close contact with temple singers and who, like them, spiritualized to a large extent the language and imagery which were familiar to them in the ritual of the atonement. Here the ransom may be obtained, perhaps, by the patient endurance of suffering (cf. 36:18).

The hapax of vs. 24a, יָדֶה, is not known. Some MSS read יָדֶה, "let him go," "let him alone," or "let him loose" (usually in a perjorative sense; cf. 15:4; Exod. 32:25). In all probability the original text had ישם (cf. Targ. and Syriac as well as vs. 28), meaning "ransom him" (cf. Ps. 49:8, where the same verb is found side by side with the noun ישם, "ransom"). The intercessor prays that, through some mystery of expiation which he does not need to describe, the flesh of the dying man may become fresh with youth (vs. 25a; the word ישם is a hapax which the RSV, following Dhorine, reads as ישם; cf. 24:8), and that he may return to the days of his youthful vigor ("lustihood" [Driver and Gray]; vs. 25b; see 20:11).

(4) PRAYER AND CONFESSION OF THE SUFFERER (33:26-28)

26-28. In the fourth place Elihu pursues his program of theological therapeutics by setting forth the part which man in turn must undertake and fulfill. After the intercession

27-28. Songs of Redemption.—For "respectable" people in an intensely "practical" world, men and women who have only the foggiest notion of either the awful holiness of God or the unplumbed depths of human sin, the word "deliverance," which is the very theme song of the Bible from beginning to end, has precious little significance. What to Paul and those around him were "principalities" and "powers" and "rulers of the darkness" (Eph. 6:12) are to them inclinations and impulses and sudden inducements. Eat the right food, take plenty of exercise in the fresh air, and get eight hours' sleep: that should enable a man to handle most of them. For pity's sake, delivered from what? Not out of the battle, so much is certain. In it, then? Is there no whisper in the soul, "God be merciful to me a sinner" (Luke 18:13)? No clenching of the hands, no pallor on any face, 28 He will deliver his soul from going into the pit, and his life shall see the light.
29 Lo, all these things worketh God oftentimes with man, 30 To bring back his soul from the pit, to be enlightened with the light of the living.

28 He has redeemed my soul from going down into the Pit, and my life shall see the light.'
29 'Behold, God does all these things, twice, three times, with a man,
30 to bring back his soul from the Pit, that he may see the light of life.'

* Syr: Heb to be lighted with the light of life is offered by the angel (vs. 23-25) there must be a petition made by the sufferer himself (vs. 26ab). Then man prays to God (םשא, "supplicate," "entreat," cf. 22 27, Gen. 25.21; Exod. 8:26) and God will be favorable unto him (רעותא; cf. Isa. 42:1; Ps. 44:4; 147:11), and will let him see his face with joy (נערית, not the stylized choral "shout" and orchestral "blast" of the temple ritual but the spontaneous expression of religious gladness as in 8.21). More than this, the healed individual, like most of the psalmists who have experienced a deliverance from mortal sickness, will turn to his social environment and testify before the community: He recounts to men his salvation (vs. 26c; the RSV reads only יי or ויה instead of ישו'). This rendering, however, is hypothetical, and the M.T. reads, lit., for he will render unto man his righteousness (KJV) Inasmuch as the subject of the verb appears to be God, not man (see the three clauses, obviously parallel, in vs. 26abce), it is safe and probably correct to accept here the traditional translation. Because man feels again that he is "accepted" by God and received back into his presence, he also knows that God has returned to him his righteousness. The social element, which is not absent, appears only in the next verse. It is always true to say—even apropos of a book like Job which deals mostly with religious individualism—that "the Bible knows nothing of solitary religion" (John Wesley). As soon as the sick man is healed and thus finds himself restored before God, he sings before men (vs. 27a). The song of thanksgiving is a gem of conciseness—a surprising feature in the discourses of the Buzite—and more than a psalm in nuce. The singer confesses not only that he has sinned but also that he has perverted what was right (the verb הוא דני means, lit., "I twisted" [from הנע I], a word which suggested to the minds of auditors and readers the homonymous הנע, "I committed iniquity" [from הנע II]; hence,bose, "guilt"). Yet the enormity of the crime did not entail a mortal judgment: And it was not required to me (vs 27c). Thus instead of insisting on the injustice of his tortures, the sufferer emphasizes the patience and mercy of a God who might have dealt him at once the mortal blow; he prays that God for his redemption (דה; cf. vs. 24) from the Pit (vs. 28a), and he expresses his confidence that his life shall see the light (vs. 28b).

(5) God's Ultimate Purpose (33:29-30)

29-30. In the fifth and last place Elihu is thus able to conclude his picture of the redeemed sinner by saying that God acts mysteriously with men but slowly and consistently (the expression twice, three times does not refer to vs. 14 but signifies the duration of action; cf. Ecclus. 13:7). His intention is always to save, and there is grace in his apparently harsh treatment. His final purpose is that man may be enlightened with the light of [KJV] life (RSV, rather than the living [KJV]; cf. Pss. 27:1; 36:9).

as some murderer is led down the long corridor to his death, "There but for the grace of God goes Richard Baxter"?
Worship is not "uplift." It is the soul's res-}

8 Attributed also to John Bradford, a century earlier, and to John Newton, a century later!
31 Mark well, O Job, hearken unto me: hold thy peace, and I will speak.
32 If thou hast any thing to say, answer me: speak, for I desire to justify thee.
33 If not, hearken unto me: hold thy peace, and I shall teach thee wisdom.

Furthermore Elihu answered and said,
2 Hear my words, O ye wise men; and give ear unto me, ye that have knowledge.

31 Give heed, O Job, listen to me; be silent, and I will speak.
32 If you have anything to say, answer me; speak, for I desire to justify you.
33 If not, listen to me; be silent, and I will teach you wisdom.”

Then Eli’hu said:
2 “Hear my words, you wise men, and give ear to me, you who know;

e) Final Appeal to Job (33.31-33)

31-33. Elihu is now ready to propose a direct application of his exposition to the case at hand. Give heed, O Job (vs. 31a). The words which follow (vss. 31b-33) were not originally translated in the LXX. Elihu offers to the patient an opportunity to speak, assuring him that his sole intention is to justify him (vs. 32). This is unexpected on the part of a man who began his discourse in blazing anger (cf. 32:2, 3, 5) and who was apparently intent upon “justifying” the ways of God rather than the position of Job. He may, however, be animated by the same desire as that of the three friends, for he aims at bringing the hero to confession and conversion, hence to “justification.” His view of salvation is therefore not different from that of his predecessors, and his last word now is, Hold thy peace, and I shall teach thee wisdom (vs. 33). To be sure, he goes further than ordinary wise men by suggesting the spiritual value of endurance in suffering and by evoking the vague possibility of a mediator. But he still believes that submission brings forgiveness and physical restoration. He has not come to grips with the realities of darkest sorrow. The figure of the intercessor, which his imagination conjures up for a moment, belongs nevertheless to the realm of historical potentiality. Unwitting prophet—as a prophet always is—Elihu, the pedantic apprentice, calls for the necessity of a Christ. Indeed, he hails obscurely the advent of one who would “declare to man what is right for him, . . . be gracious to him,” and “say, . . . I have found a ransom!” The exegete who reads in the light of the total context of the Bible is not indulging in the practice of any mystical, spiritual, or even typological interpretation. He merely observes that the poet of Job (cf. 9:33 ff.) and the Joban school (cf. 33:23 ff.), like many other members of the Old Covenant, dimly recognized the dangers of a theology of unilateral transcendence, and contemplated—however distantly and vaguely—the face of the “interpreter,” a mediator who would interpret God to man and man to God; indeed, an “intercessor” who would himself be a ransom.

2. JUSTICE OF THE WAYS OF GOD (34:1-37)

Elihu now addresses the friends and perhaps also the bystanders (vs. 2) while discussing the case of Job in the third person (vss. 5, 7, etc.). After a brief exordium (vss. 2-4), he recalls the blasphemous implications of Job’s protest (vss. 5-9) and there-
For the ear trieth words, as the mouth tasteth meat.
4 Let us choose to us judgment: let us know among ourselves what is good.
5 For Job hath said, I am righteous: and God hath taken away my judgment.
6 Should I lie against my right? my wound is incurable without transgression.

upon refutes them in two contentions: First, God is righteous (vss. 10-22), because he has created all men equal (vss. 10-15), he shows no partiality to the princes and the rich (vss. 16-20), and he knows all men and all things (vss. 21-28). Second, God sometimes appears to be unrighteous (vss. 29-37), but he spares the wicked only to induce them to repentance (vss. 29-33), and consequently Job by his words rises against God in monstrous judgment (vss. 34-37).

a) The Need to Test Words (34:1-4)

34:2-4. There is an undertone of sarcasm in the double appellation, you wise men and you who know (lit., “the learned”). Elihu does not pose as an unlearned individual, but he claims to possess—as well as his interlocutors—an innate capacity to choose what is right and determine... what is good. If vss. 3-4 are original (they were absent in the early MSS of LXX), Elihu seems to contradict himself as he appeals no longer to a revelation of the divine spirit (cf. 32:18) but to human “common sense.” For him, “testing” the truth of the interpretative beliefs concerning life is like “tasting” a wine or a piece of cheese (cf. 12:11). It is therefore within the reach of man as man.

b) The Irreligion of Job (34:5-9)

5-9. Elihu uses the method of quoting Job’s words, as he has already done in 33.8-11. There is no question as to the accuracy of his representation of Job’s attitude. The patient was certain of his innocence even when he alluded to it in conditional clauses (vs. 5a; cf. 9:15; 10:15, also 33:9), and he said verbatim, God has taken away my right (vs. 5b; cf. 27:2). Vs. 6 is difficult. The M.T. reads, I lie against my right, a statement to which the KJV attempts to give meaning by considering it as interrogative. The RSV interprets—or perhaps reads—the Piel קָחֶזֶבּ (‘akhuzzĕḇ) as a Niphal (‘ekkāzēḇ, cf. Prov. 30:6) or a hypothetical Pual (‘ekhuzzabāh) and renders it I am counted a liar. The LXX has εὑρίσκομαι, which suggests the Hebrew קָדָשׁ, “he [i.e., God] is a liar.” The exegete can understand without difficulty that such a reading, if original, would have been highly suspicious to the early scribes. Elihu may very well quote, here and in vs. 6b, an authentic statement of Job now excised from the third cycle.

add rebellion to the wrongdoing which has already laid him low (cf. 56:18). He deserves now to suffer to the bitter end.

34. Prove All Things.—Let us choose what is right, i.e., let us weigh the whole matter judiciously, free of prejudice and passion, then decide who has the better case, Elihu or Job. Consider the evidence carefully, and on the basis of sound reason and high moral and religious principles reach a verdict. Man is not so corrupt that he can no longer make a few rough-and-ready, yet on the whole reliable, distinctions between good and evil, right and wrong (see Expos. on 17:9). The ear is still able to test words as the palate tastes food. Paul thought so too, though the gift was not “by nature” but of grace (Rom. 2:14-15; cf. 32:8). It is interesting, however, to remember that Job had said precisely the same thing (12:11), and had arrived at almost precisely the opposite result. It is ultimately the “man in Christ” who is to “prove all things,” and “hold fast” to “that which is good” (1 Thess. 5:21; cf. Rom. 12:1-2), the while taking “heed lest he fall” (1 Cor. 10:12).

1141
7 What man is like Job, who drinketh up scorn ing like water?
8 Which goeth in company with the workers of iniquity, and walketh with wicked men.
9 For he hath said, It profiteth a man nothing that he should delight himself with God.

A man like Job who dares to pass judgment on the Deity may not be a criminal of the common ethical variety, but he certainly goeth in company with the workers of iniquity, and walketh with wicked men (vs. 8). He belongs to their class not on account of deeds similar to theirs, but through his outrageous blasphemies. Elihu is more subtle than his three predecessors, for he does not try to explain Job's misery by accusing him of acts or thoughts of moral turpitude, and he is on the way to discerning the theological dimension of human sinfulness. The gross sinner breaks one or more articles of the moral codes. Job does less and worse: he judges the motives and decisions of his Creator.

Vs. 9 refers to another saying of the hero which is not found verbally in the present text of the poetic dialogue. But Job has often spoken of the suffering of the innocent (9:22-24; etc.) and of the prosperity of the wicked (21:7-13; etc.), and therefore of the lack of due reward or punishment upon the earth. Such a line of reasoning is in effect equivalent to declaring, It profiteth a man nothing that he should delight himself with God, for, 'to be willing and to have pleasure in the company of God'; vs. 9, cf. 33:26; Ps. 50:18. The Satan of the folkloric tale had already understood this idea (1:9). Elihu thus plants himself at the very center of the problem of the book. He understands that the crux of the matter lies less in the question of undeserved suffering than in the faith of profitless religion. Better than many of his subsequent commentators, he sees that religion for profit is irreligion.

7-9. Skeptic or Sinner.—For vs. 9 cf. 9:22; 21:15 (said of the wicked, but now attributed to Job, as in 22:13, 17). This, to Elihu's mind, was not just to drink "iniquity like water" (15:16); this was to scoff, actually to pervert the truth and mock at religion, from which it was clear enough, without any further witness, what kind of company Job had been keeping. He had walked "in the counsel of the ungodly," had stood "in the way of sinners," and now sat "in the seat of the scornful" (Ps. 1:1). But it was not God; it was the conventional picture of God that Job hated. A college student is said to have called one day on Harry Emerson Fosdick, troubled because, as he put it, he could not believe in God. "Tell me," asked Fosdick, "what kind of God is it you cannot believe in?" Startled, the boy, after stumbling about a little, began to describe the God who was taken for granted by the Sunday school he had attended and the home he lived in. When he was through, Fosdick smiled companionably, and said very quietly, "I could never believe in him either."

Elihu understood neither the madness that was in Job's brain (cf. Expos. on 25:15), nor the love that was underneath it in Job's heart. Scoffing has deep and bitter roots too; but Job was not scoffing: he was in an agony of bewilderment. Doubting was met by Jesus on its own ground (John 20.27); but Job was not doubting: he was sormented, not so much in mind as in soul, by the very contradiction of which Elihu was aware (vs. 12-15) but could do nothing to resolve. To toss such a man over into the category of the ungodly is cruelly to miss the mark.

There are times when the skeptic—and Job is far more—owes his skepticism to his own moral delinquencies. Aldous Huxley writes of his youth and companions: there was a good deal in the Christian faith that did not suit them, and they rejected it. But to universalize on that theme is disastrous. What William James calls "the will to believe" is crucial, and Job had it. Where it is lacking, a life is far better than an argument to stir it into being; where it already exists, a life—not an argument—provides God with his most effective means of self-revelation. There Job's friends failed him, and failed him utterly (cf. Expos. on 6:14, 18). Nothing is left for it but that God shall act as his own interpreter: theophany here, one day the Incarnation (Phil. 2:5-15; cf. Browning, "Saul," st. xviii).

9. What Shall It Profit a Man?—Here again is raised the question of the prologue (see 10 "Therefore, hear me, you men of understanding, far be it from God that he should do wickedness, and from the Almighty that he should do wrong.

11 For according to the work of a man he will require him, and according to his ways he will make it befall him.

12 Of a truth, God will not do wickedly, and the Almighty will not pervert justice.

13 Who gave him charge over the earth and who laid on him the whole world?

14 If he should take back his spirit to himself, and gather to himself his breath,

15 all flesh would perish together, and man would return to dust.

c) The Defense of Divine Justice (34:10-28)

(1) There Is No Evil in the Creator (34:10-15)

10-15. Men of understanding will agree that God does not perform iniquity (vs. 10), but that the work of a man shall render unto him (vs. 11). Elihu sides with Bildad (8:3) in maintaining that the Almighty will not pervert justice (vs. 12). Such a God is God: "He is no viceroy lording it on earth!" (vs. 13 Moffatt). There is neither corruption nor caprice in his rule. He is the "faithful creator" of those whose very existence depends at every instant upon the gift of his breath (vss. 14-15; cf. Ps. 104:29-30).

Expos. on 1:6-12; 28:1-28). Elihu will discuss it in ch. 35. But Job has never said that there is no profit in being "on terms of friendship" with God (vs. 9b). The old friendship is what he craves more than anything else. He has simply said that too often the wicked prosper (9:24, 21:17-18) and the righteous suffer (12:1; 24:5-11) for anybody to talk glibly about God's discriminating and retributive justice. He is learning that whatever good there is in religion cannot be stated simply in terms of cash and carry (cf. Expos. on 30:9-15). Elihu knows it too. The real question, however, turns things around terribly. Christ asks it. "What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36).

11. The Law of Retribution.—Seemingly blunt, succinct, unconditional; and to Job, as indeed to any man who insists on testing it by the facts (cf. Expos. on 12:2-6; 18:21; 21:5-6; 27:7-12), so much the more empirically vulnerable. That Elihu does not himself hold it in the form here set down becomes increasingly clear.

14. God Is Faithful.—Somebody who has been entrusted with responsibility by another may conceivably be guilty of partiality and injustice in order to serve his own selfish ends; but it is not so with God, argues Elihu (vs. 13) without any too great cogency. The righteousness of the Creator, indeed, as Strahan points out, is scarcely to be associated with disinterestedness (cf. 22:2) by way either of motive or demonstration. It is not a quality to be lost or achieved; it is of the nature and essence of the being of God. The moment Elihu leaves the analogy behind him, however, and in the next verse shifts from anthropology to theology, he gives expression to one of the most memorable passages of the book (cf. 12:10), if not of the whole O.T. God is now creator and sustainer, not remote and uninvolved (see Expos. on 22:2-5), but moment by moment upholding and preserving (see Expos. on 10:8-12). He is the faithful God of whom Paul speaks (I Cor. 1:9), who calls us into "the fellowship of his Son," suffers none to be tempted above that he is able (I Cor. 10:13),

* Job, p. 288.
16 If now thou hast understanding, hear this: hearken to the voice of my words.
17 Shall even he that hateth right govern? and wilt thou condemn him that is most just?
18 Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked? and to princes, Ye are ungodly?

16-20. If Job were right, then God would be wrong, and how could an unjust God rule the universe (vs. 17)? “Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?” (Gen. 18:25) Elihu is standing on the edge of a cogent argument, but he confuses the issue at stake. Job has never denied the omnipotence of the Creator. Elihu seems to believe that divine might makes divine right. “That in the long run empires built on wrong fall because of it may be true. Yet we are able to say ‘Rome shall perish. . . . In the blood that she has spilt,’ only because we are assured that the order of the world is moral. But when the previous question is raised, Is it moral? the reply, Rule and injustice cannot go together, is quite wide of the mark. Kipling’s ‘Lest we forget, lest we forget’ is answered by Watson’s ‘When we forgot, when we forgot.’ What retort to Watson does Elihu enable us to make?” (Peake, Job, pp. 289-90.) Still, Elihu discerns that the divine person is beyond human categories of justice. “God is greater than man” (33:12), even greater than man’s defined idea of morality. Job accuses God of being immoral. Elihu retorts that God does not belong to the human realm, not even to the reality of ethical good which is still a part of man’s conceptual world. God is not immoral but supramoral.

The argument of vss. 18-19a would be extremely weak if the M.T. were to be retained: Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked? . . . How much less to him that accepteth not the persons of princes. The LXX, Vulg., and Syriac, however, read the word "deeper contemplation" will resolve for him the terrible riddle of existence (cf. ch. 21)? The way back takes its start from a place of meeting. God encounters Job.

17. Does Might Make Right?—The answer to Elihu’s question in the first half of this verse might very well be, “Indeed, yes!” And as instance, in the annals of human history, many a despotic tyranny could be adduced, from the Pharaoh of the oppression to Antiochus Epiphanes, from Nero to Adolf Hitler (cf. Expos. on 9:2-10). Job has been insisting all along that as a sheer matter of inescapable fact one who hates justice [does] govern (25:13-14). The legerdemain of vs. 17b, where Elihu surreptitiously couples righteous and mighty when nobody is looking, will not likely provide any proof to the contrary. God is mighty enough to govern, but is he righteous enough to love justice instead of hating it? Once again anthropology turns out to be a snare and a delusion (cf. Expos. on vs. 14). It may be that some measure of justice is essential to any decent and continuing order (see Exeg. on vs. 20); but how if might, instead of being relative, were absolute? In the world of the twentieth century, with mechanized power in the hands of the comparatively few, human rights are in a far more precarious position than 19 How much less to him that accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor? for they all are the work of his hands.

20 In a moment shall they die, and the people shall be troubled at midnight, and pass away: and the mighty shall be taken away without hand.

21 For his eyes are upon the ways of man, and he seeth all his goings.

19 who shows no partiality to princes, nor regards the rich more than the poor, for they are all the work of his hands?

20 In a moment they die; at midnight the people are shaken and pass away, and the mighty are taken away by no human hand.

21 “For his eyes are upon the ways of a man, and he sees all his steps.

in vs. 18a not as ha’amōr, Is it fit to say? but as hā’omār, “He who says . . .” (referring to God in vs. 17); the RSV correctly translates vs. 18 as a sequence of vs. 17, . . . who says to a king, “Worthless one” . . . , thus providing a satisfactory transition to vs. 19. According to this translation, Elihu is not using an a fortiori argument, defending the righteousness of God on the basis of a commoner’s duty to revere human monarchs, but on the contrary is stating that God is just since he shows no partiality to the mighty of this world for they are all the work of his hands (vv. 18-29).

20. As proof of the Judge’s impartiality, anyone can observe that in a moment they die, even at midnight (vs. 20a; the ERV and ASV rightly recognize here a poetic line, against the KJV and RSV). The text of vs. 20b is uncertain. The word פָּרָה, people, was not read by the Syriac; instead of the M.T. פָּרָה, the people are shaken, one might read with Kissonne, following partly a brilliant conjecture of Budde, פָּרָה, פָּרָה, “he smiteth the rich,” and then the M.T. פָּרָה, and [they] pass away. Vs. 20c may well be rendered with the RSV, and the mighty [reading the plural פָּרָה, with one MS, Kennicott 248] are taken away by no human hand. Dhorme, however, proposes to read the verb פָּרָה, פָּרָה, אִישׁי as אִישׁי (with one MS, Kennicott 191), and to translate, “And without effort he deposes a potentate.” This rendering of vs. 20c permits the same critic to preserve the word people in vs. 20b, and thus to underline a fine sequence: oppressions of the masses do not last long, and dictators find a sudden end. In any case, the general meaning of the verse is clear enough. God does not make any distinction among men; rich and poor, kings and subjects, are all equal before the almighty Giver of life and death.

(3) Divine Omniscience Is Absolute (34:21-28)

21-28. Divine omniscience (vs. 21; cf. 24:23b; 31:4, 37) is so complete that no place is left—not even gloom or deep darkness—for the evildoers who would try to ever before. If this were not the kind of universe where a righteous God is still sovereign, and moral not physical force is ultimately decisive, the outlook would be dark indeed. The victory belongs inherently and inalienably to the right. “The battle is the Lord’s” (I Sam. 17:47; cf. II Chr. 20:15).

19. They Are All the Work of His Hands.—How can there be partiality, asks Elihu, in one who fashioned all men, kings and nobles and princes, rich and poor alike the work of his hands? The argument would run somewhat as follows: God is the author of all; he is no respecter of persons; therefore his judgments are “true and righteous altogether.” It is not the major premise Job would question, or the minor premise either—unless by it is meant that God deals out his justice with an even hand. That Job vehemently denies. God may be no respecter of persons, but demonstrably he is no respecter of a person’s integrity either. Logic is not the way to faith, and begging the question is not logic. If only God’s love for the work of his hands (10:8) could have squeezed itself in through the loopholes of the syllogism! From the very start Job had been trying to make room for it (see Expos. on 28:1-28).

21-28. Knowing and Doing.—From the categories of creation and sovereignty Elihu turns to omniscience; the result is a non sequitur which could hardly be improved. God sees and knows all things (cf. Exeg. on 24:1); therefore 22 There is no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves.

23 For he will not lay upon man more than right; that he should enter into judgment with God.

24 He shall break in pieces mighty men without number, and set others in their stead.

25 Therefore he knoweth their works, and he overturneth them in the night, so that they are destroyed.

26 He striketh them as wicked men in the open sight of others;

27 Because they turned back from him, and would not consider any of his ways:

28 So that they cause the cry of the poor to come unto him, and he heareth the cry of the afflicted.

29 When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when he hideth his hide themselves (vs. 22; cf. Ps. 139.11-12; Jer. 23:24: Amos 9:2-3). Job had complained that God refused to go to trial with him (9:32), and Elihu retorts that the Almighty has not appointed a time (reading with Reiske and most modern critics instead of ישן, the letter P having probably dropped out through haplography). God does not need to appoint any special time for a trial: he pursues his task of strict and swift justice without investigation (vs. 24) and in the sight of men (vs. 26). Thus it is not true to say that God does not hear the cry of the oppressed (vss. 27-28; cf. 24:12).

29-30. If God is silent, no human being has the right to condemn him (vs. 29a). In vs. 29b the parallelism may support Budde’s emendation of ויהי מהו (who can behold him?) into יִפְרַר ("who can blame him?"). Vs. 29c is obscure and means, lit., “and against nation and against man together.” The various emendations which have been proposed are conjectural. However, one might read with Dhorme והיו, “he watches,” instead of והיו, “together,” and link vs. 29c with vs. 30, thus rendering, “He watches over nation and individual alike, so that he prevents a godless man from being king and ensnaring the people.” Yet such a meaning is not satisfactory in a context where Elihu attempts to refute a charge against the apparent inactivity of God (vs. 29ab). It is therefore preferable to read with the Targ. (cf. Theod. and Vulg.) מֶסֶלְךָ instead of מֶסֶלְךָ (vs. 30a), and to render tentatively, “He watches over nation and individual alike, and he never needs to hold any assize (vs. 23): without investigation he shatters the wicked, does it publicly for everybody to see (vs. 26), because they . . . had no regard for any of his ways, and so caused the cry of the poor to come to him. The whole passage is replete with references (cf. vs. 21 with 13:27; 14:16; 24:23; 31:4, 37; cf. vs. 22 with 22:13; vs. 23 with 9:16; 14:13; 24:1; vs. 27 with 21:14; 22:17; vs. 28 with 24:12); but there is nothing very persuasive about it, except the unsupported statements of vss. 28, 30. There is a gulf between knowing and doing as everyone discovers to his sorrow. The “watcher of men” (cf. 11:1-11) has for Job become a spy (see Expos. on 7:20a). Neither omniscience nor omnipotence can take the place of love. Without it they are both intolerable (see Expos. on 9:2-10)—an all-knowing and all-wise celestial Gestapo! 29a. See Expos. on 19:7; 24:12c.
face, who then can behold him? whether it be done against a nation, or against a man only:

30 That the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be ensnared.

31 Surely it is meet to be said unto God, I have borne chastisement, I will not offend any more:

32 That which I see not teach thou me: if I have done iniquity, I will do no more.

33 Should it be according to thy mind? he will recompense it, whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose; and not I: therefore speak what thou knowest.

34 Let men of understanding tell me, and let a wise man hearken unto me.

35 Job hath spoken without knowledge, and his words were without wisdom.

36 My desire is that Job may be tried unto the end, because of his answers for wicked men.

37 For he addeth rebellion unto his sin, he clappeth his hands among us, and multiplieth his words against God.

When he hides his face, who can behold him, whether it be a nation or a man? —

30 that a godless man should not reign, that he should not ensnare the people.

31 “For has any one said to God, ‘I have borne chastisement; I will not offend any more; 32 teach me what I do not see: if I have done iniquity, I will do it no more?’

33 Will he then make requital to suit you, because you reject it?

For you must choose, and not I; therefore declare what you know.

34 Men of understanding will say to me, and the wise man who hears me will say:

35 ‘Job speaks without knowledge, his words are without insight.’

36 Would that Job were tried to the end, because he answers like wicked men.

37 For he adds rebellion to his sin; he claps his hands among us, and multiplies his words against God.’

* The Hebrew of verses 29-33 is obscure when he allows a godless man to be king, he may do so on account of the sins of the people’ (cf. Theod. ἀπὸ δυσχόλας λαοῦ, and Vulg., propter peccata populi).

31-33. These verses are likewise difficult, but the RSV is possibly correct here. Does Job know whether the immunity of some evildoers is not due to the fact of their secret repentance (vss. 31-32)? Has Job the right to teach God how to exercise justice (vs. 33a)?

(2) THE REBELLIOUSNESS OF JOB (34:34-37)

34-37. Skillfully Elihu returns to his initial theme (see vss. 5-9). He agrees with men of understanding (vs. 34) that Job speaks without knowledge (vs. 35) and deserves to be tried to the end (vs. 36) since he adds rebellion to his sin; . . . and multiplies his words against God (vs. 37). Once more Elihu shows that he discerns the specifically theological character of Job’s guilt. His position is close to that held by the three friends in the poetic discussion because he cannot accept the validity of Job’s attacks upon the righteousness of God. But unlike the three friends, he has so far been careful to argue on the basis of the sufferer’s blasphemous criticism of divine rule, not on the presumption 31-33. The Sin of Presumption.—Elihu wants to know if Job intends to usurp the prerogatives of the Almighty and dictates what is to be done in this case or in that (see Expos. on 40:6-42:6). For his part, he will have nothing to do with such shamelessness (vs. 33c). God’s judgments are absolute, and all of them in the interests of the poor and the afflicted (vs. 28), lest the godless triumph (vs. 30). He withholds the rod of his wrath, and who will condemn him (vs. 29)? He withdraws his favor, and nobody can make him change his mind (vs. 29b), “whether it be a nation or a man” (yet see Exeg. on vss. 29-30). If then a man should repent (vss. 31-32), must God do what Job says he must, and reject the sinner’s plea because Job rejects it? That, as everybody will agree, is not merely the result of some misapprehension (vs. 35); that is unadulterated wickedness (vs. 36b), sedition (vs. 37a), and mockery (vs. 37b). Any man who mouths such abuse against the Almighty (vs. 37c) is entitled to whatever catastrophe

35:1 The Interpreter's Bible

35 Elihu spake moreover, and said,
2 "Thinkest thou this to be right, that thou saidst, My righteousness is more than God's?"

35 And Eli'hu said:
2 "Do you think this to be just?
   Do you say, 'It is my right before God,' of the sufferer's moral guilt. He has not attempted to justify the hero's misery by charging him with ethical turpitude. He has not said that suffering is the deserved punishment of a moral violation. He has recognized an element of mystery in the government of the world, but he has been intent upon safeguarding the freedom of God from human condemnation. He now applies his attention to the central question of Job's claim of self-righteousness.

3. Giver of Songs in the Night (35:1-16)

Elihu does not describe the unqualified severity which many modern commentators visit upon him. His attitude is admittedly aggressive, but the aggressiveness and the cocksure immodesty with which he began to talk—a probable result of youthful timidity—does not prevent him from making a distinctive contribution to the book. He reaches in this chapter a high level of poetic and religious expression.

a) Rights of Man Before God (35:1-4)

35:2-4. With remarkable penetration Elihu understands that Job became a blasphemer when he deemed religion and morality were unprofitable to him: How am I overtakes him, and ought to have more (vs. 36n).

The attempt to usurp divine prerogatives is common enough; but Job is not guilty of it. He is not asking that everything be cut according to his cloth. What he wants is a faith that can transcend it all. Take everything he says at its face value, and he can be made to look ridiculous—and worse—without any trouble at all. Enter but a little way into his heart, as nobody did—nobody even tried—and the titanic dimensions of his struggle are at once apparent. It is not a struggle to sit on Anyone's throne; it is a struggle to kneel at Someone's feet. His knocking at the door—never mind that sometimes he kicks at it—is not that he may be lord of the house, but that he may be a guest in it—even if nothing is left, within to grace the table of God's bounty but the host himself, with healing in his hands for the terrible memory of those days without.

35:2-3. Man's Perpetual Challenge to God.—
It is strange to reflect that the real challenge was not Job's at all (see Expos. on 31:35-87). The unremitting challenge God has to deal with year in and year out was what Elihu and the three friends were, and what they kept saying. Perhaps one should take them, not Job, as symbols of man, always confronting the Eternal, always difficult, standing for the most part either dully or sullenly apart from his purpose, often enough striding brazenly across it or running stubbornly against it. Marc Connelly's The Green Pastures* tells the story dramatically, simply, and humanly: God, with his first high hopes vaguely disturbed, looking down from his heaven, shaking his head pitifully, sending a judge, sending a prophet, sending a priest, trying to do something as the noise on earth grew louder and more rebellious; at last whispering to himself, as the curtain fell, about a sacrifice which seemed even to him appalling. "Will man ever find his way to God?" is the question men ask as they look at the dumb red horror on "the great world's altar-stairs." The question that should be asked is, "Will God ever find his way to man?" That he has set himself to it is the drama of the ages.

Look at the postures these men strike. The first challenge God has to get around somehow, or break through, is the eternal challenge of the old. All four of them, each in his own measure, though Elihu least (see Expos. on 32:6-22, 6), insist on getting things hind part before. It was the old order that was God-given. And they crawled behind what had been, and hid, and grew rigid, and showed their teeth (cf. John 8). Salvation does not lie in forever beating a retreat. "Men have always chanced to war, and they always will. Talk of doing away with it is talk of the millennium." Or, "The system we have lived under all our lives, and our fathers before us, is the best of all systems. The others are damnable and corrupt." But it may be that in the changing of the order God tries to say something. The past is no fetish to frighten life back out of his future. They said: Let Job confess his sin and be restored; let him scuttle back

Tennyson, In Memoriam, Part LV, st. iv.
3 For thou saidst, What advantage will it be unto thee? and, What profit shall I have, if I be cleansed from my sin?

4 I will answer thee, and thy companions with thee.

better off than if I had sinned? (vs. 3). It is this utilitarian conception which Elihu will now refute.

I will answer you and your friends with you.

It is wrong to affirm, as many commentators do, that Elihu merely and wholly accepts the dogma of individual retribution and that he speaks exactly along the same lines as the three friends. Actually Elihu stands against both the friends and the hero, and shows that Job as well as they hold to a distorted view of God.

...
5 Look unto the heavens, and see; and behold the clouds which are higher than thou.

5 Look at the heavens, and see; and behold the clouds, which are higher than you.

b) Freedom of God from Man (35:5-8)

5-8. With a somber but authentic awareness of divine transcendence, Elihu suggests that God, who is above the heavens and the clouds (vs. 5; cf. Eliphaz in 22:12-13), is not affected by human sin (vs. 6; cf. Job in 7:20). Much more important still, God does not need man’s righteousness (vs. 7). However incomplete and unilateral such a theology may be (cf. Exeg. on 22:1-5), one has to admit that it does not necessarily lead to a holding out as an inducement anything a man might chance to like or want. One thing God does: he offers himself (see Expos. on 38:1). “She . . . spake of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem” (Luke 2:38). They had no very good definition of it. Most of them thought it meant some kind of deliverance from Rome. Simply because this was not what it meant, some of them may well have had a hand later on in that Good Friday affair. What it really meant was a deliverance they had never dreamed of, to set life on its feet again, no matter how far down it had been beaten, or how often. It meant that no highest, farthest, deepest, purest human hope had to flicker and go out any more. Those hopes were not poetry, they were God’s plain prose.

Says one of the characters in Sir Philip Gibbs’s Young Anarchy, speaking of modern youth,

They are lookers-on at this rather ridiculous game called life, trying to find some clue to its tangle of absurdities, but very doubtful whether such a clue is there. They are amused and interested at times, but generally a little bored. . . . They have no faith in human progress or human nature. All that they hope to do is to have the best time possible according to their luck, and dodge if possible the . . . unpleasantness which will probably hit them between the eyes when they least expect it.

There were times when Jesus too was an onlooker. One day when the disciples felt like talking about the glories of the temple, they found him staring at a poor widow who had crept up to throw her mite in the alms box. “Look!” he said, plucking them by the sleeve and pointing, “Look at that!” (Luke 21:1-4.) Because he understood the world better than we do, he was forever peering about for the great things that happen in dark corners. And because he understood God better, he kept whispering to his friends at every turn of the road. “Listen! Maybe this is he now!”

5-7. The Transcendent God.— (See Expos. on 7:20a, 21a; 22:2-5; 33:12; Exeg. on vs. 5-8; 34:16-20.) What yardstick will measure the dis-

1 New York: George H. Doran Co., 1926, p. 42.
6 If thou sinnest, what doest thou against him? or if thy transgressions be multiplied, what doest thou unto him?

7 If thou be righteous, what givest thou him? or what receiveth he of thine hand?

8 Thy wickedness may hurt a man as thou art: and thy righteousness may profit the son of man.

9 By reason of the multitude of oppressions they make the oppressed to cry: they cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty.

Moslem distortion of monotheism. It offers an indispensable corrective to all forms of man-centered worship. At the same time, it does not fall into the fallacy of antinomianism. Man’s actions are never performed in a vacuum. They affect, rightly or wrongly, the lives of other men. There is a distinction between good and evil (vs. 8).

c) Gifts of God to Man (35:9-12)

9-12. There is no clear transition between the preceding thought and the theme which is now developed, but the poet is pursuing a clear intention. Job has complained of his undeserved suffering. By so doing, he has merely joined the masses of humanity and tance between these verses and those simple words of the Apostles’ Creed, “Suffered under Pontius Pilate”? Says James Strahan:

Elihu exalts God’s greatness at the cost of His grace. His transcendence at the expense of His immanence. He sets up a material instead of a spiritual standard of profit and loss He does not realise that God does gain what He most desires by the goodness of men, and loses what He most loves by their evil. He makes God so cold, distant, apathetic, heartless, that he creates for the imagination an impassable gulf between heaven and earth, and fosters the belief that a religion worthy of the name is for ever an impossibility. This is not the God of Israel, nor the God of whom Elihu himself speaks in the next sentences.

8. What of It?— “It profits a man nothing [34:9]. . . . What advantage have I? How am I better off?” (Vs. 8.) Supposedly the question has been asked with a shrug—and worse. “I have kept his way. I have treasured in my bosom the words of his mouth.” (23:11-12.) What of it? And Elihu proceeds to answer. “God gets nothing out of it, but you do, for weal or for woe, and society does.” The transaction is still on the basis of a prudential ethic and a hedonistic philosophy (yet see Expos. on vs. 9-16). The final sanction is pro bono publico, the greatest good for the greatest number. When one asks what that may happen to be, there are few who would recommend theft or murder, unless on the titanic scale of war. For the rest, every man becomes the protagonist of his own theory. This is not wholly to invalidate Elihu’s position. It points what perhaps may be called “the peril of the center.” The center is not in self or in others, but in God; with a radius that is neither mind nor will, but love. To be “righteous” is to stand in the relationship of love with the God who is righteous. The O.T. understands that profoundly. Theologically there is no excuse for the friends or for Elihu. There is none for Job except that his problem is not theological but existential. So was the problem of the Jewish people. The resolution, when it comes, has to come in that area. The movement inevitably is toward the theophany and the Incarnation.

9-16. When God Does Not Answer.— (See Expos. on 19:7; 53:14.) Though man, unlike the beast (cf. vs. 11a with 6:5), can in his pain cry out to “God for God’s sake” (Exeg.), he does not. He cries as an animal cries, because he is hurt (see Expos. on 50:24). It is not his spirit that yields; it is his body that by reason of the pride of evil men calls for help. Such vain entreaties God does not regard. Why complain, then, of his silence, and in some bitterness bred by God’s own patience, mouth such bejemedt
10 But none saith, Where is God my maker, who giveth songs in the night;
11 Who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven?
12 There they cry, but none giveth answer, because of the pride of evil men.

animality which cry for relief from pain (vs. 9: 24:12). Like other men, he has not sought God for God’s sake, but he has cried merely for God’s help.

None says, “Where is God my Maker, who gives songs in the night?” (Vs. 10.)

This is one of the loftiest passages of the book, and indeed of the whole Bible. The quest is not one which ignores human needs. Petition for deliverance is legitimate, provided it is offered in the full recognition of creatureliness.

First of all, prayer must be addressed to the divine Maker; it appeals to the feelings which a master artist always entertains for the work of his hands (cf. 10:8 ff.), and it renews within man the sense of finitude and dependence. Second, it expects that such a God will give, even in the midnight of sorrow, the songs which have the power of transmuting the present gloom into the hope of a morning. That man should sing praises in the deepest darkness does not explain suffering, but it negates its poison, and the ability to sing them is for God alone to give. Natural man cannot overcome suffering, but grace blunts the thorn (II Cor. 12:9). This is the way in which God makes man and empty words? “The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man” (Jas. 5:16) stems of course from his need; but there is a need beyond all other needs, farther and deeper than any. In such a man’s eyes, beyond the self, is God. Job’s prayer was like that, but Elihu assumed otherwise. Job’s quest was for the God he loved, beyond the God that terrified him (23:15), upon whom his very frailty was a claim (cf. Expos. on 7:7-10; 9:14-19; 10:8-12), in whose gift alone were the songs in the night which his soul yearned to sing. He had long ago given up hope of recovery; something else had to put the song on his lips (29:4b-5a).

Kissane’s interpretation of this passage is interesting and suggestive: The oppressed cried out for redress (vs. 9), but Job did not succor them because of his respect for the wicked oppressors (vs. 12). The gratitude which he owed to God who created him and protected him in the past (vss. 10-11) should have urged him to succor the needy; but, like the impious, he assumed that God was unaware of the suffering of the distressed, and therefore of his negligence (vs. 13). In the past, when he thought that God was not aware of the sins of men, Job was silent and respectful toward him; but now, when God has intervened to punish the guilty, and has made no exception in his favor, he is no longer silent or respectful (vss. 14-16).

10b. Songs in the Night.—(Cf. Acts 16:25.) Paul’s hymn to love (I Cor. 13) was composed in the midnight of his own distress over the church at Corinth. George Matheson’s “O Love that wilt not let me go” carries with it the memory of some deep agony of soul (see Expos. on 6:4). In suffering and in sorrow, in failure and in despair, there is One whose presence is a melody in the heart, and his very will a song. There is a legend to the effect that Satan, when asked what in heaven he missed most, replied that he missed most “the sound of the trumpets in the morning.” The whole ministry of God’s redemption makes music out of discord. Henley writes his poem:

Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the Pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul,

—and gets drunk. Paul, in prison, writes to the Philippians, “Rejoice in the Lord always: and again I say, Rejoice” (Phil. 4:4), and wins an empire for Christ. Such songs in the night are the cradle songs of every victory that God has wrought.

4 “Invictus.”
13 Surely God will not hear vanity, neither will the Almighty regard it. 14 Although thou sayest thou shalt not see him, yet judgment is before him; therefore trust thou in him.

Superior to the beasts (vs. 11). Such a religious attitude, however, is not widespread. None says, “Where is God my Maker...?” (Vs. 10.) It is because men in general do not have recourse to God in true humility that they cry out, but he does not answer (vs. 12a). Job should not have accused God of silence (24:12) without at the same time having taken into consideration the pride of evil men (vs. 12b).

d) Vanity of Job’s Argument (35:13-16)

13-16. God does not hear an empty cry (vs. 13), and so he veils his presence and withdraws his face from Job (vs. 14). When the hero observes that the wicked appear

14. Wait upon God.—This is a difficult verse. It may be that we should translate, “Indeed, when you say that you do not see him, ... the case is before him; therefore wait for him.” Even when Job protests that he can see no sign of God anywhere (23:8-9; etc.), and that he cannot win a hearing from the Almighty (31:35; etc.), even then the hearing is on; one has only to wait (cf. Expos. on 8:20-22).

God is His own interpreter, And He will make it plain.5

Ages upon ages have borne their witness to the truth of that. If the Bible means any one thing, it means that God is forever breaking through.

(a) Among the most unexpected people. W. N. Ewer put one of the earliest stages of the long story of redemption, as the O.T. records it, into one of the shortest poems which the English language boasts:

How odd
Of God
To choose
The Jews.

The great unnamed prophet of the Exile described what God had been looking for: a people gentle and unafraid, that would not cause their voice to be heard in the street (Isa. 42:2). Then he described what God got: a people deaf and blind, snared in holes, hid in prison houses, a prey and a spoil (Isa. 42:19, 22).

(b) In the most unexpected places: Egypt, Babylon, a remote province of the Roman Empire, Nazareth, Calvary. Four hundred years later, on the shores of North Africa, precisely where the American troops landed in World War II, a man sat writing a book Could he think of nothing better to do—while civilization was falling to pieces? His name was Augustine. For a thousand years his book held in thrall the history of European thought. Its title was The City of God. Then a German miner’s hut—and Luther!

(c) At the most unexpected times. Read again Luke 21:25-28. Legend once had it that William Cowper wrote his poem (from which are taken the lines cited above) on a day when he had planned to put an end to his life by drowning himself, but the cabby he summoned to drive him to the river wandered round and round in a fog and set him down again at his own gate. Such strange things do not always happen. In Cowper’s case there are indications that they did not. But the norm, if ever it could be discovered, would likely prove stranger than the exception—with an incalculable God at the helm! In a world like that there is no peril like the peril of settling down. God will not be put to bed—as Michal did once with her idol (1 Sam. 19:13)—in any way of life, or in any system of doctrine. Too often when judgment begins, it begins “at the house of God” (1 Pet. 4:17). Nor is there any futility like the futility of despair. Queer people, strange places, odd times: whose case is hopeless, what man will sneak away and hide, or because he is out of love with the present, throw up his hands and lose his zest for the future? Whenever God comes, wherever he comes, or to whom, he seems to stir a tumult. And that tumult, writes John Baillie,6 is religion (see Expos. on vs. 2-3, 5; 56:15-17).

14. Solutions in Parentheses.—When you say that you do not see him, ... the case is before him; wait for him! If this translation is correct, 6 Our Knowledge of God (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1929), p. 3.

15 But now, because it is not so, he hath visited in his anger; yet he knoweth it not in great extremity:
16 Therefore doth Job open his mouth in vain; he multiplieth words without knowledge.

Elihu also proceeded, and said,

2 Suffer me a little, and I will show thee that I have yet to speak on God's behalf.

36 And Eli'hu continued, and said:

2 "Bear with me a little, and I will show you, for I have yet something to say on God's behalf.

a Theodotion Symmachus Compare Vg. The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain.

Elihu has now completed his refutation of Job's theological attacks. He will offer a positive contribution by describing God's purposes in the affliction of the just (36:1-25), continue with a hymnic meditation on the marvels of Providence (36:26–37:13), and conclude with a final exhortation for Job to fear his Creator (37:14-24).

36:2-4. Elihu announces that he has yet something to say on God's behalf (vs. 2). In the preceding part of his discourses (35.10-16) he has touched on the central theme of pure religion. He has suggested that man has no claim whatever upon the grace of God. But he must not be misconstrued. He has not proposed that God is ruled by whim like playing a dog-legged hole in golf: no use driving straight toward the hole; to win one aims off-side. As William James did when he was asked to write something that might help to stay the alarming increase in the rate of suicides. Instead of A Treatise on Self-destruction, or The Advantages of Being Alive, his book bore the title The Will to Believe.

Greatness and goodness and happiness and peace simply are not proper ends for any human soul to set up for itself. They are states of being along the road. They are the by-products of a life that has been held steadily, like a ship at sea, to some true course worth sailing.

One desolate winter day that lonely poet, Francis Thompson, walked down Chancery Lane, illy clad, carrying a kind of carpetbag full of old books, recognizing nothing, unaware of anyone, his face lifted up to the sun as it suddenly broke through the clouds; and the face was shining with ecstasy, and there were tears
3 I will fetch my knowledge from afar, and ascribe righteousness to my Maker.
4 For truly my words shall not be false: he that is perfect in knowledge is with thee.
5 Behold, God is mighty, and despiseth not any: he is mighty in strength and wisdom.

and caprice. He will therefore fetch [his] knowledge from afar (vs. 9a), and ascribe righteousness to [his] Maker (vs. 9b). He is utterly confident in the truth of his convictions (vs. 4). Many critics think that he boasts extravagantly of being perfect in knowledge (vs. 4b), but this interpretation is unlikely, for Elihu uses elsewhere the same expression for describing the Deity (37:16). It is therefore probable that vs. 4b also refers to God and anticipates the theological development which follows.

b) PURPOSES OF AFFLICTION (36:5-15)

5-7. Divine omnipotence is not incompatible with divine justice and even kindness. Behold, God is mighty (יְהוָה הֵמוֹן; vs. 5a), "but he does not despise him who is pure like milk" (vs. 5b; reading with the Syriac, וב יְהוָה הֵמוֹן, instead of the M.T. וב יְהוָה כ ב ש ס כ ש, which is in his eyes What had done that for him—or who?

Yea, in the night, my Soul, my daughter,
Cry,—clinging Heaven by the hems,
And lo, Christ walking on the water
Not of Gennesareth, but Thames!

Can it be that along the way of Christ's presence solutions appear of themselves—in parentheses? What is the theophany in Job but a foreshadow?

36:5b. To God's Defense— (Cf. Expos. on 1:12; 13:8) Elihu, with his doctrine of love-injustice, comes far nearer the heart of the matter than any of the friends. The author of these speeches lived later than the original poet, perhaps by some two hundred years. The facts of human existence, to which Job had so often appealed (see Expos. on 12:2-6; 21:5-6), the sheer weight and movement of human history, had compelled certain modifications of the rigid theory of divine retribution, and had prepared the way for a much deeper and truer understanding of the nature of God's dealing. The God of Elihu is indeed a greater God (see Expos. on 33:12; 34:14). Instead of rendering the theophany unnecessary, as Elihu's speeches were no doubt intended to do, they prepare the way for it (see Exeg. on 37:23-24). God is not only the Almighty, but forever the All-just (vss. 5, 6; 37:23), the All-wise (vs. 4b), and the All-merciful (vss. 9-10). If the righteous do have 6 He preserveth not the life of the wicked: but giveth right to the poor.

“the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.” With such a God, “Why?” Not once, but twice, and three times, “Why?” In the O.T. are hands without number lifted up to heaven, on how many faces an agony, on how many lips a question: not matched yet with the agony and the question on Calvary. Perhaps this is as good a place as any to ask what the book of Job as we now have it has to say on the subject. Only so can we see how near Elihu comes, and how far he falls short.

All along, from beginning to end, is the deep undertone of God’s wrath against the wicked. Elihu and the friends keep insisting on it; Job himself not only takes it for granted, but constantly puts it into words. Whatever else may be said about that, it is not the rule that disturbs the thoughtful person, but the exceptions to the rule. In the vehemence of his denial that the rule applies to him and to his case, Job denies more than once that there is any such rule as everybody wants him to imagine. The whole earth, says he bitterly, is given over to the wicked (9:24). In his more sober moods, even in the midst of his suffering, he never would have said that. He knew very well that there is a rough kind of justice that does get itself done. For all the miscarriages of that justice, it is still not well with the wicked. For all the woes of the righteous, there is still a judgment, incrutable, inexorable. But that is not the point at issue. The point at issue is that point where a man’s character and the calamity which overtakes him cannot be made to balance, where the two can no longer be so equated that the one can be used to explain the other. What then? It is of design in the original poem that the friends refuse to countenance any such question. Elihu will not face it because the author of his speeches is at pains to disallow the older poet’s very hypothesis.

Is it therefore by way of trial that God permits suffering? In the first cycle, especially in the first discourse of Eliphaz (4:6), some account is taken of the possibility. Certainly the thought is given shape in the mind of the original poet. There (in the prologue) is God, proud and confident of his servant; and there is Job, proving that the pride and confidence are not misplaced (cf. 42:7). In the N.T. on page after page is the boasting of apostle and martyr that they are thought worthy of the testing that has come, ships let down off the ways and set out to sea, pitting themselves against the storm, evidence of the Maker’s craft and handiwork. Recall Paul’s long list of hardships and perils (II Cor. 11:24-28). He calls them the unceasing pageant God has made of his life, and reviews them as a general would review a parade. Job, so to speak, is God’s gladiator in the bitter arena of human life and human sorrow, vindicating the honor of the God that fashioned him—how much more than Elihu (vs. 5b) than the friends, by that much more again! He is a son sent out to battle, with a father’s ineffable joy in his manhood and courage and fealty and love. Cast into the furnace like ore, emerging fine gold (23:10; cf. Expos. on 1:6). “That the trial of your faith,” so comes the echo, “being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ” (1 Pet. 1:7). How much place will be given that in the room which every life has to make for life? Let those who have suffered answer. Yet there is nothing in it of deliberate and calculated trial (cf. vs. 16 with Expos. on 1:6-12; 19:7). It was love, nothing less and nothing other, that allowed it. No doubt a man could stand a good deal if he knew that God, who has stood a good deal too, was looking on, pointing him out to the angels in heaven and saying, “See there! That is the way my sons behave!”

If not for calculated trial then, is it for discipline that God allows the blow to fall? Elihu says it is (vv. 9-10; cf. Deut. 8:1-10). And without in the least impugning the integrity of Job’s life, one can indeed find in him more than mere traces of religious egoism—as where not? It is his own self-interestedness that broods over his pain and his utter insignificance in the great universe; twists, distorts, fights back (see Expos. on 19.28-29), as if he were the special object of God’s vengeance, as once he had been the very household pet of God’s bounty. And that dross is burned out. One must not dismiss the fact. Read Francis Thompson’s “The Hound of Heaven” and see what it was that drove him back into the arms of God. Read of “The Blind Ploughman,” and the God, who took away my eyes,

That my soul might see! *

1156
7 He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous: but with kings are they on the throne; yea, he doth establish them for ever, and they are exalted.

8 And if they be bound in fetters, and be holden in cords of affliction;

Still it must be remembered that a man may come out of the fire not purged, but a cinder (vss. 13-14). Such is the risk God has to run. He ran it with Job, in the Satan's teeth. And Job stood fast, for all his wavering and beating about in the tempests that broke over him. And in Job God stood. A woman sits bound to her chair year in and year out. It would be heartless for anybody to suggest to her that her stature these sad years—in spite of them, or because of them, what difference does it make?—has grown (vs. 15), the peace on her face deepened, the smile in her eyes become radiant with an un-earthly radiance, the words on her lips gayer words. But so it is. And one may not dismiss it. The trouble with Elihu is—that for him too, as for the friends, love has slipped out of the picture—if not so much in theory, equally so in fact: slipped out of the figure he cuts, and out of God. His God "doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men" (cf. vss. 8-9); but neither can he "be touched with the feeling of our infirmities" (cf. 85:6-7).

Back of it all, however, more poignantly for Job than for any of the others, yet for them as well, each in his own measure (vs. 26; 11:7-9), lies the unfathomable mystery. Through it men may look, "as through a glass, darkly" (1 Cor. 13:12), and argue to themselves that were the world other than it is, and did the righteous always reap the harvest and the wicked the whirlwind, then indeed the problem would be solved, but very much as death solves the problem of disease. Life could no longer have any moral significance for anybody. That much may be said. But the ultimate, at this stage of the poem, must lie in the reasons beyond human reason (see Expos. on 1:12; 2:7-10). Why else that scene at the very beginning, in the secret councils of the Almighty, the transaction of which Job is kept in ignorance? It is as if the All-wise, the All-just, the All-merciful were pursuing his own great ends beyond man's knowing, while man himself is left to grope after them in faith. How else could they ever be apprehended by finite minds? If men understood God, they would do well to doubt him. If the finite could fathom the infinite, the infinite would be finite. Why else the poem on wisdom (ch. 28)? And why else the speeches of the Almighty, in which there is a world of mystery—made luminous with God. To march out bravely into the dark, and not to ask too closely, "Why?" On what other terms can living be triumphant?

8-12. However, Elihu goes further than his predecessors. While they assert merely that suffering is a punishment for sin, he insists upon the disciplinary and purifying significance of chastisement. By bringing men into affliction (vs. 8), God makes them aware of their transgressions (vs. 9), reveals to them misṣār, instruction (vs. 10a; cf.
9 Then he shoveth them their work, and their transgressions that they have exceeded.

degree but in kind; if it is so closely woven into the very pattern of life that to disturb it would be to transform the quality of that life tōto caelō, surely it must be of profounder significance than any ready “explanation” of it would suggest. What if it belongs to that Being which is the ground of all being! There is little if any hint of that in the speeches of Elihu or of the friends; in Job, nothing but the barest, broken whisper of the sorrows that have their home in the heart of God (7:21c; 14:13-15).

Add this, that as life advances from its lower to its higher forms its capabilities for suffering grow more and more acute (cf. 6:5; 35:11). A mule has sensations which a lobster very likely knows nothing about. One may be relatively sure of that without being either. See how acute Job’s suffering is! The more exalted the character and the finer the nature, the higher the ideals, the quicker the wound, and the deeper. Ought it not be just the reverse? As life climbs farther up, should it not be leaving the shadow farther and farther behind, instead of getting in more deeply for every inch of ground it covers? Unless in some unaccountable way the shadow works with it toward its goal.

That the dark facts of human existence have done just that is the un-failing testimony of the ages. It is the testimony of the book of Job. That much more right Elihu and the friends were than Job himself. He thought it made demonic sense (see Expos. on 10:13-17); they thought it made God’s kind of sense—only they mistook the kind. No need to insist with Elihu that God sends suffering for men to sharpen their teeth on. It is necessary only to acknowledge, as true of the realities of human experience, that when a man achieves some measure of moral greatness his triumph comes not so much in spite of suffering as through it. In some queer way out of that raw stuff his victory has been fashioned. What he has endured has gone into the warp and woof of his soul and become a part of him, as the thorn was a part of Paul, and indeed the scars a part of Jesus, so that no man now can think of God without them.

Yet there is left over what seems to be the bald and meaningless injustice of so much of the suffering there is in the world. J. Y. Simpson, in writing of it, aptly recalls the “happy little child Jesus once placed in the midst of his disciples to teach them a lesson of faith,” and adds, “There are in the world other little children, and when we place them in our midst our faith is simply struck dumb.” To watch them lifting up their pathetic faces against the crippling odds to which they have fallen heir is to make that easy phrase, “It’s all for the best,” stick fast in the throat. There is anguish that seems purposeless and mad—Job knew it well—a grinning mockery of God. It is quite out of the question to be sure of him at all without realizing that somehow something has gone wrong (see Expos. on 1:6-12, 16:11). The friends said it, and so did Elihu; and they were right. They said that the world is marked all over with our interference; and it is. They did not reckon on Satan’s. And they all wanted to come down to cases with it, applying it to the situation in hand. It happened not to apply. When a man breaks his leg it is not always certain that he has been running after something he should have let go. Nevertheless, sin and suffering are not unrelated. “Forasmuch as it hath pleased God, of his great mercy, to take unto himself the soul of this our brother . . .” It may not have pleased God at all. The man may have been a glutton. Life may well have been intended as a channel of mercy; but anybody can send his evil and his willfulness down its ways until it carries a very burden of woe and those who come after must stoop to the heritage that is left them (see Expos. on 21:19). How much of the pain bears that indictment written across its face? How much of the pain wears a human signature for any soul to read?

If there is any rescue for faith as it stands gazing at the spectacle of a tortured world, it must be in the passion of a God who suffers too (cf. Expos. on 12:7-25; cf. also Expos. on Heb. 12:3-11).

8. But If, When Ye Do Well, and Suffer.—Elihu barely hints at that problem, and solves it by dismissing it. One would suppose that in his thought the word “righteous” (vs. 7) actually did stand in quotation marks. If they are . . . caught in the cords of affliction, God is declaring to them “their transgressions.” But no such tour de force will serve. The matter has to be taken seriously, as Job says. No man is righteous; but no man either can take advantage of that fact to hide his mind away in the doctrine of an evenhanded retribution.

Certainly what “goodness” there is cannot be
JOB

10 He openeth also their ear to discipline, and commandeth that they return from iniquity.

11 If they obey and serve him, they shall spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasures.

5:17), and bids them to return from iniquity (vs. 10b). The alternative on the one hand is prosperity and pleasantness in this life (see Job 11; cf. Ps. 16:6, 11, in which the word נעמם has probably the meaning of “religious delights”), or on the other hand an unholy and violent death (vs. 12).

set down as a guarantee of anybody’s safety. Still there are “the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune.” Indeed, the situation is worse than that: “But if, when ye do well, and suffer,” i.e., from a sense of God (I Pet. 2:20, 19), knowing what he is like, and what he demands. It was precisely this that Job knew, deep in the turmoil of his soul (see Expos. on 19:6); and the knowledge itself was anguish. As the years passed, and the very goodness of God was made incarnate, men found it no shield and buckler (see Expos. on 23:10). Rather it laid them wide open, drove them out of doors into the thick of the storm, where the wind could whip their clothes about and the rain could sting their face. If anything is to be set down, it is that. When Jesus came, and was baffled and beaten and killed, not many could swallow the fantastic notion that this was God in the flesh. God could have saved himself the thorns and the reed and the nails. He could have managed differently and got along better. It should not be necessary to pay so terribly in a Father’s house for being that Father’s child (see Expos. on 21:7-18). What is it, a crazy world, where a man does well and suffers for it? “Aye,” writes Peter, “it is that. Just so!” There is nothing in the Sermon on the Mount to the effect that the poor in spirit, the meek, the pure in heart, will have their fur stroked. No neat modicum of success, no fat surplus of well-being: just something about a kingdom sometime. And something more one day about “sheep in the midst of wolves” (Matt. 10:16). Partly no doubt because New York and London and Paris and Berlin and Tokyo are what men have made them, not what God wanted them to be.

The other fact that has to be set down is this: There is a way of meeting the world’s hostility—“if ye take it patiently.” Peter could not rub from his eyes that One who waited out the ribald laughter and the shouts, until life looked up amazed to find gentleness there still, and hope, and a sort of dry and tearless yearning. Does that mean a lying down under anything? Is it unconquerable might with God, but just plain, cheap, yellow flabbiness with man? Job, with his dreadful wrestling (see Expos. on 3:24), and the faith that flatly refused to let go, came nearer God’s kind of patience than any of the cowardly resignation which was commended to him—holding on and defying the odds. Patience in the N.T. means just that. Staying with it when you are down, and everybody else has made off. A man’s lonely, gallant wager that God is true (see Expos. on 8:20-22).

Franz Werfel in Embezzled Heaven takes an old woman and a priest into the catacombs and has them linger behind the crowd, while the priest tells of how horribly tedious everything down there seemed to him—above all else that greatest thing which nobody could see: just the incredible perseverance of the poor, simple folk by the hundreds, whose bones lay all about; their poverty, and squallor, and misery, despised by their fellows up yonder on the streets, forever facing prison and death. When at last they died, they had no idea of whether their waiting was in vain or not. Generation after generation, none of them knew. He called it “the craziest mystery in the whole history of the world . . ., the only revolution in which mankind has ever been successful.” Just that waiting, that awful, tremendous waiting. Job’s was noisy and violent; but the noise and the violence were for God’s sake.

11. God’s Kind of Security.—Their days in prosperity, . . . their years in pleasantness (cf. Expos. on 5:17, 18, 23; 11:18; 17:12). One of the fundamental urges of human life is the urge to get through this world as safely as may be. And nobody does. More shelter for the body, less for the mind, least for the soul: there is something quite terrible about such “progress.” For the Christian, paradoxically enough, there is most in that which seems to offer least (see Expos. on vs. 8; 55:14; read Eph. 4:22-28).

11-15. Somehow Good.—Elihu and the friends are at least never guilty of saying to Job that they are sure it will all turn out for the best.

12 But if they obey not, they shall perish by the sword, and they shall die without knowledge.
13 But the hypocrites in heart heap up wrath: they cry not when he bindeth them.
14 They die in youth, and their life is among the unclean.
15 He delivereth the poor in his affliction, and openeth their ears in oppression.
16 Even so would he have removed thee out of the strait into a broad place, where there is no straitness; and that which should be set on thy table should be full of fatness.

12 But if they do not hearken, they perish by the sword, and die without knowledge.
13 "The godless in heart cherish anger; they do not cry for help when he binds them.
14 They die in youth, and their life ends in shame.
15 He delivers the afflicted by their affliction, and opens their ear by adversity.
16 He also allured you out of distress into a broad place where there was no cramping, and what was set on your table was full of fatness.

b Heb among the cult prostitutes

13-15. The same thought is here repeated and amplified but in reverse order. The godless [vs. 13; cf. 8:13; etc.] cherish anger (cf. Rom. 2:5) and refuse to pray even under the strokes of distress; in their prime they die of premature exhaustion, lit., among the cult prostitutes (vs. 14 RSV mg.; cf. Deut. 23:18; I Kings 14:24; etc.). The proper acceptance of affliction is the way to salvation (vs. 15).

c) Let Job Beware and Praise (36:16-25)

The text of vss. 16-21 bristles with difficulties of various kinds, and the meaning is so obscure that some critics leave them untranslated. Inasmuch as the rendering of the RSV is not more conjectural than any of several others which might be proposed, and since it respects the M.T. as much as possible, it may be accepted provisionally as a basis of interpretation.

Elihu now concludes his exposition by applying it to Job’s situation (vss. 16-17). He gives the hero three warnings (vss. 18-19, 20, 21-23) and ends with a solemn exhortation to turn carping against God into praise of his works (vss. 24-25).

16-17. The speaker appears to be bewildered by the fact that Job is obviously not a criminal in the usual sense of the word, and he therefore tries to find an explanation for itself Tennyson’s lines:

O, yet we trust that somehow good
Will be the final goal of ill.²

Too much vapid sentimentalizing would claim for itself Tennyson’s lines:

There are conditions that have to be met. Elihu describes them in detail (vss. 9-11; 8:23-28; 5:10). So do the friends (5:17 ff.; 8:5-6; 11:13-17). Consistently the diagnosis was wrong, the therapy was for another ailment entirely, and the prognosis altogether beside the point (cf. modern man’s approach to a world dis-traught).

15-17. Round About by Way of the Wilderness.—(Cf. Expos. on 13:17-18.) In pioneer days to leave New England and head for the West was to follow river beds and skirt mountains, to overcome hardships and weather privations; but those who arrived had learned some-ting en route. An airplane flies as the crow flies, only much better; but the trip does very few travelers any good.

Elihu understands the value of the detour. The best road is not always the shortest: it may well run from A to B through Z. In fact, one may save a minute and lose a life. Or leap toward decency, as a whole culture tried to do in Russia, only to be caught in the toils of tyranny. The wilderness may be adversity or affliction; it may be postponement or old age—but what if the promises of God lie that way and not another? In vss. 16-17 Elihu suggests that Job’s distress had its origin in a broad place where there was no cramping, and what was set on [the] table was full of fatness.

² In Memoriam, Part LIV, st. i.
17 But thou hast fulfilled the judgment of the wicked: judgment and justice take hold on thee.
18 Because there is wrath, beware lest he for the hero’s misery. His reasoning may have proceeded as follows. Job’s past privileges and extraordinary happiness were for him an occasion of sin. God allured or “enticed” him (observe the pejorative meaning of the verb הָעַבֵּד in vs. 18 and also in 2:3; cf. I Sam. 26:19; II Sam. 24:1; Isa. 36:18) by preserving him “from the mouth of the enemy” (out of distress), and by establishing him in a broad place where there was no cramping (vs. 16a). Job enjoyed all that earth could offer. What was set on [his] table was full of fatness (vs. 16b). He did not suffer from the fear of insecurity which gnaws at other men. He knew neither hunger nor thirst, neither cold nor oppression. He was truly a free man.

Exceptional prosperity, however, made him soft toward himself and hard on others. His pride corrupted his sense of justice. He condemned the evildoers and in particular expressed shocked amazement that many of them never seemed to be punished. He was full of the judgment on the wicked (vss. 17a; הואל, a verb in the perfect tense). Now judgment and justice seize him (vss. 17b; מַעְלָה, a verb in the imperfect tense, expressing the continuation of the past into the present and future). In other words, his own sense of justice has gone to his head, but the justice of God is catching up with him. He must now bear the penalty of his pride, but he still refuses to recognize that his plight is actually the price of his pride. Thus he increases the burden of his crime in uncommon proportion. Such may be Elihu’s diagnosis in this passage. It must be emphasized that this interpretation is hypothetical. But it fits the general tenure of Elihu’s thought.

18-19. Now comes the first warning: Beware lest wrath entice you into scoffing (vs. 18a). Job’s resentment against God should not lead him into a more grievous sin. God

Out of his own pride (see Exeg.) and comfortable complacency had sprung his resentments at the prosperity of the wicked (vs. 17a); out of his surfeit judgment and justice had laid hold on him. It does happen. Meanwhile, the only assurance which anybody is heir to is the assurance of some crown that God has pledged himself to fashion: not to achieve something, perhaps, but to be something. That always takes time. And tears may be a part of it, and broken hopes, and bitter delays (see Expos. on 35:14). But to make it clear, there stands One who came to a manger in Bethlehem. Thirty years he waited. Even then there was no crown to be had for a leap. In the wilderness the devil whispered to him, “Hurry!” But there was to be a cross first. And how much else to follow? He said to Simon, “Go and preach.” “To the men who crucified thee, Lord?” “Yes.” “To those who brought the crown of thorns?” “Yes. I still have my crown, and to him who came with the reed say that I have a scepter too.” “Preach, Lord, to the men who drove the nails?” “Yes. And to those who cursed me say that I have a song for them; and to the soldier who pierced my side say that there is a nearer way to my heart than that.”

It was God’s road, and it was long and round about, and it ran far away, and out of sight, toward the spires on the world’s rim. In that one sentence, as also in vs. 15, is the whole story of Job; but its dimensions were far greater than Elihu dreamed.

18-25. In Life’s Rough Places.—For Job three warnings (see Exeg. on vss. 18-19, 20, 21-23) and an exhortation (vss. 24-25): no mocking now, no vain hoping for release in death, no sitting in judgment on God—but praise; praise anyhow, whether under the circumstances it makes sense or not; for praise is what God wants. Besides missing the point entirely (see Expos. on vss. 18, 21), such admonition betrays on the face of it its own pitiful inadequacy: for all the beauty of the psalm that follows, these are how much more than the counsels of prudence? Come from them in one long stride to the N.T. “Tribulation . . . distress . . . persecution . . . famine . . . nakedness . . . peril . . . sword” (Rom. 8:35). Life indeed turns rough—perhaps it was never intended to run smoothly; rougher now and then than people bargain for, until they are stuck in it up to their knees: like Michelangelo’s figures in the gallery at Florence, looking as if they were struggling hopelessly to be free of the marble. “What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us take thee away with his stroke: then a great ransom cannot deliver thee.
19 Will he esteem thy riches? no, not gold, nor all the forces of strength.
20 Desire not the night, when people are cut off in their place.
21 Take heed, regard not iniquity: for this hast thou chosen rather than affliction.
22 Behold, God exalteth by his power: who teacheth like him?
23 Who hath enjoined him his way? or who can say, Thou hast wrought iniquity?

and let not the greatness of the ransom turn you aside.
19 Will your cry avail to keep you from distress, or all the force of your strength?
20 Do not long for the night, when peoples are cut off in their place.
21 Take heed, do not turn to iniquity, for this you have chosen rather than affliction.
22 Behold, God is exalted in his power; who is a teacher like him?
23 Who has prescribed for him his way, or who can say, 'Thou hast done wrong'?

is not to be mocked. His wrath must be accepted with penitence. Let not the greatness of the ransom turn you aside (vs. 18b). Job is now bearing in his afflictions the "atonement" (מִכָּם) of his crime. He should carry the full weight of this burden instead of being lured farther and farther from deliverance. His cry of distress (cf. Pss. 18:6; 66:14; etc.) will not preserve him from ultimate annihilation, not even "all the energies of [his] strength" (vs. 19). He cannot save himself by his own resources and exertions. Man's power is of no avail. The giant must surrender. Prometheus is bound.

20. The second warning seems to be quite clear, although many critics agree with Driver and Gray that it is "perhaps the most unintelligible of all these verses" (Job, I, 318). As a matter of fact, the literal meaning of the M.T. is not out of place in the context as we have thus far interpreted it.

Do not long for the night, when peoples are cut off in their place.

Job has been tossed about between two moods: either he has desperately asked for a hearing and a vindication, or else he has begged for death. Elihu warned him in vss. 18-19 not to add rebellion to pride, and in this verse he now admonishes him that there is no hope for him in death. He probably alludes to the sufferer's initial lament (3:2) and more specifically to the line, "Like a slave who longs for the shadow" (7:2). "Do not desire the grave," says the strictly monotheistic theologian to a man possibly tempted by pagan rituals concerned with life in the underworld, "do not yearn for darkness because nothing is there but extinction."

21-23. The third warning confirms the Exeg. on vss. 16-17 and 18-19. Take heed, do not turn to iniquity (vs. 21a): Job has already chosen rebellion rather than humble acceptance of affliction (vs. 21). How could he dare to be the teacher of a God who alone is exalted in . . . power (vs. 22; cf. vs. 19b)? Will Job presume to dictate to the Almighty? There is no man who can teach God.

Who has prescribed for him his way, or who can say, "Thou hast done wrong"? (Vs. 23.)

...?" (Rom. 8:31.) It is worth something to start with the knowledge that however sticky the road is, he has traveled it ahead of us, and has come back to meet us (Expos. on 8:3). If he cares that much, caring may be what life is all about. If he cares that much, he soberly and honestly means, whatever happens, to make it more than worth while to go on and through. "Nay, in all these things" (Rom. 8:37) there is a glory beyond; beyond this grief, that failure, yonder ruined life. "For I am persuaded . . ." (Rom. 8:38-39).

18, 21. Are Morals Enough?—Elihu is concerned about doing; Job is concerned about being. Elihu no doubt would have been pleased with an address on "The Sufficiency of an 24 Remember that thou magnify his work, which men behold.
25 Every man may see it; man may behold it afar off.
26 Behold, God is great, and we know him not, neither can the number of his years be searched out.
27 For he maketh small the drops of water: they pour down rain according to the vapor thereof;

"Remember to extol his work,
of which men have sung.
All men have looked on it;
man beholds it from afar.
Behold, God is great, and we know him not;
the number of his years is unsearchable.
For he draws up the drops of water,
he distils* his mist in rain
* Co: Heb they distil

Job has been bold and reckless enough to pass judgment on the divine acts. He must now refrain from condemning his Maker (cf. 9:12b; 21:31). He must acknowledge the humanity of man and the divinity of God.

24-25. Elihu thus bids Job reverse his course and, instead of arguing against God, join the universal chorus of praise.

Remember to extol his work, of which men have sung (vs. 24; cf. 33:27; 35:10).

The giant who set himself to defy the Godhead must rejoin the rank and file of mankind and gaze in gladness mixed with awe upon the toil of the Creator.

All men have looked on it;
man beholds it from afar (vs. 25).

Contemplation will give birth to the music of adoration. Job may be unable to comprehend the mysterious ways of God, but he can still stand above the vicissitudes of earth and even transmute the moan of his tortures into a Magnificat. His lament of self-pity can thus be turned into a hymn of praise. This is Elihu's last word of advice, "Magnify the opus Dei!" And, following exhortation with example, he intones a psalmodic doxology.

2. UNSEARCHABLE GLORY OF THE LORD OF NATURE (36:26–37:13)

In a style which recalls the doxologies of the prophetic literature and the hymns of praise for the Lord of nature which are found in the Psalter, Elihu extols the glory of God as it appears in the marvels of sky and storm. The themes flow one into the other like the motifs of a tone poem.

a) LORD OF AUTUMN (36:26-33)

26-33. After an overture on the greatness and eternity of the divine being, a greatness and an eternity which forever transcend the comprehension of man (vs. 26), the poet centers his meditation on two seasons of the year—autumn and winter—when meteorological portents inspire in man theological reflection.

Ethical Religion." Job would have preferred some such subject as "Morals May Be Enough If There Is No God." It was fellowship with that God which was far and away the most important item on the roster of his business (cf.
Expos. on 19:4; 6; 42:5).

26-33. The Heavens Declare the Glory of God.
—(Cl. Expos. on 11:7.) The movement in Scripture is not from nature to man to God. The Gifford Lectures were intended to travel in that direction. Modern man is still inclined to insist on it. The ambiguities of both nature and man would seem to make it difficult. Savage or kind, purposeful or meaningless? The reading depends on the reader. A man who has lost his faith cannot be brought back to it by any mere contemplation of the heavens. Because Elihu begins with God, he can see in the lightning, judgment, in the rain, mercy (vs. 31; cf.
37:13), both hidden and revealed (vs. 32-33) by them at once. The revelation is not conceived as either in nature or in history; nature and history are its footnotes (cf. Expos. on 26:5-14). When they are allowed to step into 28 Which the clouds do drop and distil upon man abundantly.
29 Also can any understand the spreadings of the clouds, or the noise of his tabernacle?
30 Behold, he spreadeth his light upon it, and covereth the bottom of the sea.
31 For by them judgeth he the people; he giveth meat in abundance.
32 With clouds he covereth the light; and commandeth it not to shine by the cloud that cometh betwixt.
33 The noise thereof showeth concerning it, the cattle also concerning the vapor.

37 At this also my heart trembleth, and is moved out of his place.

In autumn the Master of nature brings rain to the parched soil and thus renews the life of the earth with the promise of abundant food (vss. 27-31). He thereby reveals his providential bounty, but conceals at the same time the true nature of his being in the flash of lightning (vs. 32); yet its crushing declares concerning him, and the man of faith can discern behind the flash of light the presence of a God who is jealous with anger against iniquity (vs. 33; read with the Targ. נָעַם, who is jealous, for the M.T. נְעִיָּם, cattle, and with Aq. and Theod. point חָוָה not as 'ōleh, "that which goes up," but as 'awālah, iniquity). True to the Hebrew interpretation of nature, the poet turns a somewhat primitive view of the thunderstorm into a theology of justice and grace (cf. Ps. 29). Going beyond elemental emotions of fear, Elihu detects in the autumnal thunderstorms signs of providential fidelity and reminders of God's ethical judgment (cf. especially vs. 31).

b) LORD OF WINTER (37:1-13)

37:1-13. In winter the thunderstorms bring the wonders of the snow and the persistent showers of rain (vs. 6) which keep man away from his toil so that he may have leisure to consider God's wondrous works (vs. 7; with the Targ. and Syriac read שַׁמְשֵׁן).

There is nothing of that here. This is the God of the Bible, transcendent, sovereign; away, but not far, above, yet in; beyond, yet near; whose splendor makes of man's proud light darkness (vs. 9), whose righteousness makes of man's vaunted wisdom conceit (vss. 23-24); hidden to how many, revealed to ears that hear and eyes that see (36:32-33).

Surely the peril of missing him is not less today (see Expos. on 23:3; read John 8). To Elihu he was the God of the familiar. In Thornton Wilder's play Our Town,* there is a scene where a young girl, after death, begs to go back to the world of her home and live over again the most uneventful day of her life, but with seeing eyes. So she comes back to her home, and her mother barely lifts a tired face from

---

* New York: Coward-McCann, 1938, Act III.
2 Hear attentively the noise of his voice, and the sound that goeth out of his mouth.
3 He directeth it under the whole heaven, and his lightning unto the ends of the earth.
4 After it a voice roareth: he thundereth with the voice of his excellency; and he will not stay them when his voice is heard.
5 God thundereth marvelously with his voice; great things doeth he, which we cannot comprehend.
6 For he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth; likewise to the small rain, and to the great rain of his strength.
7 He sealeth up the hand of every man; that all men may know his work.
8 Then the beasts go into dens, and remain in their places.
9 Out of the south cometh the whirlwind: and cold out of the north.
10 By the breath of God frost is given: and the breadth of the waters is straitened.
11 Also by watering he wearith the thick cloud: he scattereth his bright cloud:

2 Hearken to the thunder of his voice and the rumbling that comes from his mouth.
3 Under the whole heaven he lets it go, and his lightning to the corners of the earth.
4 After it his voice roars; he thunders with his majestic voice and he does not restrain the lightnings when his voice is heard.
5 God thunders wondrously with his voice; he does great things which we cannot comprehend.
6 For to the snow he says, ‘Fall on the earth’; and to the shower and the rain, ‘Be strong.’
7 He seals up the hand of every man, that all men may know his work.
8 Then the beasts go into their lairs, and remain in their dens.
9 From its chamber comes the whirlwind, and cold from the scattering winds.
10 By the breath of God ice is given, and the broad waters are frozen fast.
11 He loads the thick cloud with moisture; the clouds scatter his lightning.

Instead of בָּשַׁלֵּל. Here again the singer discovers a moral lesson in the phenomena of nature. God evokes the “hurricane” from the south (vs. 9a; the rendering whirlwind is unfortunate, for the word is not the same as that of 38:1) and the cold wind from the the cooking. Her father hurries by absent-mindedly without a word, brooding over his work. And she cannot bear it. She thinks to herself that it is really the living who are dead. In some such way do men go stumbling about blindly before the face of God’s continual presence, wanting to know where he is: he who is as near as any lingering thought they have, though vast beyond it (vs. 5b); close as the air they breathe and the words on their lips, pressing upon them in the touch of some hand, shining into their eyes with his accustomed light. But these they pile up and say are common things, too common. Common as the steam spurting from under the lid of a kettle. Thousands had looked, but James Watt saw it. Common as the drift water on the shores of Portugal. Thousands had looked, but Columbus saw it, and it spoke to him of another world across the sea that waited for his coming. It is recorded of Moses, “When the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him” (Exod 3:4). Still harder it is for people to recognize him in the things that irk them (cf. vss. 17-18; 36:17)—unpleasant things they do not even want to look at, much less see; things that are nothing but an offense, that upset tradition, hurt pride, and trample on prejudice. Why else was it that the friends missed God, while Job with his bitterness and his longing came tremblingly near? If only Elihu had seen that—to make his heart leap out of its place. A sermon by John Timothy Stone was once published in the Christian Century Pulpit. The next week a reviewer cut it to pieces mercilessly, wondered why anybody ever came to hear such stuff. Promptly Dr. Stone wrote the editor, and said that he rather agreed with the criticism; he him-

And it is turned round about by his counsels: that they may do whatsoever he commandeth them upon the face of the world in the earth.

He causeth it to come, whether for correction, or for his land, or for mercy.

They turn round and round by his guidance, to accomplish all that he commands them on the face of the habitable world.

Whether for correction, or for his land, or for love, he causes it to happen.

north (vs. 9b), with its marvels of hoary frost and ice (vs. 10). Thus Elihu brings his lyrical meditation to a theological climax: correction, or for his land, or for love (vs. 13; the text is uncertain and probably over-burdened).

self had often wondered about the crowds that came. Whereupon, in the reviewer's column this appeared: "Dr. Stone's letter is the answer to my question. They come because he is a great soul!" Pride is blind, not love. Tradition called it madness when Isaiah spoke of God's turning his sword against his own people. When pride and tradition and prejudice got together, there was a cross, and a man on it.

But the story is not yet complete. There are still the things that baffle and bewilder, the deep perplexities of life, where Elihu and the friends could never quite enter: the loss and the pain where for Job God was hidden—and revealed. It was in the mystery that Abraham met God that day he trudged up the mountain with Isaac his son. It was in the mystery of a brutally defeated life that God uttered his name at last so clearly that no one need ever miss it.

"I am persuaded . . .," Paul's great doxology sweeps on to its close (Rom. 8:31-39). It is not the upshot of any argument. It is a gleam, caught in the web of no logic that was ever spun. It is a sudden seeing of life whole, a quick piecing together of all its sunshine and every shadow. It is a spark. It is a soul flaming away to God like the lightning. It is a man standing at salute as God passes along the lines, himself the seeker, preoccupied and intent.

God: The Eternal Paradox.—Whether for correction, . . . or for love. Elihu would not set the two in any simple antithesis. The "rod" itself is for love's sake (cf. 36:9-10), the love that carries in its hand the "rod." It is common enough to say that God's justice is tempered with mercy, and by it mean that he will tip the beam of his reckoning with the finger of his compassion. He will err a little on the side of long-suffering. But to temper does not mean to tamper. To temper steel is to make it hard and elastic like a Damascus blade, to give it tone and vigor. It is God's mercy that gives his justice its cutting edge.

It were loss indeed to lose out of the heart of the Christian gospel the rigors of that justice. The Greeks saw the dreadful inevitableness of life and called it Fate: how one wrong brought after it a score of wrongs, until men were no longer free at all; they were bound hand and foot by a kind of tragic necessity. Shakespeare saw it, and Macbeth and Hamlet and Othello, one by one, waded in so deep that "returning were as tedious as go o'er." There are terrors in God's steadiness, and history itself is for witness. A British clergyman observed out of the midst of World War II, as he looked back over the years—it is always easier for men to see as they look back like Dives out of some hell of their own devising: We were a pleasure-loving people, dishonouring the Lord's day; now the beaches are closed, and there is a shortage of petrol. We ignored the ringing of church bells; now they are not allowed to ring except in case of invasion. The churches themselves we left hall empty; now they are in ruins. The money we would not give them is taken from us in taxes. The service we would not render is conscripted by the government. The food for which we forgot to give thanks is not available any more. The nights we refused to spend in prayer we spend in air-raid shelters.

From America came a revised version: The billions we could not afford to part with for the sake of a decent world are being used to blow the world we have into bits, and our sons with it. The income we saved for stockholders during the depression by lowering wages and throwing men and women out of work is going up in smoke or rotting away at the bottom of the sea in a crusade which provides everybody with employment. The potatoes we dumped in the river to keep the prices up, the calves that were killed and buried in New England, the wheat we were warned not to plant, the cotton that was plowed under—it would all be so convenient now. The Negroes we argued about with a great show of reason, and would not house, and would not hire; the laws we passed against the Japanese with one hand while we sold them the Sixth Avenue elevated with the
3. LAST ADMONITION (37:14-24)

Elihu now turns directly to Job in final exhortation. Yet the theme of the seasons lingers on in his thought for a while, and blends appropriately with his purpose.

a) LORD OF SUMMER (37:14-22)

14-22. Once more the poet bids the hero consider the wondrous works of God (vs. 14). He contemplates the Lord of nature in the stillness of the summer heat, when the skies are spread out, and hard as a molten mirror (vs. 18), and out of the north comes golden splendor (vs. 22a). Before this God . . . clothed with terrible majesty, how can Job still other—thinking perhaps they would take it over to China, but they brought it back to us, and dropped it on Pearl Harbor; the selfishness with which we got out of Europe when we had helped to make it safe for the democracy of which we washed our hands, and the willingness of some Senators to do the same thing all over again, if only they can humble the President in the process. There is something terrible on this earth, and it is not just sin: it is the way sin runs into God, and he will not move.

But even worse, it may be, than losing out of religion the rigors of God's justice is the wild guess which whole generations in the Western world are quite capable of making at the drop of a hat, that they are his agents by whom he plans to deal at last with all the others, notably with the twin demons of fascism and communism: until—God forbid it, though his forbidding seems to have very little to do with the issue—war again condemns their blind and persistent immoralities to its own suicidal insanity. Fear, men say, is not for the wise: only the ignorant tremble. Rather is it only the fools who do not. It was the "gentle Jesus, meek and mild" who said one day, "My friends, . . . I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear"—not "them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do," but "him, which after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell; yet, I say unto you, Fear him" (Luke 12:4-5). He knew what there is in God that cannot be cajoled with an apple on his desk. Life is not like that. It looks instead as if a little trembling were indicated (vs. 1).

There is, however, another side of the picture. It is Elihu's badge of distinction that he saw it. A paradox is a double truth that can never be simply resolved into either one of its terms without the other. Whether for correction . . . or for love: the correction tempered by a mercy until it cuts like a surgeon's knife to heal; a love that ranges this round, sad earth, and searches and pursues and tears and exposes until a man's very soul is God's (see Expos. on 5:17; 17:3; 19:25). To Isaiah God is "Like as the lion and the young lion roaring on his prey" (Isa. 31:4), with his paw stretched out over Jerusalem, never intending to give it up, unafraid of the "multitude of shepherds," or "of their voice." And then in an instant he is like a mother bird fluttering tenderly over her young (Isa. 31:5), darting down with her sharp beak at the glittering eyes of a snake. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy put the two sides of the picture together in one of his poems. A cockney soldier has gone to church and heard a sermon about that last great day of judgment. Fretting over it, he lies down in the afternoon for a nap, and has a dream which he later describes to his friends as they gather around. It was of a presence, full of "sweetness and rebuke," grim and Hast thou with him spread out the sky, which is strong, and as a molten looking-glass?
Teach us what we shall say unto him; for we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness.
Shall it be told him that I speak? if a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up.
And now men see not the bright light which is in the clouds: but the wind passeth, and cleanseth them.
Fair weather cometh out of the north: with God is terrible majesty.

Can you, like him, spread out the skies, hard as a molten mirror?
Teach us what we shall say to him; we cannot draw up our case because of darkness.
Shall it be told him that I would speak? Did a man ever wish that he would be swallowed up?
And now men cannot look on the light when it is bright in the skies, when the wind has passed and cleared them.
Out of the north comes golden splendor; God is clothed with terrible majesty.

desire to speak (vss. 19-20a)? In the sultriness, when vegetal and animal life seem to come to a hellish end, would Job in his presumption court the power of death itself? Did a man ever wish that he would be swallowed up? (Vs. 20b.) With unusual poetic skill Elihu joins the motif of the seasons with the Joban crux, and from the contemplation of transcendence returns to the theme of rebellious pride.

gentle at once, staring at him to hold him fast, and with but a single word to say: "Well!"
All eyes was in 'Is eyes—all eyes,
My wife's and a million more;
And once I thought as those two eyes
Were the eyes of the London whore.

There ain't no throne, and there ain't no books,
It's 'Im you've got to see,
It's 'Im, just 'Im, that is the Judge
Of blokes like you and me.
And, boys, I'd sooner frizzle up,
I, the fires of a burning 'Ell,
Than stand and look into 'Is face
And 'ear 'Is voice say—"Well?" 8

Perhaps after all there is a tragic incongruity about the way in which the figure of Justice is commonly represented: a sword in one of her hands, a pair of scales in the other; with a bandage tied tightly over her eyes so that she cannot possibly see. Which means to say, of course, that she executes her judgments impartially; but it says more than it means to say: it says that she cannot read her own scales, never knows when they balance, and cannot tell where to strike. And that, ironically enough, is precisely the trouble with human justice. God's kind is not blindfolded. It sees with the longing, steady eyes of Jesus; and they mean to win, with God's unbroken promise in them: the God whose awful power had to be gentle, or it would never have been great; and had to be awful, or for all his gentleness he would never have been of any use. A pity like that on Calvary did not break into human life to wander about helpless and witless, wasting its breath, unable to do anything. It broke in to probe and cut away, and so set at naught every costly fear men have—all the galling slavery of little souls, the odds that pile up, the things people ought to do and cannot—to make nothing of it, cancel it, set God in its stead. The majesty which is back of God's compassion is what makes the compassion matter.

Strange that Elihu should have seen them both more clearly than any of the others, including Job. And yet, not strange. Two long centuries, it may be, had passed, and men had had to think long, long thoughts of God. The wonder is that while throughout the original poem there are numerous and striking reminiscences of the great prophet of the Exile (Isa. 40-55), for all the similarity of subject matter there is none here. Nowhere in the O.T. is the God who "is clothed with terrible majesty" (vs. 22) seen more clearly than in Second Isaiah as the God whose boundless compassion broods forever over his own. There the prophet takes his people by the hand and leads them back with a kind of cosmic humor to the great simplicities: to the towering fact of a God who undergirds with effortless ease his huge creation. Remember how it was with them, in this flat and distant land, shut in by lofty palaces and hanging gardens. They were used to hills, and green slopes, and little freshets gurgling down through deep gullies in the springtime, spreading out 23 Touching the Almighty, we cannot find him out: he is excellent in power, and in judgment, and in plenty of justice: he will not afflict.

24 Men do therefore fear him: he respecteth not any that are wise of heart.

23 The Almighty — we cannot find him;
he is great in power and justice,
and abundant righteousness he will not violate.

24 Therefore men fear him; he does not regard any who are wise in their own conceit."

b) FEAR OF THE LORD (37:23-24)

23-24. Such a God is beyond the reach of puny man. The Almighty—we cannot find him: This avowal of impotence, however, Elihu will not make without asserting once more and for the last time that divine omnipotence is not incompatible with divine justice:

He is great in power and justice,
and abundant righteousness he will not violate.

Or, better, “The master of righteousness will not oppress” (vs. 23; cf. KJV). For man the consequence of such a creed is ineluctable: Therefore men fear him (vs. 24a). In the fear of God is true wisdom, for he does not regard any who are wise in their own conceit (vs. 24b). If this translation is correct, Elihu thus shoots a parting arrow at the dying and prostrate, but still defiant, Job. Unsympathetic to the end, the apologist of God remains sublime in his exposition of truth, but inhuman because devoid of brotherly love or even of elementary pity. Elihu’s analysis of the Joban crime is correct and his faith beyond reproach, but the hardness of his heart condemns him and thus indicts his theology.

Whatever the literary origin of the Elihu discourses (see Intro., pp. 890-91), their presence at this point of the book in its completed form is not inappropriate, for they constitute at once a negative and a positive preparation for the hearing of the voice from the whirlwind (38:1-42:6). Rhetorically, they produce dramatic suspense between the hero’s oath of clearance and the intervention of the Lord. Psychologically, they show man’s inability to cope with the depth of human suffering and isolation. Theologically, they condition the hero for the immediate confrontation of God. Elihu does not succeed in making Job realize the theological dimensions of sinfulness: only the voice from the whirlwind can achieve this purpose. But Elihu does succeed in raising Job’s thinking from the level of egocentricity to a region at whose center God reigns in glory. In this respect the discourses of Elihu are comparable to a vestibule of the holy of holies.

into still waters at the bottom of the valley where the sheep were grazing; with the snows of Lebanon lifting themselves serenely on the horizon. That meant home to them—and God. But there was none of it now. Only the broad, clear sky of the East; and the stars coming out suddenly in the sharp dusk, as if they were leaping to some celestial roll call. The prophet nudges them. “Who is doing that, do you think? Look! They are the gods these befuddled men of Babylon worship, yonder in the silent heavens, beyond all this marble and this stone. And your God made them! Not bending his back to do it. There was no sweat on his face. They were just fleeting notion in his mind, a whisper on his lips, and they were there! Watch him tonight leading them forth by number, no one of them missing. Answering when he calls, crying ‘Here!’ ‘Here!’ ‘Here!’ Never a star daring to quit its post at the evening summons of the Almighty.⁶ That deep blue canopy itself is to him the little tent an Arab spreads in the desert at the end of the day. He gets out his smallest scales, like a jeweler's; and the mountains back home are dust in them, and the seas a breath of moisture. Feel his muscles, dear people of mine, and laugh at this Babylon that laughs at us!”
(Cf. Isa. 40.)

It is the compassion back of it that keeps the majesty of God majesty indeed. No one can say that Elihu, if only he had been there, would

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

38:1 Then the LORD answered Job out of the whirlwind, and said,

IV. Voice from the Whirlwind (38:1-42:6)

Job has frequently requested a divine audience in order to present his claim of innocence and to hear from God himself the charges made against him so that he may show their emptiness (cf. 9:3, 11-20, 28-35; 13:22; 31:35-37). Now at last God himself speaks. He does not accuse Job of ethical transgressions, but reveals to him by ironical questioning that man has no right to judge the Deity because man cannot conceive the Deity except in terms of some human image. God's wisdom and power are truly beyond man's grasp, and man may not trespass beyond the bounds of his humanity.

The first discourse of Yahweh (38:1-39:30) depicts the wisdom of the Creator and brings Job to silence (40:1-5). The second reveals the power of the Creator over the cosmic forces, Behemoth (40:15-24) and Leviathan (40:25-41:26), and leads to Job's repentance (42:1-6).

A. First Discourse of Yahweh (38:1-40:5)

1. Opening Challenge (38:1-3)

38:1. Then the LORD answered Job out of the whirlwind: It is not possible to tell whether the poet intended to describe the event literally or symbolically. The whirlwind not have helped to ready the mind of Job for the God whom that titan among the world's great sufferers was about to meet.

38:1-42:6. When God Appears.—It is scarcely necessary to point out that when God appears strange things happen (cf. Expos. on 23:3; 35:8). Strange things happen in these chapters. When God speaks, it is to describe his own unimaginable greatness. And to what purpose? He seems deliberately intent on overawing this Job whose rebellious sense of finitude has already contributed to that mouthing of words without knowledge (cf. Expos. on 25:6). This was the very thing Job was sure God would not do, had pleaded that he might not (9:34; 13:21; cf. Expos. on 9:2-10; 13:20-21; 23:3, “God and Man in Search of One Another”). Again God speaks, and it is to sharpen against his servant the arrows of his vast irony, calling on Job to come up and sit on the throne of the heavens and do better if he can, if he thinks it is so easy to govern the world in righteousness. There is nothing about any of it that is particularly new, nothing that can be remotely imagined to provide an answer to the struggle which has been going on in Job's soul. Nothing is explained or made clear. No reasons at all are given. Nothing is said about the wager with Satan, nothing about God's quiet confidence in Job. There is no justification of the sufferer, no acquittal, no public vindication. Nothing in short, or so it would seem, to stir any love in anybody's heart, certainly not in Job's. It is always exceedingly difficult to get a direct answer from God. The Jews rarely got one when they plied Jesus with their questions. “What shall I do to inherit eternal life?” “How readest thou?” (Luke 10:25-26). “Art thou he?” His friend John the Baptist asked that. “Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see” (Matt. 11:3-4). “Art thou the King of the Jews?” Pilate asked that. “Sayest thou this thing of thyself?” (John 18:33-34). It is very hard. God thrusts men back on themselves, as everybody must do who knows that the human spirit will not accept the answers even when they are supplied (see Expos. on Luke 22:67-69). “They have Moses and the prophets. . . . If they hear not [them], neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.” (Luke 16.29, 31.) Most of them did refuse when one did rise.

In a word, the theophany is irrelevant. God appears, and what he says changes no question mark into a period. Everyone has to do that for himself. What he says has already occurred to Job, and more than once. He is full of majesty; Job knew that. He rules over all things Job knew that. Nobody can stand up to him and win. Job had said that. None of his purposes can be defeated. Job says, “I know that.” What is the meaning of it all? There are those who insist that somebody else wrote the speeches of Yahweh. Whoever else did, he was not very successful in accomplishing the end he must have had in view, viz., to solve the problem and answer the riddle. Rather, one might suppose, the author of the original poem, with his own subtle understanding of the human soul, is himself engaging to say to the reader, as clearly as may be, “There is nothing here for which you are looking, simply because you are looking for the wrong thing. You expect God to come in and untie the knot. And he never will. You expect to add v to y, two unknown quantitics, and then have God speak in good intelligible Arabic numerals when he gives you the sum of them. He will speak; but when he does, you will realize that he has been speaking all the way along. That is why you hear nothing new. He has been speaking to Job ever since Job's sons died and the sores broke out" (see Expos. on 19:7; 33:14). In his heart of hearts Job has known that from the beginning, or guessed it. The friends have been speaking, and he has been speaking, and God has been speaking. Why on earth should there be anything new? The irrelevance is itself relevant. The solution will not be here. It will be somewhere else. What actually is here is magnificent in its scope and beauty. It is not instructive in its content. God is not bent on teaching Job something, he is only passing in review before him the glory he had already learned; but doing it as God would do it, with the roll of the sea in it, the vast, unmeasured sea of his own forever. Instruction, as another puts it, has become Presence, and so makes sense for the first time. God is really bent—simply on being God.

38:1-40:5. Summons and Response.—Gird up now thy loins like a man. I will ask the questions. You answer them (see Expos. on vs 3). Where were you when I laid the foundation of the earth? Tell me, who measured it? Who stretched out the line along its edge? And where was it fastened?

Who laid its cornerstone,
when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?
Or who shut in the sea with doors, when it burst forth from the womb; when I made clouds its garment, and thick darkness its swaddling band?

And said to it, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: . . . here shall thy proud waves be stayed? Have you ever commanded the morning, and caused the dayspring to know his place? That dawn might take hold of the ends of the earth, as you would take hold of a sheet, and the wicked be shaken out of it? The dawn which changes the earth when it comes, as a man changes the clay with his seal: all things take shape in the rosy light like a coat of many colors.

Have you entered into the springs of the sea, or walked in the recesses of the deep?

Hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death, far away there beneath them all?

Where is the way to the dwelling of light, and where is the place of darkness?

Doubtless you know, for the number of your days is great!

Who has cleft a channel for the torrents of rain, and a way for the thunderbolts, to bring rain on a land where no man is, yonder in the waste and desolate land, to make the tender grass spring forth? Job's ideas are by way of getting themselves stretched a little. Out there in the wilderness, even there God is at work, a God who cares and tends, whose eye is on every living thing. Writes Forsyth:

We are apt to treat God as if He were only a patron saint magnified, whom we expect to attend to our affairs if He is to retain our custom and receive our worship.

There is even what we might call a racial egoism, a self-engrossment of mankind with itself, a naive and tacit assumption that God were no God if He cared for anything more than He did for His creatures. We tend to think of God as if man were His chief end, as if He had no right to a supreme concern for His own holy name, as if His prodigals were more to Him than His only begotten Son in whom He made the worlds and has all His delight. We think and worship as if the only question was whether God loves us, instead of whether His love has absolute power to give itself eternal and righteous effect.

For Job the perspective is changing, and no man readily suffers that to happen.

Has the rain a father, or who has begotten the drops of dew?

Can you lend forth the stars in their season, or send forth lightnings, or number the clouds?

It is indeed vast, and our farthest thought runs but so little a way toward it. In that goodness which from end to end is over every one of God's works, the very bottles of heaven are laid down in a row to refresh the thirsty ground. All the beasts of the earth are in his great and keeping hands. Who provides . . . the raven its food, when its young ones cry to God? The hands which do that, will they not spread out for men their bounty? Is that heart a niggard's heart? Who has sent out the wild ass free? . . . The range of the mountains is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing. Harness the wild ox to your plow, if you can, and trust him to gather your grain. Give to the horse his might. . . . He paws in the valley, . . . he swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage. . . . When the trumpet sounds, he says "Aha!" and smells the battle from afar, the thundering roar of command, the shouting of the soldiers.

Then Job answered the LORD: "Behold, I am in biblical usage is the medium of theophanies and designates a tempest of a specific character (יהוה; cf. יהוה and מָקוֹם in Nah. 1:3; Zech. 9:14; cf. also Pss. 18:7-15; 50:3; Ezek. 1.4, Hab. 3; the word is not the same as that used by Elihu in 37:9). The designation "Yahweh," the Lord, indicates beyond doubt that the poet is a Hebrew addressing a Hebrew circle of auditors or readers. God does not answer Job according to Job's expectation, but the divine silence is broken; and though the message of the revelation of small account"; what shall I say? "I lay my hand on my mouth." I spoke once. I spoke twice. But no more. Is there any difference between this and the kind of self-abasement which is robbed of its self-respect by the immensity of creation (see Expos. on 9.2-10)? And so is ready to shrug off its responsibility? God never does that to anyone. This is humility, not self-abasement. If the ring on one's little finger were taken as the orbit of the earth around the sun, the nearest fixed star would be some twenty miles away! That was enough of itself to give one young scientist what he called a cosmic chill (see Expos. on 7:17-18; 9.14-19; 16:15; 25:6). Human life has by some been taught to think of itself as a blob of protoplasm, an itch on the epidermis of a pigmy planet, an accident of matter, the first cousin of an ape that learned how to shave. A man has a hard time thinking as highly of himself as he should (cf. Rom. 12:3; 1 John 3:2). There is always danger of his beginning to live down to what he has been told. Here is the bowed head of one who is beginning to enter into his dignity as a son of God, not on the point of leaving it. There had been a time when God's majesty had been of no comfort to Job, but a terror. That time is past. Sidney Lanier once sang of the marsh hen building her nest on the watery sod: "Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness of God" 8

(see Expos., pp. 903-7).

What is it that is taking place? For one thing, God is issuing his summons. Humanity does not have to look him up every once in a while. Whole generations are obsessed with techniques. How go about the business of praying? How cultivate the religious mood? How tap the reservoirs of infinite power? So was a book about the Sermon on the Mount advertised! It rarely occurs to such people that the most important step in the whole transaction has already been taken. The difficulty is not so much that they are unable to find God; the real difficulty is that they cannot manage to get rid of him. Read Francis Thompson's "The Hound of Heaven" as an interpretation of human history. Revelation is scarcely the half of it. God's is a downright stubborn pursuit. Job was sure that God was somehow on the other side of all the ruin and the loss and the pain, while he himself was in it. And here was Someone putting his hand through Job's arm and catching step. It was that way one day on the road from Jerusalem to Emmaus (Luke 24:13-25). A woman in a hospital reached stealthily for a pencil as the nurse went out of the room, and against orders, as she lay there, scrawled down for a minister, who had called on her without knowing her at all, the story of her life. It began in a loveless place, and stretched out wanly enough into womanhood. There were a few short years of furtive happiness during World War I, while she and her husband were being driven about from pillar to post under the foolish suspicion of being spies. When he died and she had lost all she had, she gave her high talents to the training of other women's children. Then this illness, which they said would be her last. Before it was over, she just wanted to say that God had been very good to her through it all, and she was very humble—and very grateful.

Still with unhurrying chase,
And unperturbed pace
Deliberate speed, majestic instance,
Came on the following Feet. 9

Does life mean that from start to finish? People have an idea that they cannot get hold of him, and it worries some of them. What worries God is whether or not he can get hold of them.

But there is another element in religious experience, and that too is here. There is something in man that responds if he will let it. Job's response is not yet full and complete (see Exeg. on 40:3-5; Expos. on 28:1-28); but the humility and the awe that are born of God's presence are here, that spark which in a moment will flame away to God like the lightning (see Expos. on 37:1-13). What shall I answer? Abraham asked it, and set out from Chaldea. Israel asked it, and turned her face toward the Land of Promise. Paul asked it, and little churches sprang up all over Europe. The Pilgrims asked it, and sailed westward across the Atlantic. The world is asking it in agony, because it will not learn in any other way that God has made of one blood all the nations of the earth. The novelists and columnists who like to write of how nasty and smelly life is know nothing is still unknown, Job can no longer accuse the Deity of aloofness, indifference, or apathy. Whatever the Lord will tell him, the fact which counts and which overwhelms his consciousness is that there is indeed a God who cares for him. This God loves his creature to such a measure and in such a way that he intervenes directly in an I-and-thou encounter. The bare event of the voice speaking from the whirlwind is a testimony to the love as well as to the greatness of God.

of life. They take a tiny truth and make a stupendous lie. Arthur John Gossip says somewhere that whenever Heine read Plutarch, he always wanted to jump on a fast horse and ride straight away to Berlin into the thick of things and be a great soul too. There is that in a man. God put it there. Christ of all others sees it, and is sure that life cannot keep going back to what it was before as if nothing had happened. I am of small account. Job was never in all his life of greater account (see Expos. on 23:6). The true answer, which has been struggling up from his soul through all of his bitterness and wild imaginings, is coming now to his lips, his eyes wide, his hand at his mouth.

38:1. God Behind the Scenes.—There are times when life takes such a frightful plunge into the dark that the Almighty hardly seems to be even in his accustomed hiding places (see Expos. on 23:3). Apparently he is nowhere around and has nothing to say. The vast gloom of the whole incongruous business picks out a human heart often enough, and settles down full strength. What would matter then would not be any analysis. Elihu and the friends have done enough “explaining.” Say as they did that the sickening thud is never for nothing. They knew at least that history never hits bottom because the world periodically goes crazy, but simply because the world always makes sense, and nobody gets away with anything. Even Job’s suffering was not for nothing—if only they and he had known for what! But none of that can possibly help. They said it was Job’s fault; he said it was God’s—and came farther along with it than they did because he knew what mattered (see Expos. on 23:2). Beyond events, behind the scenes, is there One whose heart is steadier than nature’s own laws, intent not on rendering evil for evil but on overcoming evil with good? A God who will hear and answer and in his own way redeem (cf. Expos. on 17:3; 19:7; 24:12c; 30:24; 38:14)? Like the sound of distant footsteps in the theater, or the knocking on the door in Macbeth, giving notice that the world outside is trying to get in (cf. Isa. 40:1-8)? During World War II a London newspaper carried a time schedule of one day’s life in the city. There in the late evening it read “Blackout: 6:37.” The next item was “Moon Rises: 6:58.” Famine and pestilence, concentration camps, a field of battle, great ships floundering in a storm, starving generations, a cemetery in Honolulu, the dragging of a lake—while this is being written—for a young girl’s body: try squaring any of it with an ultimate motive of love—unless God really does slip into this world when nobody much is looking. On one night of all nights he did it, coming down the stairs of heaven with a child in his arms. As Job learns to trust him with the huge pattern of things as they are, a fireside mercy steals back into life that can match any or all of his public appearances, giving to the hero’s lonely, battling soul a dignity and a standing in some sort commensurate with the very cosmic purposes of God. It would be tragic were he to be unmoved by it, capable only of settling back in the old order as if nothing had happened. It is God’s tomorrow which waits for the soul that will come out of its own yesterday into his presence. Recall the words spoken by Sydney Carton to the little seamstress who stood at his side as they both faced the scaffold; it is not a scaffold that life faces, but a cross: beyond it a Man who is God’s pledge, saying, “Keep your eyes upon me, dear child, and mind no other object.”

In the quest for a theodicy what is it that you are looking for? What is it that would justify God to you? You have grown up in an age that has not yet got over the delight of having discovered in evolution the key to creation. You saw the long expanding series broadening to the perfect day. . . . The dark valleys, antres vast, and deserts horrible, you did not see. . . . But now you have been flung into one of these awful valleys. . . . You are in bloody, monstrous, and deadly dark. . . . Every aesthetic view of the world is blotted out by human wickedness and suffering. . . . You see no sense, no justice in it. . . . God has not kept His promise. . . . What right had you to take your expectation for promise? Where shall we get the idea of what is worthy of God? There can only be one source of such knowledge. It is the final account God gives of Himself. It is no expectation of ours, no presumption in us of what a godlike God would do (cf. Expos. on 35:5). His account . . . , on the scale and depth of the great convulsive judgments, is in Christ and His Cross, or it is nowhere. . . . The Cross of Christ, with its judgment-grace, its tragic love, its grievous glory, . . . is God’s only self-justification in such a world. . . . It is impossible even to discuss the theodicy all pine for without the theology so many deride.

1 Charles Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities, ch. xv.
2 Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?
3 Gird up now thy loins like a man; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me.
4 Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding.

2-3. The poet reveals at once his attitude toward the hero. With the swift sure touch of a master of drama, he ascribes to God words which by implication exonerate the sufferer from any moral stigma and yet accuse him of self-deification. Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? (Vs. 2.) The counsel of the ruler of this universe operates in full light. God does not govern his world by whim or fancy but according to a well-considered plan, and Job has shown by his blasphemous judgments that he spoke without knowledge, i.e., without understanding the divine will. Let Job now prepare himself to fight God, if he so desires. Gird up your loins like a man (vs. 3a). The word ת região is a favorite designation of Job for himself, and it means "male," "valiant warrior" (cf. יָד ה', "hero"). Its use underlines the playful but not unkind scorn with which God invites his would-be opponent to stand his ground and answer questions (vs. 3b).

2. Creation of the World (38:4-15)

4-7. Job is invited to meditate first on the brevity of his own existence, and at the same time to compare his human power and wisdom with those needed for the creation

The only theodicy is not a system, but a salvation... It is not a rational triumph but the victory of faith. Christ is the theodicy of God and the justifier both of God and the ungodly.

3. The Grand Inquisitor.—(See Expos. on 13:20-27; 38:1-42.6.) When all the questions are in God, himself becomes the questioner. "I will ask; you do the answering" (see Expos. on Luke 22:67-69). Sooner or later the roles are reversed (Mark 11:29), and the really important questions are put. The ultimate dilemma of human existence lies not in God’s failure to answer man (see Expos. on 19 7; 33:14; 34:9), but in man’s inability of himself to answer God (cf. Expos. on 38.1-40.5)—all the way from "Where art thou?" (Gen. 3:9) to "Will ye also go away?" (John 6:67) and "Saul, Saul, why persecust thou me?" (Acts 9:4). The Bible punctuates human history with its revelation, period. It confronts human life with its scrutiny, question mark. It records humanity’s choice, exclamation point. "And they bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews!" (Matt. 27:29.) Either that, or "O the depth of the riches both of the wis-

---

2 "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?
3 Gird up your loins like a man, I will question you, and you shall declare to me.
4 "Where were you when I laid the foundation of the earth? Tell me, if you have understanding.

---

The only theodicy is not a system, but a salvation... It is not a rational triumph but the victory of faith. Christ is the theodicy of God and the justifier both of God and the ungodly.

3. The Grand Inquisitor.—(See Expos. on 13:20-27; 38:1-42.6.) When all the questions are in God, himself becomes the questioner. "I will ask; you do the answering" (see Expos. on Luke 22:67-69). Sooner or later the roles are reversed (Mark 11:29), and the really important questions are put. The ultimate dilemma of human existence lies not in God’s failure to answer man (see Expos. on 19 7; 33:14; 34:9), but in man’s inability of himself to answer God (cf. Expos. on 38.1-40.5)—all the way from "Where art thou?" (Gen. 3:9) to "Will ye also go away?" (John 6:67) and "Saul, Saul, why persecust thou me?" (Acts 9:4). The Bible punctuates human history with its revelation, period. It confronts human life with its scrutiny, question mark. It records humanity’s choice, exclamation point. "And they bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews!" (Matt. 27:29.) Either that, or "O the depth of the riches both of the wis-

---

The only theodicy is not a system, but a salvation... It is not a rational triumph but the victory of faith. Christ is the theodicy of God and the justifier both of God and the ungodly.

3. The Grand Inquisitor.—(See Expos. on 13:20-27; 38:1-42.6.) When all the questions are in God, himself becomes the questioner. "I will ask; you do the answering" (see Expos. on Luke 22:67-69). Sooner or later the roles are reversed (Mark 11:29), and the really important questions are put. The ultimate dilemma of human existence lies not in God’s failure to answer man (see Expos. on 19 7; 33:14; 34:9), but in man’s inability of himself to answer God (cf. Expos. on 38.1-40.5)—all the way from "Where art thou?" (Gen. 3:9) to "Will ye also go away?" (John 6:67) and "Saul, Saul, why persecust thou me?" (Acts 9:4). The Bible punctuates human history with its revelation, period. It confronts human life with its scrutiny, question mark. It records humanity’s choice, exclamation point. "And they bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews!" (Matt. 27:29.) Either that, or "O the depth of the riches both of the wis-

---

The only theodicy is not a system, but a salvation... It is not a rational triumph but the victory of faith. Christ is the theodicy of God and the justifier both of God and the ungodly.

3. The Grand Inquisitor.—(See Expos. on 13:20-27; 38:1-42.6.) When all the questions are in God, himself becomes the questioner. "I will ask; you do the answering" (see Expos. on Luke 22:67-69). Sooner or later the roles are reversed (Mark 11:29), and the really important questions are put. The ultimate dilemma of human existence lies not in God’s failure to answer man (see Expos. on 19 7; 33:14; 34:9), but in man’s inability of himself to answer God (cf. Expos. on 38.1-40.5)—all the way from "Where art thou?" (Gen. 3:9) to "Will ye also go away?" (John 6:67) and "Saul, Saul, why persecust thou me?" (Acts 9:4). The Bible punctuates human history with its revelation, period. It confronts human life with its scrutiny, question mark. It records humanity’s choice, exclamation point. "And they bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews!" (Matt. 27:29.) Either that, or "O the depth of the riches both of the wis-
5 Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? or who hath stretched the line upon it?
6 Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened? or who laid the corner stone thereof;
7 When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?
8 Or who shut up the sea with doors, when it brake forth, as if it had issued out of the womb?
9 When I made the cloud the garment thereof, and thick darkness a swaddling band for it,
10 And brake up for it my decreed place, and set bars and doors, 11 And said, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed?

of the universe. Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? (Vs. 4a.) Job is then subtly reminded of his position within the hierarchy of beings, since he did not even exist when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy (vs. 7). Observe that the cosmogony of the poet does not allow for any trace of a mythology of a fight between the Creator of order and some pre-existent forces of chaos. There is no room for a belief in the pre-existence of an uncreated evil. There is no survival of dualism in this monotheistic serenity. Even the mention of the sons of God (cf. 1:6), constitutes no paganistic stain, for they stand together with the constellations of dawn, singing the Jubilate of praise and adoration. The poet's monotheism is so confident that polytheistic or at least henotheistic terminology is only a literary adornment (cf. Ps. 148:2-3).

b) Creation of Sea (38:8-11)

8-11. Mythological language clearly appears in these verses, but no myth of a primeval ocean is accepted by the poet. The sea is born after the earth is founded; and while the text does not define the womb from which it burst forth (vs. 8), its origin depends entirely upon the will of the Creator who rules supreme over it (vss. 9-11). The expressions are poetical (cf. vs. 29, where the same words or similar ones are used for ice and hoarfrost).

5 Who determined its measurements—surely you know!
Or who stretched the line upon it?
6 On what were its bases sunk, or who laid its cornerstone,
7 when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?
8 "Or who shut in the sea with doors, when it burst forth from the womb;
9 when I made clouds its garment, and thick darkness its swaddling band, 10 and prescribed bounds for it,
and set bars and doors,
11 and said, 'Thus far shall you come, and no farther, and here shall your proud waves be stayed'?

perhaps he has not swallowed something with a string tied to it. The rise and fall of the chants; those strange stories of the Son of God. A mist forms in front of his eyes. None of it seems quite actual. It is like a landscape by Whistler, where the outlines are dim and weird. He finds himself in a sort of dream. Tomorrow around six or seven he will wake up, and start living again, with all the old solid stuff to handle once more, stuff that matters, stuff that he can understand.
And the process goes on. Not long after the Creed, the Sermon on the Mount begins to get a bit foggy around the edges; this turning of the other cheek, these lilies of the field and owls of the air. It looks a little blurred, as if it

1175
12 Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days; and caused the dayspring to know his place;
13 That it might take hold of the ends of the earth, that the wicked might be shaken out of it?
14 It is turned as clay to the seal; and they stand as a garment.
15 And from the wicked their light is withholden, and the high arm shall be broken.
16 Hast thou entered into the springs of the sea? or hast thou walked in the search of the depth?
17 Have the gates of death been opened unto thee? or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death?
18 Hast thou perceived the breadth of the earth? declare if thou knowest it all.
12 "Have you commanded the morning since your days began, and caused the dawn to know its place, that it might take hold of the skirts of the earth, and the wicked be shaken out of it?
13 It is changed like clay under the seal, and it is dyed like a garment.
14 From the wicked their light is withhild, and their uplifted arm is broken.
16 "Have you entered into the springs of the sea, or walked in the recesses of the deep?
17 Have the gates of death been revealed to you, or have you seen the gates of deep darkness?
18 Have you comprehended the expanse of the earth? Declare, if you know all this.

**

c) Creation of Days and Nights (38:12-15)

12-15. Just as Job was absent from the creation of earth and sea, so also he has never commanded the morning (vs. 12a), even within the short span of time during which he has been in existence (note the irony of vs. 12a*). Dawn lifts up the darkness as a veil under which the earth has been asleep and shakes the wicked out of it like parasites (vs. 13). When the earth awakes, the sunrise sharply accentuates and reddens its configurations (vs. 14); and the evildoers desist from their deeds, for the light of day banishes their own false light (vs. 15).

3. Mysteries of Land and Sky (38:16-38)

a) The Deep and the Extremities of the Earth (38:16-18)

16-18. Job has not searched the recesses of the deep (vs. 16; tehôm, as in Gen. 1:2), the gates of the underworld (vs. 17; cf. Ps. 9:13; Isa. 38:10), or the extremities of the wide earth (vs. 18).

were out of focus somehow. Unfortunately that is not the kind of place he lives in, where to give means that it shall be given unto him, "good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over" (Luke 6:38). He lives on hard city streets, and in a dingy office, with the fan going, and due bills fluttering across the desk. "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on" (Matt. 6:25). Sounds a bit distant that, like the ghosts that chatter among the dead ruins of Pompeii, or the whispering of the ivy as it twines around the broken column of a temple. He cannot quite "get" it.

He cannot quite "get" a good deal of the talk that he hears about God, e.g., the love that leaves him out of a job and alone in the world. A surgeon lost a house and a son and a left hand, and knows now what hunger is. But what does any of it mean? The wrong marches rough-shod over the right. Nations rush blindly toward the brink of destruction. The love of God, in a century when ideals only make fools of themselves? Jacques de Lalaing, the flower of knighthood, the pattern of chivalry for all Europe, has been called the last hero of romance. In 1453 he died an early death; not of a lover's broken heart, as we might have wished—writes another—not in any tournament with his thirty-two pennants flying, and a foeman worthy of his steel. He walked into a cannon ball fired by some shopkeepers in the little town of Ghent. So prosaic was it, like the gross facts
19 Where is the way where light dwell-eth? and as for darkness, where is the place thereof, 20 That thou shouldst take it to the bound thereof, and that thou shouldst know the paths to the house thereof?
21 Knowest thou it, because thou wast then born? or because the number of thy days is great?
22 Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow? or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail,
23 Which I have reserved against the time of trouble, against the day of battle and war?
24 By what way is the light parted, which scattereth the east wind upon the earth?

b) LIGHT AND DARKNESS (38:19-21)

19-21. Not only is Job circumscribed in space, but he is also pitifully limited in time. The irony becomes more incisive as he is queried over the origins of light and darkness (vss. 19-20). Yahweh prods him:

You know, for you were born then, and the number of your days is great! (Vs. 21.)

c) SNOW, HAIL, AND LIGHTNING (38:22-24)

22-24. Hail is traditionally the weapon of God in battle (vss. 22b-23; cf. Josh. 10:11, Ps. 18:12-13; Isa. 80:30; Ezek. 13:11, 13). “Fog” (vs. 24a, read , “vapor,” instead of , light) and the east wind, scorching all living things with the heat of the Arabian Desert, are of utmost importance for the inhabitants of the Fertile Crescent.

every dream of a better world walks into when it leaves its pew and the church door closes behind it.

Significantly, much of this disillusion has its roots deep in man's impatience with all there is about life and religion which he cannot understand and cannot quite manage. The Middle Ages looked at such things and said “God!” The modern mind looks at them and says “Nonsense!” One or the other is superstition—but which? If the whole of reality is intelligible, if all of truth is commensurate somehow with human reason, the choice is easy. Then for the man who cannot understand how God could have spoken to Moses the ready conclusion is that he did not. How could God be incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth? He was not. Wherever the meekness and the patience and the unselfishness of the N.T. cut across the common sense of mankind they are impractical. Wherever mir-
25 Who hath divided a watercourse for the overflowing of waters, or a way for the lightning of thunder;
26 To cause it to rain on the earth, where no man is; on the wilderness, wherein there is no man;
27 To satisfy the desolate and waste ground; and to cause the bud of the tender herb to spring forth?
28 Hath the rain a father? or who hath begotten the drops of dew?
29 Out of whose womb came the ice? and the hoary frost of heaven, who hath generated it?
30 The waters are hid as with a stone, and the face of the deep is frozen.
31 Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?
32 Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season? or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?
33 Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven? canst thou set the dominion thereof in the earth?
34 Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds, that abundance of waters may cover thee?
35 Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are?

25 “Who has cleft a channel for the torrents of rain, and a way for the thunderbolt, 26 to bring rain on a land where no man is, on the desert in which there is no man;
27 to satisfy the waste and desolate land, and to make the ground put forth grass?
28 "Has the rain a father, or who has begotten the drops of dew?
29 From whose womb did the ice come forth, and who has given birth to the hoar-frost of heaven?
30 The waters become hard like stone, and the face of the deep is frozen.
31 “Can you bind the chains of the Pleiades, or loose the cords of Orion?
32 Can you lead forth the Mazzaroth in their season, or can you guide the Bear with its children?
33 Do you know the ordinances of the heavens? Can you establish their rule on the earth?
34 “Can you lift up your voice to the clouds, that a flood of waters may cover you?
35 Can you send forth lightnings, that they may go and say to you, ‘Here we are’?

d) Rain, Dew, and Ice (38:25-30)

25-30. The face of the deep is frozen: Lit., “curdled” like milk. Does the poet allude to lakes of the distant north, or even to the polar cap?

e) Constellations, Clouds, and Mist (38:31-38)

31-38. The Pleiades and Orion (vs. 31) are constituted by stars which give the appearance of being held together by chains and cords. The word Mazzaroth (vs. 32a) does not designate the signs of the Zodiac (cf. II Kings 23:5) but refers to a single constellation (observe the singular Hebrew pronoun in the expression “in its time”), probably the Corona Borealis, to which the Bear with its children forms a natural parallel (vs. 32b).

The poet lends only scant attention to the lightnings (vs. 35; contrast Elihu in 36:26 ff.). The meaning of the words יָאוֹן, inward parts (vs. 36a; cf. Ps. 51:6(?)), and בְּלֵב, heart (vs. 36b), is unknown, and numerous conjectures have been proposed (cf. RSV, which selects one of them). The words should probably be rendered respectively by reminded—that there is much which has not yet been cleared up, e.g., being alive, to have arrived out of darkness, to be here at all, chucked into existence out of the great silence (38:4).

There is a mathematician of sorts who does not believe in a future life; while his friend, something more of a dreamer perhaps, can hardly bring himself to believe in this life! He wonders 36 Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts? or who hath given understanding to the heart?

37 Who can number the clouds in wisdom? or who can stay the bottles of heaven, 38 When the dust groweth into hardness, and the clods cleave fast together?
39 Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lion? or fill the appetite of the young lions, 40 When they couch in their dens, and abide in the covert to lie in wait?
41 Who provideth for the raven his food? when his young ones cry unto God, they wander for lack of meat.

39 Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve?
2 Canst thou number the months that they fulfil? or knowest thou the time when they bring forth?
3 They bow themselves, they bring forth their young ones, they cast out their sorrows.

36 Who has put wisdom in the clouds, or given understanding to the mists?
37 Who can number the clouds by wisdom? or who can tilt the waterskins of the heavens, 38 when the dust runs into a mass and the clods cleave fast together?
39 "Can you hunt the prey for the lion, or satisfy the appetite of the young lions, 40 when they crouch in their dens, or lie in wait in their covert?
41 Who provides for the raven its prey, when its young ones cry to God, and wander about for lack of food?

"ibis" (the bird of Thot [ unregister], Egyptian god of wisdom, which announced the flood of the Nile) and "cock" (cf. the rabbinical prayer, "Blessed art thou, Adonai, our God, King of the world, who hast given to the cock [ unregister] the intelligence to discern between day and night"; cf. also First Targ. and Vulg.) While the presence of these birds fits the context, since they are associated with meteorological prediction (cf. vs. 37), it also prepares for the long poem on the wonders of wild animals.

a) The Lion and the Raven (38:39-41)

39-41. God—not Job—feeds the lion (cf. Ps. 104:20-22) and the raven (cf. Ps. 147:9).

b) Mountain Goats and Hinds (39:1-4)

39:1-4. God—not Job—knows the intimate life of the mountain goats (or "the antelopes of the rocks") and hinds, as well as the way in which their young ones . . . grow up.
4 Their young ones are in good liking, they grow up with corn; they go forth, and return not unto them.
5 Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass?
6 Whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings.
7 He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver.
8 The range of the mountains is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing.
9 Will the unicorn be willing to serve thee, or abide by thy crib?
10 Canst thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow? or will he harrow the valleys after thee?
11 Wilt thou trust him, because his strength is great? or wilt thou leave thy labor to him?
12 Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy barn?
13 Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings and feathers unto the ostrich?
14 Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in the dust,

4 Their young ones become strong, they grow up in the open; they go forth, and do not return to them.
5 "Who hath let the wild ass go free? Who has loosed the bonds of the swift ass,
6 to whom I have given the steppe for his home, and the salt land for his dwelling place?
7 He scorns the tumult of the city; he hears not the shouts of the driver.
8 He ranges the mountains as his pasture, and he searches after every green thing.
9 "Is the wild ox willing to serve you? Will he spend the night at your crib?
10 Can you bind him in the furrow with ropes, or will he harrow the valleys after you?
11 Will you depend on him because his strength is great, and will you leave to him your labor?
12 Do you have faith in him that he will return, and bring your grain to your threshing floor?"
13 "The wings of the ostrich wave proudly; but are they the pinions and plumage of love?"
14 For she leaves her eggs to the earth, and lets them be warmed on the ground,

4 Heb your grain and your threshing floor
5 Heb obscure

- The Wild Ass (39:5-8)
5-8. God—not Job—has given freedom to the wild ass.

- The Wild Ox (39:9-12)
9-12. The wild ox (בִּגְשָׁם; cf. the Akkadian remu, perhaps an Asiatic buffalo) is not willing to serve man, not even Job.

- The Ostrich (39:13-18)
13-18. These verses were absent in the original LXX. The ostrich is ugly (vs. 13) and foolish (vss. 14-16; vs. 17 is probably a marginal comment which has crept into the main text), but it is able to outrun the horse.

21). As Nicodemus did that night Jesus was talking to him about being born again (John 3:1-21). He spent half an hour tacking and filling. "How can these things be?" He was more comfortable when he was puzzled. There are a good many who stick fast part way through some such Scripture as "Bless them that curse you" (Matt. 5:44). If a man sues you for your shirt, throw in the cloak too. If he compels you to go a mile, go with him two (Matt. 5:40-41).
15 And forgettesth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them.
16 She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers: her labor is in vain without fear;
17 Because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding.
18 What time she lifteth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider.
19 Hast thou given the horse strength? hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?
20 Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper? the glory of his nostrils is terrible.
21 He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men.
22 He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted; neither turneth he back from the sword.
23 The quiver rattleth against him, the glittering spear and the shield.
24 He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage: neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet.

15 Forgetting that a foot may crush them, and that the wild beast may trample them.
16 She deals cruelly with her young, as if they were not hers; though her labor be in vain, yet she has no fear;
17 because God has made her forget wisdom, and given her no share in understanding.
18 When she roases herself to flee, she laughs at the horse and his rider.
19 "Do you give the horse his might?
   Do you clothe his neck with strength?"
20 Do you make him leap like the locust?
   His majestic snorting is terrible.
21 He paws in the valley, and exults in his strength;
   he goes out to meet the weapons.
22 He laughs at fear, and is not dismayed, he does not turn back from the sword.
23 Upon him rattle the quiver, the flashing spear and the javelin.
24 With fierceness and rage he swallows the ground;
   he cannot stand still at the sound of the trumpet.

f) The Horse (39:19-25)

19-25. God—not Job—gave the horse his might (vs. 19a) and "mane" (vs. 19b; cf. thunder or strength: the word נושאר is probably derived from the verb עשת, "to thunder" [cf. 40:9] and may mean "trembling one," hence "mane"; cf. the Greek words φώνα, "mane," and φόβος, "fear"). These verses form a distinctive poem composed of three strophes in a special meter. The poet displays an intimate knowledge and appreciation of hippology.

No use shifting about from one foot to the other saying it makes no sense. God may not have to make that kind of sense. Mark Twain used to say that the things he could not understand about the Bible gave him very little trouble. It was the things he could understand that gave him all the trouble he was looking for.

Other "mysteries" come of insisting on the "now" and dropping out of sight the "after awhile" (cf. Expos. on 35:3). Take the promises which God has been at such pains to scatter around like flowers in a meadow. It is not always clear how he is going to make them good. Things seem to get out of hand, beyond all help. At the end of the universe is a blank wall.

The height of folly would be to quit when God is just about ready to begin. Such walls have had holes knocked in them more than once, wide enough for a regiment to march through. To keep staring out of the window when Someone is at the door—that nothing happens on such terms is no mystery at all. The trouble then is not with the Person at the door, but with the person at the window.

But when even due allowance is made for dullness and downright insincerity, there is yet the unfathomable deep. What could one make of God if he could be made out (see Expos. on 11:2-6, 7)? There is yet the problem of evil which taunted Swinburne beyond endurance.
25 He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting.

26 Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings toward the south?

27 Doth the eagle mount up at thy command, and make her nest on high?

28 She dwelleth and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock, and the strong place.

29 From thence she seeketh the prey, and her eyes behold afar off.

30 Her young ones also suck up blood: and where the slain are, there is she.

25 When the trumpet sounds, he says ‘Aha!’ He smells the battle from afar, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting.

26 “Is it by your wisdom that the hawk soars, and spreads his wings toward the south?

27 Is it at your command that the eagle mounts up and makes his nest on high?

28 On the rock he dwells and makes his home in the fastness of the rocky crag.

29 Thence he spies out the prey; his eyes behold it afar off.

30 His young ones suck up blood; and where the slain are, there is he.”

40 Moreover the Lord answered Job, and said,

2 Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him? he that reproveth God, let him answer it.

40 And the Lord said to Job:

2 “Shall a faultfinder contend with the Almighty?

He who argues with God, let him answer it.”

5. SILENCE OF JOB (40:1-5)

a) CLOSING CHALLENGE (40:1-2)

40:1-2. Shall a faultfinder contend with the Almighty? This translation is based upon the Masoretic pointing which understands the word רָבִיה (rābh) as an infinitive absolute of the verb בֵּר, בֵּר, “to contend,” and the hapax legomenon יִסּוֹר (yissôr) as a noun derived from the verb יִסָּר (cf. 5:17) and meaning “censor,” faultfinder. It is better to follow some of the ancient versions (Targ., Symm., Vulg.) and to consider the word בֵּר as a participle (rābh) and the word יִסָּר as an intransitive verb (yāsâr) meaning “to yield,” “to cease,” “to desist” (cf. Isa. 11:18; Amos 6:7); thus one obtains a perfect parallelism of grammatical construction between vs. 2a and vs. 2b, as follows: “Will he who disputes with the Almighty yield? Will he who reproves God answer these things?” The question is not whether Job contends with the Almighty (cf. RSV), for he has done

(see Expos. on 10:1-22)—and the mystery of the good to offset it. Always somewhere the cloud and thick darkness. For those who expect it, who will not let it irritate them, or make them uneasy, or fill them with doubt, there is a kind of comfort in it. At least they are rid of the kind of God that the nineteenth century wanted to give the world (see Expos. on 33:12), with its “fifty-seven varieties” of custom-built explanations; they may even be on the way to what the N.T., through “distress of nations, with perplexity” (Luke 21:25), goes about calling faith, in deep and awe-struck tones, ready to do the will of God where it is known, and to stop worrying about it where it is not. One who on a cross overcame the hazard of that distance which separates God from man is not likely to find an insuperable obstacle in any distance which man allows to separate him from God. In these chapters the mystery is given its
3 Then Job answered the Lord, and said,
4 Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth.
5 Once have I spoken; but I will not answer: yea, twice; but I will proceed no further.
6 Then Job answered the Lord unto Job out of the whirlwind, and said, just that throughout the poetic discussion with his three friends, but whether he will now desist or be able to answer the queries which Yahweh has put to him. Thus understood, this verse provides a satisfactory link with the preceding and following context.

b) Submission of the Hero (40:3-5)

3-5. Behold, I am of small account (vs 4a; יִשְׂכֵּל, “I am light, insignificant,” perhaps with an evil connotation; cf. vile, KJV). Job slowly discovers his proper place in the universe, as well as the nature of his relationship to God, who created the cosmos and maintains it in order and harmony. He thus dimly becomes aware of the folly of his previous judgment of God and realizes that his presumption has been criminal. He can do so because he is now lifted into the realm of world-wide contemplation, with God as a guide, where the old questions concerning his puny self have lost their importance. He is not yet articulate about his consciousness of guilt, and may not even be conscious of it, but the way is being cleared for the inception of his sense of sin. What shall I answer thee? (Vs. 4a). From the new vantage point afforded him by the divine intervention he is still perplexed, to be sure, by the mystery of his suffering, but he is no longer in a mood to make his claim of innocence and thus to maintain that God owes him health and wealth. His religion is undergoing a process of purification as little by little he abandons the position of paganism (idolatry of the self) and moves toward the new realm of authentic monotheism. He is gradually passing from an egocentric to a theocentric view of the world and of existence. He is not ready, however, to proceed from a confession of insignificance to a confession of repentance, because he has not yet grasped in its full import his confrontation with God (cf. 42:5-6). Therefore he says at this point merely, I lay my hand on my mouth (vs. 4b). His silence, however, is not one of dumbness. He could speak, but he refrains. I have spoken once, and I will not repeat (vs. 5a; read הנה instead of הנה, answer, which is repeating vs. 4a). The negative insistence probably reveals the intensity of the inner convulsion: Twice, but I will proceed no further (vs. 5b). The poet admirably succeeds in suggesting that humility does not come easily to a man of Job’s caliber, buffeted by pain and unbowed by the most horrible series of physical and mental tortures. If this exegesis is correct, the presence of a second discourse of Yahweh is quite justified.

B. Second Discourse of Yahweh (40:6-42:6)

Most modern commentators maintain that the second discourse of Yahweh on Behemoth (40:15-24) and Leviathan (41:1-34) represents a series of later additions, or at any rate is displaced from its original location at the end of the procession of animals meaning, and its meaning is God. “Will he who disputes with the Almighty yield? Will he who reproves God answer these things?” (See Exeg. on 40:1-2.)

What shall I answer...? I lay my hand on my mouth.

40:6-42:6. Like a Prince?—(Cl. 31:37.) Once more now comes the challenge. I shall again ask the questions, says God. You answer them. Will you make nothing at all of my righteousness? Will you condemn me in order to justify yourself? Come up where I am, as you seem to wish (see Expos. on 34:31-33), and tread down the 7 Gird up thy loins now like a man: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

7 "Gird up thy loins like a man; I will question you, and you declare to me.

(39:30). They argue that (a) Yahweh's purpose is already achieved when Job submits (40:3-5); (b) Yahweh's renewal of the challenge (40:6-14) is superfluous or even "comes perilously near nagging" (Peake, Job, p. 332); (c) the developments on Behemoth and Leviathan constitute merely a continuation of the gallery of animals (38:39-39:30); (d) these developments are poetically inferior to those which precede and are written in a different style, thus betraying a separate hand; (e) Yahweh introduces the question of Job's attacks on divine righteousness (40:8), but in his final answer (42:1-6) Job ignores this question completely and refers only to the might of the Deity; (f) the final confession of Job (42:1-6) is obviously an integral continuation of the first (40:4-5).

While it is probable that the developments on Behemoth and Leviathan have been expanded by another poet, and it is possible that various alterations and transpositions have been imposed on the early forms of the MS, the fact remains that the order of the present text reveals rhetorical skill, psychological perspicacity, and theological discernment. The following points should be taken into consideration: (a) Yahweh's purpose is not achieved when Job submits, because submission—as seen above (see Exeg. on 40:3-5)—does not mean repentance; (b) consequently, Yahweh's renewal of the challenge is not superfluous: it is made necessary by the purely negative character of Job's acceptance of silence; (c) the developments on Behemoth and Leviathan do not constitute merely a continuation of the gallery of animals, but introduce a new meditation on the nature and activity of God, with the help of mythical motifs (see Exeg. on 40:15-23; 41:1-34); (d) the differences of style and poetic ability may easily derive from the difference of subjects, and in any case literary heterogeneity—if demonstrated—is not at this point of direct relevance for the correctness of interpretation, since the exegete must ultimately deal with the book of Job as a finished product of the Joban school; (e) the fact that Job ignores Yahweh's question concerning divine righteousness is of no significance, since the hero in his final answer stands no longer on the level of intellectual discussion (see Exeg. on 40:1-5); (f) Job's last confession is of course an integral continuation of the first but it cannot take place at once: it needs a slow maturing which can occur only during a second discourse of Yahweh, and presumably under its impact. Thus, in addition to dramatic suspense, the separation of Job's response in two different moments suggests a depth of anguish and a breadth of bewilderment which could not otherwise be communicated to the hearer or reader, and—a most important point—implies that the spiritual phenomenon of repentance includes not only a negative act of silent submission but also a positive recognition of the presence of God; not only an avowal of guilt but also a commitment to the will of God and a dedication to his service (cf. mutatis mutandis the medieval distinction between attrition and contrition).

1. Renewed Challenge (40:6-14)

6-7. The introductory formulas of the second discourse of Yahweh are almost identical with those of the first (cf. 38:1, 3), an indication of a parallel pattern between the two, and a sign of the place where the second discourse actually begins.

wicked if you can. You think I should. Try it. Hide them . . . in the dust. Shut them up in the darkness of death. Then boast of your own right hand, and I will be the one to sing your praise! As if to say, "Suppose now that you were omnipotent, as you like to think you are, more or less; what would you do?" A physicist once spoke with chuckling amusement of some of his students, especially of those who would come to him every now and then with their criticisms of much in particular and of almost everything in general. He said he had found a way to rock most of them back on their heels. He would let them get it all out of their system, and then ask what constructive suggestions they had to offer. Whereupon, having smashed "this Sorry Scheme of Things entire," they would begin to rebuild it "nearer to the Heart's De-8 Wilt thou also disannul my judgment? Wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous?
9 Hast thou an arm like God? or canst thou thunder with a voice like him?
10 Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency; and array thyself with glory and beauty.
11 Cast abroad the rage of thy wrath: and behold every one that is proud, and abase him.
12 Look on every one that is proud, and bring him low; and tread down the wicked in their place.

8. The new questions of Yahweh penetrate to the core of the problem presented by the book of Job and delineate most clearly its configuration: the purpose of the book is not to discuss the mystery of the suffering of the innocent or the prosperity of the wicked, but to meditate on the meaning of pure religion (see Exeg. on 1:9) and therefore of justification by faith.

Wilt thou also disannul my judgment? Vs. 8a means, lit., “Wilt thou even reduce to nought my righteousness?” (cf. the paraphrase of RSV). Job indeed has not only asserted his innocence, he has also denied the righteousness of God (9:22; etc.). It is not necessary for Yahweh to prove his own righteousness. The poet does not believe that such a demonstration would be of any avail. Job requires more than that. Thus, subtly and devastatingly the next question will shift the argument from the plane of an academic query to the reality of an existential blow which will strike at the hero’s spirit rather than at his mind. Wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous? (Vs. 8b.) The drama is reaching its theological apex. Job, the paragon of virtue and the example of morality, had expected to receive from God his due. When frustrated, and in all appearances condemned in the eyes of his fellow men and in his own, the alternative left him was either to confess that he had no claim upon God’s bounty or to declare God to be wrong in order to maintain his own self-righteousness. Thus the poet again and most eloquently exposes the sin of Job—not a sin of the horizontal type produced by ethical crimes directed against men, but a sin of the vertical type by which a creature dares to pass judgment upon his God and to indict his Creator. The vocabulary is not adequate since the poet has not yet been able to formulate a terminology which fits a doctrine of theological sinfulness. But the reality is powerfully and unambiguously suggested. If Job had the power of the Creator, then God himself would recognize the right of an equal to criticize an equal. God’s further questioning is therefore infinitely sad, but its irony is not devoid of love and it half reveals compassion.

9-13. Hast thou an arm like God? (Vs. 9a.) Job’s attacks against the righteousness of God have been expressions of his self-righteousness, and this in turn is the evidence of his delusion of self-deification. If Job were God (vs. 10), he would no doubt set the world right, abase [the] proud, ... and tread down the wicked in their place (vss. 11-13).

sire.” * He would listen very patiently, and then would say, “Do you know what my idea of hell is? Let me tell you. My idea of hell is for you to have to live in the kind of world you seem itching to put together.” If you were omnipo-
* The Rubá‘íyat of Omar Khayyám, st. xcix.

tent, what would you do? It might at least call for less talk. And not only for humility, but for repentance. This second discourse of Yahweh has to do with power; but it is power which by implication (vss. 7-14) is set in the context of weakness (see Expos. on 9:2-10). Maybe
13. Hide them in the dust together; and bind their faces in secret.
14. Then will I also confess unto thee that thine own right hand can save thee.
15. Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee; he eateth grass as an ox.

---

14. Now comes a verse which may be considered as the pivot of the book, echoing the question of the Satan (1:9) and preparing the response of the hero (42:6): "Then, I, myself, shall praise thee" (דָּעַ֣ת) because thine own right hand can save thee (vs. 14; cf. Ps. 98:1). Man is aping God whenever he attempts to save himself, i.e., whenever he tries to be a man without God (cf. Gen. 3:5; cf. also Mark 15:31), the master of his own destiny, the author and fulfiller of his own salvation. The poet is anticipating here the N.T. analysis of justification by works. "The divine irony, infinitely keen and yet infinitely kind, becomes most humbling at the close of the answer from the whirlwind. It invites the doubter to array himself with honour and majesty, mount the throne of the world, seize the reins of government, and use his power to abase the proud and send the wicked to their doom. Then he will acquire the experience which will enable him to pass an intelligent judgment upon the government of the world. For he will know what it is to be God,—will realise the amazing complexity of the universe, the endless multiplicity of the divine interests and solicitudes, the relation of each self-centered human unit to the mighty sum of things. And then it will be time for God to praise a man whose own right hand hath gotten him the victory!" (James Strahan, The Book of Job [Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1915], p. 382. Used by permission.) The expression דָּעַ֣ת, "I would praise thee," is a technical term used in the cultic act by men who sing to God their gratitude (cf. Ps. 18:49; 30:9; etc.). The fact that the poet does not hesitate to lend it to God himself addressing a man provides the final touch of irony. The human hero is indeed offered by God the place of God! "The doubter is supposed to . . . draw the sword of justice, and bathe it in the blood of all the wicked. He makes a solitude and calls it peace. He vindicates justice by emptying the world. It is now time for God to raise a paean, either as the ancients did, 'Euge! macte virtute!' or as the moderns do, 'See, the conquering hero comes!'" (Ibid., p. 385.)

2. Behemoth (40:15-24)

As Job replies nothing, Yahweh continues, according to the present text, with the description of Behemoth. In all probability this section (40:15-24) has been added to the original text by a wise man of the Joban school who interpreted Leviathan (41:1-34) as a crocodile of mythical proportion and thought that its Egyptian counterpart, the mythical hippopotamus, was unfortunately absent. Both figures are found side by side or fighting together on many frescoes of the Ancient Egyptian Empire (see Adolf Erman, Life in Ancient Egypt, tr. H. M. Tirard [London: Macmillan & Co., 1891], pp. 289-40) and even on the late tomb of Petosiris. The Behemoth passage is not written in the style of questions as is the first discourse of Yahweh (38:2-40:5) or the section on Leviathan (41:1-34). It will be observed also that vs. 19 refers to "God" in the third person—a strange procedure in the mouth of Yahweh.

15-24. Behemoth (vs. 15a) has been identified with the hippopotamus, an animal of the Nile Valley, unknown in the western part of Asia Anterior. However, the poet had in mind a creature of mythical significance, not a mere representative of an animal species (see Hermann Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit [2nd ed.;
16 Lo now, his strength is in his loins, and his force is in the navel of his belly.
17 He moveth his tail like a cedar: the sinews of his stones are wrapped together.
18 His bones are as strong pieces of brass; his bones are like bars of iron.
19 He is the chief of the ways of God. he that made him can make his sword to approach unto him.
20 Surely the mountains bring him forth food, where all the beasts of the field play.
21 He lieth under the shady trees, in the covert of the reed, and fens.
22 The shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows of the brook compass him about.
23 Behold, he drinketh up a river, and hasteth not: he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth.
24 He taketh it with his eyes: his nose pierceth through snares.

Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1921], pp. 41-69), although he conceived it largely according to a stylized image of the hippopotamus which he may well have obtained de visu. It has been maintained by some that the word Behemoth is a loan word from the Egyptian pe-emu, "water horse" (?), but the Hebrew הבמות can be explained simply as a plural of majesty of הבמות, "quadruped," meaning "the animal colossus par excellence" (cf. Ps. 73:22).

The monster in question is a creature of Yahweh, like Job (vs. 15a), and the poet's insistence upon this point may betray some polemical intent: not even a primeval beast (cf. vs. 19) originates outside of the creative act of God. The LXX omits the expression which I made, but the meter and syntax require its presence. The description stresses the sexual vigor of the giant (vs. 16 and probably also vs. 17ab; the word in the dual מזון, thigs is euphemistic; cf. Targ., Vulg., and KJV). Behemoth is not an animal similar to those of the first discourse but a unique monster, the chief of the ways of God (vs. 19a; cf. Gen. 49:3; Prov. 8:22; see Gunkel, ibid., p. 62; the text of vs. 19b is corrupt beyond recognition). It is not a mere hippopotamus, for, although some details suggest an Egyptian habitat (see lotus and reeds in vs. 21-22a, the river in vs. 23a), others point to a different geographical location (see mountains in vs. 20a, beasts of the field in vs. 20b, willows of the brook in vs. 22b, Jordan rushes in vs. 23b). Moreover, the Egyptians did capture the hippopotamus (see Erman, op. cit., pp. 239-40), whereas Behemoth eludes human hunt (vs. 24); the RSV wrongly paraphrases the Hebrew in treading down the wicked in a world like this is more even than omnipotence can accomplish. The Cross is testimony enough that God cannot do what he likes. Men can come nearer doing it than God can. Life is shudderingly nearer what they want than it is to what he wants. "I, the Lord thy God, have a job on my hands." Hear him say that, and look at the tired lines on his face. For all his patience, centuries long; for all his sad Gethsemanes, "man won't come Canst thou draw out Leviathan with a hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down?

Canst thou put a hook into his nose? or bore his jaw through with a thorn?
Will he make many supplications unto thee? will he speak soft words unto thee?
Will he make a covenant with thee? wilt thou take him for a servant for ever?
Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? or wilt thou bind him for thy maidsens?
Shall the companions make a banquet of him? shall they part him among the merchants?
Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons? or his head with fish spears?
Lay thine hand upon him, remember the battle, do no more.
Behold, the hope of him is in vain: shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him?

"Can you draw out Leviathan with a fishhook, or press down his tongue with a cord?
Can you put a rope in his nose, or pierce his jaw with a hook?
Will he make many supplications to you? Will he speak to you soft words?
Will he make a covenant with you to take him for your servant for ever?
Will you play with him as with a bird, or will you put him on leash for your maidsens?
Will traders bargain over him? Will they divide him up among the merchants?
Can you fill his skin with harpoons, or his head with fishing spears?
Lay hands on him; think of the battle; you will not do it again!
Behold, the hope of a man is disappointed; he is laid low even at the sight of him.

his eyes which refers to a method used for the seizure not of the hippopotamus but of the crocodile (the blinding of the animal's eyes with clay; Herodotus History II. 70); also, instead of הביסות (plural), with a snare (singular, a meaning which obviously does not fit the context pierce his nose), read הביסים, "with thorns" or "with harpoons."

3. Leviathan (41:1-34 [=Hebrew 40:25-41:26])
As noted above (see Exeg. on 40:15-24), the second discourse of Yahweh in its original form probably passed from the unanswerer challenge (40:6-14) directly to the questions on Leviathan (41:1-34).

a) Meaning of Pure Religion (41:1-12)

41:1-11. Leviathan is different from an ordinary crocodile because it is a sea monster which cannot be captured (vss. 1 ff.; cf. vs. 31), produces eclipses (3:8; cf. 26:13), and is associated with the forces of the primeval chaos (Ps. 74:14; Enoch 60:7-9; II Baruch 29:4; II Esdras 6:49-52). Like the whole of mankind, Job is totally impotent before it, but Yahweh can afford to speak of it with serene detachment and even playfulness (cf. vs. 5 with Ps. 104:26). Each line of humorous interrogation leads to the final questions which give meaning to the whole passage (vss. 10-11).

Who then is he that can stand before me? (Vs. 10b.) Once again the poet avails himself of the opportunity to describe by inference his concept of pure religion (cf.
10 None is so fierce that dare stir him up: who then is able to stand before me?
11 Who hath prevented me, that I should repay him? whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine.
12 I will not conceal his parts, nor his power, nor his comely proportion.
13 Who can discover the face of his garment? or who can come to him with his double bridle?
14 Who can open the doors of his face? his teeth are terrible round about.

10 No one is so fierce that he dares to stir him up.
Who then is he that can stand before me?
11 Who has given to me, that I should repay him?
Whatever is under the whole heaven is mine.
12 “I will not keep silence concerning his limbs, or his mighty strength, or his goodly frame.
13 Who can strip off his outer garment?
Who can penetrate his double coat of mail?
14 Who can open the doors of his face?
Round about his teeth is terror.

The meaning of the Hebrew is uncertain.
Gk. Heb: bridle

1:9; 40:14). He therefore ascribes to God the momentous query, Who has given to me, that I should repay him? (vs. 11). With the Targ. and a few Hebrew MSS, some critics read הנעוז (third person suffix) instead of והנעוזי (first person suffix), and therefore interpret the verse as referring to Leviathan, thus translating, “Who has ever affronted him?” The LXX, however, supports the traditional Hebrew reading of the first person suffix. The M.T. means, lit., “Who ever preceded me (with a gift)” or “Who ever came toward me (with a gift)” See the KJV’s archaic English, Who hath prevented me? Such an idea fits admirably the context, Whatever is under the whole heaven is mine (vs. 11b; cf. 35:7, and especially Rom. 11:35). Here is no less than a subtle but drastic indictment of all ritualistic or moralistic attempts to force the hand of the Deity (cf. Ps. 50:10). The poet of Job takes his place among the theological singers of sola gratia. Man cannot bestow any gift upon God, either of his wealth or of his deeds and behavior. God does not owe Job anything and Job cannot give God anything, even less make demands upon him.

12. This verse is absent in the LXX, and its language is obscure. The RSV considers it as a reintroduction of Leviathan (vss. 13 ff.), but one may relate it to the preceding context and interpret it as an indirect reference to Job, who is already alluded to in vs. 11 (see the interrogative who and the personal pronoun him). Vs. 12 might then be rendered, “Would I keep silence [Qere ש in instead of Kethib ש] concerning his boastings [רבדוי; cf. the meaning of this word in 11:3 rather than limbs as in 18:13], or (his) talk of power [בנורו, plural of majesty], and his fair array (of words)!” This translation, however, is conjectural.

b) Additional Observations on Leviathan (41:13-34)

13-34. A wise man of the Joban school may have been responsible for the list of wonderful details concerning Leviathan’s invincibility: his scales, jaws, and back (vss.

... The willows of the brook compass him about. The rivers rage, and he fears them not. The floods swell even to his mouth, and he is not afraid. Take him with hooks, if you can; pierce his nose with a snare.
Or catch Leviathan for me. Press down his tongue with a cord. Will he make a covenant with thee, and speak soft words? Will you play with him as with a bird? There was an old rabbinical tradition that Yahweh spent the morning hours reading the Torah, the early afternoon attending to affairs of state, and the 15 His scales are his pride, shut up together as with a close seal.
16 One is so near to another, that no air can come between them.
17 They are joined one to another, they stick together, that they cannot be sundered.
18 By his sneezings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning.
19 Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out.
20 Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething pot or caldron.
21 His breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth.
22 In his neck remaineth strength, and sorrow is turned into joy before him.
23 The flakes of his flesh are joined together: they are firm in themselves; they cannot be moved.
24 His heart is as firm as a stone; yea, as hard as a piece of the nether millstone.
25 When he raiseth up himself, the mighty are afraid: by reason of breakings they purify themselves.
26 The sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold: the spear, the dart, nor the habergeon.
27 He esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood.
28 The arrow cannot make him flee: sling stones are turned with him into stubble.
29 Darts are counted as stubble: he laugheth at the shaking of a spear.
30 Sharp stones are under him: he spreadeth sharp pointed things upon the mire.
31 He maketh the deep to boil like a pot: he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment.
32 He maketh a path to shine after him; one would think the deep to be hoary.
33 Upon earth there is not his like, who is made without fear.

His back is made of rows of shields, shut up closely as with a seal.
One is so near to another that no air can come between them.
They are joined one to another; they clasp each other and cannot be separated.
His sneezings flash forth light, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the dawn.
Out of his mouth go flaming torches; sparks of fire leap forth.
Out of his nostrils comes forth smoke, as from a boiling pot and burning rushes.
His breath kindles coals, and a flame comes forth from his mouth.
In his neck abides strength, and terror dances before him.
The folds of his flesh cleave together, firmly cast upon him and immovable.
His heart is hard as a stone, hard as the nether millstone.
When he raises himself up the mighty are afraid; at the crashing they are beside themselves.
Though the sword reaches him, it does not avail; nor the spear, the dart, or the javelin.
He counts iron as straw, and bronze as rotten wood.
The arrow cannot make him flee; for him slingstones are turned to stubble.
Clubs are counted as stubble; he laughs at the rattle of javelins.
His underparts are like sharp potsherds; he spreads himself like a threshing sledge on the mire.
He makes the deep boil like a pot; he makes the sea like a pot of ointment.
Behind him he leaves a shining wake; one would think the deep to be hoary.
Upon earth there is not his like, a creature without fear.

18-23; his might (vss. 24-30); his effect upon the deep and the sea (vss. 31-32); and—in conclusion—his uniqueness (vss. 33-34).
34 He beholdeth all high things: he is a king over all the children of pride.

42 Then Job answered the Lord, and said,
1 I know that thou canst do every thing, and that no thought can be withheld from thee.
3 Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? therefore have I uttered that I understood not; things too wonderful for me, which I knew not.

4. REPENTANCE OF JOB (42:1-6)

42:1. Whereas the first discourse of Yahweh leads to the negative response of the hero (40:3-5), the second discourse produces Job's positive response, his confession of total humility, his acknowledgment of the immediacy of God's presence, and finally his repentance.

2-4. At last Job recognizes the omnipotence of God and at the same time discerns that the divine will is neither arbitrary nor whimsical but follows a considered and deliberate purpose (vs. 2). Who is this that hides counsel without knowledge? (Vs. 3a.) This is a quotation from the first discourse of Yahweh (38:2) which the poet may very well have ascribed to Job at this point. It is possible to imagine the hero, quietly recalling his blasphemous expostulations while quoting in a chastened mood the word of God, Who is this that hides counsel without knowledge? This pondering aloud might be a way in which he assimilates all the ramifications of the immense truth which is now before him as well as a preparation for the confession which follows:

Therefore I have uttered what I did not understand, things too wonderful for me, which I did not know (vs. 3bc).

Likewise, still in the mood of melancholy recollection and engaged in the process of cool of the evening playing with Leviathan. Will you put him on leash for your maidens? Lay hold on him, and see what happens. You will not do it again! He laughs at the rattle of javelins, he leaves in the clay the mark of a threshing machine.

He counts iron as straw, and bronze as rotten wood.

Out of his nostrils comes forth smoke, as he blows out his hot breath with water from his mouth. He makes the deep boil like a pot. Who then is he that can stand before me? Who will put me in his debt? (See Expos. on 30:25.) And that is the upshot of it really; hardly calculated to warm Job's heart.

But something has changed him. Listen:

Then Job answered the Lord: "I know that thou canst do all things, and that no purpose of thine can be thwarted."

Thou didst ask: Who is this that hides counsel without knowledge? It is I, I who have uttered what I did not understand, things too wonderful for me, which I did not know.

Thou didst say, I will put the questions, you answer. What is it going to be now? Will Job argue his cause, carry his indictment on his shoulder, bind it on him as a crown, give account of all his steps, come like a prince before God (31:35-37)? Answer? Forbid it, O God, that I should! I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee. I am undone! In dust and ashes I repent. What has brought about that change? Not an argument. Not anything on the surface of these chapters. Certainly God has not just overpowered him, beaten him down with majesty and the mystery of things, forced him into submission. What has happened? (See Expos. on Heb. 12:18-24.)
4 Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.
5 I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee:

"Hear, and I will speak;
I will question you, and you declare to me."

5 I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now my eye sees thee; intent introspection, Job may be repeating to himself the words which God has pronounced and which linger in his subconscious mind as an indicting echo:

Hear, and I will speak;
I will question you, and you declare to me (vs. 4; cf. 38:3).

And the word Hear, turning the train of thought, carries Job to the climactic discovery expressed immediately afterward, I had heard . . . (vs. 5). On the other hand, these two quotations of Yahweh's first discourse may have been originally marginal notes which an early reader thought to be appropriate explanations of Job's statements.

5. Most commentators are inclined to discern in this verse the supreme lesson of the book. Throughout the poetic discussion Job has displayed almost as pedantically as his three friends an academic knowledge of the Deity. He has come closer to the truth than they because he had been accustomed to sense the divine communion in highly personal terms; but his certainty of God's presence has been poisoned by the seemingly unjust fate inflicted upon him. In his frantic search for a formula which would at once preserve the justice of God and his own righteousness, Job was led to explore some alleys of thought down which other adherents of faith were to follow him (see 9:33; 16:19; 19:25-26), but even there he was hitting his head against various walls, for the God of whom he had heard was largely the product of man's calculating imagination and a projection of man's ideas of morality and justice upon an infinite realm. His knowledge of God proceeded from the hearing of the ear, the tradition of the wisdom schools, the testimony of the ancients, the word of the fathers. His religion had been inherited: it was of the secondhand variety. Traditional theology might well be satisfactory in times of prosperity, but it could not survive the strokes of destitution and pain, rejection by society, and isolation from God himself. But now, through an immediate confrontation of God

42:5. The Meaning of the Book.—The book of Job is not for the casual reader. Least of all is it for the man who thinks that religion can be reduced to ethics, that by all odds the most important thing is what people say and do. God will assuredly reward them if they say and do what is right; if not, he will assuredly punish them (cf. Expos. on 36:18, 21).

Obviously there are three levels on which it moves. The most superficial of them has to do with the suffering of the innocent (see Expos. on 36:5-15, 8-25, 8).

Deeper still is the level of the Satan's question, "Does Job fear God for nought?" (1:9; see Expos. on 1:6-12). Peter once asked Jesus, "Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?" (Matt. 19:27; Mark 10:28). It was something to be possessed, and that was bad; he put it at the beginning, and that was worse; he thought of what they had left for God, not of what God had left for them, and that was worst. Jesus answered, "A great deal; but let me tell you a story." And he told the story of the man who hired laborers into the vineyard; and how those who came for only an hour got as much at the last as those who had borne the heat and burden of the day. It was not fair? Jesus was scarcely interested in that. He was interested in telling Peter that all such matters were better left to the good man of the house. No doubt Peter understood and was properly ashamed (see Expos. on Luke 19:8). When the Satan's question finds its answer in a man who will yet fear God—as in his heart of hearts Job did—though it is for nought; when it is once established that the sneer of God's celestial cynic is a lie, that there is indeed a place in this strange world for disinterested religion, then the problem of innocent suffering has been undercut. Job is no longer asking "Why?" (see Expos. on 3:20). There is now for him a place where the problem is not solved; but it is beginning to dissolve. There is still a "Why?" but the 6 Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.

which the poet described by using the motif of the voice from the whirlwind, the hero's knowledge of religion proceeds from an entirely different source; and the only way in which he is able to express this intrinsically new reality is to say, My eye sees thee. The wise man has become a prophet (cf. Isa. 6:5). And like a prophet, who sees a holy God, he is thrown into the grip of self-abhorrence and the awe of self-destruction. Thus vs. 5 is indissolubly bound to the following lines. At last Job, the proud sheik, is conscious of his sinfulness and is able to confess it.

6. Wherefore I abhor myself (KJV) or Therefore I despise myself (RSV, Moffatt). These translations are better than "I loathe my words" (ASV mg.), "I retract" (Amer. Trans.), or "I repudiate (what I said)" (Driver and Gray), but they are probably still too weak for the difficult Hebrew word סנה. This verb is not the transitive סנה, "to despise" but the intransitive parallel of סנה, "to flow," "to melt" (see 7:5, 16; cf. LXX, Targ., Syriac; also Ps. 58:8), meaning here, "I melt into nothingness," "I sink into the abyss of nought" (cf. the prophet's exclamation, "Woe is me! for I am undone!" Isa. 6:5). The matter is qualitatively different from one of retraction or even of self-despising. It is man's reaction to a devastating encounter with "the holy" (see Rudolf Otto, The Idea of the Holy [New York: Oxford University Press, 1923], pp. 74-84 et passim), and specifically with "the Holy One." The finiteness of the creature is crushed at the sudden onset of the Creator's infinity. Life appears at the conjuncture of being and nonbeing; and before the Being who is the source and the all-embracing mover of his own existence, man shrinks into the infinitely small. Thus Job completes his sentence saying, I . . . repent in dust and ashes. Repent of what? Of ethical crimes which he has not committed? Rather, of the monstrous crime of having condemned his Creator. Job does not receive the verdict of acquittal he has longed for, or the public approval which he craved from his "vindicator." But he has no longer any need of them. This does not mean at all that he now discovers the certainty of his own innocence. On the contrary, it is because he is certain of God's care for him that he is able to perceive his guilt. As in the Bible generally, his sense of sin arises at the time of his salvation.

Many exegetical comments are misleading at this point, e.g., "[Job] knows that God is righteous, he knows that, though he suffers, he is righteous also" (Peake, Job, p. 343). Such an observation ignores the fact that Job is no longer egocentric. His ego—and therefore his desire for righteousness—is annihilated, and thus he is able truly to repent.

His attitude, therefore, is far from being merely negative. He is redeemed from the anguish, not only or mainly of his tortures, but also of his alienation from the God of his youth. And he repents not from moral guilt, but from a reckless display of distrust. God, whom he accused of acting as a drunken foe, has taken upon himself the gracious sharp outlines of it are fading. It does not disturb him any longer at the point where it first disturbed him. He is willing to leave it where the last word is not mystery at all, but faith, ineffable and triumphant.

"Say to men, Come, suffer; you will hunger and thirst; you will, perhaps, be deceived, be betrayed, cursed; but you have a great duty to accomplish: they will be deaf, perhaps, for a long time, to the severe voice of virtue; but on the day that they do come to you, they will come as heroes, and be invincible."

Now one more step. The third and deepest level on which the book moves has to do with the ways and being and very nature of God (cf. Expos. on 1:12). It is only when Job comes face to face with him, beyond all hearsay, firsthand, that he comes to himself. There for the first time he is rid of too much self. The obsession lets go its hold. He was being weaned away from it all along. When the Almighty comes Job's last horizon disappears. His narrow little world of suffering crumbles. His mind and his heart are caught up from the pin point of his own experience and set free to roam hither and yon through the wide reaches of the majesty and friendliness of God. Where there is meeting
And it was so, that after the Lord had spoken these words unto Job, the Lord said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the things that are right, as my servant Job hath.

After the Lord had spoken these words to Job, the Lord said to Eli'phaz the Te'manite: "My wrath is kindled against you and against your two friends; for you have not spoken of me what is right, as my serv-initiative of revealing himself in all the glory of the Creator and Ruler of nature. Job will not approach this God "as a prince" (31:37). He will take his place in the cosmos, trusting in God and saying in effect, "Thy will be done." His trust is the result of his immediate communion (vs. 5) and the cause of his repentance (vs. 6), a repentance which means total dedication.

To be sure, the poet’s terminology is not sophisticated enough for the formulation of such a truth (cf. Ps. 73:23 ff.; Hab. 3:17-19). Yet it is hard to imagine a poet and a theologian of his caliber limited by immaturity of expression. It is therefore preferable to suppose that he respected the psychology of theological awe and knew so well the experience of holiness that he restrained himself from making his hero artificially and distastefully loquacious. It was Job, not the poet, who was laboring with a reality of tremendous newness which was fully conceived in his inner being but could not yet be brought forth into words.

V. EPILOGUE IN PROSE (42:7-17)

After the voice from the whirlwind and the response of the penitent Job (38:1-42:6), the prosaic style reappears abruptly as the storyteller, presumably the same as that of the prologue (see Intro., p. 884), describes the hero’s intercession for his friends (42:7-9) and his subsequent restoration (42:10-17).

A. JOB’S INTERCESSION FOR HIS FRIENDS (42:7-9)

7. After the Lord had spoken these words to Job: This clause ignores the hero’s confession (42:1-6), a fact which may indicate a discrepancy of authorship. Yahweh wrathfully accuses Eliphaz and his two friends, saying, You have not spoken of me what is right, as my servant Job has. Both the unqualified condemnation of the friends and the implied exculpation of the hero are unexpected; for the former have not been altogether

(see Expos. on 4 7) life is born and the sons of God shout together for joy. There God creates his “new creature,” and the questions die on Job’s lips. In the intimacies of the old relation, deepened and purified, the mists clear away into the knowledge that comes not of the hearing of the ear but of the eye with its sight restored. Could it be that there is no solution for any of the soul’s anguish, the mind’s fear, the heart’s despair, except in the peace of that presence? “But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him” (Luke 15:20). Why “a great way off,” unless that father had been going down to the gate every evening in the twilight to see if some wayfarer on the road might indeed be his son? “When . . . his father saw him, [he] ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him.” Is that what the book of Job really means? The entering in of One whose judgments are not man’s judgments. “You have not spoken of me what is right, as my servant Job has” (vs. 7). The skeptic was nearer home than the pious.

There is a religion of the irreligious. The heretic was the saint (cf. Expos. on 23:2). One whose judgments are not man’s judgments, but whose coming is man’s salvation. While over it all, as the arching sky, is the mystery of that mercy which rebukes him in order to gather him into the arms of its redemptive purpose.

7.17. The Epilogue.—(See Exeg.; Expos. on 5:17, 18, 23; 8:7; 11:16) During the American economic depression of the nineteen-thirties Calvin Coolidge wrote a magazine article to the effect that in Job we have one who passed through a period of extreme deflation, and for the lessons he learned in thrift and in diet became twice as prosperous as he ever was. Perhaps it should be observed that it was not an American who wrote the book of Job. No such crudities can be imported into it and set down with a flourish. Yet the shadow of God’s great hand is here, with its double bounty for every good withdrawn (see Expos. on 7:19), its peace on peace. The poet allows it to remain
8 Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering; and my servant Job shall pray for you: for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job.

9 So Eliphaz the Temanite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite went, and did according as the Lord commanded them: the Lord also accepted Job.

10 And the Lord turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends: also ant Job has. 8 Now therefore take seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering, and my servant Job shall pray for you, for I will accept his prayer not to deal with you according to your folly; for you have not spoken of me what is right, as my servant Job has." 9 So Eliphaz the Te'manite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Na'amathite went and did what the Lord had told them; and the Lord accepted Job's prayer.

10 And the Lord restored the fortunes of wrong about God's glory and holiness, although they may not have declared about Job נַחֲלָה, "what is true" (Deut. 18:14 [Hebrew 18.15]; I Sam. 23:23; Ps. 5:11 [Hebrew 5.10]; cf. the Akkadian ketta, "justice," "truth"); and the latter's statements, far from being endorsed by the poet as representing what is right, have been thoroughly condemned by the voice from the whirlwind and by the hero himself. These two facts may constitute another indication of literary heterogeneity.

8-9. A burnt offering of seven bulls and seven rams for the benefit of three men was of considerable magnitude (cf. Ezekiel's prescription for the entire people, Ezek. 45:22-25), and this detail, as well as that of Job's need to intercede on the behalf of his friends, has often been interpreted as underlining the gravity of their transgressions (yet cf. Balaam's sacrifice in Num. 23:1 ff.). Furthermore, it is remarkable that the author of the story extols the intercessory power of Job exactly as Ezekiel does when he mentions Job in association with Noah and Daniel (Ezek. 14:14, 20; the fact that the prophet suggests the ineffectuality of these three ancient figures' intercessory power neither proves nor disproves that the author of the Joban epilogue was ignorant of the Ezekiel statement). Yahweh hopes that he will not be compelled to inflict upon the friends any "harsh treatment" or "disgrace" (נוֹחַ, lit. folly; cf. 2:10; 30:8; cf. also Gen. 34:7; Deut. 22:21; etc.; the traditional paraphrase retained by the RSV is not supported by the Hebrew text). Job's prayer is acceptable to Yahweh, who calls him my servant, as in the prologue (1:8; 2:3). Observe that there is no mention of Elihu.

B. Job's Restoration (42:10-17)

10-11. The expression restored the fortunes (RSV) may be interpreted as turned the captivity (KJV; cf. Jer. 33:11; Hos. 6:11; Amos 9:14; Ps. 14:7; etc.), but this fact is (see Expos., pp. 905-7) because it belongs. Without it there would not only have been no artistic unity, there would have been no rounding out of what is after all a deep religious truth. To those who think the poem is well-nigh ruined by its "happy ending," let it be said that there is restoration in this world of God; there is even reward, which in normal sequence is the result of restoration—though one must keep from attaching a too facile interpretation to them. To have said nothing of them would have been to misrepresent a fact of experience.

Two comments will be found suggestive and useful. The first is by Norman H. Smuth:

If a people has no belief in any life beyond the grave worthy of the name, then of necessity this . . . vindication of right . . . must show itself in this life, on this earth, and in the things of this life. It follows therefore that the [righteousness] which God establishes must involve the blessings of honour from men and of general prosperity. These are the things of this life by which any good favour must be judged. Even the conclusion of the Book of Job admits this. The point as to whether the Book of Job is all from one hand or not, or all from the same period or not, is of no account in this connection. The last man to touch the book left it as it is.
the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before.

11 Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his sisters, and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house: and they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the LORD had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an earring of gold.

12 So the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses.

Job, when he had prayed for his friends; and the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before. 11 Then came to him all his brothers and sisters and all who had known him before, and ate bread with him in his house; and they showed him sympathy and comforted him for all the evil that the LORD had brought upon him; and each of them gave him a piece of money? and a ring of gold. 12 And the LORD blessed the latter days of Job more than his beginning; and he had fourteen thousand sheep, six thousand camels, a thousand yoke of oxen, 13 He had also seven sons and three daughters.
14 And he called the name of the first, Jemima; and the name of the second, Kezia; and the name of the third, Keren-happuch.
15 And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job: and their father gave them inheritance among their brethren.

which allowed inheritance to daughters only when there was no son). The final touch (vss. 16-17) likens the hero to the patriarchs of old (cf. Gen. 25:8; 35:29; 50:23; also Ps. 128:6; Prov. 17:6; 1 Chr. 29:28).

The literary discrepancies which have been observed between the epilogue and the discourses of Yahweh (see above) suggest that the poet was not responsible for the denouement of the story and thus should not be charged with upholding the traditional dogma of individual retribution. The interpreter has the right to conjecture that the poet borrowed as the setting of his theological meditation a folk tale which was already in the public domain, and that he accepted its ending because he had no alternative (see Intro., p. 888). The exegete may also consider that the poet, who was not primarily concerned with the problem of undeserved suffering, welcomed the conclusion of the ancient tale, for it provided a fitting symbol of earthly realism to his understanding of life with God. According to the biblical way of thinking, life is one, and communion with Yahweh means harmony within the self and the community, health, wealth, posterity, and death at a ripe old age. It may even have been inconceivable for the ancient Hebrews to imagine Job at peace with God and still destitute. The story of his restoration, with its stylized features, was the poetic symbol—in a prose story—of his ultimate salvation.

In any case, the biblical exegete must look at the book in its final form, and the epilogue may suggest a lesson which has not escaped the attention of theologians and thinkers (cf. Søren Kierkegaard, Repetition, tr. Walter Lowrie [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1941], p. 132). Job was no longer enslaved to his self or to the egocentric aspect of happiness and enjoyment of health, wealth, and family, and therefore had given them up completely as he abdicated his claim to vindication. Totally cleansed and Bible study, the message of the men who under God were responsible for the various strata, and the message of those who under God were the final editors. In both the truth of the Bible is to be found.

The other is by P. T. Forsyth:

Life begins as a problem. . . . It offers a task rather than an enjoyment. . . . The problem is disquieting, anxious, and even tragic. It is not simply interesting and amusing. . . . It touches the nerve . . . It involves the realities of life. . . . The next step is that there is a solution to the problem. Our battle is not a sport for heaven. I am thinking of the a-theology of Thomas Hardy, and the close of Tess of the D'Urbervilles. Life's tragedy is not God's jest. It is working out a real issue with Him. . . . The answer is there, and is the gift of God. It is provided. And it is practical. . . . It is not . . . an answer to a riddle but a victory in a battle. . . . So, the practical solution of life by the soul is outside life. The destiny of experience is beyond itself. . . . If life is a problem, its solution is a faith. . . . We 16 After this lived Job a hundred and forty years, and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations.

17 So Job died, being old and full of days.

totally dedicated, he could receive the possessions which he had renounced. The justice of God remains entire, and religion pure (see Intro., p. 902).

who in him entered in where life is at its lowest, and carried the burden of it, and transformed its pain, as Job's was transformed, into a blessing and a healing thing? This book says it did happen. Long, long before that third day when the light of God's victory began to shine into the world's darkness, and the dawn of another life broke over this life's sorrow. Can it happen again?

And the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning. And he died, being old and full of days.

I smiled to think God's greatness flowed around our incompleteness,—Round our restlessness, His rest.1

1 Elizabeth Barrett Browning, "The Rhyme of the Duchess May." Conclusion, st. xii.
PALESTINE in Old Testament Times